These historical poems deal mostly with the events and individuals of the Hellenistic Age, the long, brilliant but slowly declining period of Greek political power and culture in the eastern Mediterranean following the conquests of Alexander the Great; the political Hellenist world died with the suicide of Cleopatra. Some of Cavafy's works are about the Roman world, and a few treat episodes from the history of the Byzantine Empire. Some touch upon religion, although not from the viewpoint of belief; Cavafy was and remained a member of the Greek Orthodox communion but did not practice the religion. There are also love poems, obviously homosexual, intense but never presenting sexual acts.

Almost all his poems have a voice, a clear speaker. The voices are sometimes the actual voices of the protagonists, but more often, especially in the historical poems, there is a seemingly objective presentation, as if a film camera is filming the events and people, or there is a speaker outside the events, describing calmly, but never dispassionately, what is going on or has occurred.

His refusal to make explicit and simple generalizations grounds the poems in real human experience, not in vagueness or preachiness, so that the reader experiences their meanings; that is, Cavafy asks his reader to live in his world, not simply to draw grand or simple lessons from it. The general tone of his historical poems is elegiac—a quiet lament for loss, for the ends of things, for the decline of a great civilization, for the loss of individual hopes, and, in the end, for the inevitability of historical change, which destroys.

"WAITING FOR THE BARBARIANS"

First published: "Perimenontas tous varvarous," 1904 (collected in The Complete Poems of Cavafy, 1961)

Type of work: Poem

Two speakers, in the course of a day, talk of the collapse of their political world, unable to understand what is happening.

This poem is a dialogue, a short drama but deliberately without any sort of action; the first speaker asks a series of questions, which is answered by the second. Each exchange advances the time of day a little, from the morning to the late afternoon; there is no symbolic night that would somehow give closure. The dialogue has been read as reflecting the final days of the Roman Empire, attacked and overrun by Germanic invaders, although the scene and meaning should not be limited to a particular time or set of events. The poem is about Rome, but by implication about all imperial civilizations coming to their end; there is also a suggestion of the final days of the Byzantine Empire, the continuation of the Roman Empire in the eastern Mediterranean.

The speakers are citizens of a dying empire and are waiting for the arrival of the barbarians, who will take over, by implication making real decisions and exercising real power, restoring energy if not peace. The tone of the conversation is hardly excited; the voices are of a worn-out civilization, too tired to resist, too decayed to hope. The first speaker asks, as if unaware, why the citizens are waiting in the marketplace. The second speaker replies that they are waiting for the barbarians. There seems to be an awkwardness in having the first speaker seem so uninformed, but this is not really awkward; Cavafy is illustrating the decay of interest in the civic world, an apathy that has led to ignorance.

The powers of the state are present in all their external show, ready to greet the barbarians. This grand display, however, is essentially hollow. The senate, which under the Roman Republic ruled the state, is now, under the reign of the Roman emperors, simply a ceremonial group. However, the emperor also is hollow, powerless, simply carrying out ceremonies while waiting for someone, the barbarians, to settle matters. This waiting is a humiliation, but even humiliation is no longer significant.

Disconcertingly, however, the barbarians do not arrive. The first speaker finally asks why the waiting emperor, officials, and citizens are suddenly disturbed and then depart, going back to their homes in a confused manner. In an odd way, this is the only moment in the poem where emotion seems to be felt. The second speaker replies that people from the frontiers have reported that there are no more barbarians. The empire's citizens must face their own true emptiness. There is no solution, no ending, not even violence. The air has simply gone out of everything. Most empires end in violence but not in mere hopelessness, and this is the poem's final and devastating irony.

“ITHAKA”

First published: 1911 (collected in The Complete Poems of Cavafy, 1961)

Type of work: Poem

This poem and “The God Abandons Anthony” have related themes: “Ithaka” tells readers how to live, while “The God Abandons Anthony” tells readers how to die.

In “Ithaka,” Cavafy makes use of the story from the Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614), Homer’s epic tale of Odysseus’s ten-year struggle to return home from the Trojan War. This return is a kind of scaffolding for making a value statement about human life. The island kingdom of Ithaka becomes a symbol of completion and value, and the attempt to return should be the purpose of life. Odysseus is driven by a powerful longing for his home, a longing that ends with his arrival there; but for Cavafy, Ithaka is not a place, but a process, the journey itself, and the journey is one’s life. In brief, the purpose of life cannot simply be wrapped up by its ending; it is in living that one finds value.

The voice in the poem is, perhaps, the poet’s, speaking directly to the reader, even though that “reader” could also be Odysseus. The facts of Odysseus’s journey come into the poem only as symbols of what readers can meet on their lives’ journeys. In a sense, the voice urges readers to be moral, but it is not a preaching voice.

In the second section, the voice essentially tells readers to wish for a long life, but a life which is to be enjoyed for the pleasure of being alive, in seeing that which is new and beautiful, appealing to the senses. The readers also are urged to learn, “learn” being twice repeated in the Greek for emphasis on this part of the process.

Of course, one must always have the end, Ithaka, in mind, for it is “your destiny.” One should not hurry, however, and the end is not the end. Ithaka in itself may be “poor,” but getting there is how, in living one’s life, one will give and receive richness and meaning in that life.

“THE GOD ABANDONS ANTHONY”

First published: “Apoleipein o theos Antonion,” 1911 (collected in The Complete Poems of Cavafy, 1961)

Type of work: Poem

Using the story of the death of Marc Antony, the speaker here urges Antony—and, by implication, the reader—to accept one’s end gracefully and bravely.

According to Plutarch, on the night before Marc Antony died, he heard the sounds of the retinue of his tutelary god, Bacchus, leaving the city of Alexandria, in effect telling Antony that he no longer had any divine support in his struggle against Octavian, the future emperor Augustus. That departure is the subject of Cavafy’s poem; the speaker is simply a voice addressing Antony, telling him not to mourn but to accept his fate without fear and without regret, a lesson certainly, but a lesson about how to live, not how to get to heaven.

The poem is also about the ends of the lives of the once-powerful, the end of a political structure. The suicides of Antony and Cleopatra marked the last of the long succession of the Greek-descended Ptolemaic rulers of Egypt. The Romans, who had replaced Alexander’s Greek successors elsewhere, now ruled all of the eastern Mediterranean lands. In that, the poem is treating a great social event, an event that has meanings to and affects a great number of people. However, the poem is not simply a discussion of a political event, nor does it point to a moral; it is rather a presentation of how a great soul should conduct itself when all is lost.

The speaker of the poem addresses Antony at the same moment he addresses the reader, for the poem is indeed about Antony, but, potentially, about all of its readers. The first three lines are wonderfully imagistic, beginning with the evocative hour of “midnight,” the hour when strange, in this case wonderful, things happen. The speaker then introduces “the invisible troupe” of Bacchus, whom readers can imagine even though “invisible,” with its otherworldly music and clamor. The speaker directly addresses Antony (as well as the readers), urging him not to mourn the Alexandria that is “leaving” him; the last line of the poem will repeat this same pattern, only it is the Alexandria he is “losing.” The speaker urges Antony to be brave, not in the sense of taking violent action, but by an acceptance of his fate. Do not lament, do not regret. When one has lived one’s life, one should approach death bravely and with a final enjoyment of life, in this case the sound of the unearthly music, and so say goodbye to Alexandria, the marvelous city, Cavafy’s city.

SUMMARY

Constantine P. Cavafy’s poems based upon history and myth are his evocations of the past, but they have the purpose of telling readers not only about that past but how the past can add to and explain readers’ lives in the present.

L. L. Lee

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Poēmata, 1935 (Alexander Singopoulos, editor)

The Poems of C. P. Cavafy, 1951

The Complete Poems of Cavafy, 1961

Poēmata, 1963 (George Savidis, editor)

K. P. Kabaphē: Anekdotia poiēmata, 1968 (Savidis, editor)

Passions and Ancient Days, 1971

Collected Poems, 1975 (Savidis, editor)

Before Time Could Change Them: The Complete Poems of Constantine P. Cavafy, 2001

The Collected Poems of C. P. Cavafy, 2006 (Alik Barnstone, translator)

About the Author

Auden, W. H. Introduction to The Complete Poems of Cavafy. Translated by Rae Dalven. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1961.

Cavafy, C. P. The Canon: The Original One Hundred and Fifty-Four Poems. Translated by Stratis Haviaras, edited by Dana Bonstrom. Athens: Hermes, 2004.

Epstein, Joseph. "C. P. Cavafy, a Poet in History." New Criterion 12, no. 5 (January, 1994): 15.

Keeley, Edmund. Cavafy's Alexandria. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1996.

Liddell, Robert. Cavafy: A Critical Biography. London: Gerald Duckworth, 2001.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What could be Constantine P. Cavafy's purpose in choosing subject matter and people from the long distant past, in particular the Hellenistic Age, rather than more modern times? In developing this topic, consider in what way a Greek poet, writing about the Greek past, could have meaning to a modern person from another culture.
- Can the use of Greek or Roman myth be a useful practice for poets in the present world?
- In working out a "theme," a statement of meaning, for Cavafy's poems, can a reader argue that a work may have more than one theme? Must multiple themes agree with one another or can they clash?
- What is the attitude toward action, both physical and mental, in "Waiting for the Barbarians," "Ithaka," and "The God Abandons Anthony"?
- Why does Cavafy make little use of ideas or images drawn from nature?

© A. Van Mangoldt

PAUL CELAN

Born: Czernowitz, Romania (now Chernivtsi, Ukraine)
November 23, 1920

Died: Paris, France
April, 1970

Celan's tormented poetry of the Holocaust is an effort to reach into silence to find speech; his most renowned poem, "Death Fugue," is for many the most important poem to come out of World War II.

BIOGRAPHY

Paul Celan (say-LAHN) was born Paul Antschel in Romania to Jewish parents, Leon and Fritz Antschel, in 1920. It was a culture-rich household. Young Celan showed early promise in linguistics, learning a number of languages as a child and adolescent and developing a love of literature. Nevertheless, in 1938 he undertook premedical studies in France. While studying at Tours, he developed an admiration for Charles Baudelaire, Paul Verlaine, and Arthur Rimbaud, controversial French poets very much in vogue with young intellectuals.

Celan came home to the beginning of World War II and the capture and death of his parents, who refused to flee; his father died from disease in an internment camp and his mother was shot. He himself was forced to work in a Nazi labor camp in Moldavia for about eighteen months between 1942 and 1944. His anguish over the loss of his parents and his helplessness during the war informed his poetry throughout his life. His early poem "Todesfuge" ("Death Fugue"), still perhaps his most widely anthologized, was probably written in 1944.

After the war was over, Celan went to Bucharest, Romania, where he worked for a publishing house and associated with Surrealist poets and artists. He made the acquaintance in these years of both experimental poets and Jewish poets who were dealing specifically with Holocaust themes, including Nelly Sachs, with whom he had a long correspondence. He then stayed briefly in Vienna, finally relocating to Paris in 1948, where he studied philology, receiving his licence de lettres degree in 1950. His first poetry collection was published in Paris, and Celan was to remain there for the rest of his life, teaching German literature, publishing his poetry, and winning literary awards, including the Bremen Literature Prize and the George Büchner Prize.

Celan hated the German language and its Holocaust baggage but felt stuck with it; most of his poems are in German, although he wrote some in Romanian. His poetry from the outset was dark and difficult, becoming more so as he became older. His work became increasingly knotted and obscure as he engaged in his struggle with the language and his past. He changed his name first to Ancel, then to the French-sounding anagram of Ancel, Celan, fleeing the heritage that was his one true language. Ironically, Celan also translated the work of dozens of poets from many countries into German.

In Paris, Celan married the artist Gisele de Lestrangé, and the couple had two children. One son died in infancy. His surviving son, Eric, gave Celan a large part of the little joy he had in his life. The wonder and delight Celan experienced through his son appears in some of his last poems and in the published collection of his letters. These emotions, however, were not enough to outweigh his tragic past; he suffered constantly from depression, and at one point he voluntarily committed himself to a mental hospital, at the suggestion of his wife. He committed suicide by drowning himself in the Seine River sometime in April, 1970, after writing in his diary the comment, “Depart Paul.” His body was not found until the beginning of May; thus, his death date remains uncertain, although some sources list it as May 1.

ANALYSIS

From Celan’s very first work, the Holocaust was the overwhelming center of his poetry. There was no escape from the Holocaust into art, into language, into friendship, or into love. The poems are powerfully effective in bringing back the reality of the Holocaust and making those who came after it aware of what it did to those who survived it, as well as to those who did not.

His earliest poetry is his clearest, but Celan repudiated some of his early work even when it was popular. In his earliest work, Celan shows the horror of the Holocaust directly through description and reflection. The later work becomes more cryptic, enigmatic, folded in upon itself. The later work also has a more religious or spiritual dimension, asking a distant or absent God how such a thing as the Holocaust could be allowed to happen. Early poems are more purely mournful; later poems also interrogate, reach after answers that forever remain elusive. His late poems have been slow to appear in English despite their power and Celan’s reputation because they pose almost insurmountable problems to the translator.

In Celan’s early work, rhythms often ironically underscore the horror that is depicted in the poetry. These poems are more lyrical and more expansive than the poems that came later. The later poems are a grappling with the German language, which represented the destroyer to Celan, and yet was the only language in which he felt comfortable writing. Later poems have to be pored over, as the reader learns to appreciate the invented words and the words or expressions with multiple meanings. Celan develops a private mythology of death in which colors and sounds play against blacks and silences.

His view of poetry as a desperate attempt at communication is reflected in the acceptance speech he delivered when he received the Bremen Literary Prize in 1958. In this speech, he describes poetry as “a message in a bottle, cast out and addressed to something that stands open, perhaps an addressable Thou, an addressable reality.” He writes to connect, and yet this connection is unpredictable and unreliable. His speech is inseparable from silence. As he said when he accepted the George Büchner Prize, “Certainly the poem, the poem today shows—and this I think has only indirectly to do with the sharper fall of syntax or heightened sense of ellipsis—the poem unmistakably shows a strong bent toward falling silent.” He goes on to articulate something of his struggle as a poet, which may illuminate his struggle as a tormented Holocaust survivor: “It holds on . . . the poem holds on at the edge of itself; so as to exist, it ceaselessly calls and hauls itself from its Now-no-more into its Ever-yet.” (Translation is by John Felsteiner.)

Many critics claim that the early poem “Death Fugue” is the preeminent poem of the Holocaust. Other Celan poems, including “Todtnauberg,” have received major critical attention for their complex, difficult representation of World War II and its causes, its results, and its apologists. While some of Celan’s poetry was published in English shortly after the war, his reputation grew tremendously toward the end of the twentieth century. His importance is based on the depth of his work, its struggle with theological issues and with human evil. The intense torment of his desire to “survive” his experience, to find some reason for which life still could be lived, is present in every poem.

“DEATH FUGUE”

First published: 1947, in Romanian; 1948, in German as “Todesfuge” (collected in Nineteen Poems, 1972)

Type of work: Poem

The deaths of the Jews in the Holocaust are mourned in a musical poem that is the most frequently anthologized and taught of Celan’s poems.

“Death Fugue,” or “Todesfuge,” remains Celan’s most popular poem, although he at one time repudiated it, refusing to anthologize it further or to read it aloud. In this poem, Celan treats his subject, the Holocaust, directly and graphically. He wrote “Todesfuge” in 1944 or 1945—critics disagree—and it was first published in 1947 in Romanian, not German, having been translated by Celan's friend, Petre Solomon. This poem was immediately and immensely popular, as it expressed in unshakable images the Jewish experience under Adolf Hitler.

Celan indicated that the poem arose from the Nazi practice of forcing Jews to play dance tunes while prisoners were executed; in one camp where this was done, the entire orchestra was shot after the performance. His first name for the poem was Todestango (death tango), and it was first published under the Romanian equivalent of this name. The bleak, obsessive repetitions and the music of the lines suggest the death dance. The poem also has qualities of the musical form of the fugue, in which a theme or themes appear again and again in differing patterns. The theme of the blond- and dark-haired women, the black milk, and the death-dealer are repeated throughout the poem, the repetitions themselves creating a musical effect. Changes appear in the repeated lines, as variations on the theme.

In the poem the "we" who narrate describe the "black milk of daybreak we drink it at evening"; "we," perhaps the voiceless, annihilated Jews, are destroyed by those who should nourish them. (Translation is by Michael Hamburger.) The reader, too, is implicated, forced in mind to drink the milk and breathe the ashes of destruction. The ideal German, Aryan woman, Margarete, is compared with "ashen-haired" Shulamith, who is the erased Jewish woman. Margarete's name evokes the woman whom Faust seduces in Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's play Faust: Eine Tragödie (part 1, pb. 1808, pr. 1829; The Tragedy of Faust, 1823; part 2, pb. 1833, pr. 1854; English translation, 1838). Shulamith's name may suggest "shalom," the Hebrew word for peace, and it also alludes to the Beloved in the Song of Solomon. The speaker, the "we" or the Jews, are forced to "shovel a grave in the air" for Shulamith. Shulamith's hair is not merely covered with ashes—it is ashes; she is ashes. The women and the milk are motifs throughout the poem.

Another motif is the death-dealer, a man who "lives in the house," who is present in the enclosed society and whose pleasure is killing. He "looses his hounds on us grants us a grave in the air." The death-dealer is at the center of the action, playing "with his serpents" and sowing destruction around him. The repetition gathers heaviness as the poem proceeds, shifting back and forth between the women and the man. The phrase, "Black milk of daybreak we drink it at evening" goes through various permutations; the last is "Black milk of daybreak we drink you at night," the German familiar du (you) taking the place of the objective "it." The black milk is internalized, a part of the speaker. The poem concludes with a final reference to the two women, she of the golden hair and she of the ashen hair, as the music seems to die away into silence.

In "Death Fugue," the ashes of the death camps become the air that "we" must breathe—we the speakers, as well as we the readers. "We" become saturated with the Holocaust, drink its black milk, breathe in its smoke. Knowledge of Celan's life and of the Nazi's forced execution dances only deepens the experience. The images evoke the monstrous violation that was the Holocaust, and the eerie repetitious music ensures that the images of profound, irremediable loss will stay with the reader.

"TODTNAUBERG"

First published: 1970 (collected in Selected Poems and Prose of Paul Celan, 2001)

Type of work: Poem

This difficult poem shows Celan's ambivalent reaction to Martin Heidegger, a German philosopher whose work Celan respected but who has been accused of Nazi sympathies.

"Todtnauberg" was inspired by Celan's single encounter with one of the most famous philosophers of the twentieth century, Martin Heidegger. It has been the center of a fierce debate, most of which has taken place in France among contemporary philosophers, but the poem has been discussed at length in Germany, England, the United States, and elsewhere. It is a difficult poem because of its compression and allusiveness; without knowing its background the reader may find it impenetrable.

Todtnauberg was the name of Heidegger's home in the Black Mountains of Germany, and therefore this title cannot be translated, although the name's components reflect some of Celan's preoccupations: Tod (death) and Berg (mountain).

In 1966, after giving a reading, Celan was taken to a meeting with Heidegger at Todtnauberg. The two went for a walk and talked, and Celan wrote in Heidegger's guest book in his home. Then Celan went back to his hotel. That very week, he wrote the poem, identifying the time and place of composition.

Heidegger remains a major figure in contemporary theory. His reputation has been tainted by his association with Nazism, and rumors of this connection were already afloat when he met Celan. He was interested in Celan's work and Celan in his; Heidegger went to hear Celan read his work. However, the issue of Heidegger's politics remained a barrier between them.

In the poem, Celan describes his single visit with the German philosopher at Todtnauberg. The beginning seems bright with hope, as the first images in the poem are of the healing herbs, arnica and eyebright, that Celan spotted upon his arrival there. (Heidegger was impressed by Celan's knowledge of botany.) The speaker then takes a drink from a well—perhaps another symbol of hope and renewal. This is followed by his writing in the guest book, which is almost exactly what he wrote to Heidegger: "a hope, today,/ for a thinker's/ word/ to come,/ in the heart." (Translation is by Pierre Joris.) The question is: Was Celan asking for an explanation or an apology from Heidegger himself? The "thinker" is probably Heidegger.

In the poem, Celan is then driven back to his hotel, as he was after the actual visit. Upon leaving, he talks of how nature now appears: orchids, log trails, and dampness. There is a suggested unpleasantness: "Krudess," or crudeness, is shown, probably by another passenger, and the driver is witness to it. The trip continues with nature now appearing oppressive and overbearing.

As in many poems, the speaker is effaced; the event seems to happen unobserved. This poem includes only one reference to "us" and the rest is objective; Celan's later poetry tends to place the subject matter outside of the recorder. This makes the poem difficult to decipher. Is the crudeness indeed from another passenger? It is not identified. Or is it some insight into the visit that has just ended? Could it be that Celan has simply decided that no hope could possibly be justified, despite what he has just written in Heidegger's guest book?

Some argue that Celan is asking in the poem for an apology from Heidegger that does not come. Others think that he is looking to Heidegger as a thinker who could help the healing process. If the former, Heidegger did not seem to read the poem that way; he felt honored by it.

SNOW PART

First published: Schneepart, 1971 (English translation, 2007)

Type of work: Poetry

Celan's last and often most difficult poems are translated by Ian Fairley in a collection published in 2007; some of these poems were previously untranslated and unpublished.

Snow Part represents Celan's last work and shows his most difficult struggles with language and silence. Some of these poems were not authorized by their writer for publication, but Celan's son allowed them to be published. This collection is for those who wrestle with philosophical and psychological questions surrounding the Holocaust. These are Celan's last words on the subject, and their knotted, gnarled syntax, their effaced narrators, and their ambiguities make them difficult to enter but rewarding of study. They are shadowed by Celan's suicide, which took place shortly after the last poems were written, but they should not be read exclusively in the light of his death, as some of them show signs of hope.

The English translation by Ian Fairley is mostly comprised of the poems included in the poetry collection Schneepart, which Celan wrote around the time of his 1967 breakdown. The poems show the breakdown, the falling away, of any constructed coherence the poet had brought to or read into his shattered world. Most of the poems are short, terse, and dense. A few poems express a kind of distant optimism—a shaky faith that sometime, somehow, all will be well. In addition to the poems in Schneepart, Fairley also has translated and included some previously uncollected and unpublished poems as part of this collection.

The most extensive poem here and perhaps the most optimistic is “Was Naht” (“What Knits”). The poem asks what “this voice” is knitting, or drawing together, on “this side and on that,” maybe the abyss of the Holocaust, maybe death and life. The “snow needle” springs from the “chasms” and the “you” addressed in the poem is asked to come forth:

. . . tumuli, tumuli,
you
hill out of there, alive, come into the kiss.

“Hill” is used here as a verb, and this transformation is Celan’s, who invents the word “hugelst,” the familiar form of the nonexistent verb “to hill.”

The poem works toward some transformation and resurrection; though “worms/ inweb you,” still the globe gives you “safe passage,” and there is “a word, with all its green” that you are told to follow. (Translation by Ian Fairley.) The poem is somewhat spooky, suggesting that the dead are coming alive, being reborn into the unimaginable. Yet, it is a rebirth. Beetle and worms are weighted against words, a tree, green. The green concludes, suggesting at least a possibility of renewal.

Other poems are less accessible, and Fairley’s translations do not always open them to readers unfamiliar with Celan, as he uses words not familiar to many, such as “grimpfen” for “marshy,” and “thole” for “endurance.” Nevertheless, these last poems will be part of the Celan canon, and the explanations that Fairley provides of their sources help the student who is unfamiliar with German history to enter into their world.

SUMMARY

Paul Celan remains perhaps the best-known Holocaust poet. His poems make the Holocaust real for those who came after it and serve as a painful evocation of its horror for those who lived through it. The tortured groping for understanding is also a search for God; these poems are religion-haunted, always asking an unreachable and silent God the question, “Why?” The knotted, difficult late poems are attempts to express the inexpressible cataclysm, as well as to make some kind of sense of it, in language and also beyond language. It is probably easiest for the reader to enter Celan’s world through the more accessible early work, such as the immensely popular “Death Fugue,” which gives some idea of his developing private mythology. However, the later work also rewards study. Celan’s dense last poems contain a compressed energy that gives even the shortest, most cryptic poems fire.

Janet McCann

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- Der Sand aus den Urnen*, 1948
- Mohn und Gedächtnis*, 1952
- Von Schwelle zu Schwelle*, 1955
- Gedichte: Eine Auswahl*, 1959
- Sprachgitter*, 1959 (Speech-Grille, 1971)
- Die Niemandsrose*, 1963
- Gedichte*, 1966
- Atemwende*, 1967 (Breathturn, 1995)
- Ausgewählte Gedichte: Zwei Reden*, 1968
- Fadensonnen*, 1968 (Threadsunns, 2000)
- Lichtzwang*, 1970 (Lightduress, 2005)

Paul Celan

Schneepart, 1971 (Snow Part, 2007)
Speech-Grille, and Selected Poems, 1971
Nineteen Poems, 1972
Selected Poems, 1972
Gedichte: In zwei Bänden, 1975 (2 volumes)
Zeitgehöft: Späte Gedichte aus dem Nachlass, 1976
Paul Celan: Poems, 1980 (revised 1988, as Poems of Paul Celan)
Gedichte, 1938-1944, 1985
Sixty-Five Poems, 1985
Last Poems, 1986
Das Frühwerk, 1989
Gesammelte Werke in sieben Bänden, 2000 (7 volumes)
Glottal Stop: 101 Poems, 2000

SHORT FICTION:

“Gespräch im Gebirg,” 1959

NONFICTION:

Edgar Jené und der Traum vom Traume, 1948 (Edgar Jené and the Dream About the Dream, 1986)
Collected Prose, 1986

TRANSLATIONS:

Der goldene Vorhang, 1949 (of Jean Cocteau)
Bateau ivre/Das trunkene Schiff, 1958 (of Arthur Rimbaud)
Gedichte, 1959 (of Osip Mandelstam)
Die junge Parzel/La jeune Parque, 1964 (of Paul Valéry)
Einundzwanzig Sonette, 1967 (of William Shakespeare)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Prose Writings and Selected Poems, 1977
Selected Poems and Prose of Paul Celan, 2001

About the Author

Burnside, Sheridan. “Senselessness in Paul Celan’s Mohn und Gedächtnis.” German Life and Letters 59, no. 1 (2006): 140-150.

Cassian, Nina. “‘We Will Be Back and Up to Drown at Home’: Notes on Paul Celan.” Parnassus: Poetry in Review 15, no. 1 (1988): 108-129.

Chalfen, Israel. Paul Celan: A Biography of His Youth. Translated by Maximilian Bleyleben. New York: Persea Books, 1991.

Dutoit, Thomas, ed. Sovereignities in Question: The Poetics of Paul Celan. New York: Fordham University Press, 2005.

Felsteiner, John. Paul Celan: Poet, Survivor, Jew. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1995.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What recurrent images and symbols show Paul Celan’s preoccupation with the Holocaust?
- Are there any glimmers of light in the darkness of Celan’s poetry? What are they?
- How do Celan’s experiments with language fit in with the content of his poetry?
- What role does silence play in Celan’s poetry?
- What elements of music and dance do you see in “Death Fugue”? What relationship does the music have with the underlying theme?
- One critic said that poetry was impossible after the Holocaust. Why might one believe this assertion? Discuss Celan’s poetry in the light of this comment.
- How does Celan use his own and his family’s experience of the Holocaust in his poetry?
- How does the poetry of Celan add a dimension to what is generally taught about the Holocaust?
- Celan uses neologisms, invented words, to express ideas he could not find words for. His translators have tried to represent these with invented English words. What effect do Celan’s neologisms have?
- How does Celan’s description of the Holocaust compare with others you have read in both poetry and prose?

- Geuss, Raymond. "Celan's Meridian." Boundary Two: An International Journal of Literature and Culture 33, no. 3 (Fall, 2006): 201-226.
- Myers, Saul. "The Way Through the Human-Shaped Snow: Paul Celan's Job." Studies in Twentieth-Century Literature 11, no. 2 (Spring, 1987): 213-228.
- New German Critique: An Interdisciplinary Journal of German Studies* 91 (Winter, 2004): 5-189. An issue devoted to Paul Celan.
- Roditi, Edouard, "Paul Celan and the Cult of Personality," World Literature Today 66, no. 1 (Winter, 1992): 11-20.
- Roos, Bonnie. "Anselm Kiefer and the Art of Allusion: Dialectics of the Early 'Margarete' and 'Sulamith' Paintings." Comparative Literature 58, no. 1 (Winter 2006): 24-43.
- Tobias, Rochelle. The Discourse of Nature in the Poetry of Paul Celan: The Unnatural World. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006.

Library of Congress

MIGUEL DE CERVANTES

Born: Alcalá de Henares, Spain

September 29, 1547

Died: Madrid, Spain

April 23, 1616

The creator of Don Quixote, one of the most original characters in world literature, Cervantes is known for his many-sided humor and his insight into the nature of reality.

BIOGRAPHY

Nothing is known of the first twenty years of Miguel de Cervantes (sur-VAHN-teez) Saavedra's life except that he is believed to have been born on September 29, 1547, and christened on October 9, 1547, in the church of Santa Maria in Alcalá de Henares, Spain, a small university town a little more than twenty miles northeast of Madrid. His father was Rodrigo de Cervantes, a ne'er-do-well surgeon who moved frequently from town to town while his mother probably remained in Alcalá with the children. Rodrigo's was an old family that had seen better days, claiming hidalgo rank but now heavily in debt. Cervantes' education seems to have been limited. In 1568, he was a student in the City School of Madrid, but he may have interrupted his studies to serve in the army in Flanders.

In December, 1569, he traveled to Rome as chamberlain in the household of Cardinal Acquaviva. Restless, he soon applied for a certificate of legitimacy to prove that he came from "Old Christian stock" so that he might, with his brother Rodrigo, enlist as a soldier in the Spanish army under Don Juan of Austria, an experience that gave him a chance to visit Italian cities. He fought in the Battle of Lepanto (1571). Sick below with a fever on the battleship Marquesa, he insisted on being brought on deck. In command of a longboat with twelve men, he continued to fight even after being wounded twice in the chest and having his left hand shattered, rendering it useless for the rest of his life. Later, he took part in the capture of Tunis in 1573.

He left the army in 1573, planning to return to Spain. En route, he and his brother were captured by the Turks and taken to Algiers, where Cervantes was imprisoned and enslaved for five years. After several attempts to escape, he was ransomed and returned to Madrid, where he tried to satisfy his ambitions as a writer, trying his hand at sonnets and plays for the then-burgeoning theater. Between twenty and thirty plays were rejected by producers. In 1584, with Ana de Villafranca, probably an actress, he had an illegitimate daughter, Isabel. In December of that same year, he married Catalina de Salazar y Palacios, daughter of a prosperous peasant of Esquivas, who, however, brought him little dowry.

For all of his life, Cervantes was financially insecure. After his marriage, he was burdened with the responsibility for two sisters, an illegitimate daughter, a niece, and a maidservant, besides his wife, and his attempts at a literary career met with little or no financial success. In 1585, however, he wrote and published a pastoral romance, La Galatea (1585; Galatea: A Pastoral Romance, 1833), which had considerable popular reception. In that same year, he wrote his historic tragedy El cerco de Numancia (wr. 1585, pb. 1784; The Siege of Numantia, 1870; also as Numantia: A Tragedy), the story of the collective suicide of a Celtiberian city encircled by the Roman army in 133 B.C.E., which chose death rather than surrender; it was successfully produced.

In 1588, he found employment collecting wheat and oil for the Spanish armada, roaming the countryside of Andalusia and becoming familiar with folk speech and folklore. Again he met with misfortune, was excommunicated for seizing wheat belonging to the cathedral of Seville, and was imprisoned for a shortage in his accounts. He wrote two sonnets on the armada that met with popular approval. In May, 1590, he applied for a post in the New World but was refused and told to seek something nearer home. He turned again to writing and in 1595 won first prize in a poetry contest. In 1598 his sonnet, "Soneto al t mulo de Felipe II," on the funeral of that monarch, attracted attention.

In 1603, after imprisonment for debt, he moved to the Calle del Rastro in Valladolid after the court transferred there; he began work on El ingenioso hidalgo don Quixote de la Mancha (1605; Don Quixote of the Mancha, Part 1, 1612; hereinafter referred to as Don Quixote). Published in 1605, it was an immediate popular success, not only in Spain but abroad, quickly translated and published in England, Brussels, France, and Italy. Yet fate intervened again when, that same year, a neighbor was murdered, and Cervantes and his family were imprisoned for a time, an experience that embittered him and seems to have prompted him to withdraw from the limelight until 1608, when he moved back to Madrid. In 1613, Cervantes published Novelas ejemplares (1613; Exemplary Novels, 1846), and a collection of his comedies and interludes, Ocho comedias y ocho entremeses nuevos (pb. 1615), appeared two years later. His long burlesque poem Viaje del Parnaso (1614; The Voyage to Parnassus, 1870) was published in 1614. In 1614, a copy of a spurious and vicious so-called sequel to Don Quixote appeared, written by a mysterious Alonso Fern ndez de Avellaneda. Cervantes, angered, hurried to finish his own Segunda parte del ingenioso cavallero don Quixote de la Mancha (1615; Don Quixote de la Mancha, Part 2, 1620).

In his last year, Cervantes joined the Tertiary Order of St. Francis. Ill, he hurried to finish Los trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda (1617; The Travels of Persiles and Sigismunda: A Northern History, 1619), a prose romance, which was not published until 1617, after his death. On April 18, 1616, Cervantes sent for the almoner of the Franciscan monastery to administer the last sacraments. The next day, somewhat improved, he wrote the dedication to

The Travels of Persiles and Sigismunda, now finished. On Wednesday, he penned a final "Farewell, witticisms; farewell, jests; farewell, cheerful friends."

Cervantes died in Madrid on April 23, 1616—on the same day as William Shakespeare. He was buried in the Trinitarian monastery, wearing the Franciscan rough habit. His remains were scattered at the end of the seventeenth century during the rebuilding of the monastery. He left no children except for Isabel, and there are no descendants today.

ANALYSIS

The strongest and most immediate impression one gets from most of Cervantes' work is his unique gift for humor, especially for burlesque, but also for irony. Besides The Voyage to Parnassus and some of the interludes, there is that kind of humor in Don Quixote: the dubbing of Don Quixote as a knight, the tournament at the duke's, the marvels such as the talking head and the enchanted bark, the visit of Altisidora to Hell. There is also burlesque of literary conventions: "sonnets, epigrams, or eulogies . . . bear[ing] the names of grave and entitled personages" that are "commonly found at the beginning of books"; the citation of authorities; segments in the pastoral and picaresque modes; sonnets and love tales.

Irony appears in the contrast between the grandiose expectations of Sancho Panza for the governorship of Barataria and the actual experience. There is a special irony, however, in the ending of the novel, when the dreams of Don Quixote come to nothing, and he resigns himself to being just Alonso Quijano.

There are other forms of humor, such as playfulness when Cervantes avenges himself on the spurious Don Quixote by placing that book in Hell, and in the confusion of Don Alvaro over meeting two Don Quixotes, the spurious one and the real one. There is also a playful humor of Cervantes' account of Don Quixote's discomfiture at the amorous advances of Altisidora. There is slapstick in Don Quixote's battle with the bagful of cats, and in the trampling of Sancho under the feet of the supposed defenders against the phony attack on Barataria.

Don Quixote, however, transcends humor. It borrows the experiences of Cervantes: his imprisonment and slavery in Algiers, his service in the army, his wanderings in Andalusia, his associations with the underworld during his imprisonments. Out of these experiences come most of the themes and motifs of his literary works.

Like many of his contemporaries, Cervantes had certain ideas about the nature and responsibilities of those who govern, ideas that he deftly wove into the fabric of his literary work, especially Don Quixote, where he frequently contrasts the ideals of chivalry with modern decadence. The tenure of Sancho as governor of Barataria gave Cervantes added opportunity to express those ideas: The common individual is as well equipped to govern as a noble; the governor should beware bribery and entreaties, be suave and mild in fulfilling duties, let the tears of the poor find compassion, and seek to uncover the truth in his or her judgments.

Cervantes also had certain standards for his literary profession, and he judged his contemporaries by those standards, especially in The Voyage to Parnassus and “Canto de Calíope” (“Song of Calliope”), standards that he applied not only to chivalric romances but also to the pastorals, love poetry, and comedy: verisimilitude, consistent structure, and the avoidance of supernatural elements, trivialities, and playing to the pit. He returns to this theme frequently in Don Quixote.

Cervantes shows an interest in, and sympathy for, the peasants, although he never idealizes them. He incorporates them into his comedies, as well as in Don Quixote. Sancho is such a peasant, who repeatedly quotes folk proverbs. Several of the scenes in Don Quixote are village or countryside scenes like those Cervantes knew in Andalusia. Not surprising, then, is the presence of the pastoral elements, notably the love story of Grisótomo and Marcela in part 1, and Don Quixote’s decision to become a shepherd when he is compelled to forsake knight-errantry. The picaresque element, influenced by Cervantes’ knowledge of the Sevillean underworld, appears in the beggar and other characters in his Exemplary Novels. In Don Quixote, it appears when Don Quixote tries to free a chain gang of galley slaves, all criminals, who then turn on him and rob him. The most sharply delineated rogue is Ginés de Pasamonte, who appears twice in the novel.

The absorbing concern of Don Quixote, however, is the interplay between the delusions of Don Quixote and reality. This theme probably reflects an inner conflict within Cervantes himself, considering his youthful regard for the idealism of the chivalric, then for the pastoral romance, and considering his belief in the need for charm and imagination in poetry, tempered by his developing regard for artistic truth.

This dichotomy is dramatized by the play between Don Quixote, a well-read, highly imaginative but deluded individual, and Sancho Panza, an illiterate peasant with a store of common sense and folk wisdom but with little or no imagination or vision. At the beginning, the line of demarcation is clear-cut, but as the story progresses, the line becomes more and more blurred. There are times when the grand delusions of Don Quixote are so powerful that even Sancho has his doubts; in one instance, Quixote accepts the delusion that Dulcinea is enchanted. Sancho has his own illusions—that he will become the governor of an island and wealthy. At times, the roles are reversed, as when Sancho tries to deceive Quixote into believing that three peasant girls are princesses riding palfreys, and Quixote corrects him: “They are donkeys.”

There are other distortions of reality for Sancho, as when he and Quixote encounter a carter with two docile lions in a cage, and Sancho, exaggerating their size and ferocity, flees. There are times when other people, sensible persons, also distort the truth: biased parents boast of their children, their lovers, their beloved. Persons, such as the innkeeper’s daughter who has illusions of bruises after dreaming that she has fallen from a tower, can be deluded by dreams. There is a difference, however, between their illusions and Quixote’s, the difference between a transforming faith and absurd conclusions.

At the end of Don Quixote, sadly, Don Quixote no longer believes in his delusions, in his visions, and again he becomes Alonso Quijano. Yet even then, the skeptic Sancho Panza will protest: “Who knows but behind some bush we may come upon the lady Dulcinea, as disenchanting as you can wish.”

DON QUIXOTE DE LA MANCHA, PART 1

First published: El ingenioso hidalgo don Quixote de la Mancha, 1605 (English translation, 1612)

Type of work: Novel

A certain Alonso Quijano fancies himself a modern knight-errant righting every manner of wrong and takes the name of Don Quixote.

Don Quixote is a parody of the romance of chivalry, as Aubrey F. G. Bell has described it, “a multiplicity of heterogeneous thoughts, events, episodes, scenes, and characters” welded together in a harmonious whole and bound together by “humor and the consistency of two chief characters,” Alonso Quijano of the village of La Mancha and an illiterate peasant whom he recruits as his squire.

Quijano, or Don Quixote, as he renames himself, is close to fifty, lean and gaunt, and has spent most of his time reading books of chivalry, selling many acres of his land to buy more of these books. Finally, his wits weakened, he decides to put into practice all that he has read. He polishes old pieces of armor and doctors a piece of a helmet with cardboard reinforced with iron strips, and he sets out to find someone to dub him a knight. The innkeeper at a nearby inn humors him. Alarmed at his absence, his niece finds him and brings him back to his village, where she and the curate decide to burn Quixote’s library of more than one hundred books.

Quixote chooses as his lady a good-looking farm girl who lives nearby, Aldonza Lorenzo, whom he renames Dulcinea. Since a squire is necessary, Quixote persuades a neighboring farmer, Sancho Panza, to follow him, with promises of adventure and the prospect of winning an island, over which Sancho is to become governor. Embarked upon his second sally, they find windmills, which Quixote imagines to be giants. Despite Sancho’s warnings, Quixote charges them and is unhorsed by one of the wings. Now seeing that these are really windmills, Quixote explains them as the work of a magician who has changed what are truly giants into windmills. There follow a series of episodes, many of them derived from folklore, in which Quixote suffers setbacks. Two flocks of sheep are imagined to be a Christian army fighting a pagan army—the bleating of the sheep mistaken for the neighing of horses, the sound of trumpets, and the roll of drums.

They meet a man on horseback with something on his helmet that gleams like gold. Quixote is convinced that it is the gold helmet of Mambrino, a famous enchanted helmet of folklore. Bearing down upon the horseman, who is a barber traveling from one village to another to perform some bloodletting for one man and to trim the beard of another, Quixote dismounts and puts to flight the barber, who abandons his headgear, which is actually a basin atop his head to protect it from the rain. Quixote picks it up and proceeds to wear it on his own head.

When Quixote and Sancho meet a chain gang of galley slaves, all criminals, Quixote concludes that now is the time to right wrongs and aid the wretched. When the guards refuse to unshackle them, Quixote charges, and in the turmoil the criminals break their chains and the guards alternate their blows between Quixote, Sancho, and the thieves. In the confusion, the guards flee, abandoning their weapons. The criminals now turn upon Quixote and Sancho and steal their clothing. Chagrined at the succession of defeats and fearing further pursuit, Quixote and Sancho retreat to the mountains of Sierra Moreno, where, Quixote reasons, there is a setting better adapted to the adventures that he seeks, a place for the marvels like those of which he has read.

There, Don Quixote meets a double pair of lovers, Cardenio and Luscinda, Fernando and Dorotea. Cardenio is betrayed by his friend Fernando, who tries to win Luscinda away from Cardenio while breaking his engagement to Dorotea. Cardenio becomes mad, a foil to Don Quixote’s madness. Don Quixote, as helper of damsels in distress, becomes involved, and the lovers are all eventually reunited. This preoccupation with love inspires Quixote to send a love letter and a love poem to Dulcinea with Sancho, who returns to the home village. There, he joins the curate and the barber in a plot to bring Quixote back home. Dorotea will pretend that she is a distressed princess who has come from Guinea to seek redress for an injury done to her by a giant and to seek Don Quixote's help.

En route to the village, they stop at an inn, where Don Quixote goes to sleep in the garret where wineskins are kept. Dreaming that he is engaged in a struggle with a giant, he begins to slash at the wineskins. Half awake, he mistakes the wine for the flow of blood. Even after thoroughly waking, he continues the battle and begins to look for the giant's head on the floor, persuaded that he has cut it off. Sancho is so convinced that he looks for it too and assures the innkeeper's daughter that he saw the monster.

Among the persons at the inn are a student and a former soldier with a Morisco maiden. Both soldier and student inspire lengthy discourses from Don Quixote on war and peace, on the treatment of students, on the treatment of soldiers, and on the comparisons between the professions of arms and letters. Artillery, Don Quixote says, is a diabolic device by which an infamous arm may take the life of a valiant knight without his knowing from where the blow came. Peace is the greatest blessing desirable in this life. The end of war is peace.

The student's chief hardship is poverty. He must suffer hunger, cold, destitution, nakedness. The soldier is the poorest of the poor, dependent upon wretched pay, which comes late or never, and upon such booty as he can amass, to the peril of his life and conscience. On the day of battle, they place upon his head a doctor's cap to heal the wound inflicted by some bullet that may have passed through his temple or left him mutilated. It is far easier to reward scholars than soldiers, for the former may receive posts, while the latter receive any compensation that their master has a disposition to give. Men of letters argue that, without them, men of arms cannot support themselves; men of arms reply that, without them, there can be no letters, since by their efforts states are preserved. To attain eminence in letters requires time, loss of sleep, hunger, headaches, and indigestion; to be a good soldier costs as much and more. The former soldier, pressed to tell his story, is revealed as a former captive of the Moors and enslaved by them. The captive's tale has many elements derived from Cervantes's own experiences in Algiers, and Cervantes himself appears briefly as a character in the tale.

Sancho, the curate, and the barber finally get Quixote home. Back home, he is warmly greeted by the townsfolk and taken to his house, where the niece and the housekeeper care for him. Quixote and Sancho do mention the possibility of a third sally, but the author does not know what will happen.

DON QUIXOTE DE LA MANCHA, PART 2

First published: Segunda parte del ingenioso cavallero don Quixote de la Mancha, 1615
(English translation, 1620)

Type of work: Novel

Don Quixote embarks with Sancho Panza on his third sally, which takes him into a larger and more variegated world.

Responding to criticism of part 1 and stung by the spurious sequel to Don Quixote by Alonso Fernández de Avellaneda, Cervantes restricts this novel more to the protagonists, with fewer interpolations and digressions. Don Quixote and Sancho are never lost to view, and the bonds between them are kept strong, even when they are separated.

In part 2, there is a refinement of the character of Don Quixote and a development of his saner nature, including moments of sanity when he comments on society in a mixed picture of madness and idealism. There is a corresponding refinement in the character of Sancho, as his understanding of and sympathy for Don Quixote develop. The world of part 2 is a much expanded world in which Don Quixote travels much farther from his native village, as far as Barcelona and the Mediterranean coast. It has a wider range of characters: peasants, bandits, traveling actors, shepherds, country squires, dukes, and Moriscos. Part 2 begins about a month after the end of part 1. Two new characters are introduced: Cid Hamete Benengeli, the Moorish author of Don Quixote, whom Cervantes frequently pretends to cite, and Sansón Carrasco, recent graduate of the University of Salamanca.

To cure Don Quixote's madness, the curate and barber consult frequently with the niece and housekeeper. Finally satisfied that he has come to his senses, they come to the house and begin a discussion of statecraft, in which Don Quixote impresses them with his good sense, until the subject turns to chivalry and he again defends the old knightly virtues found in the romances against the sloth, arrogance, and theory over practice of the present age, persuading his auditors of a return of his madness. When Don Quixote asks Sancho's opinions regarding criticisms of him, Sancho refers him to a book by Cid Hamete Benengeli, then mentions Sansón Carrasco, the student, who knows all about the book. Thus, Quixote and Sancho meet Sansón, who wins them over with flattery, although he is secretly allied with the curate and the barber, plotting stratagems to discourage Quixote as a knight.

The first concern of Don Quixote is to see his lady Dulcinea, so they set out for Toboso, Dulcinea's hometown. Stopping just outside, Quixote sends Sancho into town to find her. Sancho, however, has no idea what she looks like, so Quixote decides on a trick of his own: He (Quixote) will approach the first farm girl he meets. Don Quixote sees only a farm girl and is bewildered. Sancho is hard pressed to convince him. The girl, annoyed, rides off. Sancho explains the snub nose, mole on lip, and the odor of garlic as enchantments, an explanation that satisfies Quixote.

Arriving at a woods, the two meet Sansón, disguised as a knight. His plan is to challenge Quixote's mistress and in an ensuing clash of arms, defeat Don Quixote, who then by the rules of knighthood would be obligated to follow the bidding of the victor—in this case, to return to his village. Sansón's plot fails, and Don Quixote and Sancho leave him behind in the care of a bonesetter. In the woods, Don Quixote also meets the Knight of the Wood, who, not recognizing him, boasts of having met and defeated all Spanish knights. Further discussion reveals that the Knight of the Wood had really met the spurious Don Quixote that Avellaneda had conceived.

Don Quixote meets a traveler, Don Diego de

Miranda, with whom he engages in his favorite subject, knights-errant. Don Diego, intrigued by this now sensible, now mad man, invites him to his home. En route, they meet a carter bearing two lions in a cage on his way to the king. Ordered to get out of the way and warned that the lions are dangerous, Quixote, feeling a threat to his courage, orders the carter to open the cages. His companions retreat to a far distance, while he approaches one of the lions, braces his buckler, draws his sword, and faces the lion, which then turns around, stretches, yawns, washes its face, and then enters its cage and lies down. God upholds true chivalry, Quixote shouts, and then fixes the white cloth of victory on his lance. Quixote is a crazy sane man, an insane man on the verge of sanity, Don Diego concludes.

Later, Don Quixote meets a duke and a duchess on a hunt in the forest and is invited to their palace, where the hosts keep Quixote and Sancho for their amusement, proceeding to play a series of "jests" at their expense. At a dinner, Quixote speaks of the giants whom he has conquered and the enchanters whom he has met. An ecclesiastic at the table recognizes Quixote and answers him with a sermon about Don Quixote's experiences, ridiculing his belief in these creatures. Angered, Quixote answers with a discourse on the high and narrow path of knight-errantry that rights wrongs and does good. The duke, to irritate the ecclesiastic, offers Sancho the governorship that Quixote had promised him.

Sancho's tenure as governor of the Island of Barataria, actually a village in the duke's domain, lasts but seven days, in which Don Quixote offers him much advice, and where Sancho very astutely settles petitions brought to him. Yet since this was another of the duke's jests, the latter arranges a mock invasion, in which Sancho is badly bruised and decides that he has had enough.

Slapstick humor is provided by the account of a hunt, where Sancho, frightened by a boar, scrambles up a tree and is stuck until his screams are heard and he is freed. In another incident, Dulcinea's disenchantment requires three thousand and some lashes on Sancho's back, which Sancho performs on himself, out of sight but not out of hearing, so that he lashes the trees, with proper sound effects.

Sansón again attempts to best Don Quixote in knightly encounter, this time disguised as the Knight of the White Moon. He is successful. Quixote agrees to return to La Mancha for a year. Since he can no longer be a knight-errant, however, he will become Quixotic, a shepherd, with Sancho as Pancino, living among shepherds and shepherdesses, restoring the Arcadia of old. Back home, Don Quixote calmly announces that he is no longer Don Quixote but Alonso Quijano, the Good, and the enemy of the romances. The curate declares that Quijano, the Good, is dying but also sane. After writing his will, Quixote dies. The curate sends for a notary to witness that he is truly dead, lest some author other than Cid Hamet Benengeli try to resurrect him falsely.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

La Galatea, 1585 (Galatea: A Pastoral Romance, 1833)
El ingenioso hidalgo don Quixote de la Mancha, 1605, 1615 (The History of the Valorous and Wittie Knight-Errant, Don Quixote of the Mancha, 1612-1620; better known as Don Quixote de la Mancha)
Novelas ejemplares, 1613 (Exemplary Novels, 1846)
Los trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda, 1617 (The Travels of Persiles and Sigismunda: A Northern History, 1619)

POETRY:

Viaje del Parnaso, 1614 (The Voyage to Parnassus, 1870)

DRAMA:

El cerco de Numancia, wr. 1585, pb. 1784 (The Siege of Numantia, 1870; also as Numantia: A Tragedy)
El trato de Argel, pr. 1585, pb. 1784 (The Commerce of Algiers, 1870)
Ocho comedias y ocho entremeses nuevos, pb. 1615 (includes Pedro de Urdemalas [Pedro the Artful Dodger, 1807], El juez de los divorcios [The Divorce Court Judge, 1919], Los habladores [Two Chatterboxes, 1930], La cueva de Salamanca [The Cave of Salamanca, 1933], La elección de los alcaldes de Daganzo [Choosing a Councilman in Daganzo, 1948], La guarda cuidadosa [The Hawk-eyed Sentinel, 1948], El retablo de las maravillas [The Wonder

SUMMARY

As a writer, Miguel de Cervantes aimed to move his reader to laughter. He also had serious concerns about excesses in literary art. A logical result was Don Quixote, a parody on chivalric romances.

An assemblage of heterogeneous elements welded together by humor and the consistency of two characters, Don Quixote is Cervantes' masterpiece. It depicts one of the world's best-known fictional characters, a madman who sets out to right wrongs, and a squire with much common sense but little or no vision. Between Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, Cervantes probes human delusions and the conflict between idealism and realism.

Thomas Amherst Perry

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In what ways does Don Quixote reflect the age of Miguel de Cervantes, who began it when he was in his late middle age?
- Much of Cervantes' humor is very difficult to translate. How might a reader unfamiliar with Spanish at least partially overcome this difficulty?
- Since few people today are, like Don Quixote, victims of an insatiable love of chivalric romances, how can his story impress modern readers as much as, or more than, it did readers who were very familiar with them?
- Is Don Quixote a crazy old man? Does Don Quixote possess nobility?
- Consider the statement that Don Quixote transforms Sancho into a better man.
- What does the rich assortment of minor characters contribute to Don Quixote?
- Does the evidence of the novel Don Quixote itself confirm the suspicion that Cervantes only gradually learned what kind of book he was writing?

Show, 1948], El rufián viudo llamada Trampagos [Trampagos the Pimp Who Lost His Moll, 1948], El viejo celoso [The Jealous Old Husband, 1948], and El vizcaíno fingido [The Basque Imposter, 1948])
The Interludes of Cervantes, pb. 1948

About the Author

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Miguel de Cervantes. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.
- Canavaggio, Jean. Cervantes. Translated by J. R. Jones. New York: W. W. Norton, 1990.
- Church, Margaret. Don Quixote: Knight of La Mancha. New York: New York University Press, 1971.
- Close, Anthony. Cervantes and the Comic Mind of His Age. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Durán, Manuel. Cervantes. New York: Twayne, 1976.
- González Echevarría, Roberto. Love and Law in Cervantes. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2005.
- Madariaga, Salvador de. "Don Quixote": An Introductory Study in Psychology. London: Oxford University Press, 1966.
- Mondadori, Arnoldo, ed. Cervantes: His Life, His Times, His Works. Translated by Salvator Attanasio and selections by Thomas G. Bergin. New York: American Heritage Press, 1970.
- Predmore, Richard. The World of "Don Quixote." Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Wagschal, Steven. The Literature of Jealousy in the Age of Cervantes. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 2006.

AIMÉ CÉSAIRE

Born: Basse-Pointe, Martinique
June 26, 1913

Died: Fort-de-France, Martinique
April 17, 2008

In his finely crafted poems, plays, and essays, Césaire presents images of black people who refuse to submit to the evils of racism and colonialism.

BIOGRAPHY

Aimé Césaire (say-ZEHR) was born in abject poverty in Basse-Pointe on the French Caribbean island of Martinique, on June 25, 1913. After primary studies in Basse-Pointe, he earned a scholarship that enabled him to study at the Victor Schoelcher High School in Fort-de-France, where one of his classmates was Léon-Gontran Damas, who became a famous poet and remained Césaire's close friend until his death in 1978. Victor Schoelcher High School was then the most prestigious high school on Martinique, and it was named for a white Frenchman who helped end slavery on Martinique and in all of the French colonies. Victor Schoelcher remains beloved among Martiniquais; the main library in Fort-de-France is called the Victor Schoelcher Library, and the Université des Antilles is located in the city of Schoelcher, which is near Fort-de-France. The example of Schoelcher taught Césaire the need for all people of good faith to resist evil.

In 1932, Césaire traveled to Paris to begin his university studies. While studying in Paris, he met a fellow student named Léopold Senghor, who became a celebrated poet and served as the president of Senegal from its independence in 1960 until his retirement in 1980. While Damas, Senghor, and Césaire were studying in Paris together in the 1930's, they created a literary movement that Césaire called "la Négritude" (Blackness), which was inspired by poets of the Harlem Renaissance, such as Langston Hughes, Countée Cullen, and Jean Toomer, whose poems Damas, Senghor, and Césaire read either in the original English versions or in French translations. The basic purpose of Négritude was to describe in French the experience of being black in a positive way that would appeal to readers of all races and nationalities and would expand the literary canon to include black writers.

In 1937, Césaire married a Martiniquais woman named Suzanne Roussy. After completing his studies, he began writing his highly autobiographical poem, Cahier d'un retour au pays natal (1939, 1947, 1956; Memorandum on My Martinique, 1947; better known as Return to My Native Land, 1968), in which he described the return to Martinique of a man who has come home from France with a deep appreciation of African cultural values and of the essential dignity of all black people. In September, 1940, Césaire and his wife returned to Fort-de-France to become teachers at the Victor Schoelcher High School. Between 1941 and 1945, they taught together at this high school, and among their students were Edouard Glissant and Frantz Fanon, who later became distinguished writers, defenders of Négritude, and eloquent critics of racism.

After the Allies liberated France in 1944, Césaire entered politics. In 1945, he was elected the mayor of Fort-de-France, a position he held uninterruptedly until 2001. In 1946, he was elected as a representative from Martinique to the French National Assembly in Paris. He remained in the assembly until 1994. Between 1945 and 1956, he belonged to the French Communist Party, but he resigned from the party in 1956 to protest the Soviet invasion of Hungary. He then created a new political movement that he called the Parti Progressiste Martiniquais (Martiniquais Progressive Party). He remained enormously popular in Martinique. In addition to helping improve Martinique's infrastructure, educational system, and standard of living, he persuaded the French government in 1948 to transform the Caribbean islands of Martinique and Guadeloupe from colonies to overseas departments of France. This change also granted the residents of these two islands full French citizenship.

Césaire's extraordinarily long political career can be attributed to his skill in managing the funds that he received from France in order to improve the quality of life for all social classes in Martinique. He knew that France wanted above all to maintain its naval base and the deep harbor in Fort-de-France. This base is militarily important because it is France's main naval base in the Western hemisphere, and the port of Fort-de-France enables France to earn a great deal of money from shipping. Césaire understood that the French government would heavily subsidize Martinique in order to maintain calm there. Over the decades, Césaire persuaded successive French governments to provide large expenditures to build roads, an international airport, petroleum refineries, schools, a university, and hospitals and to hire more than one-third of working Martiniquais as well-paid French civil servants. Césaire made sure that economic conditions improved throughout the island and not just in the capital of Fort-de-France.

Voters came to realize that Césaire was not just a writer with an international reputation who continued to write respected poems, essays, and plays. He also was a highly skilled politician who succeeded in meeting the economic and social needs of the Martiniquais, while at the same time maintaining a stable society in which the ethical and moral values of the black majority were always affirmed and respected. He helped to maintain a very stable and diversified economy in which shipping, commerce, petroleum refineries, tourism, and agriculture worked together in order to reduce poverty and improve the quality of life in Martinique.

In 2006, the ninety-three-year-old Césaire received two major honors. He was elected to the prestigious French Academy, and the name of the Fort-de-France airport was officially changed from Lamentin Airport to Aimé Césaire Airport. Césaire died in a hospital in Fort-de-France on April 17, 2008. He was ninety-four.

ANALYSIS

While Léopold Senghor, Léon-Gontran Damas, and Aimé Césaire were studying in French colonial schools, they read textbooks that affirmed the superiority of French culture over the native civilizations of the colonized peoples. French colonial authorities arrogantly spoke of "the civilizing mission of France" and of their desire "to assimilate" those in their colonies into the supposedly superior French culture. In Paris, Senghor, Damas, and Césaire met numerous black students and writers from Africa and from various regions of the African diaspora. The term "African diaspora" refers to black people who now live in exile far from Africa as a result of the slave trade that transported their ancestors into slavery in the New World. Senghor, Damas, and Césaire took courses in Paris on African civilizations and learned a great deal about the rich cultures of Africa before the slave trade and the European colonial exploitation of the continent. They also came to realize that colonial powers had created negative images of black people as a means of justifying racism. As well-educated people who had learned to express themselves in fluent French, Senghor, Damas, and Césaire came to believe that it was their responsibility to speak for ordinary black people who needed to appreciate their profound dignity as human beings.

Both Senghor and Damas readily admitted that it was their friend Césaire who invented the term "Négritude." Césaire argued that "Négritude" meant describing the experience of what it meant to be a black person in literary works that would appeal to readers of all races. Senghor and Césaire had a white friend, Georges Pompidou, who studied with them in Paris and later served as the president of France from 1969 to 1974. Césaire and Senghor would read their poems to each other in order to make sure that these works authentically captured aspects of black culture, and then they would read their poems to Pompidou in order to find out if their poems were of universal appeal. Pompidou was not just an ordinary friend. He also possessed a deep appreciation of French poetry. He introduced Senghor and Césaire to the poetry of Victor Hugo and Charles Baudelaire and helped his friends realize that great poetry had to have universal appeal to readers. Pompidou's own acumen as a fine judge of French poetry was shown in his excellent Anthologie de la poésie française (1961), an anthology that is still used in introductory courses on French poetry.

In Return to My Native Land, Césaire illustrates how he combined Négritude with what Senghor later called la civilisation de l'universel (the civilization of the universal). In this long and exquisite poem, Césaire describes how his extended stay in France gave him the time to appreciate the values of his own culture and to realize that he could not be anything other than a proud black man from rural Martinique. He presents this highly autobiographical poem as an illustration of the voyage of self-discovery that all people experience in their lives. This poem helps readers understand the essential difference between what they do and who they are. Although Césaire achieved international fame as a statesman and a writer, he never forgot that he was raised in the impoverished village of Basse-Pointe, where his moral values were formed in his childhood. As a black man, Césaire knew that he could authentically describe the world only from his perspective of a black man. For Senghor, Damas, and Césaire, Négritude enabled them to present positive and authentic images of black culture, while at the same time depicting readers' universal search for their own values.

CADASTRE

First published: 1961 (English translation, 1973)

Type of work: Poetry

A very personal collection of poems, in which Césaire explores the meaning of black culture from different countries in his understanding of the world.

The very title of this book of poems will send readers to a French dictionary because cadastre is an obscure legal term that means a register of land possessions. The French word cadastre translates into English as the equally rare word “cadastre,” which can also be spelled “cadaster.” Once readers have understood the meaning of the title, they begin to realize that Césaire strives to evoke many different places that were important in his life.

He naturally mentions his native island of Martinique in the poem “Ton portrait” (“Your Portrait”), addressed to Martinique. He evokes not the title of “the flower island” that is designed to attract tourists but rather the 1902 cauchemar (nightmare), when the Mount Pelée volcano exploded and killed more than thirty thousand people in the former capital of Saint-Pierre, leaving only one survivor. Martiniquais are still traumatized by this volcanic explosion, and the area around Mount Pelée remains largely abandoned more than a century after this natural disaster.

Each afternoon there is a report on Martinique television designed to assure Martiniquais that they do not have to evacuate their homeland within twenty-four hours. During his fifty-six years as the mayor of Fort-de-France, Césaire had to make sure that the city's emergency services were always prepared for another explosion of this active volcano.

In another poem, “Ode à la Guinée” (“Ode to Guinea”), he evokes the West African country from which so many slaves were taken in chains to Martinique. Césaire “salutes” Guinea, whose screams of suffering still “strike” him. The horrors of slavery were so terrible that they can never disappear from Césaire's understanding of the world. In a powerful poem, “Lynch” (“Lynching”), Césaire mentions this extreme crime of violence committed against African Americans by the Ku Klux Klan and other racists. In Cadastre, Césaire describes very powerfully the unity of suffering that tragically links blacks in Africa with blacks in the African diaspora.

THE TRAGEDY OF KING CHRISTOPHE

First produced: La Tragédie du Roi Christophe, 1964 (first published, 1963; English translation, 1969)

Type of work: Play

This powerful tragedy explores the abuse of power by a Haitian leader who places his own interests over those of his people, who are fighting to maintain their newly acquired freedom.

In both The Tragedy of King Christophe and in Une Saison au Congo (pb. 1966, pr. 1967; A Season in the Congo, 1968), Césaire explores the abuse of power by black politicians. Although Césaire recognized that there were many superb black leaders, such as his friend, President Léopold Senghor of Senegal, and Toussaint-Louverture, the founder of the Haitian Republic and the subject of a biography written by Césaire, Toussaint Louverture: La Révolution française et le problème coloniale (1960), Césaire knew all too well that many black leaders in Haiti and in various African countries betrayed and exploited their people by transforming democracies into dictatorships. In The Tragedy of King Christophe, Césaire contrasts the simple honesty of Pétion, a successor to the heroic Toussaint-Louverture, with the demagogue and megalomaniac General Christophe.

As this play begins, the Haitians realize there is a very real threat that the forces of Napoleon I will invade Haiti in order to overthrow this new democracy and reestablish slavery. Pétion understands clearly that Napoleon I, who had reestablished slavery in the French Empire after it had been abolished during the French Revolution, wants to destroy the new democracy in Haiti. In order to resist the expected French invasion, Haitians must all cooperate in order to maintain their freedom. Pétion does not want power for himself; rather he desires to serve the Haitian people, so they can enjoy real freedom themselves.

Christophe, however, believes that he alone knows what the Haitian people truly need, and he needs to become their king so he can impose his will on them. In his mind, his vanity is more important than the survival of the fragile Haitian democracy. As a manipulator, Christophe lies quite effectively to the naïve people by telling them what they want to hear. He presents the specious claim that he alone understands the horrors of slavery that they experienced before Toussaint-Louverture's slave revolt, and then he argues that Haitians need a monarchy with all its trappings and impressive traditions.

He has himself crowned king and hopes that the peasants to whom he grants empty titles of nobility will feel as much loyalty as sycophantic nobles did to King Louis XIV at Versailles. King Christophe deludes himself into thinking that the Haitian people will find their dignity not in resisting the French forces intent on destroying Haitian freedom but rather in the theatrical ceremonies and performances that he creates for their amusement. He is so egotistical that he affirms near the end of the first of this play's three acts that Haitians will owe their true heritage to him alone.

King Christophe, however, remains an ambiguous tragic hero because theatergoers and readers can never fully decide whether he is delusional because of a mental illness or if he deliberately intends to impose himself as Haiti's absolute ruler in an effort to destroy its new and fragile democracy. Although Christophe gives several eloquent speeches that well describe the intense suffering of black people as a result of slavery, he nevertheless takes unreasonable actions that endanger Haitian freedom in the face of an invasion by the French, who aim to end Haitian independence and reestablish slavery.

Although readers and theatergoers may choose to view Christophe as an evil despot, there is another possible explanation for his bizarre behavior. In his 1952 book, Peau noire, masques blancs (Black Skin, White Masks, 1967), the psychiatrist Frantz Fanon, who studied under Césaire at Victor Schoelcher High School, argues persuasively that the experience of racism is so traumatic that it can cause serious psychological problems. The Tragedy of King Christophe was written and performed shortly after Fanon's death from leukemia in 1961. Like many great dramatic works, The Tragedy of King Christophe permits radically different interpretations. Its title character can be seen as a petty despot, or as a victim of racism and slavery, or perhaps as both simultaneously.

A SEASON IN THE CONGO

First produced: Une Saison au Congo, 1967
(first published, 1966; English translation, 1968)

Type of work: Play

This political play describes how a European country manages to maintain its economic exploitation even during the postcolonial period.

A Season in the Congo deals with an extremely obvious exploitation of an African country during the early postcolonial period. In 1960, Belgium very grudgingly granted independence to its colony, the Belgian Congo, in which between three million and twenty million Congolese were either executed or worked to death while toiling on Belgian rubber plantations in the colony, known as the Congo Free State until 1980 and the Belgian Congo from 1908 until 1960. After independence, the country was first named the Congo and then Zaire. In his novel Heart of Darkness (1899, serial; 1902, book) Joseph Conrad portrays the horrendous human suffering in the Congo Free State that modern historians have frequently compared to the Nazi Holocaust and to Joseph Stalin's mass murder of Soviet citizens.

In the late 1950's and the early 1960's, France and England began committing themselves to granting independence to their many African colonies. The crimes against humanity committed against the black Congolese by Belgium were so awful and well known that few blacks in Africa and throughout the black diaspora trusted Belgium to act properly toward the newly independent Congo. Congolese blacks became even more suspicious when Belgian colonial authorities had Patrice Lumumba arrested because of his opposition to long-term mining leases designed to enable Belgium to continue exploiting the Congo's mineral riches after independence. Strong international criticism forced Belgium to release Lumumba so he could participate in discussions aimed at transferring power from Belgium to the Congo.

In A Season in the Congo, Césaire contrasts the idealism of Lumumba, who wants to end completely Belgian influence in the Congo, with the overt cynicism and corruption of General Mokutu, who sells out his country for his personal enrichment. It does not take much imagination for readers and theatergoers to understand that Mokutu represents Mobutu Sese Seko, who helped overthrow the elected government of Lumumba with Belgian military assistance. Belgian businesses rewarded Mobutu generously for his betrayal of his homeland. Mobutu allowed Belgian mining interests to continue stealing the Congo's mineral resources for decades, while helping none of the Congolese except himself and his thugs.

In A Season in the Congo, Césaire portrays how Belgians, with the covert support of Mokutu, fund a civil war in the Congo in order to overthrow Lumumba's government. When the United Nations, represented in this play by its then Secretary General Dag Hammarskjöld, refuses to intervene because this is allegedly a civil war not involving any foreign country, Lumumba flies to Moscow and Soviet military planes restore him to power. Césaire shows quite powerfully how the Congo became a pawn in the larger conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States for political influence in Africa. In this play, Lumumba refuses to meet with the United Nations' diplomat, Ralph Bunche, because Lumumba understands all too clearly that although Bunche was a distinguished African American, Bunche's loyalty was to the United States and not to newly independent African countries.

Once the United Nations abandons the Congo, the die is cast for Lumumba. Theatergoers and readers realize that it is only a question of when and how Lumumba will die. Mokutu makes arrangements for killers to execute Lumumba; when the Congolese demonstrate openly in support of the martyred leader, Mokutu instructs his soldiers to use machine guns against the demonstrators. Just to make sure that theatergoers and readers identify Mokutu as Mobutu, Césaire specifies that Mokutu wears "a leopard-skin outfit," similar to the one Mobutu liked to wear when he became the dictator of the country that he renamed Zaire.

When Césaire completed this play in the mid-1960's, he could not imagine that Mobutu would allow Belgian mining interests to continue stealing wealth from Zaire, while at the same time destroying Zaire's infrastructure, until 1997, when Mobutu was finally driven into exile in Morocco.

SUMMARY

Aimé Césaire is generally considered to be among the most important writers of the postcolonial era. His essays, poems, and plays explain clearly the many links between race and the colonial experience in postcolonial countries in Africa and in the black diaspora. Like his friend Léopold Senghor, Césaire realized that he needed to make his vision of race and colonialism appeal to readers of all races and countries so that all readers could learn to accept people with different views, beliefs, and experiences. It is not surprising that Césaire is beloved not just in Martinique and in Africa but also in France, whose august French Academy elected him to membership in October, 2006, the very month in which the French-speaking world celebrated the centennial of the birth of Césaire's close friend and fellow poet, Senghor.

Edmund J. Campion

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Why is it significant that Aimé Césaire presents both positive and negative images of black characters?
- What is the meaning of “Négritude” in the postcolonial era?
- Why is it essential to keep talking about race, although such discussions may make certain people uncomfortable?
- Is it possible to distinguish one's personal views of the historical Patrice Lumumba from one's reaction to the idealistic character presented in A Season in the Congo?

BIBLIOGRAPHY*By the Author*POETRY:

Cahier d'un retour au pays natal, 1939, 1947, 1956 (Memorandum on My Martinique, 1947; better known as Return to My Native Land, 1968)
Les Armes miraculeuses, 1946 (Miraculous Weapons, 1983)
Soleil cou coupé, 1948 (Beheaded Sun, 1983)
Corps perdu, 1950 (Disembodied, 1983)
Ferremets, 1960 (Shackles, 1983)
Cadastre, 1961 (revised editions of Soleil cou coupé and Corps perdu; Cadastre: Poems, 1973)
State of the Union, 1966 (includes abridged translation of Miraculous Weapons and Shackles)
Moi, Laminaire, 1982
Aimé Césaire: The Collected Poetry, 1983
Lyric and Dramatic Poetry, 1946-82, 1990
La Poésie, 1994

DRAMA:

Et les chiens se taisaient, pb. 1956, pr. 1960
La Tragédie du Roi Christophe, pb. 1963, pr. 1964 (The Tragedy of King Christophe, 1969)
Une Saison au Congo, pb. 1966, pr. 1967 (A Season in the Congo, 1968)
Une Tempête, d'après "La Tempête" de Shakespeare: Adaptation pour un théâtre nègre, pr., pb. 1969 (A Tempest, 1974)

NONFICTION:

Discours sur le colonialisme, 1950 (Discourse on Colonialism, 1972)
Toussaint Louverture: La Révolution française et le problème coloniale, 1960

MISCELLANEOUS:

Œuvres complètes, 1976

About the Author

Davis, Gregson. Aimé Césaire. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Munro, Martin. Shaping and Reshaping the Caribbean: The Work of Aimé Césaire and René Depestre. Leeds, England: Modern Humanities Research Association, 2000.

Pallister, Janis L. Aimé Césaire. New York: Twayne, 1991.

Scharfman, Ronnie Leah. Engagement and the Language of Aimé Césaire. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1987.

Suk, Jeannie. Postcolonial Paradoxes in French Caribbean Writing. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2001.

© Jerry Bauer

BRUCE CHATWIN

Born: Sheffield, South Yorkshire, England
May 13, 1940

Died: Nice, France
January 18, 1989

Widely recognized as one of England's most brilliant essayists, novelists, and journalists, Chatwin wrote semiautobiographical travel books that secured for him a permanent place among travel writers of the twentieth century.

BIOGRAPHY

Bruce Chatwin was born in Sheffield, England, on May 13, 1940. His mother was Margharita Turnell Chatwin, and his father, Charles Leslie Chatwin, was a lawyer. His family regularly moved around England, but he attended a private secondary school in Marlborough. He did not pursue a formal university degree, choosing to read on his own and travel throughout the world to places that fascinated him. His writings about these locations became his first published works and established him as an expert on their history, geography, and culture.

He did, however, work for eight years at Sotheby's, the famous art auction house in London. Beginning as a porter there, he worked his way up to art consultant and picture expert and, finally, became a director and member of Sotheby's board of directors in 1965. His rise to such a high position in his early twenties has become one of the art world's most famous success stories. Though starting work still in his teens, he suggested that a newly acquired Picasso painting was really a fake. When highly paid experts were asked to authenticate the painting, they found that it was, indeed, just that. Chatwin was then offered a job as an expert in paintings. His career at Sotheby's was so successful that he was actually given, at age twenty-five, a partnership in the company, becoming the youngest man in the history of Sotheby's to be appointed director of modern art.

In the meantime, Chatwin had used his self-taught expertise to begin his own antiquities collection. Disaster struck, however, when he suddenly lost his eyesight at the age of twenty-five by, according to his eye doctor, studying too closely the details of paintings and other art objects. Though it was considered a psychosomatic disorder, his physician suggested that he find landscapes with long horizons so that he could physiologically expand the parameters of his vision. Upon the return of his eyesight, Chatwin immediately sailed to the African Sahara and became deeply involved not only in the physical landscape but also with the nomadic tribes that traveled throughout the land and domesticated its enormous spaces. Initially, he had become interested in the relationship between the physical geography and the spiritual lives of those who lived there and how that combined into a geography of the imagination.

Chatwin never returned to the rarefied atmosphere and financially successful world of art criticism and auctioneering, preferring the nomadic existence of the people that he studied for the remainder of his life. He then began his career as a journalist in London, journeying to the most remote parts of the earth and reporting on the strange nomadic peoples who lived in places that at first seemed barely habitable. What he discovered was that those places that seemed most barren actually possessed the most elaborate, complex, and richly detailed spiritual cosmologies. Yet he also discovered that even in remote areas, such as Patagonia and the outback of Australia, Western "civilization" and values had done enormous damage both to the natives of the region and to the delicate ecological balance between the human, animal, and plant life that cohabit in vital symbiotic relationships.

After becoming interested in anthropology and archaeology through his journalistic assignments, Chatwin began writing in earnest. His visit to the southern tip of South America known as Patagonia became the subject matter of his first full-length book, In Patagonia (1977). It was highly praised by many critics as a worthy successor to the travel journals of both D. H. Lawrence and Evelyn Waugh. It won several prestigious awards at the time, namely the Hawthornden Prize in 1978 and the E. M. Forster Award in 1979. His ability to amalgamate facts with fictional techniques raised the level of discourse from mere reportage to a serious examination of the spiritual lives of a variety of European and indigenous groups in the desolate areas of the world.

His next major critical success was a novel titled The Viceroy of Ouidah (1980), which he had initially intended as a nonfictional biography about a notorious nineteenth century Brazilian slave trader, Francisco Felix de Souza. Chatwin's arrest and imprisonment as an illegal mercenary in the West African nation of Dahomey, the setting of de Souza's atrocities, became the occasion of the novel. The book mixed fact and fiction so compellingly that the German film director Werner Herzog decided to adapt it for a film. Having successfully garnered international acclaim as both a travel writer and a nonfiction novelist, Chatwin then proceeded to write a conventional novel about identical twin brothers who spend eighty years on a remote Welsh farm. That novel, On the Black Hill (1982), elicited high praise from such authors as John Updike, who compared it favorably to both Lawrence and Ernest Hemingway.

Chatwin's fifth book became his most renowned travel journal and received unusually high praise. The Songlines (1987) is a quasi documentary account of his trip to Australia to study Aboriginal culture. Again, he intermixes an adventure narrative with philosophical meditations on the damage done to the instinctual lives of the natives of the area. The book has become a virtual model for the work of other concerned students of how Western culture has systematically destroyed the spiritual foundations of so-called savage cultures.

Chatwin's final novel, Utz (1988), was a product of his deep knowledge of antiquities. It documents, fictionally, the life of Caspar Utz, a Czech aristocrat who collected priceless Meissen figurines during World War II. His final work was a collection of essays titled What Am I Doing Here (1989), which was published posthumously. He died in Nice, France, on January 18, 1989, of a rare bone marrow cancer possibly contracted during a visit to China, but there were some reports that he actually died of complications from AIDS (acquired immunodeficiency syndrome).

ANALYSIS

The key to understanding the complex world of Chatwin is that he combined a number of identities that manifest themselves in his writings. He was a respected and highly accomplished novelist, a writer of critically acclaimed travel books, and a superb essayist. What distinguished him from others who write novels, travel literature, or essays was that he interwove genres in exceptionally imaginative ways. By amalgamating these genres, he was able to keep the content of his books open and multifaceted. In Patagonia is primarily a journalistic assignment that he recorded in ninety-seven journal entries. It documents a trip to the southern tip of South America but tells much more than the mere literal events of that trip. He consciously does not call it a diary, since that word suggests a simple recording of daily events. Since he is highly conscious of the etymologies of crucial words, he calls it a journal and stresses the connection between the words "journey" and "journal"; he thus establishes a two-part structure consisting of the physical journey and, as importantly, the spiritual journey he is taking into his own psyche as well as the spiritual history of the place itself.

The ostensible reason for the trip is to find the origin of a primitive relic that had been in his family for many years. What he serendipitously discovers is a deeper understanding of himself, his family, and the heart of Patagonia itself. By varying his methods of inquiry, he was able to bring into his book enormous amounts of information that include religious, historical, mythical, archaeological, and personal data. What emerges, then, are cultural investigations that reveal radical differences in his Eurocentric value system and the so-called primitive societies that had flourished until the arrival of Western exploiters. His physical explorations become metaphysical ones, since he is always interested in the earliest signs of some kind of common human nature. Chatwin, like writers such as the poet Ezra Pound and the fiction writer Guy Davenport, was keenly interested in how the archaic imagination reasserts itself in modern society, and how it can be used to salvage humankind from its self-destructive practices.

Since Chatwin possessed a highly attuned romantic imagination that trusted impulse and embraced risk, he believed that avenues other than fact and data contribute to a comprehensive understanding of humanity's problematical plight. His novel The Viceroy of Ouidah combines the facts about the life of a Brazilian slave trader with Chatwin's own starkly dramatic re-creations of the sadistic conditions under which the slaves suffered. Some critics called it a mock-heroic fantasy full of exotic, even surrealistic scenes. He uses fictional techniques to shape and organize the bare facts into cinematic images that demand attention and make their points with shattering impact.

After receiving worldwide acclaim for a travel book (In Patagonia) and a nonfiction novel (The Viceroy of Ouidah) that became a film, Chatwin produced a conventional novel, fully fictional as far as anyone knew, about identical twin brothers who spend their lives on a remote Welsh farm. On the Black Hill is as explicitly detailed in miniature as his earlier works were grandly exotic.

The Songlines, perhaps his most brilliant and respected book, revisits the genre of the travel book as it details his explorations of one of the oldest cultures of the world, the Aborigines in the dry heart of central Australia. Chatwin loved extremes and was especially enamored with where extremes converged. What interested him most were those locations, geographical and cultural, where the aggressively linear West meets the cyclical ever-renewing "primitive" imaginations of the Aborigines.

In his last major work, he returned to the nonfiction novel. Utz combines techniques from detective fiction with James Bond-like adventures in its depiction of lost treasures of rare miniature figurines in central Europe. Chatwin was able to use his encyclopedic knowledge of antiquities that he had collected during and after his career with Sotheby's.

IN PATAGONIA

First published: 1977

Type of work: Travel literature

The narrator journeys to the southern tip of South America to authenticate a lost family relic but discovers, instead, the disturbing riches of Patagonia.

One of the difficulties that critics had when In Patagonia first appeared in print was what to call it. It was certainly a travel book that treated that remote area with the same serious attention that classic travel writers such as D. H. Lawrence and Evelyn Waugh treated the locations that they wrote about. Indeed, Chatwin's style is every bit as literary and novelistic as the best of either Lawrence or Waugh, both of whom were known primarily as novelists.

Though the structure of the book is quite obviously the journal of a trip, Chatwin varies his methods throughout the work. He uses anecdotes about people he met and adventures he had and interweaves them, sometimes seamlessly, with anecdotes, adventures, and stories he had earlier read about in books and articles about Patagonia. Though the book opens with the narrator's call to adventure as he vows to find and authenticate the origin of a family relic from Patagonia (a piece of giant animal skin from prehistoric times), the narrator quietly removes himself as an active participant in the action of the venture. He prefers to record what he sees and hears and also to connect that data with the many sources he studied before embarking on his trip.

The book becomes, then, a mélange of diverse methods of presentation that include biography, autobiography, anthropology, myth, geography, religion, portrait, strange encounters, family history, and philosophical speculation. He uses all of these methods not only to describe a sense of the place but also, more importantly, to evoke the spirit of the actual geography and its relationship to the original natives, the Araucanian Indians. While the book celebrates the diversity of that part of the world, it also, just as vividly, laments what has been lost as a result of the invasions of other cultures into its precincts. The narrator spends considerable time meditating on the ruins of Patagonia and on what it had once been as a culture unsullied by Western materialistic values.

Chatwin is also involved in the ultimate journey South; that is, a Dantean journey into hell. Indeed, at the tip of Patagonia is Tierra del Fuego, or the Land of Fire. He meets a variety of wise and not-so-wise guides as he pursues both his actual and his mythological journeys to the underworld. What keeps the reader involved is the sense that he or she is witnessing and recording a fall from the Edenic timeless innocence of the native Patagonians into the time-bound, linear world of divided consciousness—that Western imperative that separates the world into categories of sacred and profane.

Chatwin uses dramatic juxtapositions to show how a variety of European immigrants, such as the Welsh, Germans, Scots, Boers, and others, had left the stultifying atmospheres of their native countries while yet ironically and unconsciously re-creating the same cultural restrictions they thought they were fleeing. What fascinates Chatwin about this urge to find satisfaction in radically new landscapes is the suspicion that the source of this desire has a genetic basis. In chapter 44, he encounters some scientists who have been studying the migration patterns of jackass penguins: “We talked late into the night, arguing whether or not we, too, have journeys mapped out in our central nervous systems; it seemed the only way to account for our insane restlessness.” In short, the quest—the basic plot of most Western literature—can be explained as physiological law. Indeed, such questions tortured Chatwin in many of his other examinations of nomadic cultures. He suspected that humankind’s fall consisted in abandoning his natural, biologically determined impulse to move throughout the world continuously; settling into a permanent place was therefore unnatural.

Chatwin’s most convincing form of historical and anthropological inquiry always comes, however, in the form of his etymological research. Linguistically, the name “Patagonia” refers to a tribe of Tehuelche Indians who were hunters of great size, speed, and endurance. He extrapolates from these characteristics that Caliban, of William Shakespeare’s The Tempest (pr. 1611; pb. 1623), was probably a Patagonian, an idea that he pursues into Gnostic and Hermetic interpretations of Patagonia that had found their way into a number of Renaissance texts. Throughout the work, Chatwin identifies himself with the mythic Abel, the wanderer, as opposed to Cain, the hoarder of property. He also uncovers historical accounts of American heroes, such as Butch Cassidy, and British scientist Charles Darwin, whose early associations with Patagonia were disturbing and repulsive.

One of Chatwin’s most convincing arguments for looking upon Patagonia as a place of Edenic innocence is the language of one of its indigenous tribes, the Yaghans. He notes that there are no abstractions in that language for moral ideas such as “good” or “beautiful” unless they are rooted to actual things. The tribe’s territory is always a paradise that could never be improved upon, and hell was the outside world.

The last stop on this odyssey through the visionary south is the cave in which his grandmother’s cousin, Captain Charley Milward, had probably found the piece of prehistoric animal skin that became the central relic of his family. Nearing the end of his visit, he states that he has accomplished “the object of this ridiculous journey.” Chatwin leaves Patagonia convinced that humankind lost its innocence when it ceased its nomadic existence and settled into one place, and that Cain derived his reputation for villainy principally because he founded the first city.

THE SONGLINES

First published: 1987

Type of work: Novel

The narrator, Chatwin, journeys throughout the Australian outback in search of Aboriginal sacred sites.

The Songlines is generally considered Bruce Chatwin’s masterpiece, even though its form is difficult to categorize. It certainly is an adventure story, but it is also a novel of ideas; it combines, although to a lesser extent than In Patagonia, many of the identical literary, historical, and philosophical techniques, such as anecdote, biography, autobiography, anthropological case study, and other similar methods of inquiry. The book includes a previously unpublished anthropological study called "The Nomadic Alternative," which had arisen from Chatwin's journeys to Africa and South America.

Some critics have labeled The Songlines a meta-physical novel that interweaves Chatwin's experiences in the Australian outback with philosophical meditations on the dark future of Western civilization. It resembles In Patagonia in that it can be read as a long meditation upon the ruins of the prelogical civilization of the Aborigines, who now dwell in the fallen world of time and permanent location and, as a result, have lost their visionary consciousness. Their reaction to being restricted to a particular space has resulted in alcoholism of epidemic proportions.

Readers familiar with Chatwin's recurring concern will encounter it again in this work. As in In Patagonia, Chatwin believes that humankind's original pristine state was as nomadic travelers rather than as settlers in a permanent location. What obsessed him for more than twenty years was the destructive territorialism that permanent ownership breeds. Mircea Eliade demonstrated in dozens of books that humankind has derived its sense of the sacred from symbolic centers in which the divine and the human intersect. These points of intersection (Calvary, for example) then become permanent centers of significance or shrines around which civilizations are built. People, then, derive their identities from their proximity to permanent sacred places.

What troubled Chatwin was that the definition of the sacred among the natives of the Australian outback differs radically from Christian theologians insofar as Aboriginal sacred places cover the earth and derive their sacred status and identity from the human imaginations that "sing" them into existence. The poetry of that idea and the idea of that kind of poetry drove him to pursue an arduous and sometimes dangerous trip into one of the world's most remote and desolate areas.

The narrator finds a brilliant Russian, Arkady Volchok, an Australian citizen, to guide him through the outback. Arkady's job is to map the sacred sites of the Aborigines so that the national railroad system will not infringe upon those areas. Volchok becomes Chatwin's highly informed guide throughout the journey. What he discovers is in enormous contrast to the usual Judeo-Christian creation narrative, and the narrator's dramatic confrontation with these stunning differences becomes the energy that drives the story along. Volchok leads Chatwin through the elaborate cosmology of the natives consisting of the "Dreaming-tracks," or "Songlines," that are the footprints of the ancestors as they crisscrossed the land for ten thousand years singing the world into existence. As these ancient totemic ancestors traveled nomadically through the land, they scattered a trail of words and songs along their footprints, known as "Dreaming-tracks," which became paths of communication among the most distant tribes. By naming in song all significant objects or features of the landscape, the ancestors called all things into existence. Chatwin found that, once again, nature followed art in that the Greek word from which "poem" derives is "poesis," which means "to make or create." The "Walkabout," then, became a ritual journey to keep the land in its original condition and, thus, re-create Creation. Nothing was there until the Ancestors, the great poets and singers, brought it into existence from out of their own minds and souls. The narrator delights in both the similarities and the differences between the primary wisdom of the European Holy Grail quest ("The king and the land are one") and the core of the Aboriginal cosmology ("The song and the land are one").

Later, in talking to an ex-Benedictine Aboriginal named Father Flynn, Chatwin finally hears articulated what he has suspected for twenty years: Once people settled into one place, everything began to disintegrate. The people had to keep moving in such barren land: "To move in such landscape was survival: to stay in the same place was suicide." A good third of the book consists of Chatwin's notes from his journal, most of which are quotations from a range of philosophers, spiritual leaders, and writers such as the Buddha, Meister

Eckehart, the biblical writers, Shakespeare, Martin Buber, Arthur Koestler, William Blake, and many, many others. He concludes the book with salient quotations from Giambattista Vico, the linguistic philosopher Otto Jespersen, and finally the great German existentialist Martin Heidegger. Arkady takes him to witness the final hours of three ancient Aborigines who are dying together on their shared totemic songline behind a large rock in the middle of a desert. They are “going back” into the place of their conception so that they may become “the Ancestor.”

Chatwin was terminally ill as he finished this book, and though the book’s organization is weakest at its conclusion, his sensual writing style is as lucid as anything he ever wrote.

SUMMARY

Few writers went to such great lengths to pursue their passionate obsessions as Bruce Chatwin. Suspecting that a nomadic existence was humankind’s original and most natural condition, he journeyed to the farthest points on the planet to test his theory. If he was not as great a stylist as the other two distinguished travel writers, Evelyn Waugh and D. H. Lawrence, he certainly brought a more precise and varied brand of scholarship to his work. Compared with Lawrence, Chatwin documented even more brutally the disastrous consequences that modern industrialization and mechanization

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does the range of writers who have praised Bruce Chatwin suggest about the man?
- If places are not sacred, and if people are too “territorial,” how can Chatwin’s awareness of a need to travel be explained?
- What evidence from your experience confirms or denies the dangers Chatwin saw in being “restricted to a particular space”?
- Chatwin rose quickly, both as an art critic and writer. Which matters more: genius or determination?
- Consider Chatwin’s body of work as an argument against too strict an adherence to the demands and limitations of literary genre.

had on so-called primitive societies. His works truly celebrate the idiosyncratic diversity of the world while simultaneously lamenting the damage done to the instinctual lives of those, such as the Aborigines, who have no methods of protecting themselves.

Patrick Meanor

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Viceroy of Ouidah, 1980

On the Black Hill, 1982

The Songlines, 1987

Utz, 1988

NONFICTION:

In Patagonia, 1977 (travel)

What Am I Doing Here, 1989

Nowhere Is a Place: Travels in Patagonia, 1992 (with Paul Theroux, originally published as Patagonia Revisited, 1985)

Far Journeys: Photographs and Notebooks, 1993 (David King and Francis Wyndham, editors)

Anatomy of Restlessness: Selected Writings, 1969-1989, 1996 (Jan Borm and Matthew Graves, editors)

About the Author

- Ackerman, Diane. "Home Was Where the Road Was." The New York Times Book Review, September 10, 1989, pp. 9, 11.
- Clapp, Susannah. With Chatwin: Portrait of a Writer. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1997.
- Enzensberger, Hans Magnus. "Much Left Unsaid." The Times Literary Supplement, June 16, 1989, p. 657.
- Keneally, Thomas. "Going for a Songline." The Observer, June 28, 1987, p. 23.
- Meanor, Patrick. Bruce Chatwin. New York: Twayne, 1997.
- Rieff, David. "The Wanderer's Wisdom." The New Republic 197 (November 30, 1987): 36-39.
- Rushdie, Salman. "Before the Voice We Lost Fell Silent." The Observer, May 14, 1989, p. 48.
- Shakespeare, Nicholas. Bruce Chatwin. New York: Nan A. Talese, 2000.
- Ure, John. In Search of Nomads: An Anglo-American Obsession from Hester Stanhope to Bruce Chatwin. London: Constable, 2003.

Library of Congress

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

Born: London(?), England
c. 1343

Died: London, England
October 25(?), 1400

Generally agreed to be the most important writer in English literature prior to William Shakespeare, Chaucer retains a central position in the development of English literature and the English language.

BIOGRAPHY

While historians have been able to reconstruct much about the life of Geoffrey Chaucer (CHAW-sur) from the 493 documents, mostly office records, that mention him, these documents cast light only on the public life of a prominent civil servant; not one refers to him as an author. That is not to say that he was not recognized or appreciated as a poet by his contemporaries: In Chaucer's day, poetry was considered to be a leisure pastime of talented men, a valuable skill, but not in itself a career. Chaucer, too, probably thought of himself primarily in terms of his public duties rather than his poetry.

The exact date and even year of Chaucer's birth are unknown; the year 1340 has become traditionally accepted, but 1343 may be a more accurate guess. He was probably born in London, where his parents, John and Agnes, held property. His father was a prosperous wine merchant with business ties to the court of King Edward III.

Despite his middle-class origins, he was to have a distinguished public career as a courtier, soldier, diplomat, and civil servant. No records of his early childhood or schooling have survived, but in 1357 Chaucer received an appointment to serve as a page in the household of Elizabeth de Burgh, countess of Ulster and wife of Edward III's son Lionel, duke of Clarence. Chaucer apparently went along with Prince Lionel's forces when England invaded France in 1359, was captured by the French, and then ransomed in 1360.

No direct evidence survives concerning Chaucer's activities between 1360 and 1366, but Thomas Speght, who edited Chaucer's works in 1598, claimed to have seen records establishing that Chaucer was studying among the lawyers of the Inner Temple, one of the four great Inns of Court. As expensive academies for the sons of rich or noble families, the inns were more convenient than the universities for a grounding in common law because of their proximity to the law courts in Westminster and also because common law was studied in three languages, English, French, and Latin, at a time when only Latin was used at the universities. A period of study at one of the inns would account for the training in record keeping and legal procedures that would have been considered prerequisite for many of the posts that Chaucer later held.

In 1366 he married Philippa de Roet, a woman well above his own social class, the daughter of a knight and sister of Katherine Swynford. (Swynford was to become the mistress and eventually the third wife of Edward III's son, John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who would become one of the most powerful men in England.) About 1367, Chaucer began working as a member of the household of Edward III and was soon advanced from the status of yeoman to that of esquire (just below a knight). He apparently had no specific duties and may have been valuable to the household in part for his storytelling abilities. He was engaged in four diplomatic missions to France between 1366 and 1370, and an extended mission to Italy in 1372 and 1373. In 1374, having been made financially independent with a yearly grant and a rent-free house, he left the royal household and became controller of customs for the port of London. It was the first of a series of responsible administrative positions that he would hold through the reigns of three monarchs—a tribute both to his competence and to his ability to remain on good terms with the members of opposing factions.

Chaucer's busy life in public affairs was apparently never a serious obstacle to his creative work. Indeed, most of his poetry seems to have been written during the years of his most active public service, and relatively little after his retirement. Since Chaucer's works were all written before the introduction of the printing press into England and existed only in his manuscripts and copies made of them by scribes, there are no exact dates of "publication" of any of his works. Dating the works is further complicated by evidence that he left several of them unfinished and worked on others over long periods of time. Still, various kinds of evidence suggest that, by this stage of his career, he had translated much of the French Roman de la rose (eleventh century) into English as the Romaunt of the Rose (c. 1370), had written several short poems, and also had written the first of his "major minor poems," Book of the Duchess (c. 1370), an elegy almost certainly written to commemorate the death of Blanche of Lancaster, the first wife of John of Gaunt. The date of her death, probably in 1368 or 1369, has allowed literary historians to assign a fairly secure date to this particular work, although even in this case it may be that the poem was written well after the event.

Chaucer was sent again to France to conduct peace negotiations several times in 1376 and 1377. One of the goals of these talks may have been to arrange a marriage between ten-year-old Richard, heir to the English throne, and eleven-year-old Marie, daughter of the king of France. It has been suggested that the second of Chaucer's major minor poems, Parlement of Foules (1380), satirizes these discussions and was written during this period, but the date and occasion of the poem have been much disputed. He continued to hold positions of influence when Richard II came to the throne in 1377, traveling to Italy again in 1378 to negotiate with the ruler of Milan.

In or around 1380, Chaucer completed his translation of De consolacione philosophiae (c. 523;

The Consolation of Philosophy, late ninth century), by the Roman philosopher Boethius, from Latin into English. This translation, known usually by the title Boece (c. 1380), would have provided access to a work of great literary, as well as philosophical, value for those who could not read Latin, and it is also seen as having had a strong influence on Chaucer's own ideas. In 1382, he published Troilus and Criseyde, a poem that includes discussions of Boethian ideas about free will and determinism. In 1385, Chaucer was allowed to appoint a permanent deputy to handle his duties in the customs office, and in 1386 he was elected to Parliament, resigning the office of controller of customs shortly thereafter. The period between 1386 and 1389 seems to have been relatively quiet, and it is thought that during these years he wrote the General Prologue to The Canterbury Tales (1387-1400), as well as several of the individual tales themselves. He was appointed to the important post of clerk of the king's works in 1389, in charge of the maintenance and supervision of several royal forests, parks, and public buildings, including Westminster Palace and the Tower of London, until 1391, when he was appointed deputy forester of one of the royal forests, still a responsible position, but far less demanding than his clerkship had been. About this time, he must have written the fourth of his major minor poems, The Legend of Good Women (1380-1386), and A Treatise on the Astrolabe (1387-1392), a technical manual on the use of the astrolabe, a scientific instrument used for astronomical observations, which Chaucer says he wrote for his ten-year-old son, Lewis. When Henry IV came to the throne in 1399, he doubled Chaucer's annuity, a sign of his continued favor with the court. Chaucer's tomb in London's Westminster Abbey, which marks the first burial in what has come to be called Poets' Corner, gives the date of his death as October 25, 1400.

ANALYSIS

One of the keys to Chaucer's continued critical success is the scope and diversity of his work, which extends from romance to tragedy, from sermon to dream vision, from pious saints' lives to bawdy fabliaux. Each century's readers have found something new in Chaucer and have learned something about themselves, as well.

Chaucer was recognized even in his own time as the foremost of English poets. A ballad written by the French poet Eustache Deschamps in 1386, well before the works for which Chaucer is now remembered, identifies him as the “great translator, noble Geoffrey Chaucer” (probably thinking of his translation of the Romaunt of the Rose) and praises his work extravagantly, as do the contemporary English writers Thomas Usk and John Gower. Chaucer’s most important creative output consists of six major narrative poems, although his translations and short poems are also of high quality and considerable interest. These six are The Canterbury Tales and Troilus and Criseyde, his two masterpieces, and the four “major minor” poems, Book of the Duchess, Parlement of Foules, House of Fame (1372-1380), and The Legend of Good Women.

All four of the major minor poems are structured by the devices of the dramatized first-person narrator and the dream vision. In the earliest of these poems, Book of the Duchess, the evidently love-sick and therefore (by the conventions of courtly love) insomniac narrator reads the classical myth of Ceyx and Alcyone to help him sleep. After finishing the tale, he does in fact fall asleep and has a dream in which he follows a group of hunters on a chase. He is eventually led by a small dog into a clearing in the woods, where he comes upon a grieving knight dressed all in black. At first uncomprehending, the narrator comes to realize that the Black Knight’s grief has been caused by the death of his incomparable lady-love and the end of their blissful life together. The poet then wakes and resolves to write the story of his experience, presumably the very poem that the reader has just read. The poem is a sensitive elegy on the death of John of Gaunt’s wife Blanche, but it is also of great interest in its own right as a work of art.

While the framing device of the dream vision had long been a standard tool for medieval poets, especially for the presentation of allegorical subjects, Chaucer’s innovative grafting of the character of the narrator onto this stock technique creates additional levels of psychological and dramatic depth. The narrator’s naïve questions, the result of his failing to understand the Black Knight’s poetic and allusive speeches about his loss, provide the knight with a sympathetic, if obtuse, listener and enable him to talk his way through his grief and achieve a measure of consolation. Some critics prefer to read the poem with a slightly different emphasis, arguing that the dreamer-narrator only pretends to be naïve in order to help the knight work through his grief to a catharsis. Some see the dramatic irony as the effect of the distance between Chaucer the author and his naïve narrator; others interpret it as a result of the distance between the sophisticated narrator and the bumbling persona that he creates for the knight’s benefit. In either case, the key narrative function—achieved through the unreliable persona who accurately records, but inaccurately interprets, the events that he narrates—is already present in Chaucer’s first extended work. This narrative persona would appear in one guise or another in all Chaucer’s major narratives and would become one of the poet’s most distinctive stylistic trademarks.

Parlement of Foules follows Book of the Duchess closely in structure if not in time. Chaucer combines the motifs of the dream vision and limited narrator with the popular conventions of the council or parliament of birds and the demande d’amour, the “question of love,” which calls for the solution of delicate and usually involved problems of etiquette in courtly love. As in the earlier poem, the narrator, having lamented his own inaptitude for love, reads a book (this time one on dreams) and falls asleep. After being shown around an allegorical landscape by one of the characters in the book that he had been reading, the narrator is taken to a beautiful park near the temple of Venus, where the birds of the parliament are gathered before the goddess of Nature on Saint Valentine’s Day for the purpose of choosing their mates. A female “formel” eagle is claimed by three different suitors, who present in turn their arguments for deserving her love. The issue is then subjected to a lively debate among the general assembly of birds, which eventually deteriorates into bickering and name-calling. Nature takes charge at this point and leaves the decision to the formel eagle herself, who chooses to defer her choice until next year’s Valentine’s Day gathering. The shouting of the birds at this decision wakes the dreamer, who returns to his books, still hoping to learn from them something about love. Critics have been unable to agree about the interpretation of the poem. It has been read variously as a serious debate about the conventions of courtly love, as a satire mocking those conventions, as an allegory (either about love and marriage in general or, more specifically, about the suit of Richard II for the hand of Marie of France in 1377 or the hand of Anne of Bohemia in 1381), and as a political and social satire (with the birds representing different social classes).

Such diversity of critical opinion represents the norm, rather than the exception, in studies of Chaucer, and there has been even less agreement about interpretation of his two remaining major minor poems, House of Fame and The Legend of Good Women, at least in part because neither appears to have ever been completed. House of Fame presents an especially heterogeneous set of materials, recounting the dreamer's vision of the story of Dido and Aeneas in book 1, an airborne journey to the House of Fame in the talons of a talking eagle in book 2, and a visit to the House of Fame and the House of Rumor in book 3. None of the critical explanations offered of the poem's overall theme or meaning has been widely accepted, and the diversity of the different parts may preclude such unifying readings. The poem does succeed, however, as an often brilliantly comic literary experiment. The Legend of Good Women presents a prologue, which exists in two versions, in which the god of love demands that the narrator write a series of tales about good women to atone for his many tales about unfaithful women. The nine tales that follow are not among Chaucer's best efforts, and he apparently lost interest and abandoned the idea without completing the poem. The device of a prologue and dramatic frame enclosing a series of stories, however, may well have helped him conceive the structure of The Canterbury Tales.

THE CANTERBURY TALES

First published: 1387-1400

Type of work: Poetry

A motley group of travelers on a pilgrimage agree to take turns telling stories to one another along the way.

The Canterbury Tales, Chaucer's best-known and most important literary achievement, consists of twenty-four tales, some with prologues and epilogues, which range over a wide variety of styles, subjects, and genres. The work avoids becoming merely a loose collection of unrelated stories because of Chaucer's ingenious development of the framing device of the pilgrimage and his ability to suit his diverse tales to the personalities of their tellers. Chaucer's ideas about the book apparently evolved over a period of decades, with some tales (the Second Nun's Tale, parts of the Monk's Tale) possibly written as early as the 1370's, and others (the Nun's Priest's Tale, the Parson's Tale) probably written in the later 1390's, not long before his death. The imaginative breakthrough that made the work possible—his conceiving of the framing narrative that lends coherence to the stories—seems to have occurred some time in the 1380's, when he must have written an early version of the General Prologue. The work is evidently unfinished, though the flexible nature of the framing device allows for considerable diversity of opinion as to Chaucer's final plans for the poem's overall structure.

The Canterbury Tales begins with the General Prologue, which opens with a lyrical evocation of springtime in England, the time for folk to go on pilgrimages to holy shrines to thank the saints for their good fortune of the past year. It then proceeds to a series of portraits of a particular group of pilgrims assembled at the Tabard Inn in Southwark, near London, where they are preparing to leave on their pilgrimage to Canterbury. The ostensibly random assemblage of pilgrims actually provides a fairly complete spectrum of the middle classes of fourteenth century England, omitting the higher nobility and the poorer peasants but representing a substantial number of the social gradations between the Knight and the Plowman. These characters are not merely representative abstractions, however, but are provided with vividly individual traits to the degree that they become distinct characters for the reader.

One of the most interesting of the characters is the unnamed first-person narrator, who meets the group at the inn on his way to Canterbury, decides to join their party, and describes them for the reader. Critics usually call the narrator “Chaucer the Pilgrim” to differentiate him from the author, whose point of view often seems to diverge considerably from that of his mouthpiece. While the naïve narrator approves of the worldly Prioress and Monk and is amused by the villainous Shipman, the reader is able to see beyond his uncritically approving point of view to their serious faults. The technique of the unreliable narrator leaves all direct storytelling and commentary to speakers whose point of view is suspect to various degrees and calls for the reader to infer the implicit truth from the information provided. If Chaucer did not originate this method of narration, he certainly developed it to a greater extent than any other writer before him. The device of the unreliable narrator has had an influence on later narrative writing, especially in the twentieth century, that would be difficult to overestimate, and much of this influence may be traced directly to Chaucer’s own refinement of the technique.

The proprietor of the Tabard Inn, Harry Bailly, is so struck by the conviviality of the group that he decides to join them on the condition that they agree to participate in a storytelling contest, with himself as leader and judge of the contest. Each pilgrim will tell four stories, two on the way to Canterbury and two on the way back, and the winner will get a free dinner at the inn at the other pilgrims’ expense. The travelers agree and draw lots for the telling of the first tale. The lot falls to the Knight, who begins the sequence of tales. No pilgrim actually tells more than one tale (with the exception of Chaucer the Pilgrim, discussed below), and at one time it was thought that Chaucer must have originally planned some 120 tales (four each for thirty pilgrims). More recently, critics have argued that the scheme for 120 tales is proposed by Harry Bailly, not Chaucer, and that The Canterbury Tales as a whole may be fairly close to its final form. While the work is clearly not finished in a strict traditional sense (the pilgrims never arrive at Canterbury or return, and the winner of the contest is never revealed), it does seem to have a coherence of effect that is just as satisfying aesthetically as a more rigid closure would have been.

The Knight tells one of the longest and most formal tales, a chivalric romance with philosophical overtones set in ancient Thebes, treating of courtly love and ceremonial combat among the nobility. This somewhat idealized tale of aristocratic life is followed by an abrupt change of pace when the Miller, so drunk that he can hardly sit on his horse, insists on telling the next tale, which addresses the rather less courtly love of a college student and his elderly landlord’s young wife. The tale is one of the finest examples of the fabliau, a short comic tale, usually obscene, depicting illicit love and practical jokes among lower- and middle-class characters. The tale contains a number of parallels to the Knight’s Tale and may be viewed in part as a parody of it. In addition to connecting with the preceding tale, the Miller’s Tale provides the impetus for the next. The Reeve, who bears a number of similarities to the foolish carpenter cuckolded by the student, takes the Miller’s Tale personally and repays him with another fabliau, this one about a miller whose wife and daughter are comically seduced by two college students. The Cook’s Tale, which follows, is an incomplete fragment that would evidently have been another fabliau.

These four tales follow the General Prologue and one another in all the major manuscripts of The Canterbury Tales and are collectively referred to as part (or fragment) 1 (or A). Depending on the manuscripts followed, modern editions usually recognize ten distinct parts; while the order of tales within each part is fixed, the parts themselves are not always arranged in the same order. None of the arrangements offered is without its problems, and it may well be the case that Chaucer had not decided on a final order. The most commonly followed arrangement is that of the Ellesmere manuscript, and that will be observed here, as well.

After part 2, which consists of the Man of Law’s tale of the saintly Constance and her several tribulations, come parts 3 through 5, a textually and thematically connected series that has come to be called the Marriage Group, as several of the tales seem to be pursuing what amounts to a running debate on the proper roles of the man and woman in marriage. In the Wife of Bath’s lengthy prologue, as well as in her tale, she argues that the woman should have the mastery of the man in marriage. While most of her arguments are drawn from traditional antifeminine satire, and while the stock character type of the bawdy older woman had existed since classical times, Chaucer combines these elements to original effect. Alison of Bath is developed into a much more rounded and sympathetic character than any of her predecessors, and her humorous and lively account of her methods of outwitting and dominating men seems, at least to modern readers, more feminist than antifeminist. After an exchange of fabliaux between the Friar and the Summoner (each telling a tale that degrades the other's profession), the Clerk tells a tale about a pure and virtuous wife, perhaps by way of replying to the Wife of Bath, and then the Merchant tells a tale of an unfaithful wife. After a short and incomplete attempt at a chivalric romance by the youthful Squire (whose tale does not measure up to that of his accomplished father, the Knight), the Franklin tells a tale of mutual respect and forbearance by a married couple, a tale that is usually seen as concluding the marriage debate with a compromise. Part 6, one of the more difficult parts to place in the sequence, contains the brief Physician's tale of Appius's sacrifice of his daughter Virginia and the justly renowned Pardoner's prologue and tale of greed and murder, frequently anthologized and often called one of the first great short stories in English literature.

Part 7 is the longest and most varied of the parts. It begins with the Shipman's crude fabliau and the Prioress's sentimental saint's legend. Chaucer the Pilgrim starts to recount an inept romance about Sir Thopas, but his story is so bad that he is interrupted and told to stop. Chaucer the Pilgrim then tells the Tale of Melibee, a lengthy prose sermon. After the Monk recounts a series of brief tragic anecdotes, and is also interrupted, the Nun's Priest tells his tale. The latter is based on the popular stories of Reynard the Fox, in which the fox tries to outwit and capture the cock, Chauntecleer. Chaucer fuses the genre of the beast fable with that of the mock epic, telling his story of barnyard animals in the elevated rhetoric of courtly romance, and makes the cock into a somewhat bombastic orator whose digressive and encyclopedic argument with his wife over dreams almost overshadows the plot of the story. Because of its comedy and stylistic range, the Nun's Priest's Tale is widely considered by modern readers to be the one that ought to have been awarded the prize at the end of the pilgrimage.

In part 8, the Second Nun tells a saint's legend, and the Canon Yeoman delivers an exposé of the fraudulent practices of medieval alchemists. Part 9 contains only the Manciple's version of a tale from Metamorphoses (c. 8 C.E.) by Ovid, Chaucer's favorite classical author. Part 10 contains the Parson's long prose sermon and, perhaps, Chaucer's Retraction, a listing and retraction of his worldly writings, which some critics see as a part of the text and an ironic advertisement for the works, and which others see as a sincere extrafictional address to posterity.

While The Canterbury Tales may be unfinished, the very openness of its structure has increasingly come to be seen as one of the sources of the work's complexity and richness. The poem is unified to the degree that, read as a whole, it can draw the reader into the creative process of interpretation and discovery that it demands. Yet it is designed freely enough that the tales may also be appreciated as individual works outside the context of the frame.

TROILUS AND CRISEYDE

First published: 1382

Type of work: Poem

Troilus and Criseyde meet and fall in love in the besieged city of Troy but after three years of happiness are separated.

Troilus and Criseyde is Chaucer's longest complete work and in many ways his most polished; he wrote it at the peak of his creative powers and may well have expected it to endure as his most important literary achievement. Indeed, it has only been in the last century or two that readers have come to rank it a step beneath the incomplete and somewhat experimental The Canterbury Tales. His combining of the conventional setting and plot of medieval romance with realistic insights into character and motivation have led critics to debate whether it is more properly considered a sophisticated medieval romance or the first modern psychological novel.

The story of the Trojan War had long been a popular one in England, partly because of the popular legend that Britain had been founded by the Trojan hero Brut. It is not surprising, therefore, that Chaucer, like many of his contemporaries, wrote a book dealing with aspects of the Troy story. Chaucer's interest lies not so much in the Trojan War itself (though political events caused by the siege affect the personal events that constitute his focus) as in the love story between the two title characters, both members of the Trojan aristocracy. Troilus and Criseyde do not appear as characters in the original version of the legend of Troy, Homer's Iliad (c. 750 B.C.E.; English translation, 1611); Chaucer's immediate source is the contemporary Italian poet Giovanni Boccaccio's Il filostrato

(c. 1335; The Filostrato, 1873), but Chaucer expands the poem considerably (from 5,740 to 8,239 lines) and changes the plot and characters so freely that the poem becomes distinctively his own creation.

The bare outline of the plot is relatively simple: The young nobleman Troilus, son of the Trojan king Priam, falls in love with the widow Criseyde, suffering all the pains of unrequited love specified in the courtly love tradition. He reveals his love for her to his friend Pandarus, who is also Criseyde's uncle and whose machinations eventually unite the two as lovers. Criseyde's father, Calchas, a soothsayer who has foreseen the Trojan defeat and has deserted to the Greek camp, arranges for his daughter to be exchanged for a Trojan prisoner and to be sent to join him. His well-intentioned effort to save his daughter from the destruction of the city has tragic consequences for the two lovers. Before leaving Troy, Criseyde promises to Troilus that she will escape and return to him; this proves difficult, however, and in time her resolve weakens, and she takes a new lover, the Greek soldier Diomedes. Troilus eventually recognizes that she has been unfaithful and, having been killed by the Greek hero Achilles, looks down from the heavens and laughs at the mutability of earthly love as compared to the more durable joys of divine love.

The roles of Pandarus and Criseyde are far more complex in Chaucer's version than in Boccaccio's, and their treatment shifts the emphasis of the plot. Chaucer changes Pandarus from a nondescript comrade of Troilus to Criseyde's elderly uncle, creating tension between his dual roles as Troilus's friend and adviser and Criseyde's guardian. Criseyde is the most complex of the characters, and her actions are less clearly reprehensible. Whereas Boccaccio's tale is focused on Troilus, who represents the author's own disappointment in love, the role of Criseyde comes to dominate Chaucer's poem. Chaucer's greater insight into Criseyde's character creates a balance between the actions that result from the outside pressures of fate and society upon Criseyde and the actions that result from her own free will. While she does prove unfaithful to Troilus, the narrator is generally sympathetic to her, and it is difficult to see what else she could have done to survive under the circumstances in which she finds herself. As a result, critics are divided over whether her portrayal is meant to be admired and pitied or condemned as faithless and perhaps immoral.

SUMMARY

Geoffrey Chaucer was recognized even in his own time as one of the greatest of English poets and is now regarded as the foremost writer in English literature before the time of William Shakespeare. The outstanding characteristics of Chaucer's work include its diversity—covering a spectrum of genres extending from pious saints' lives to bawdy fabliaux, from romance to tragedy—and its consistently humorous quality, allowing Chaucer to combine the serious treatment of moral and philosophical questions with a pervasively comic and entertaining style. His masterpiece, The Canterbury Tales, has proven to be one of the truly inexhaustible classics of world literature, appealing in new ways to each new generation of readers.

William Nelles

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- Romaunt of the Rose*, c. 1370 (translation, possibly not by Chaucer)
Book of the Duchess, c. 1370
Tragedies of Fortune, 1372-1380 (later used as "The Monk's Tale")
The Legend of St. Cecilia, 1372-1380 (later used as "The Second Nun's Tale")
House of Fame, 1372-1380
Parlement of Foules, 1380
Anelida and Arcite, c. 1380
The Legend of Good Women, 1380-1386
Palamon and Ersyte, 1380-1386 (later used as "The Knight's Tale")
Troilus and Criseyde, 1382
The Canterbury Tales, 1387-1400

NONFICTION:

- Boece*, c. 1380 (translation of Boethius's The Consolation of Philosophy)
A Treatise on the Astrolabe, 1387-1392

MISCELLANEOUS:

- Works*, 1957 (second edition; F. N. Robinson, editor)

About the Author

- Bowden, Muriel. A Commentary on the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. 2d ed. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
 Donaldson, E. Talbot. Speaking of Chaucer. New York: W. W. Norton, 1970.
 Howard, Donald R. Chaucer. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1987.
 Lynch, Kathryn L., ed. Chaucer's Cultural Geography. New York: Routledge, 2002.
 Payne, Robert O. Geoffrey Chaucer. 2d ed. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
 Rowland, Beryl, ed. Companion to Chaucer Studies. Rev. ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
 St. John, Michael. Chaucer's Dream Visions: Courtliness and Individual Identity. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000.
 Shoaf, R. Allen. Chaucer's Body: The Anxiety of Circulation in the "Canterbury Tales". Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001.
 Shoenck, Richard, and Jerome Taylor, eds. Chaucer Criticism. 2 vols. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 1960-1961.
 Wetherbee, Winthrop. Geoffrey Chaucer: The Canterbury Tales. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Geoffrey Chaucer is classified as a poet. Does the evidence of his work suggest that a writer with his capacities today would be primarily a short-story writer?
- The pilgrims never get to Canterbury, never return, and the storytelling contest suggested by Harry Bailly never occurs. Are not these too many defects to impose upon the reader?
- The Canterbury Tales is an account of a Christian pilgrimage involving several characters with religious vocations, some of them unworthy representatives, and one of them, the Parson, exceptional. Are critics and readers today ill-equipped to appreciate the poem's religious significance?
- Consider the statement that Chaucer's outrageous characters in The Canterbury Tales, such as the Wife of Bath and the Pardoner, are his most interesting ones.
- Give several examples of Chaucer's pilgrims' contentions with each other.
- Critics disagree about whether Criseyde is to be admired and pitied or she is to be condemned. Which view seems best supported by the evidence of the poem Troilus and Criseyde?

Library of Congress

ANTON CHEKHOV

Born: Taganrog, Russia

January 29, 1860

Died: Badenweiler, Germany

July 15, 1904

Chekhov was both a great writer of short fiction and a superb dramatist.

BIOGRAPHY

Anton Pavlovich Chekhov (CHEH-kawf) was born on January 29, 1860, into a family of tradesmen in the southern Russian port town of Taganrog, a stiflingly provincial place where he spent his first nineteen years. Chekhov despised Taganrog and used the adjective “Taganrogish” for behavior that he regarded as dull, boorish, squalid, or vulgar. Chekhov’s father, Pavel Egorovich, was a despotic grocer who terrorized his wife, five sons, and one daughter, overworked them, eventually went bankrupt, and had to flee town to escape his creditors. Chekhov’s mother was the soul of kindness, but she was too timid and deferential to protect her children against an abusive father who beat his offspring, ordered them to attend church services daily, and forbade them the luxury of play. “We felt like little convicts at hard labor,” Chekhov wrote in an 1892 letter about his childhood—though he did manage to fish and swim and to become a great practical joker. It is nonetheless crucial to note that he was deprived of an adequate portion of familial love in his formative years. That may account for the central flaw in Chekhov’s character: his marked tendency to avoid emotional (and with women, physical) intimacy with family, friends, and lovers.

Chekhov’s Taganrog schooling coincided with tremendous socioeconomic revolutionary ferment incited by the writings of Mikhail Bakunin, Aleksandr Herzen, and others, culminating in the assassination of Czar Alexander II in 1881. Yet he was sheltered from these winds of modernity and showed no particular inclination, in either his youth or his manhood, to espouse or oppose radical causes. He did show early signs of the poor health that would cost him his life at the age of forty-four: peritonitis, malaria, hemorrhoids, migraines, and other ailments. His symptoms may well have indicated an early tubercular infection, with the bacillus aided in its assault on Chekhov’s body by his hard boyhood regimen of schooling, churchgoing, and shop-minding.

In July, 1876, the elder Chekhovs and all the children but Anton fled Taganrog for Moscow, leaving him to finish grammar school and giving him a theme—dispossession—that he was to feature in both Tri sestry (pr., pb. 1901, revised pb. 1904; The Three Sisters, 1920) and Vishnyovyy sad (pr., pb. 1904; The Cherry Orchard, 1908). For three years, the lad supported himself alone in his hometown, burdened with economic worries but relieved of his tyrannical father. Astonishingly, Chekhov not only took care of his own needs but also was able to send small sums to his family. He seems to have been born with a maturity and a fastidious sense of order and responsibility that never deserted him.

In August, 1879, Chekhov joined his family in Moscow and lived there for the next twenty years. He began a demanding five-year grind to become a physician, began his literary career in 1880 with comic sketches published in periodicals, and soon established himself as the de facto head of the Chekhov household. Chekhov was enormously prolific in his early years as a writer. He wrote not only stories and short plays but also sketches, comic calendars, captions for cartoons, and even a detective novel, Drama na okhote (1884-1885; The Shooting Party, 1926). When he reviewed his achievements for a collection of his works that was published in 1899, he excluded 342 of his early titles, calling them “my literary excrement,” but only 6 of his later ones. The major source for Chekhov biographers is his enormous and often eloquent correspondence; the total number of his extant letters is about 4,400.

In June, 1884, Chekhov passed his medical school examinations and was to practice medicine sporadically during the remaining twenty years of his life, though always as a profession secondary to writing. He often claimed medicine for his “wife” and literature for his “mistress,” but the mistress had little trouble supplanting the wife. Chekhov’s medical training enabled him to become acquainted with people on diverse social levels and reinforced his sensible, pragmatic (or diagnostic) view of life. Chekhov often attested in his letters to the harmony of his two callings, claiming that familiarity with the scientific method had enriched his literary skills: “To the chemist nothing in this world is unclean. The writer must be as objective as the chemist.”

In one respect, ironically, Chekhov’s medical knowledge proved to be of no value: his care, or rather neglect, of his own health. As early as December, 1884, he suffered a serious attack of chest pains and blood spitting. In October, 1888, he wrote of his bleeding and chronic coughing fits but refused to characterize them as tubercular symptoms. Hemorrhoids afflicted him with maddening torments, but he rejected a medical colleague’s offer to remove them by an operation. Gastritis, phlebitis, migraine headaches, dizzy spells, defective vision, heart palpitations—all these were frequent afflictions.

In the 1890’s, with Chekhov established as a highly eligible bachelor, many women sought his affections, but he usually managed to evade them. A highly productive, hardworking writer, he used his writing as a shield against amorous involvements and insisted that sexual energy (of which he had very little) bore no relation—except perhaps an inverted one—to creative energy (of which he had a ceaseless supply). He frequently linked artistic creativity with erotic self-denial. Sensual, fleshly women in Chekhov’s fiction and drama are almost invariably predatory, distasteful, and villainous, with Chekhov the author idealizing, as romantically desirable, pallid women with thin arms and flat breasts. Yet Chekhov the man, when interested in women at all, preferred them robust, hearty, and earthy. While love is the dominant theme of Chekhov’s mature work, it is almost never happily consummated love. He prefers to collapse illusions rather than fulfill hopes, to stress romantic frustration and forlornness rather than union and bliss.

Before his marriage at the age of forty-one, Chekhov had only one incontestable mistress, the actress Lydia Yavorsky. Olga Knipper was Chekhov’s second certain mistress and then his wife for what were to be his last three years. She had taken drama lessons from Vladimir Ivanovich Nemirovich-Danchenko, cofounder of the Moscow Art Theatre, and graduated into leading roles with his company, including Masha in The Three Sisters and Lyuba Ranevskaya in The Cherry Orchard. Olga was Chekhov’s opposite rather than duplicate: lusty in contrast to his asceticism, insecure and manic-depressive compared to his stable, steady temperament. By July, 1900, she was creeping into his Yalta bedroom at night, stepping on creaking stairs that awakened his old mother and spinsterish sister. The forthright, determined Olga took the initiative in courting the evasive, elusive author, and they were married on May 25, 1901.

In June, 1904, Anton and Olga traveled to the German spa of Badenweiler, near the Black Forest, to attempt his cure. On July 15 he died there, first taking the time to explain to his wife that he was about to die, then draining a glass of champagne, turning calmly to his left side, and expiring. Chekhov’s corpse was delivered to Russia in a railway wagon labeled “Fresh Oysters”—an incongruous effect that he would have loved to have used in one of his stories.

ANALYSIS

Chekhov is the gentlest, subtlest, most modest, and most complex of the nineteenth century’s major authors. In an era when such titans as Leo Tolstoy and Fyodor Dostoevski were concerned with the conflict of good against evil, Chekhov primarily saw the conflict of simplicity against pretension and found the consequences depressing. In the Russia of his time, choked with morality tales, nourished on progressive theories of history, lashed with messianic messages, Chekhov was ahead of his age, a lonely, restrained, melancholy man who remains, despite extensive scholarship and criticism, an ambiguous and elusive figure.

Chekhov is the moralist of the venial sin, seeing a soul damned not for murder, robbery, or adultery but for the small, universal faults of ill-temper, untruthfulness, miserliness, and disloyalty. In his short story "Poprygunya" ("The Grasshopper"), Olga Iranovna, who cheats on her dull doctor husband by having an affair with a mediocre, flashy painter, will not be damned for her adultery. Rather, she will be damned for her shallowness, superciliousness, and narcissism. Be truthful to yourselves and to others, Chekhov says in his art.

With his penchant for understatement and irony, Chekhov has had an overwhelming influence on both short-story writers and dramatists. He does not commit himself to any particular stance, does not issue moral imperatives to his public, and bequeaths no mystical enlightenment to a darkling humanity. Neither a prophet nor a system builder, Chekhov is a diagnostician who works unobtrusively and dispassionately but with great care and delicacy through the materials that life presents. He has no religion, accepting a world of comfortless indifference. He is averse to metaphysics and politics, romanticism and sentimentality. Unlike Tolstoy, he refuses to idealize the peasant class; he is disgusted by the crass materialism of the middle class; and he chronicles the drift, inertia, and self-pity of the upper class.

Yet Chekhov's bleak vision of modern life does not lead him to regard existence as meaningless or people as absurd. Humane to the very marrow of his bones, he never loses sight of the qualities that make his characters affective beings even when analyzing them with tough and apparently impersonal candor, and he refuses to entertain false hopes about them or their world. In what has become a famous letter, Chekhov writes in October, 1889:

I am not a liberal, a conservative, an evolutionist, a monk, or indifferent to the world. I should like to be a free artist—and that is all. . . . I regard trademarks or labels as prejudices. My holy of holies are the human body, health, intelligence, talent, inspiration, love, and the most absolute freedom—freedom from violence and falsehood in whatever form these may be expressed.

Chekhov is passionately addicted to what he vaguely labels "culture," by which he means an indefinable union of humanity, decency, intelligence, education, will, and accomplishment. Yet his tough intelligence tells him—and his audience—that people with these characteristics constitute a dwindling minority. Consequently, he afflicts most of his characters with such flaws as laziness, hypocrisy, pretentiousness, and self-destructiveness.

In everything that Chekhov writes, he refuses to claim for himself the brilliant, commanding powers that are often considered the essence of literary genius. His art is indirect, muted, and apparently casual; he loves to pose as an ideal eavesdropper who communicates an overheard conversation to the jury of his readers or spectators. He excludes whatever is maneuvered, subjective, theatrical, or otherwise grand. He is modest in both his matter and his manner, dealing with the pains of isolation and loneliness, frustrated ambitions, agonizing misunderstandings, forlorn hopes, boredom, and listlessness. He consistently questions the heroic mode, with his best fiction and drama representing lives from which the possibility of valor has been removed, with pathos and desolation displacing honor, admiration, or dignity. Even when his scenes are comic, the sound of heartbreak's snapping strings is never distant.

Chekhov's techniques are those of suggestion and implication, with the author meticulously invisible yet miraculously present. He has a remarkable gift for psychological acuteness and absolute control of tone—a subtle and unique blend of the melancholy, the farcical, the lyrical, and the ironic. He evokes atmosphere with marvelous skill, portrays elusive states of mind, and renders fleeting sensations and subtle effects by a masterful selection of telling details. Like a pointillist painter, Chekhov's brush strokes may seem, at close range, monotonous and drab. Yet once readers step back to view the work from the proper distance, they will respond to the irresistible art of a supreme stylist and creator of mood.

Chekhov knows that both the tragedy and the comedy of life are precisely that they do not usually lead to a large crisis but dissolve in small ones. Thus, he avoids, in both his stories and his plays, the cumulative action that Henrik Ibsen, August Strindberg, Émile Zola, and Fyodor Dostoevski favor. He insists on observing his characters in the apparently commonplace routine of their everyday lives.

"THE KISS"

First published: "Potseluy," 1887 (collected in The Portable Chekhov, 1947)

Type of work: Short story

Lieutenant Ryabovich, a timid artillery officer, finds his life significantly changed as the result of a kiss in the dark.

The setting of "The Kiss" is a Russian village on a May evening. The officers of an artillery brigade encamped nearby are invited by a retired lieutenant general, the leading landowner in the village, to spend an evening dining and dancing in his residence. After describing a panoramic scene of aristocratic society, Chekhov focuses on one of the officers, Ryabovich, an inarticulate conversationalist, a graceless dancer, a timid drinker, and an altogether awkward social mixer. During the evening, he strays into a semidark room, which is soon entered by an unidentifiable woman, who clasps two fragrant arms around his neck, whispers, "At last!" and kisses him. Recognizing her mistake, the woman then shrieks and runs from the room.

Ryabovich also exits quickly and soon shows himself to be a changed man: He no longer worries about his round shoulders, plain looks, and general ineptness. He begins to exercise a lively romantic fancy, speculating who at the dinner table might have been his companion. Before falling asleep, he indulges in joyful fantasies.

The artillery brigade soon leaves the area for maneuvers. Ryabovich tries to tell himself that the episode of the kiss was accidental and trifling, but to no avail: His psychic needs embrace it as a wondrously radiant event. When he tries to recount it to his coarse fellow officers, he is chagrined that they reduce it to a lewd, womanizing level. He imagines himself loved by, and married to, the woman, happy and stable; he can hardly wait to return to the village, to reunite with her.

In late August, Ryabovich's battery does return. That night, he makes his second trip to the general's estate, but this time he pauses to ponder in the garden. He can no longer hear the nightingale that sang loudly in May; the poplar and grass no longer exude a scent. He walks a bridge near the general's bathing cabin and touches a towel that feels clammy and cold. Ripples of the river rip the moon's reflection into bits. Ryabovich now realizes that his romantic dreams have been absurdly disproportionate to their cause. When the general's invitation comes, he refuses it.

It is a masterful tale, as Chekhov demonstrates his vision of life as a pathetic comedy of errors, with misunderstanding and miscommunication rooted in the psychic substance of human nature. Lieutenant Ryabovich, the least dashing and romantic of men, is transformed by the kiss meant for another into a person with a penchant for an intense inner life that runs its dreamy course virtually separate from the dreariness of external reality. He inflates an insignificant incident into an absurd cluster of fantasies centering on ideal love and beauty. All the more embittering, then, is his plunge from ecstasy to despair as he recognizes, in the story's anticlimactic resolution, the falseness of his hopes, the frustration of his yearnings.

Chekhov dramatizes two of his pervasive themes in "The Kiss." One is the enormous difficulty, often the impossibility, of establishing a communion of feelings between human beings. Ryabovich discovers that he cannot explain to his fellow officers his happiness that an extraordinary event has transformed his life. Lieutenant Lobytko regards Ryabovich's experience as an opportunity to parade and exaggerate his own sexual adventures. Lieutenant Merzlyakov dismisses the lady in the dark as "some sort of lunatic." The brigade general assumes that all of his officers have his own preference for stout, tall, middle-aged women.

The other great Chekhovian theme (which he shares with Nikolai Gogol) is the contrast between beauty and sensitivity, and the pervasiveness of the elusive characteristic best expressed by the Russian word poslost. The term is untranslatable, but it suggests vulgarity, banality, boredom, seediness, shallowness, and suffocation of the spirit. Ryabovich, surrounded by the coarseness of his comrades, depressed by the plodding routine of artillery maneuvers, poignantly tries to rise above this atmosphere of poslost by caressing an impossible dream.

When Ryabovich returns to Lieutenant General von Rabbeck's garden in late summer, "a crushing uneasiness took possession of him." His exultant mood disappears as he confronts the prospect of a nonexistent reunion with a nonexistent beloved. Chekhov symbolizes Ryabovich's feelings of rejection and disillusionment. As Ryabovich touches the general's cold, wet bathing towel and observes the moon's reflection, this time torn by the river waters, he has a shattering epiphany of heartbreak: "How stupid, how very stupid!" he exclaims, interpreting the endless, aimless running of the water as equivalent to the endless, aimless running of his life—of all lives. "To what purpose?"

"GOOSEBERRIES"

First published: "Kryzhovnik," 1898
(collected in The Portable Chekhov, 1947)

Type of work: Short story

A frugal minor official saves money to buy a country estate, which does not transform him into the benevolent landowner of his self-image.

"Gooseberries" is one of three linked Chekhov stories treating forms of desire, in which friends on holiday in the country relate remembrances as travels take them to different locations. In "Gooseberries," the two companions, Burkin, a schoolmaster, and Ivan Ivanovitch, a veterinary surgeon, seek shelter at a welcoming friend's farm. After the men wash up, they enter the comfortable house of their host, Alehin. There, the veterinarian agrees to tell a story about his younger brother, Nikolay, once an unhappy office-bound civil servant, who for years desires and dreams of buying a country estate near water with a garden, orchard, and, most particularly, gooseberries. Nikolay continues to dream and lives frugally, penny-pinching on food and clothes to save money. Then he marries an elderly rich widow, keeping her short of food while he banks her money in his name. The deprived lady conveniently dies, leaving him with sufficient savings to purchase the country estate.

Continuing his narrative, Ivan visits his now porcine brother on his estate and finds Nikolay a gluttonous, idle, self-satisfied landowner, convinced of salvation by such deeds of charity as treating all peasants' ailments with castor oil and corrupting them with gallons of vodka on special holidays. Such condescension, Nikolay believes, permit the peasants to love him as their gentleman landowner. A sumptuous meal ends with home-grown gooseberries, which Nikolay excitedly eats with relish, claiming them delicious without perceiving that they are sour and unripe. Ivan feels guilt that he, too, has been content with his life without realizing that behind such idle satisfaction exists the poverty and suffering of the weaker. Ending his story, Ivan warns his friends that they rest easy in the happy smugness of country comfort because they do not hear the unhappy people who bear their burdens in silence. Further disquieting his companions, Ivan predicts that life will someday remind the contented that trouble will find them.

The narrative has two parts. The frame story concerns the farm visit, where all enjoy comfort, and, after hearing the inner story about the veterinarian's brother, are warned by the storyteller about the complacency they all share as gentlemen. Ivan's epiphany reflects Chekhov's belief, stated in an 1898 letter, that leaving stressful city life for a comfortable country life can lead to a selfish existence without practicing good works. The story illumines Chekhov's insightful perception of the human condition.

“THE LADY WITH THE DOG”

First published: “Dama s sobachkoi,” 1899
(collected in The Portable Chekhov, 1947)

Type of work: Short story

Two people married to other partners fall in love, only to face an uncertain future.

Alternately titled “The Lady with the Dog” or “The Lady with the Little Dog,” this story treats the theme of adultery, akin to Leo Tolstoy’s Anna Karenina (1875-1877; English translation, 1886), and has a heroine with the same first name. Yet whereas Tolstoy pursues and punishes his Anna for having violated a social and moral law, Chekhov treats his Anna gently and compassionately in one of his most accomplished tales.

The plot can be briefly summarized. The banker Dmitry Dmitrich Gurov, a married but philandering man of almost forty, spends a vacation alone in the seaside resort of Yalta, where he meets and skillfully seduces a much younger lady, Anna Sergeyevna, who is also on holiday without her spouse. Their first encounter leads to a furtive and sporadic liaison, with Anna, who lives in a provincial town, having trysts with him in Moscow once every two or three months. Now deeply in love, the couple faces an unpredictable future. Chekhov ends the story on this indeterminate note.

Like a play, the narrative is divided into four parts, each of which deftly dramatizes a different phase of Anna and Dmitry’s romance. The first, of course, deals with their meeting in Yalta. The reader makes Dmitry’s acquaintance as a type: He is a cold-blooded roué, contemptuous of women as easy conquests yet compulsively erotic. He approaches Anna by fondling her dog, discovers that Anna is a gentlewoman who, like himself, is bored on holiday, and finds himself charmed by her shyness, slimness, and “lovely gray eyes.”

In part 2, they walk on the pier, Dmitry kisses her passionately, they have sex back at the hotel, and Anna is immediately remorseful, while he calmly cuts himself a section of watermelon. The alternation of Dmitry’s feelings between cynicism and lyricism recurs rhythmically. Chekhov treats Anna tenderly, rendering her shame and penitence as genuine, with her unconsciously assuming the posture of a classical Magdalen. When she leaves for home, both lovers assume that the brief affair has ended. He reflects that she overestimated his character in calling him “kind, exceptional, high-minded,” while his treatment of her was arrogantly condescending.

Part 3 starts with Dmitry busily immersed in his Moscow life and expecting Anna’s image to have filtered out of his memories within a month. Not so. He discovers himself in love with her and finds life without her “clipped and wingless.” He travels to Anna’s town to see her, only to find her house virtually sealed off by “a long gray fence studded with nails.” That is the first of a series of images of hardness, constriction, and enclosure. They symbolize the difficulty and sadness of a love between people both married to others. Anna’s town is the apotheosis of grayness: the fence, a gray carpet in the hotel room, a gray cloth covering the bed, the inkwell on the desk gray with dust.

Dmitry finds Anna attending a first night performance in the local theater. In the scene describing their reunion there, the tone of the tale assumes dramatic tension. Both speak in anxious, short, urgent exclamatory phrases. Dmitry, now realizing that his heart belongs to Anna, treats her deferentially and no longer worries whether onlookers can see them embracing. The best that they can do, however, is to meet on the theater’s narrow and gloomy staircase. She swears that she will visit him in Moscow and does so in part 4.

In Moscow, Anna and Dmitry find a pathetically marginal happiness together. Chekhov contrasts the scene in her hotel room there with that in part 2. Dmitry is now soft and considerate with Anna, no longer slightly bored and irritated. For the first time, he finds himself loving a woman unselfishly. The story’s concluding mood is one of gentle melancholia, of mingled joy and pain and sadness.

THE SEAGULL

First produced: Chayka, 1896, rev. pr. 1898
(first published, 1904; English
translation, 1909)

Type of work: Play

Confined to his mother's provincial estate, a young writer finds his avant-garde work and his love rejected by both his successful actress mother and a girl he adores, and his ensuing despair leads to suicide.

The Seagull inaugurates the most significant portion of Chekhov's career, when his major plays were written, and marks a departure from his earlier dramatic work, chiefly conventionally structured short plays with plots developing onstage climax and resolution. The Seagull and subsequent plays treat onstage the characters' inner action and lives without typical plot progression, while keeping dramatic events offstage. The play's production proved a disaster. Masterfully directed two years later at the new Moscow Art Theatre, it was a recognized success as a new dramatic form.

In the play's first of four acts, a celebrated stage actress, Arkadina, returns to visit her estate with her younger lover and popular writer, Trigorin. There they, with her doddering brother Sorin and visitors, are given a performance of a murky symbolic play by her son Konstantin. Its sole performer is a neighbor girl, Nina, whom Konstantin adores. When the play is rejected by both Arkadina and Trigorin as decadent, its author is devastated.

The second act reveals the characters' unhappy lives fueled by unrequited love. Both the estate manager's wife and her daughter, Masha, are rejected by those they love: respectively, physician Dr. Dorn and Konstantin. The latter jealously loves his dismissive mother, who strives to hold onto the self-absorbed Trigorin. Angry at Nina's indifference to his play, Konstantin kills a seagull and gives it to her as a symbol of ruined hope before departing. Trigorin, meanwhile, is flattered by Nina's affectionate admiration and is led to admit his success stems from his writing about mere trivialities. Observing the dead gull, he remembers a story idea about a girl who lives free as a seagull until she is seen by a man who indifferently destroys her like the shot seagull.

In act 3, after a failed suicide attempt, Konstantin berates his departing mother for remaining with Trigorin, whom he calls a hack, and is rebuffed by her. Nina, now determined to leave her family and pursue an acting career, offers her love to Trigorin and arranges to meet him in Moscow.

The final act occurs two years later. Arkadina and the still celebrated Trigorin return to the estate to find that Konstantin has become a published writer. The aging Arkadina is trying to keep a grip on Trigorin and her fading glory as an actress. Masha, ever-devoted to Konstantin, has joylessly married a schoolmaster. Nina, a lowly provincial actress who still loves Trigorin, arrives in the vicinity. Konstantin has followed her unspectacular stage career and knows that Trigorin had left her with a child who died. Nina, still believing in her art, meets Konstantin, declines his urgent invitation to stay with him, and departs to continue her acting. Without her, Konstantin determines that his art and recognition are meaningless and shoots himself.

One underlying theme of the play is each character's isolation and failure to achieve his or her dreams. Chekhov employs such dialogue devices as pauses, fragments of speech, and soliloquies to reveal a character's inner self. Another thematic thread is the nature of art and artists. Four characters are artists reflecting individual attitudes. Konstantin's working desire for new forms is undeveloped. His work is anathema both to his mother, whose fading career remains rooted in pseudo-realistic theater, and to Trigorin, who aspires to treat vital issues but remains a popular hack. Despite Trigorin's desertion and her plodding career, Nina rejects her family's security and Konstantin to hold true to her art. The pervasive seagull metaphor represents not only Nina but the failed hopes and discontented lives of all the characters.

THE THREE SISTERS

First produced: Tri sestry, 1901 (first published, 1901; English translation, 1920)

Type of work: Play

The Prozorov family of three sisters and one brother lead lives of quiet desperation in a provincial town.

Nowhere in modern drama is there greater majesty or fuller substance than in The Three Sisters. These qualities issue from Chekhov's incomparable ability to make physical data yield moral truth, domestic irritation dilate into the great cage of cosmic suffering, and a single moment beat with the immeasurability of all time. Almost nothing "happens" in the play: His characters transmit no urgency, create no suspense, feel little tension. Yet The Three Sisters offers a psychic and spiritual eventfulness so dense, yet also so delicately organized, as to make the work one of the miracles of drama and certainly Chekhov's masterpiece. No play has ever conveyed more subtly the transitory beauty and sadness of the passing moment. None has ever expressed more shatteringly the defeat of sensitive minds and generous hearts, the pathos of frustrated personal aspirations.

The play's structure is woven of several separate strands of narrative, resulting in a complex dramatic texture. A highly educated Moscow family, the Prozorovs, were geographically transplanted eleven years earlier than the beginning action when the father, a brigadier general, took command of an artillery unit in a provincial town. The first scene opens on the first anniversary of his death, with the three daughters and one son living in their inherited house but wishing they were in Moscow. That city is seen by them through a haze of delusions as a center of sunshine, refinement, and sensibility, in contrast to the banality, stupidity, and dreariness of their town. This vision of Moscow is, of course, a mythical opiate. The Prozorovs never move there, preparing the reader/spectator for the play's principal motifs of nonattainment and nonfulfillment.

Olga, the eldest sister, teaches school; Masha has married a dull local teacher, Kulygin; Irina, the youngest, has a position in the telegraph office; Andrey, the family's pride, is expected to continue his studies at Moscow University and become a professor. All four are wonderfully reared, highly educated, sensitive, and unhappily stranded in a mediocre small town where only the officers of the garrison are of their class. Chekhov concentrates on the wasting away of this superior family in a coarse and sordid environment.

This milieu is personified by Natasha, a local girl whom Andrey marries, a pretentious, bourgeois, vicious, and vengeful person who is Chekhov's most malevolent character. She dispossesses the Prozorovs by steady degrees in the drama's course, taking control of the house's mortgage money and shifting the family from room to room, until she has finally evicted them from the house. In the last act, Olga is installed in a municipal apartment, Irina has moved to a furnished room, and even Andrey is ejected from his section of the residence to make way for a baby sired by Natasha's lover, Protopopov.

In typically Chekhovian manner, the conflict is usually kept indistinct. Andrey and his sisters are too polite or too deeply involved in their own problems or simply too weak to confront Natasha directly. Nevertheless, the contrast between the town's natives (not only Natasha but also Kulygin and, offstage, Protopopov) and the Muscovites (the Prozorovs and certain artillery officers) provides the basic theme of the clash between culture and vulgarity. The Prozorovs permit the dreary town to brutalize them. Masha tries to find happiness through a liaison with a lieutenant colonel, Vershinin, also unhappily married; then his brigade must leave, and she is again sentenced to her unbearable pedant of a husband. Olga, doomed to spinsterhood, suffers from migraine headaches. Andrey, drained of his youthful vigor, resigns himself to a minor bureaucratic post and loses heavily at cards.

Irina's story is more complicated: The most beautiful of the sisters, she is desired by a lieutenant, Baron Tusenbach, a cheerful soul despite a gloomy philosophy of life, and Captain Solyony, a disagreeable, menacing bully. For a while, Irina is tormented by dreams of Moscow and a perfect romance. Then she resigns herself to marrying the likable, decent Tusenbach, who has abandoned his commission to seek salvation through hard work in a brickyard, even though she does not love him. In act 4, however, Solyony, having sworn that if he cannot have Irina, nobody else shall, challenges Tusenbach to a duel and kills him.

Everything fails the Prozorovs. As their culture fades, Masha forgets her piano-playing skills, Irina is perpetually tired, Andrey trails through life aimlessly—the forces of darkness move in on them like carrion crows, slowly and relentlessly withdrawing all that once promised them contentment. The question that the play finally asks, articulated by Olga in her last speech, is whether the Prozorovs' defeat has any ultimate meaning. According to Vershinin, it does: He has faith in the future, whose generations will be more productive and progressive, as civilization marches toward perfection. In a friendly debate, Tusenbach disagrees:

Life will be just the same as ever not merely in a couple of hundred years' time, but in a million years. Life . . . follows its own laws, which don't concern us, which we can't discover anyway.

Even gloomier is Chebutykin, a sixty-year-old physician who had once been in love with the mother of the Prozorov family and who has transferred that affection to Irina, having installed himself in the family circle. He takes refuge from his disappointment through alcohol, neglect of his medical knowledge, and a profound nihilism.

In the last act, Chebutykin does not raise a finger to prevent the Solyony-Tusenbach duel—he sees everything that comes to hurt the Prozorovs but never intervenes. With the family's hopes shattered, the sisters huddle together, statuesque, motionless, defeated, listening as Olga muses, “if we wait a little longer, we shall find out why we live, why we suffer. . . . Oh, if we only knew, if only we knew!”

THE CHERRY ORCHARD

First produced: Vishnyovy sad, 1904 (first published, 1904; English translation, 1908)

Type of work: Play

The decline of the aristocracy is symbolized by Lyuba Ranevskaya's loss of her cherry orchard.

Whereas Chekhov depicts the defeat of the cultured elite in one of drama's saddest works, The Three Sisters, he examines the same problem from a more comic-ironic view in The Cherry Orchard. While Konstantin Stanislavsky staged the premiere of the play as a somber tragedy, Chekhov insisted, in letters about this production, on calling it “not a drama but a comedy, in places almost a farce.” Nonetheless, it has most often been performed as pathetic drama. Surely, its subjects are depressingly serious: the loss of an ancestral estate; the rise of a semiliterate, ambitious middle class to replace the aristocracy; the dispossession and scattering of the Ranevskaya family and household; and the guilt and remorse of Lyuba, who cannot resist her attachment to an unworthy man. The play's concerns are loss, the failure to communicate and comprehend, and the death of an old order.

The Cherry Orchard presents a dilemma: The Ranevskaya family, which includes landowner Lyuboff (Lyuba) Andreeva Ranevskaya, her brother Gayev, daughter Anya, and adopted daughter Varya, faces two alternatives that it finds equally unacceptable: either to lose the estate on the auction block because of its unpaid mortgage, or to destroy its uniqueness by chopping down its cherry trees and razing the residence to replace it with summer cottages. The second option, which will be exercised by the businessman who buys the orchard at auction, Yermolay Alexeevich Lopahin, offers what the gentry considers a vulgar economic solution at the expense of its cherished values of beauty and inspiration. In this situation, Mme Ranevskaya chooses not to act, thereby forfeiting the property.

Before the reader/spectator laments the losses dramatized, it would be well to understand precisely what is being lost, and why. Chekhov softens the act of dispossession by qualifying sympathy for the victims and complicating the character of the despoiler. Certainly, both Lyuba and Gayev, while charming and well intentioned, are a good deal less pathetic and attractive than their predecessors, the Prozorovs. Lyuba is irresponsible, negligent, and self-destructive. Her indolence and uncontrollable extravagance bring her house tumbling down. Granted, to her the orchard emblemizes childhood innocence, the elegance of the old, leisured, manorial nobility, culture, grace, purity, and beauty. Yet Lyuba's visions of innocence and childhood have had to yield to her tarnished adulthood with its reckless adultery, girlishness, and inertia. Once the symbol of a vigorous way of life, the orchard now represents the decay and rottenness that have overtaken that life.

While the orchard reminds Lyuba of her pure childhood, it strikes the student-tutor Trofimov as a memento of slavery. He tells the seventeen-year-old Anya of the guilty dreams of Russia's decaying upper class:

Just think . . . your grandfather . . . and all your forefathers were serf owners—they owned living souls. Don't you see human beings gazing at you from every cherry tree in your orchard . . . don't you hear voices?

Eloquently idealistic though Trofimov is, he has his less engaging side. Chekhov is usually ironic at the expense of the activist, and he shows Trofimov as slothful, superficial, fatuous, and undersexed. The volatile Lyuba lashes out at him for urging her to confront the truth of her miserable situation; she stabs cruelly at his immaturity. Horrified, he rushes out of the room and tumbles down the stairs. After a remorseful Lyuba begs his pardon and dances with him, they forgive each other. Chekhov shows how his characters can lapse from dignity only to accentuate their humanity.

The self-made merchant/developer Lopahin plays a profoundly ambiguous role in the drama. He is the despoiler of the old order, who cannot restrain his class-conscious sense of triumph when he has acquired the orchard at the auction: He rightly calls himself "a pig in a pastry shop," is brisk with the servants, pitiless with Gayev, and insensitive to Varya, who would like to marry him. Yet he is the most positive character in the play. He labors, with increasing exasperation, to bring the befuddled gentry to their senses. He is alone in having energy, purpose, dedication, and shrewdness enough to suggest how the estate can be converted into a profitable operation. He worships Lyuba and can refuse her nothing, though he despairs of her ability to survive. Most likely, she is the secret love of his life, furnishing the real reason why he will not marry Varya. Chekhov depicts Lopahin as generous, unpretentious, and free of malice; Lopahin's motives are innocent, though his impact is destructive. In sum, Chekhov markedly softens the act of dispossession.

Moreover, he shows that what is being lost is not, in truth, an order of stability, familial love and unity, innocence and usefulness—these are already long gone. The destruction of the estate is the destruction of illusions, and the drama explores this double negative at many ambivalent and ironic levels of action, characterization, and theme. The governess Charlotta soliloquizes about her rootlessness and life's emptiness then muffles her words by chewing on a cucumber and clowning. Gayev vows that the estate will not be sold, while continually popping candy into his mouth. Lyuba's valet Yasha parodies her French manners, while her maid Dunyasha mimics her passionate nature. The rivalry of the clumsy clerk Yepihodov and the insolent Yasha for the affected Dunyasha is a travesty of romantic love. Old, deaf Firs, neglected and abandoned at the play's end, is a relic of the obsolete days when the orchard's cherries were abundant and sweet.

SUMMARY

"You ask me what life is?" Anton Chekhov once wrote his wife. "It is like asking what a carrot is. A carrot is a carrot, that's all we know." Chekhov records facts: people, places, things, words, actions. Held in his artist's vision, they catch the comic, pathetic, sometimes frightening, other times loving but always vulnerable and lonely human pose between birth and death. Chekhov is the subtlest, quietest, most indirect of storytellers and dramatists, capable of examining his characters' darkest despair with calm sympathy, gentle irony, and restrained affection. As an author, he seeks to be an impartial witness to the human condition, careful not to indulge in moral fervor, messianic dogma, or anything that smacks of theatricality. A hater of lies and delusions, he has no remedy for the disease of modern life and refuses to arouse false hopes about the future of humankind.

Gerhard Brand; updated by Christian H. Moe

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- Platonov*, wr. 1878-1881, pb. 1923 (English translation, 1930)
Ivanov, pr., pb. 1887, revised pr. 1889 (English translation, 1912)
Medved, pr., pb. 1888 (A Bear, 1909)
Leshy, pr. 1889 (The Wood Demon, 1925)
Svadba, pb. 1889, pr. 1890 (The Wedding, 1916)
Predlozheniye, pb. 1889, pr. 1890 (A Marriage Proposal, 1914)
Yubiley, pb. 1892 (The Jubilee, 1916)
Chayka, pr. 1896, revised pr. 1898, pb. 1904 (The Seagull, 1909)
Dyadya Vanya, pb. 1897, pr. 1899 (based on his play The Wood Demon; Uncle Vanya, 1914)
Tri sestry, pr., pb. 1901, revised pb. 1904 (The Three Sisters, 1920)
Vishnyovy sad, pr., pb. 1904 (The Cherry Orchard, 1908)
The Plays of Chekhov, pb. 1923-1924 (2 volumes)
Nine Plays, pb. 1959
The Complete Plays, pb. 2006 (Laurence Senelick, editor)

SHORT FICTION:

- Skazki Melpomeny*, 1884
Pystrye rasskazy, 1886
Nevinnye rechi, 1887
V sumerkakh, 1887
Rasskazy, 1888
The Tales of Tchekhov, 1916-1922 (13 volumes)
The Undiscovered Chekhov: Forty-Three New Stories, 1999 (revised and expanded, 2001)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Describe Anton Chekhov's use of nature to emphasize the actions and thoughts of the characters in several major plays.
- Consider how the physician characters in The Seagull and Uncle Vanya might serve as the playwright's mouthpiece as they observe the characters about them.
- Examine how Chekhov uses soliloquies, fragments of speech, and public utterances to reveal the inner being of his characters.
- A common Chekhovian theme is the isolation of people and their failure to achieve their dreams. Discuss this theme's appearance in at least two major plays.
- In three major plays how, why, and where do certain characters meet death?
- What ideas about art and artists are reflected by Arkadina, Trigorin, Konstantin, and Nina in The Seagull?
- Discuss any three characters who might individually represent Chekhov's conception of the landed gentry, the merchant middle class, and the peasant class.
- In terms of storytelling, characters, and theme, how is "Gooseberries" linked to two other short stories by Chekhov, "The Man in a Case" and "About Love"?

LONG FICTION:

Drama na okhote, 1884-1885 (The Shooting Party, 1926)

NONFICTION:

Ostrov Sakhalin, 1893-1894

Letters on the Short Story, the Drama, and Other Literary Topics, 1924

The Selected Letters of Anton Chekhov, 1955

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Works of Anton Chekhov, 1929

Polnoye sobraniye sochineniy i pisem A. P. Chekhova, 1944-1951 (20 volumes)

The Portable Chekhov, 1947

The Oxford Chekhov, 1964-1980 (9 volumes)

About the Author

Adler, Stella. Stella Adler on Ibsen, Strindberg, and Chekhov. Edited by Barry Paris. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1999.

Bartlett, Rosalind. Chekhov: Scenes from a Life. London: Free Press, 2004.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Anton Chekhov: Modern Critical Views. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1999.

Chekhov, Anton. Anton Chekhov Plays: "The Seagull," "Uncle Vanya," "The Three Sisters," "The Cherry Orchard," and "Four Vaudevilles." Translated by Michael Frayn. New York: Methuen, 1988.

Hingley, Ronald. New Life of Anton Chekhov. London: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Meister, Charles W. Chekhov Bibliography: Works in English by and About Anton Chekhov—American, British, and Canadian Performances. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 1985.

Pritchett, V. S. Chekhov: A Spirit Set Free. New York: Random House, 1988.

Rayfield, Donald. Anton Chekhov: A Life. New York: Henry Holt, 1998.

Styan, J. L. Chekhov in Performance: A Commentary on the Major Plays. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

Library of Congress

AGATHA CHRISTIE

Born: Torquay, Devon, England
September 15, 1890

Died: Wallingford, Oxfordshire, England
January 12, 1976

As the foremost writer in what has been called the golden age of crime fiction, Christie was instrumental in bringing the genre to new heights of literary achievement.

BIOGRAPHY

On September 15, 1890, Agatha Mary Clarissa Miller was born in Torquay, Devon, England. Her father, who died when she was eleven, was American, and her mother was British. At this point in time, formal schooling for young women usually took place in the home. At sixteen, Agatha went to Paris to study piano and singing. She became an accomplished pianist and was fluent in French. This linguistic knowledge helped her to create realistic dialogue for her famous character, the Belgian detective Hercule Poirot, whose English was fractured and frequently included French expressions.

In 1912, Miller became engaged to Archibald Christie, a young officer in what would become the Royal Air Force in 1918. They were married on December 24, 1914. During World War I, he was stationed in France and Mrs. Christie became a member of the Voluntary Aid Detachment in a hospital at Torquay. Her work in the pharmacy would be invaluable, as she became familiar with many of the poisons that she would later use in her novels. She was writing short stories at this time, and a few were published. In 1916, after a challenge from her sister that she could not write a detective novel, Christie produced The Mysterious Affair at Styles: A Detective Story (1920), featuring Poirot. The book was rejected by a number of publishers before it was finally published by Godley Head in 1920. It was not a great financial success, but the publication encouraged Christie to continue writing.

Between 1920 and 1926, Christie published six novels and introduced several new primary characters. Among these were Tommy and Tuppence Beresford, who made their debut in The Secret Adversary (1922), and Colonel John Race, who was introduced in 1924 with the publication of The Man in the Brown Suit. The author also published The Secret of Chimneys (1925), which featured Superintendent Battle, the only major Christie detective who was affiliated with Scotland Yard. In 1926, The Murder of Roger Ackroyd was published and provoked a violent debate among both reviewers and readers alike. Christie, according to some, broke the rules of fair play often associated with mystery novels by allowing the narrator, Ackroyd, to be the murderer. Christie responded with the defense that the reader must suspect all the characters. This novel is now regarded as one of her highest achievements.

At this point, Christie's life began to change dramatically. Her mother died soon after the publication of The Murder of Roger Ackroyd, and her marriage to Colonel Christie was quickly falling apart. On December 4, 1926, she took her car and drove away from her Berkshire home, supposedly for a short drive. Colonel Christie called the police when she did not return after a reasonable time. Her car was found two days later, its wheels hanging over a cliff. The entire country seemed involved in the search for the missing author, whose life appeared to be taking on the characteristics of one of her books. Two weeks after her disappearance, staff members at a Yorkshire hotel identified her among their guests. She had registered as Teresa Neele of Capetown. “Mrs. Neele” had appeared completely normal to the staff and guests of the hotel. The doctor who later examined her concluded that she had a legitimate case of amnesia that had been brought about by stress.

In 1928, she was divorced from Colonel Christie and spent her time traveling while her daughter Rosalind was in school. She met her second husband, Max Mallowan, an archaeologist, in 1930 while visiting Ur in what is now Iraq. They were married on September 11, 1930. From that time on, she spent several months a year at digs in Iraq or Syria. During World War II, while Mallowan worked as an adviser on Arab affairs for the British military government in North Africa, Christie again volunteered as a nurse. She was assigned to the pharmacy at University College in London. Once again, this experience enabled her to gain valuable information on poisons. Because she had little to do in the evenings, Christie continued writing, and two of her most famous books, Sleeping Murder (1976) and Curtain: Hercule Poirot’s Last Case (1975), were written during this time. These were the “last cases” of Jane Marple and Hercule Poirot. They were originally intended to be published posthumously. The success of the film version of Murder on the Orient Express in 1974, however, convinced Christie that the books should be published sooner. Thus, Curtain was published in 1975 and Sleeping Murder in 1976. Christie published her autobiography, An Autobiography, in 1977.

Christie was made a fellow of the Royal Society of Literature in 1950. The year 1952 saw the opening of Christie’s The Mousetrap in London, a work that has the distinction of being the longest-running legitimate play in history. In 1955, she received the New York Drama Critics Circle Award for Witness for the Prosecution (pr. 1953). She was made a Commander of the Order of the British Empire in 1956, received an honorary doctorate of literature from the University of Exeter in 1961, and was made a dame of the British empire in 1971. Madame Tussaud’s Wax Museum measured her for a wax portrait in 1972. After a brief period of failing health, Christie died in her home in Wallingford on January 12, 1976.

ANALYSIS

Christie is known for her crime-fiction novels, especially those that feature Poirot, introduced in The Mysterious Affair at Styles, or Miss Marple, an elderly spinster introduced in The Murder at the Vicarage (1930). Her other detectives include Tommy and Tuppence Beresford, Superintendent Battle, and Colonel John Race. Christie began writing during what has been called the golden age of crime fiction. This time period can be roughly defined as the years between World War I and World War II. It was a time of world recovery, tinged with hardship as well as a certain amount of optimism. People were anxious to forget their daily troubles, and crime-fiction novels often provided this escape. Following the publication of The Murder at the Vicarage, Christie was on her way to becoming a well-established author. At about the time of World War II, her novels became quite popular, and she firmly established her place as a leader in the genre.

Christie can be characterized as a traditional mystery writer, depending on imagination and intelligence, rather than technological marvels, to solve crimes. That is one of the reasons that she has remained popular. She was always careful to “play fair” and provide her reader with all the information necessary to solve the crime, plus enough red herrings to make this task challenging. By the time Christie died in 1976, many new scientific discoveries had revolutionized police departments around the world. While she did not ignore modern methods, she made it clear that all the scientific apparatus in the world would not solve a crime if there was not a thinking individual to work with the machinery.

One of her two most popular thinking individuals is Hercule Poirot, a fastidious and curious Belgian with a large mustache. Poirot is painted as a dandy, about whose appearance others often make jokes. Scoffers often find themselves rebuffed, however, because Poirot’s sometimes semicomical fastidiousness hides a keen mind and a nature that demands that he search for the truth in all matters. In this search, Poirot employs his “little grey cells” in order to distinguish the truth from fiction. He often accomplishes this by asking seemingly irrelevant questions. These questions, however, turn out to be relevant and often important in terms of uncovering information previously hidden.

Christie's other well-known detective is Jane Marple, a spinster who resides in the village of St. Mary Mead. One of the characteristics that has set Miss Marple apart from other detectives is her age. She is in her seventies or eighties, but the reader should not underestimate her. Miss Marple uses her knowledge of human nature to solve crimes. In addition, Christie uses the anonymity that Miss Marple can assume. Miss Marple looks so innocent that no one could ever suspect her of having any dealings with the police. She is everyone's old-fashioned aunt and blends in quite well with the scenery.

Several factors account for Christie's popularity. First, her plots are well constructed. She takes the reader through a logical series of actions to an equally logical conclusion. In addition, enough red herrings are dragged across the reader's path to ensure continued interest in the activities. Characterization is also an important factor. While Poirot and the Beresfords, especially, are occasionally parodies of themselves, they are still believable. Their eccentricities are not so outlandish as to be thought impossible. In addition, Christie has an ear for dialogue. Her characters consistently speak in a manner appropriate to their roles in the novels. Her characters also continually act in a manner consistent with roles created for them.

Christie was also interested in looking at human nature in general; thus, her plots revolve around the motivations that cause people to act in a desperate manner. These include greed, jealousy, a desire for power, and revenge. This tendency to construct crimes around common motives rather than esoteric ones enables the reader to relate easily to the characters involved.

Through the course of her career, Christie developed a particular style and stuck with it. In her novels, the reader can expect a clever plot, believable dialogue, and engaging characters. This adherence to a pattern that worked has contributed greatly to the popularity of her novels.

THE MURDER OF ROGER ACKROYD

First published: 1926

Type of work: Novel

In this novel, Dr. James Sheppard leads the reader through an account of the murder of his friend, Roger Ackroyd.

The Murder of Roger Ackroyd was Christie's sixth novel and was published in 1926. It was the third novel that featured the Belgian detective Hercule Poirot. Like many of her other novels, the book is set in a small town and focuses on the interactions between characters who are well known to one another.

When the novel was first published, critical reactions were mixed because of the unusual narrative structure. Christie chose to have the murderer tell the story from his point of view. This device caused some consternation because some believed that Christie was not "playing fair" with her readers. They reasoned that, in crime fiction, if the novel is to be fair, the reader should be able to follow the same path the detective does in order to solve the crime. Some believed that by having the narrator as the murderer, the reader would not be able to follow the path of the clues, since the murderer would, in order to protect his identity, conceal certain key pieces of information.

Christie circumvents this problem in several ways. First, Dr. Sheppard is an extremely believable character. Because of the remorseful tone he assumes at the beginning of the novel, the reader immediately trusts him and his observations. In addition, Poirot appears to trust Sheppard, including him in discussions with the police and, as Poirot admits, using Sheppard as a substitute for Captain Hastings, who had played Dr. Watson to Poirot's Sherlock Holmes in previous novels. Thus, the reader is led to trust Sheppard because Poirot trusts him.

Sheppard also establishes an intimate rapport with the reader through the use of first-person narrative. The reader is privy to what are assumed to be the doctor's private thoughts about Ackroyd's murder. Poirot also confides in Sheppard and often asks his opinion of people within the town. Again, this action on the part of Christie serves to inspire confidence in the narrator; the reader does not suspect him because Poirot does not, and because Christie has, as in previous novels, established Poirot as a reliable source and a good judge of human nature.

Another aspect to the novel in regard to the narration is the comparatively small role that Poirot plays. The reader is accustomed to seeing him as the main character—almost as a master puppeteer who guides the movements of all around him. In fact, the readers expect Poirot to manipulate them, for this is the nature of crime fiction in general: The reader is manipulated by the detective to see things his or her way. Christie, however, chooses to radically depart from this formula. Instead of Poirot manipulating the reader, Sheppard manipulates both the reader and Poirot. The reader is unaware of this subterfuge, however, until the end of the novel, when all the other probable suspects have been eliminated and only Sheppard remains. The reader is then privy to Sheppard's confession, and all the pieces to this very complex puzzle fall into place.

A POCKET FULL OF RYE

First published: 1953

Type of work: Novel

Jane Marple travels to Yewtree Lodge to try to discover who has murdered her former maid, Gladys Martin.

A Pocket Full of Rye opens with the death of Rex Fortescue, a successful but not universally liked financier. Curiously, rye is discovered in one of his pockets. In addition, it was not his afternoon tea that poisoned him but something that he had eaten at breakfast that contained taxine, a derivative of yew. Before long, Gladys Martin, the parlor maid, has been strangled, and Rex's attractive second wife, Adele, has received a dose of cyanide in her tea.

The police are baffled, both by the methods the murderer has chosen to employ and by the number of motives. Adding to the confusion is the sudden appearance of Lancelot Fortescue and his wife Pat. Years before, Lance had moved to Africa after his father had turned him out of the house for ostensibly forging a check. According to him, he and his father had made their peace, and he has come back to enter the family business, much to the dismay of the oldest son, Percival, who resides at Yewtree Lodge with his wife, Jennifer. All parties stand to gain from the death of Rex Fortescue. Consequently, there are nearly as many motives as there are suspects, and no one can adequately account for his or her time. Adding to the confusion are the rye in Rex's pocket and a clothespin clipped to the nose of Gladys Martin.

Miss Marple enters the Fortescue home as a former employer of Gladys Martin. She wants to see the girl's murderer found. Inspector Neele quickly finds that Miss Marple is a valuable asset and asks that she lend a hand in finding out information about the family. Miss Marple is aided in her endeavors by Miss Ramsbottom, Rex Fortescue's eccentric sister-in-law from his first marriage. She likes Miss Marple because Marple is sensible, and she insists that Marple stay at Yewtree Lodge.

The continued presence of Miss Marple unnerves the household, with the exception of Miss Ramsbottom, but greatly aids Inspector Neele, who finds her observations invaluable. In addition, Miss Marple is the quintessential objective observer. She does not know anyone in the household except the late Gladys Martin and so is in a position to evaluate objectively the various members of the family.

Throughout the novel, the reader sees Christie employ her own powers of observation to bring the characters to life. As in most of her novels, the setting is sketched and the reader is left to fill in the fine details. With the characters, however, Christie takes great care to see that all necessary details are supplied for the reader. Facets of the characters are often revealed through dress and everyday actions.

This novel also serves to give the reader a fairly complete portrait of Jane Marple. Christie herself described her as “dithery,” and that she is. This behavior, however, is more camouflage than anything else. Miss Marple does indeed take in everything around her. Christie also uses this novel to show the benefits of age. Inspector Neele does not see the significance of the pocket full of rye, the clothespin on Gladys’s nose, or the fact that Adele was poisoned while eating scones with honey. Yet when Miss Marple reminds him of the rhyme from Mother Goose, several pieces of the puzzle fall into place.

The overriding theme of this novel is that justice must be served. Miss Marple gets involved in the murders because of Gladys Martin, a not-very-bright parlor maid. It is definitely Miss Marple’s belief that her murder deserves as much attention as the murder of a wealthy business executive. It is a theme present in many of Christie’s works: Justice is not simply for those who are privileged, but for all.

SUMMARY

Taken as a whole, Agatha Christie’s crime-fiction novels constitute some of the best-known works in the genre. Her primary detectives, Jane Marple and Hercule Poirot, are some of the best-known characters in popular fiction. Christie’s talents include the ability to weave a cunning plot, construct realistic dialogue, and create believable characters. All these traits combine to create novels that are entertaining and engaging. While Christie’s writing is somewhat old-fashioned, she uses realistic motivations that enable readers to relate easily to the situations at hand.

Victoria E. McLure

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- The Mysterious Affair at Styles: A Detective Story*, 1920
The Secret Adversary, 1922
The Murder on the Links, 1923
The Man in the Brown Suit, 1924
The Secret of Chimneys, 1925
The Murder of Roger Ackroyd, 1926
The Big Four, 1927
The Mystery of the Blue Train, 1928
The Seven Dials Mystery, 1929
The Murder at the Vicarage, 1930
Giants’ Bread, 1930 (as Mary Westmacott)
The Sittaford Mystery, 1931 (pb. in U.S. as The Murder at Hazelmoor)
The Floating Admiral, 1931 (with others)
Peril at End House, 1932
Lord Edgware Dies, 1933 (pb. in U.S. as Thirteen at Dinner)
Murder in Three Acts, 1934
Why Didn’t They Ask Evans?, 1934 (pb. in U.S. as Boomerang Clue, 1935)
Unfinished Portrait, 1934 (as Westmacott)
Murder on the Orient Express, 1934 (pb. in U.S. as Murder on the Calais Coach)
Death in the Clouds, 1935 (pb. in U.S. as Death in the Air)
The A. B. C. Murders: A New Poirot Mystery, 1936
Cards on the Table, 1936
Murder in Mesopotamia, 1936

Death on the Nile, 1937
Dumb Witness, 1937 (pb. in U.S. as Poirot Loses a Client)
Appointment with Death: A Poirot Mystery, 1938
Ten Little Niggers, 1939 (pb. in U.S. as And Then There Were None, 1940)
Murder Is Easy, 1939 (pb. in U.S. as Easy to Kill)
Hercule Poirot's Christmas, 1939 (pb. in U.S. as Murder for Christmas: A Poirot Story)
Sad Cypress, 1940
One, Two, Buckle My Shoe, 1940 (pb. in U.S. as The Patriotic Murders, 1941)
N or M? The New Mystery, 1941
Evil Under the Sun, 1941
Five Little Pigs, 1942 (pb. in U.S. as Murder in Retrospect)
The Body in the Library, 1942
The Moving Finger, 1942
Poirot on Holiday, 1943
Towards Zero, 1944
Death Comes in the End, 1944
Absent in the Spring, 1944 (as Westmacott)
Sparkling Cyanide, 1945 (pb. in U.S. as Remembered Death)
Poirot Knows the Murderer, 1946
Poirot Lends a Hand, 1946
The Hollow: A Hercule Poirot Mystery, 1946
Murder Medley, 1948
Taken at the Flood, 1948 (pb. in U.S. as There Is a Tide . . .)
The Rose and the Yew Tree, 1948 (as Westmacott)
Crooked House, 1949
A Murder Is Announced, 1950
They Came to Baghdad, 1951
Blood Will Tell, 1951
A Daughter's a Daughter, 1952 (as Westmacott)
Mrs. McGinty's Dead, 1952
They Do It with Mirrors, 1952 (pb. in U.S. as Murder with Mirrors)
After the Funeral, 1953 (pb. in U.S. as Funerals Are Fatal)
A Pocket Full of Rye, 1953
Destination Unknown, 1954 (pb. in U.S. as So Many Steps to Death, 1955)
Hickory, Dickory, Dock, 1955 (pb. in U.S. as Hickory, Dickory, Death)
The Burden, 1956 (as Westmacott)
Dead Man's Folly, 1956
4:50 from Paddington, 1957 (pb. in U.S. as What Mrs. McGillicuddy Saw!)
Ordeal by Innocence, 1958
Cat Among the Pigeons, 1959
The Pale Horse, 1961
The Mirror Crack'd from Side to Side, 1962 (pb. in U.S. as The Mirror Crack'd, 1963)
The Clocks, 1963
A Caribbean Mystery, 1964

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Evaluate Agatha Christie's most famous use of an unusual point of view.
- Contrast Jane Marple's and Hercule Poirot's aptness for detection.
- People seldom reread mysteries, but Christie's stage mystery, The Mousetrap, is the longest-running legitimate play in history. How does one account for its durability?
- Christie was not what usually would be considered a stylist. Evaluate her style as to its appropriateness for her literary purposes.
- Trace the influence of Miss Marple on characterizations by later writers of crime fiction.

Agatha Christie

At Bertram's Hotel, 1965
Third Girl, 1966
Endless Night, 1967
By the Pricking of My Thumbs, 1968
Hallowe'en Party, 1969
Passenger to Frankfurt, 1970
Nemesis, 1971
Elephants Can Remember, 1972
Postern of Fate, 1973
Curtain: Hercule Poirot's Last Case, 1975
Sleeping Murder, 1976

SHORT FICTION:

Poirot Investigates, 1924
Partners in Crime, 1929
The Mysterious Mr. Quin, 1930
The Thirteen Problems, 1932 (pb. in U.S. as The Tuesday Club Murders, 1933)
The Hound of Death, and Other Stories, 1933
The Listerdale Mystery, and Other Stories, 1934
Parker Pyne Investigates, 1934 (pb. in U.S. as Mr. Parker Pyne, Detective)
Murder in the Mews, and Other Stories, 1937 (pb. in U.S. as Dead Man's Mirror, and Other Stories)
The Regatta Mystery, and Other Stories, 1939
The Mystery of the Baghdad Chest, 1943
The Labours of Hercules: Short Stories, 1947 (pb. in U.S. as Labors of Hercules: New Adventures in Crime by Hercule Poirot)
The Witness for the Prosecution, and Other Stories, 1948
The Mousetrap, and Other Stories, 1948 (also known as Three Blind Mice, and Other Stories, 1950)
The Under Dog, and Other Stories, 1951
The Adventures of the Christmas Pudding, and Selection of Entrées, 1960
Double Sin, and Other Stories, 1961
Star over Bethlehem, and Other Stories, 1965 (as A. C. Mallowan)
Thirteen Clues for Miss Marple: A Collection of Mystery Stories, 1965
The Golden Ball, and Other Stories, 1971
Hercule Poirot's Early Cases, 1974
Miss Marple's Final Cases, 1979
The Harlequin Tea Set, and Other Stories, 1997

POETRY:

The Road of Dreams, 1925
Poems, 1973

DRAMA:

Black Coffee, pr. 1930
Ten Little Niggers, pr. 1943 (pb. in U.S. as Ten Little Indians, pr. 1944)
Appointment with Death, pr., pb. 1945
Murder on the Nile, pr., pb. 1946
The Hollow, pr. 1951
The Mousetrap, pr. 1952
Witness for the Prosecution, pr. 1953
Spider's Web, pr. 1954
Towards Zero, pr. 1956 (with Gerald Verner)

The Unexpected Guest, pr., pb. 1958
Verdict, pr., pb. 1958
Go Back for Murder, pr., pb. 1960
The Patient, pr. 1962
Afternoon at the Seaside, pr. 1962
Rule of Three: Afternoon at the Seaside, The Patient, The Rats, pb. 1962
The Rats, pr. 1962
Fiddlers Three, pr. 1971
Akhmaton, pb. 1973 (also known as Akhmaton and Nefertiti)

NONFICTION:

Come Tell Me How You Live, 1946
An Autobiography, 1977

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Thirteen for Luck: A Selection of Mystery Stories for Young Readers, 1961
Surprise! Surprise! A Collection of Mystery Stories with Unexpected Endings, 1965

About the Author

Bargainnier, Earl E. The Gentle Art of Murder: The Detective Fiction of Agatha Christie. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1980.
Bloom, Harold, ed. Agatha Christie. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2002.
Fitzgibbon, Russell H. The Agatha Christie Companion. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1980.
Keating, H. R. F., ed. Agatha Christie: First Lady of Crime. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1977.
Makinen, Merja. Agatha Christie: Investigating Femininity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
Norman, Andrew. Agatha Christie: Finished Portrait. Stroud, England: Tempus, 2006.
Osborne, Charles. The Life and Crimes of Agatha Christie: A Biographical Companion to the Works of Agatha Christie. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1999.
Rowland, Susan. From Agatha Christie to Ruth Rendell: British Women Writers in Detective and Crime Fiction. New York: Palgrave, 2001.
Tynan, Kathleen. Agatha. New York: Ballantine, 1978.

Library of Congress

CICERO

Born: Arpinum, Latium (now Arpino, Italy)
January 3, 106 B.C.E.

Died: Formiae, Latium (now Formia, Italy)
December 7, 43 B.C.E.

Universally regarded as the greatest of the Roman orators, Cicero was also a competent poet whose epics showed the possibilities of the rhymed hexameter and thus paved the way for the works of Vergil.

BIOGRAPHY

Marcus Tullius Cicero (SIHS-uh-roh), the son of a Roman knight, was born in Arpinum, Latium (now Arpino, Italy), on January 3, 106 B.C.E. He was the elder son of Marcus Tullius Cicero and Helvia. He was also one of several famous Romans, such as Gaius Marius, who made the Latium region of Italy famous. His family was upper-middle-class, and he was well educated in law, rhetoric, and Greek literature and philosophy, attending schools in both Rome and Greece. In 89 B.C.E., he commenced military training under Pompeius Strabo, the father of Pompey the Great, the Roman general who became the rival of Julius Caesar; he also served with Lucius Cornelius Sulla, who was the commanding general in the campaign to drive Mithridates, king of Pontus, back to Asia. Cicero first appeared in the Roman courts in 81 B.C.E. and his celebrated defense of Sextus Roscius, the great actor who had taught him elocution, established him as a preeminent defense lawyer. Within a decade, he had won many important legal battles, including the prosecution of Gaius Verres (governor of Sicily, 73-71 B.C.E.) for extortion and other forms of maladministration. In this famous case, Cicero displayed remarkable versatility: He delivered a brief speech, notable for its thundering rhetoric and its inclusion of evidence by witnesses.

Cicero was made praetor in 66 B.C.E. and consul in 63 B.C.E. His first speech as consul was against the agricultural policy of Servilius Rullus and in the interests of Pompey, with whom he maintained a lifelong friendship. At this time, he discovered the conspiracy of Lucius Sergius Catilina (Catiline) to murder the consuls, generate uprisings, and burn Rome. After escaping an attempt on his life, Cicero on the same day delivered one of his greatest prosecution speeches. The conspirators were apprehended and executed on the authority of Cicero himself. Marcus Porcius Cato, who outdid Cicero in vituperation, argued for execution; Julius Caesar argued against it. When Cicero announced the death of the conspirators with the single word vixerunt (they are dead), he was hailed by Quintus Catulus as the father of his country—a title later accorded to President George Washington in recognition of his having saved the United States from its enemies.

Because he had acted on his own authority, Cicero was criticized for the execution of the Catiline conspirators—which he never regretted, though it was legally questionable because it was carried out without a formal trial. Cicero went into voluntary exile for a year, but on his return to Rome he became a great advocate of the republican form of government, against Caesar's concept of a popularly supported dictatorship. During his absence, however, the politician Publius Clodius Pulcher had a bill passed that forbade the execution of a Roman citizen without trial, tried to have Cicero declared an official exile, and ordered the destruction of Cicero's beautiful villa at Tuscum.

From August 4, 57 B.C.E., when he landed at Brindisi in the south of Italy, Cicero was warmly welcomed by the populace, who were favorable to his political theory of concordia ordinum (harmony among the several social classes). His monthlong journey to Rome helped to establish his popularity; however, he faced formidable obstacles in his plan to reestablish himself in the world of politics because Pompey and Caesar formed an alliance. After promptings by Pompey, Cicero agreed to align himself with them politically, though he found distasteful some of the legal cases that he was obliged to accept. Accordingly, he decided to devote himself increasingly to writing, with De oratore (55 B.C.E.; On Oratory, 1742), De republica (51 B.C.E.; On the State, 1817), and De legibus (52 B.C.E.; On the Laws, 1841) being some of his main publications. He was pleased when Titus Milo assembled a gang to try to defeat the gang controlled by Clodius, which kept Rome in constant fear, and Cicero agreed to defend Milo when Clodius was killed on the Appian Way. Cicero was so intimidated by Pompey, however, who was given plenipotentiary powers to restore order, that he did not deliver his speech at the trial. Milo was exiled, joined an insurrection, and was captured and killed. Only later did Cicero publish his defense speech as Pro Milone (52 B.C.E.; For Milo, 1577).

During the civil war (49–45 B.C.E.), Cicero was given charge of recruiting soldiers for Pompey's armies, but he did not leave Italy with Pompey and his men, though he later joined them for a while, until illness forced him to retire. When Caesar defeated Pompey's army at Pharsalus in 48 B.C.E., Cicero was offered safe conduct and returned to Rome, where he continued his efforts for a republican polity and against Caesar's dictatorship. There began his second intense period of literary works, which included Brutus (46 B.C.E.; English translation, 1776), a study of Roman orators, indicating their strengths in the five divisions of rhetoric: ideas, arrangement, diction, delivery, and memory, and Orator (46 B.C.E.; The Orator, 1776), composed in the form of a letter addressed to Marcus Junius Brutus that answers a request for a picture of the perfect speaker. It is the latest of Cicero's rhetorical studies and offers a defense of his own career as an orator, as well as a detailed examination of the five canons of rhetoric. In particular, The Orator defends the florid, or Asian, style against critics who favored the Attic, or plain, style, and it asserts the validity of vitality, exuberance, digressions, and rhythmical language in the composition of effective speeches. That is, Cicero favored the speech style of the public orator rather than that of the cool, collected, logical courtroom advocate of his era. That his point of view had merit may be gathered from the almost universal belief that he is the unchallenged master of Latin prose style.

Cicero took no part in the assassination of Caesar on the Ides of March, 44 B.C.E. Two days later, on March 17, he delivered a conciliatory speech in the Roman senate, supporting a general amnesty. Later, he delivered the fourteen great Philippic orations (so named because they resemble the great Greek orator Demosthenes' speeches against Philip of Macedon) that marked his return to politics. Cicero thought that he could "use" Caesar's adopted son Octavian, but Octavian was astute and could not be manipulated. The latter's march against Rome made him consul. When the Second Triumvirate of Octavian, Marc Antony, and Marcus Lepidus was formed, Cicero was proscribed, caught, and killed near Caieta in Formiae, Latium (now Formia, Italy), on December 7, 43 B.C.E. Marc Antony and his wife, Fulvia, had Cicero's head and hands nailed to the rostrum in the Roman forum.

ANALYSIS

For many readers, the most interesting of Cicero's works are his letters to Titus Atticus, the Roman philosopher and patron of literature, who was perhaps his closest friend; to his brother Quintus; or to Marcus Junius Brutus, the principal assassin of Caesar. For others, his philosophical works have a special interest, since they expound a fundamentally Stoic position and address such topics as friendship, old age, duty, the good, the nature of the gods, and the goals of life and politics. Yet for those interested in rhetoric and oratory, his three treatises—On Oratory, Brutus, and The Orator—constitute a major investigation and analysis of those subjects. These three works have justified placing Cicero in the company of Aristotle and Quintilian as the three great classical writers on the subject of public speaking. In many ways, Cicero's On Oratory is the most important of his three books: It gives full consideration to all the aspects of the subject, and it lacks the self-justification of the more epistolary Brutus. On Oratory is the theoretical study, Brutus is the exemplification, and The Orator is a consideration of the ideal, as one critic has phrased it. On Oratory is written in three books and is offered as a reconsideration of earlier thoughts and writings on public speaking; it was intended as edification for his brother Quintus, who had inquired about the functions of the orator. In addition, it defends Cicero's view that the good speaker is a well-educated person.

For centuries, the very term "Ciceronian" suggested everything that was elevated and admirable in the art of rhetoric, whether written or spoken. Cicero was the consummate stylist, the model advocate. His strengths in the use and manipulation of language were admitted by all, and his weaknesses or defects were few or trifling. Whether speaking for the prosecution or for the defense, his advocacy was considered exemplary. Hugh Blair, an eminent eighteenth century critic who was professor of rhetoric and belles lettres at the University of Edinburgh, offered his appraisal of Cicero in one of his Lectures on Rhetoric (1783): "He is always full and flowing, never abrupt. He is a great amplifier of every subject; magnificent, and in his sentiments highly moral. His manner is on the whole diffuse, yet it is often happily varied, and suited to the subject." Blair thought that some of Cicero's great achievements were his ability to gain the attention of his audiences and to influence them, his ability to arrange his arguments with the greatest force and propriety, and his reluctance to bring the emotional proofs into force before he had prepared the way with logical conviction. Blair concluded that "no man knew the power and force of words better than Cicero." Yet even Blair discerned certain weaknesses in Cicero, and he proposed that they amounted to a predilection for show (for "eloquence" in the old terminology), which had the effect of leaving on the minds of both readers and hearers "the impression of a good man, but withal, of a vain man."

Over the years, concepts of appropriate style have changed somewhat, and today "Ciceronian" implies the use of long and elaborate sentences—usually of the periodic form—that end with great force and climax. The term also suggests parenthetical elements, doubled elements, appositives, such tropes as triads, and periphrasis. Yet in his many great speeches he knew how and when to use the demotic, the conversational, and the formal styles to serve the purpose of the occasion. Their amalgam in his magnificent speeches on Milo and Catiline, for example, is still worthy of study by students of courtroom speaking; for the ordinary person who relishes language used at its best, there are few authors who are more satisfying.

ON ORATORY

First published: De oratore, 55 B.C.E. (English translation, 1742)

Type of work: Essay

In the form of a Platonic dialogue with other famous orators, Cicero offers his philosophy of rhetoric as more than the mastery of certain rules; rather, it is the training of the whole person to speak effectively.

On Oratory takes the form of a dialogue, though it is fictional: It is merely a vehicle for Cicero to state his theory of public speaking, supported by the views of some other famous orators of his time. These are Licinius Crassus, Marcus Antonius, Sulpicius Rufus, and Caius Aurelius Cotta. Others participate in sections of the book; the most notable of them is Quintus Mucius Scaevola, the elderly lawyer and Stoic.

In book 1, Cicero offers On Oratory as his principal contribution to the discussion of rhetoric (the art of persuasion in all of its forms), indicating that it is to supersede all of his earlier statements on the subject, and that it is prompted by his brother Quintus's inquiry about the matter. Great orators are rare, says Cicero, not owing to a dearth of men of ability but because of the difficulty of the art itself, in spite of its great rewards, both in compensation and in fame. Cicero calls for a liberal education (a wide general knowledge), mastery—not just fluency—in the language, psychological insight and sophistication, wit (sharpness of intellect), humor, excellent delivery (voice and gesture), and outstanding memory. All of these demands are to be satisfied if the speaker is merely to be competent to meet the usual demands of public life; leadership requires that they be mastered to a high degree, and that the speaker must first have attained a knowledge “of all important subjects and arts.”

“There is, to my mind,” says Crassus, “no more excellent thing than the power, by means of oratory, to get a hold on assemblies of men, win their good will, direct their inclinations wherever the speaker wishes or divert them from whatever he wishes.” In every free society that has enjoyed the fruits of peace and prosperity, the art of rhetoric has always flourished and reigned supreme; it is indeed puzzling that so few men have been given the power to use language to move others. Scaevola objects that Crassus values rhetoric too highly and proposes that its main uses are to be seen in the law courts and in political situations only. Crassus replies that rhetoric alone is insufficient: The great orator must be well versed in moral and political philosophy, his language must rival that of the poet, and his style must reveal his depth of education. Answering Scaevola, he admits that few can attain the ideal of a true liberal education, but that all should aspire to it. There follows Cicero’s view that “in an orator we must demand the subtlety of the logician, the thoughts of the philosopher, a diction almost poetic, a lawyer’s memory, a tragedian’s voice, and the bearing almost of the consummate actor. Accordingly, no rarer thing than a finished orator can be discovered among the sons of men.”

Cicero’s discussion of the art or science of rhetoric follows the Greek model, most clearly stated by Aristotle in his Rhetoric: There are three speech types (forensic, or courtroom; deliberative, or parliamentary; and panegyric, or speeches of praise and blame); speeches have three sections (introduction, discussion, and conclusion); and the act of speaking covers the arrangement of ideas, style, and delivery (involving voice, gesture, and memory). The competent speaker practices frequently. He or she writes themes to improve fluency and style, paraphrases poetry and prose extemporaneously and occasionally impromptu, delivers speeches upon all subjects and as often as the opportunity allows, practices gestures and trains the voice, engages in close reading of literature, and debates both for and against as many propositions as possible.

Book 2 takes the form of a second day’s discussion of the topic of oratory. Antonius proposes that oratory is not a science but that many useful rules can be derived from the observation of successful speakers: Oratory covers all good speaking and on all subjects. He suggests that the most difficult kind of oratory is forensic—courtroom speaking. There, the speaker is required to meet argument with argument and appeals to the emotions by appeals to the opposite emotions. Cicero proposes that wit and humor are natural gifts and cannot be taught; he suggests that there are two types of wit, irony and raillery, and that they are often particularly effective in court cases. Antonius resumes his contribution, proposing that the strongest argument should be placed either at the beginning or at the end of the speech.

Book 3 is devoted to a discussion of style, which Crassus holds to be inseparable from matter. Further, he says that various styles are necessary and admirable, but that the first consideration of the orator is clarity of diction. Embellishment should be produced naturally, not as an extravagance. Always, style should be adapted to a specific audience and occasion. Style depends on correctness, lucidity, ornateness, and appropriateness to the subject and occasion; but style without effective delivery is impotent, and effective delivery depends in large measure on a pleasing variety in vocal qualities: “This variation . . . will add charm to the delivery.”

SUMMARY

Charles Sears Baldwin, a Columbia University professor of rhetoric in the 1920’s, noted that Cicero sympathized with the views of both Antonius and Crassus: Both orators are right in almost all of their views, which are actually complementary. Further, Baldwin believed that book 1 of On Oratory has been the volume studied most by readers because it has most of the Ciceronian message which can be summarized rather easily: The effective speaker is the well-educated individual who has studied the speeches of the great orators of the past, has studied the component parts of the oration and their requirements, and has practiced diligently to strengthen wit, voice, and bodily delivery—always remembering that any good speech must be adapted to both the occasion and the audience.

Marian B. McLeod

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

- De inventione rhetorica*, 84 B.C.E. (Rhetoric, 1949)
Ad Atticum, 68-43 B.C.E. (Epistles to Atticus, 1752)
Ad familiares, 62-43 B.C.E. (The Familiar Epistles, 1620)
Ad Quintum fratrem, 60-54 B.C.E. ( . . . To Brother Quintus, 1561)
De oratore, 55 B.C.E. (On Oratory, 1742)
Oratoriae partitiones, 54? B.C.E. (Classification of Oratory, 1817)
De optimo genere oratorum, 52 B.C.E. (The Best Kind of Orator, 1852)
Pro Milone, 52 B.C.E.; For Milo, 1577)
De legibus, 52 B.C.E. (On the Laws, 1841)
De republica, 51 B.C.E. (On the State, 1817)
Brutus, 46 B.C.E. (English translation, 1776)
Orator, 46 B.C.E. (also known as Orator ad M. Brutum, and De optimo genere dicendi; The Orator, 1776)
Paradoxa Stoicorum, 46 B.C.E. (The Paradox, 1540)
De finibus bonorum et malorum, 45 B.C.E. (On the Definitions of Good and Evil, 1702)
Topica, 45-44 B.C.E. (Topics, 1848)
De fato, 45-44 B.C.E. (On Fate, 1853)
De divinatione, 45-44 B.C.E. (On Divination, 1848)
De officiis, 44 B.C.E. (On Duties, 1534)
De natura deorum, 44 B.C.E. (On the Nature of the Gods, 1683)
Cato maior de senectute, 44 B.C.E. (On Old Age, 1481)
Laelius de amicitia, 44 B.C.E. (On Friendship, 1481)
Tusculanae disputationes, 44 B.C.E. (Tusculan Disputations, 1561)
Philippicae, 44-43 B.C.E. (Philippics, 1868)
Ad Brutum, 43 B.C.E. (The Epistles of M.T. Cicero to M. Brutus, 1743)
The Orations, 1741-1743

About the Author

- Baldwin, Charles Sears. Ancient Rhetoric and Poetic Interpreted from Representative Works. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1971.
Cicero. De oratore. Translated by Edward W. Sutton and Harris Rackham. 2 vols. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1942-1948.
Cowell, Frank R. Cicero and the Roman Republic. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin Books, 1956.
Fantham, Elaine. The Roman World of Cicero's "De oratore." New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
Mitchell, Thomas N. Cicero. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979.
_____. Cicero the Senior Statesman. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1991.
Ramson, Elizabeth. Cicero: A Portrait. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1983.
Steel, C. E. W. Cicero, Rhetoric, and Empire. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.
_____. Reading Cicero: Genre and Performance in Late Republican Rome. London: Duckworth, 2005.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Show how Cicero exemplifies the speaker who is also a doer.
- Some of Cicero's orations have long been used in the teaching of Latin. What practical value is there in studying the structures of argument by an ancient orator?
- During what period in American political history did Cicero most influence political speakers?
- One of Cicero's favorite courtroom techniques was "passing over" a subject that he would, in fact, thus emphasize, so that his listeners would remember it. Cite some instances of this technique being used today, in or out of literature.
- The word "rhetoric" is often used with negative connotations. What are the principles by which Cicero defends the importance of rhetoric?
- Summarize and assess Cicero's essay on friendship or one of his other essays.

© Washington Post; reprinted by permission of the D.C. Public Library

ARTHUR C. CLARKE

Born: Minehead, Somerset, England
December 16, 1917

Died: Colombo, Sri Lanka
March 19, 2008

A prolific writer of novels, short stories, and nonfiction, Clarke was a well-known and very influential science-fiction author.

BIOGRAPHY

Arthur C. Clarke was born in the village of Minehead, Somerset, England, on December 16, 1917, the son of Charles Wright Clarke and Norah Mary Willis Clarke. Even as a boy, he was interested in science and writing. In 1931, he read Last and First Men (1930) by Olaf Stapledon, a book that changed his life. A strong advocate of space exploration, he joined the British Interplanetary Society in 1935, serving as its chair from 1946 to 1947 and again from 1950 to 1953.

Clarke did well in mathematics but could not afford to attend a university. Instead, he took the civil service examination and in 1936 found employment as an assistant auditor in His Majesty's Exchequer and Audit Department. He continued to read widely and began to publish short fiction in 1937.

From 1941 to 1946, Clarke served in the Royal Air Force (RAF). Because of his poor eyesight, he was unable to qualify for pilot training. He was sent to electronics and radar school and worked as a technical officer on the first trials of ground control approach radar. He also served as a radar instructor. A technical paper that he wrote describing the possibility of communications satellites was published in the October, 1945, issue of Wireless World, an engineering journal. After leaving the RAF in 1946, he received a grant to enter King's College, London; he received a degree in physics and mathematics in 1948. From 1949 to 1950, he was an assistant editor for Science Abstracts, a technical journal.

During the 1950's and 1960's, Clarke published prolifically, both fiction and nonfiction. Childhood's End (1953) was the first work to win critical acclaim. In 1956, he won the Hugo Award for his short story "The Star." Between 1964 and 1968, Clarke wrote the novel 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) and collaborated with director Stanley Kubrick on the 1968 screenplay. This book and its sequels, 2010: Odyssey Two (1982) and 2061: Odyssey Three (1987), and 3001: The Final Odyssey (1997) are probably his best-known works. Clarke has won virtually every award for science-fiction writing, an Academy Award conomination for the screenplay of 2001: A Space Odyssey, and a number of awards for science writing.

Clarke has written an astonishing number of nonfiction books and articles, some for the general public but many for scientific and technical journals. He also became interested in underwater exploration and published several books and articles on this subject. Clarke married Marilyn Mayfield in 1953; they were divorced in 1964. He moved to Sri Lanka in 1956 but continued to make frequent trips to England and the United States. Queen Elizabeth II conferred knighthood on him in 1998, and the investiture ceremony took place in 2000.

Clarke died on March 19, 2008, in Colombo, Sri Lanka, after having a cardiorespiratory attack. He was ninety years old.

ANALYSIS

In his introduction to Time Probe: The Sciences in Science Fiction (1966), an anthology of science-fiction stories he edited, Clarke explains his views on what science fiction should be. In the first place, it must incorporate some principles of science and technology. He strongly emphasizes, however, that “the prime function of a story is to entertain—not to instruct or to preach.” In addition, the story must contain some intellectual substance if it is to have lasting value. All of these qualities are evident in his own fiction.

Clarke was educated as a scientist and writes about the future in a remarkably detailed, believable manner. He became a staunch advocate of space travel; books such as Prelude to Space (1951) are mostly propaganda with many scientific details to show how some technical accomplishment might be possible. Clarke sees space travel as opening new horizons for human civilization, similar to the exploration of the Western Hemisphere several centuries ago.

Other stories show his skill as a storyteller, often including some surprising revelation that changes the readers’ perspective. In Childhood’s End, the extraterrestrial creatures that seem to be acting as humankind’s guardian angels turn out to look like devils. Another example is “The Star.” It tells about a Jesuit priest who, while traveling on a starship, discovers the ruins of an ancient civilization that was destroyed when its sun became a supernova. By calculating the time when the light from this star would have reached Earth, he determines that this civilization was destroyed to create the star of Bethlehem.

Clarke’s writing can be a combination of the mundane with the lyrical and mystical; 2001: A Space Odyssey includes both. On the one hand, readers learn about the details of space travel, including how toilets work in zero gravity. On the other hand, the ending describes astronaut David Bowman traveling through time and space to some other type of existence in what is a truly transcendental experience.

Most of Clarke’s writings deal with two main themes: the belief that human beings are not alone in the universe and the outcome of human evolution. Clarke is convinced that life has evolved on many other planets and that it is merely a matter of time before contact is made. In stories such as 2001: A Space Odyssey, the extraterrestrial being plays a key role in the development of the human race; in others, such as Rendezvous with Rama (1973), the aliens are indifferent. In all cases, the first contact with another race shows that humans are members of a galactic community.

The question of what will become of humans has troubled writers since Charles Darwin first published On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection in 1859. Some authors, such as H. G. Wells in The Time Machine: An Invention (1895), have taken a pessimistic position, predicting that the human race will simply expire. Others, such as Olaf Stapledon in Star Maker (1937), suggest that human beings may eventually evolve into new, superior creatures. Clarke belongs to the latter group.

Clarke sees the evolution of humans as something they cannot control, but he also sees the possibility of some type of transcendent mutation, one in which the mind is freed from matter—and therefore from decay and death. That is certainly the case of Vanamonde in Against the Fall of Night (1953), of the children in Childhood’s End, and of David Bowman in 2001: A Space Odyssey.

Even if humans cannot be sure of their evolutionary future, Clarke thinks that change and potential progress are preferable to stagnation. In Imperial Earth (1975), Duncan Makenzie is the latest in a long line of clones. Because of an inherited genetic defect, cloning is the only way the family can perpetuate itself. Makenzie has the resources to make one clone and is expected to make a genetic duplicate of himself. Instead, he decides to have his dead friend cloned because the friend had intellectual gifts and because that clone would be able to have children and thus contribute to the genetic pool; thus the potential for change would exist.

Clarke takes a mostly optimistic view of the future. Although humans cannot know what lies ahead and cannot to a large extent control it, they should trust their potential.

CHILDHOOD'S END

First published: 1953

Type of work: Novel

While Earth is being supervised by extraterrestrial Overlords, humans suddenly evolve into a new type of creature.

Childhood's End begins with this unusual statement: "The opinions expressed in this book are not those of the author." Although Clarke's books usually promote space exploration, this one shows that humans are not ready to travel to the stars.

Many writers have speculated about the first encounter between the human race and extraterrestrial beings and what the relationship between those two races will be. Childhood's End begins with a description of just such an encounter. Some thirty years after the end of World War II, just as the Americans and the Russians are both about to launch their first rockets to the Moon, spaceships appear over every major city on Earth. The Overlords, as the extraterrestrials come to be called, are intellectually and technologically superior to humans and quickly assert their authority.

The directives of the Overlords result in an improved standard of living for all the creatures on Earth. Some object to their domination, mostly because the Overlords are secretive and have never explained why they have come to Earth. No one has ever seen one, and only Rikki Stormgren, the secretary general of the United Nations, ever speaks to them. Karellen, the head Overlord, explains to Stormgren that he is not a dictator but "only a civil servant trying to administer a colonial policy in whose shaping I had no hand." He does not say who sent him. After fifty-five years, the Overlords finally show themselves to humans. Although their actions make them seem like the guardian angels of humankind, they look exactly like the ancient legends of devils with horns, barbed tails, and leathery wings.

The Overlords have prohibited space travel, and people such as Jan Rodricks resent this because they want to learn what is out there. Rodricks is a stowaway inside a whale model that is being shipped to the Overlords' home planet and becomes the first and last of his species to travel in space. He learns, however, just how vast and un-knowable the universe is and how paltry humans are in comparison. He understands why the Overlords have said, "The stars are not for Man."

The Overlords represent science and reason and spend much time learning about humans. One of them, Rashaverak, attends a party because the host owns one of the best libraries on paranormal phenomena. When the last few guests experiment with a sophisticated Ouija board, Rashaverak does not participate but sits outside the circle and observes. One of the guests wonders if Rashaverak is like an anthropologist watching a primitive religious rite he does not understand. Apparently, the Overlords are not omniscient.

When the children of the planet begin their transformation into a new type of creature, Karellen finally announces the Overlords' true purpose: They were sent to Earth by some superior force called the Overmind to help humans through the transition from their present form to a new type of existence. They can help with the birth of a new species and can observe it, but they themselves lack the potential to evolve any further.

A major question in Childhood's End is what will be the next step in human evolution. The Overlords engineer the first stage by creating a utopia in which humans learn to live in a cooperative society. All the major problems, such as war and famine, have been solved, but no more real progress occurs; no more major scientific breakthroughs are made and no notable works of art are created.

When the final change occurs, it is triggered not by the humans' intellectual or technological advances but by their paranormal powers. All the children are soon affected by the "Total Breakthrough," and a new species evolves. They lose their individual personalities; each becomes like a single cell in a larger brain. Eventually, they lose their need to exist in material form and join with other races from other planets in the Overmind, free to roam the universe.

The species known as Homo sapiens comes to an end as Jan Rodricks, the last man on Earth, watches the final joining take place. He expresses a sense of achievement and fulfillment and sends a message to the Overlords, now on their way home: "I am sorry for you. Though I cannot understand it, I've seen what my race became. Everything we ever achieved has gone up there into the stars."

The Overlords, who seemed so powerful in the beginning, do not have the potential to evolve. Humans do not possess their great intellectual powers, but they do have paranormal powers and therefore can evolve into a new species. The stars are not for the present race but rather for its descendants.

2001: A SPACE ODYSSEY

First published: 1968

Type of work: Novel

A team of astronauts is sent to discover the destination of a strange signal emitted by a monolith excavated on the Moon.

2001: A Space Odyssey is Clarke's best-known work, partly because of the popularity of the 1968 film version. From 1964 to 1968, Clarke and director Stanley Kubrick collaborated on the novel and the screenplay, with Kubrick having control over the film and Clarke being responsible for the novel. Both works were extensively revised, and Clarke later published some material cut from the novel in The Lost Worlds of 2001 (1972).

In the epilogue to 2001: A Space Odyssey, Clarke says the book "was concerned with the next stage of human evolution." The beginning of the book describes creatures not yet human, the middle shows modern humankind, and the ending speculates on what humanity might become. Black monoliths appear in each section and provide connections between each section.

When the book opens, three million years in the past, man-apes have reached a crucial point in their development. Unable to obtain enough food, they will perish if they do not learn to use tools to hunt. Space-traveling extraterrestrials recognize their potential and teach them how to use bones as weapons. The first monolith is a teaching device, but it also transforms Moon-Watcher, one of the smarter apes; the structure of his brain is altered and the change will be passed on to his descendants. Without this almost divine intervention, the human race would not have evolved. Moon-Watcher also discovers, on his own, that the weapons can kill others of his own species.

In the next section, humans have developed a sophisticated technology that enables them to travel to the Moon—and also to create increasingly lethal weapons. They also are at a crucial point in their history: Will they continue to progress or will they destroy themselves and the planet?

Clarke sees technology as a necessary step forward. In "The Sentinel," the short story on which 2001: A Space Odyssey is based, a scientist discovers an ancient device on the surface of the Moon. When disturbed, it emits a signal. The scientist speculates, "They would be interested in our civilization only if we proved our fitness to survive—by crossing space and so escaping from the Earth, our cradle."

In 2001: A Space Odyssey, scientists discover a similar device, this time another black monolith. When uncovered after three million years, it emits a powerful signal toward Saturn. Humankind now knows that it is no longer alone in the universe.

Undaunted, not waiting for the extraterrestrials to come to Earth, the humans launch a mission to Saturn. David Bowman, the one astronaut to survive that trip, discovers a third monolith on Japetus, one of the moons of Saturn. This one is a "star gate," an extremely advanced machine that shuttles him through time and space to a distant part of the universe. In this odyssey, he discovers that the beings that left the monoliths have themselves evolved, first into mechanical bodies that could last forever, and finally into creatures of energy no longer dependent on matter for their existence.

Bowman undergoes a transformation, first aging rapidly, then dying and being reborn as the infant Star Child. He is the first human to make this evolutionary jump. Again the extraterrestrials have intervened to make it possible.

Whether this evolutionary jump has resulted in a better creature, or whether humankind will be doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past, is not clearly answered. At the very end, Star Child completes his journey back to Earth, where he discerns some atomic bombs in orbit and detonates them.

Does he merely destroy the bombs, making the world a safer place, or does he destroy humankind in the process? The description of Star Child discovering his new powers is almost identical to the description of Moon-Watcher discovering his new power: Both are like children who learn through play.

The people in 2001: A Space Odyssey tend to be detached, unemotional men of science. HAL, the computer, seems more human than the humans. HAL may represent another evolutionary path to intelligent life. Although he is a machine, his electronic brain can reproduce most of the mental activities of which a human brain is capable. He becomes “neurotic” and “dies” when Bowman disconnects his higher mental functions. In the sequel 2010: Odyssey Two (1982), the extraterrestrials permit the lonely Star Child Bowman to choose a companion. He chooses the revived HAL, who is then transformed into a creature of mental energy like Bowman. Once again the extraterrestrials are controlling the evolutionary process.

GREETINGS, CARBON-BASED BIPEDS!

First published: 1999

Type of work: Nonfiction

This book is a collection of Clarke's nonfiction writings arranged in chronological order and grouped by decades; Clarke provides introductions in which he explains the background behind his writing of each selection and his reflections on it at the time the anthology was being compiled.

Greetings, Carbon-Based Biped! Collected Essays, 1934-1998 includes a large number of essays on diverse subjects. The essay from which the title is taken, “Greetings, Carbon-Based Biped!” explores the reasons why humans search for evidence of intelligent life on other planets: The search is important because “It represents the highest possible form of exploration; and when we cease to explore, we will cease to be human.” This collection documents Clarke’s explorations of science fiction, of science and technology, and of the impact of science and technology on humans.

The selections that deal with science fiction reveal Clarke’s perspective on the genre. “Aspects of Science Fiction” is his attempt to define science fiction and to differentiate it from fantasy, while “Writing to Sell” expresses his frustrations with the pressure to produce works that will appeal to a wide audience. His reviews of science-fiction books and films are included. Some of the tributes to other science-fiction and fantasy authors, usually written at the times of their deaths, include “Dunsany, Lord of Fantasy,” “Tribute to Robert A. Heinlein,” “Good-Bye, Isaac” (Isaac Asimov), and “Gene Roddenberry.” His prefaces to The War of the Worlds and The First Men in the Moon also show his engagement with other writers of the genre.

Some pieces discuss his own work. “The Birth of HAL,” for example, explains the origin of HAL in 2001: A Space Odyssey, and “Son of Dr. Strangelove” explains his collaboration with Stanley Kubrick in the production of the film version of that book.

Trained in the technical disciplines, Clarke has also published technical and scientific papers. In “Extraterrestrial Relays,” first published in an engineering journal in 1945, Clarke describes the problems of providing telephone service to all areas of the globe using the system of transmitters and wires that was currently in use. Then he proposes that worldwide telecommunications could be facilitated by means of satellites placed in geosynchronous orbits above the earth. Highly theoretical (it appeared before any rockets capable of achieving orbit had been launched), this paper predicts the type of telecommunications system now in use. In “The Star of Bethlehem,” he relies on his knowledge of astronomy as he speculates that the star was actually a supernova. His scientific speculation on this event was the basis for his short story “The Star.” The final selection, “The Twenty-First Century: A (Very) Brief History,” attempts to prophesize the technological advances that will take place in this century.

Clarke also includes many commentaries on the development of technology and its impact on humans and on society. In "The Uses of the Moon," which first appeared in 1965, he argues for colonization of the Moon based on economic benefits; however, in "Space and the Spirit of Man," published the same year, he makes the claim that space exploration is necessary for human spiritual growth. "The Obsolescence of Man" speculates that humans might eventually be replaced by machines.

Clarke's nonfiction work provides much insight into his knowledge of science and technology and his views on how they affect human societies, as well as his views on the genre of science fiction.

SUMMARY

Arthur C. Clarke's stories are grounded in scientific fact, but they also deal with a future that cannot be known. For the most part, he is optimistic about that future and the role humans will play in it, and he sees space travel as an invigorating force. He believes that life exists on other planets and that eventually humans will make contact with it. Although the human race may reach the end of its evolutionary development, it has the potential to become something better.

In Profiles of the Future (1962), one of his non-fiction books, Clarke writes that he is not trying "to describe the future, but to define the boundaries within which possible futures must lie." When considering the future, he says, the one fact "of which we can be certain is that it will be utterly fantastic."

Eunice Pedersen Johnston

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Prelude to Space*, 1951
- The Sands of Mars*, 1951
- Against the Fall of Night*, 1953 (revised as The City and the Stars, 1956)
- Childhood's End*, 1953
- Earthlight*, 1955
- The Deep Range*, 1957
- Across the Sea of Stars*, 1959
- A Fall of Moondust*, 1961
- From the Ocean, from the Stars*, 1962
- Glide Path*, 1963
- Prelude to Mars*, 1965 (with Mike Wilson)
- "The Lion of Comarre," and "Against the Fall of Night," 1968
- 2001: A Space Odyssey*, 1968
- Rendezvous with Rama*, 1973
- Imperial Earth*, 1975
- The Fountains of Paradise*, 1979
- 2010: Odyssey Two*, 1982
- The Songs of Distant Earth*, 1986
- 2061: Odyssey Three*, 1987
- Cradle*, 1988 (with Gentry Lee)
- Rama II*, 1989 (with Lee)
- The Ghost from the Grand Banks*, 1990
- Beyond the Fall of Night*, 1990 (with Gregory Benford)
- The Garden of Rama*, 1991 (with Lee)
- Rama Revealed*, 1993 (with Lee)
- The Hammer of God*, 1993

Richter 10, 1996 (with Mike McQuay)
3001: The Final Odyssey, 1997
The Trigger, 1999 (with Michael Kube-McDowell)
The Light of Other Days, 2000 (with Stephen Baxter)
Time's Eye, 2004 (with Baxter)
Sunstorm, 2005 (with Baxter)
Firstborn, 2007
The Last Theorem, 2008

SHORT FICTION:

Expedition to Earth, 1953
Reach for Tomorrow, 1956
Tales from the White Hart, 1957
The Other Side of the Sky, 1958
Tales of Ten Worlds, 1962
The Nine Billion Names of God, 1967
Of Time and Stars: The Worlds of Arthur C. Clarke, 1972
The Wind from the Sun, 1972
The Best of Arthur C. Clarke, 1937-1971, 1973
The Sentinel: Masterworks of Science Fiction and Fantasy, 1983
Tales from Planet Earth, 1989
Dilemmas: The Secret, 1989
More than One Universe: The Collected Stories of Arthur C. Clarke, 1991
The Collected Stories of Arthur C. Clarke, 2000

POETRY:

The Fantastic Muse, 1992

NONFICTION:

Interplanetary Flight, 1950
The Exploration of Space, 1951, revised 1959
Going into Space, 1954
The Exploration of the Moon, 1954
The Coast of Coral, 1956
The Reefs of Taprobane, 1957
The Making of a Moon, 1957
Voice Across the Sea, 1958
The Challenge of the Spaceship, 1959
The First Five Fathoms, 1960
The Challenge of the Sea, 1960
Indian Ocean Adventure, 1961 (with Mike Wilson)
Profiles of the Future, 1962
Man and Space, 1964 (with others)
The Treasure of the Great Reef, 1964
Indian Ocean Treasure, 1964 (with Wilson)
Voices from the Sky, 1965
The Promise of Space, 1968
First on the Moon, 1970 (with others)
Into Space, 1971 (with Robert Silverberg)
The Lost Worlds of 2001, 1972
Beyond Jupiter, 1972 (with Chesley Bonestall)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Arthur C. Clarke's fiction speculates about the lives of humans in the future. Is his vision of the future a utopia, where humans live happy lives in a nearly perfect society, or a dystopia, where they lead a fearful existence in a hostile world?
- Are any of Clarke's characters complex, well-developed ones to whom readers can relate?
- What role does the theory of evolution play in Clarke's fiction?
- What nonhuman sentient beings appear in Clarke's fiction, how are they different from humans, and why are they important?
- What is the relationship between humans and technology in Clarke's fiction?

Arthur C. Clarke

Report on Planet Three, 1972

The View from Serendip, 1977 (autobiographical)

1984: Spring, a Choice of Futures, 1984

The Odyssey File, 1985 (with Peter Hyams)

Arthur C. Clarke's July 20, 2019: Life in the Twenty-First Century, 1986

Astounding Days: A Science Fictional Autobiography, 1989

How the World Was One: Beyond the Global Village, 1992

By Space Possessed, 1993

The Snows of Olympus: A Garden on Mars, 1994

Greetings, Carbon-Based Bipeds! Collected Essays, 1934-1998, 1999

From Narnia to a Space Odyssey: The War of Ideas Between Arthur C. Clarke and C. S. Lewis, 2003 (Ryder W. Miller, editor)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Islands in the Sky, 1952

Dolphin Island, 1963

EDITED TEXT:

Time Probe: The Sciences in Science Fiction, 1966

About the Author

Hollow, John. Against the Night, the Stars: The Science Fiction of Arthur C. Clarke. San Diego, Calif.: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1983.

James, Edward. "Clarke's Utopian Vision." Foundation: The International Review of Science Fiction 34 (Spring, 2005): 26-33.

Kilgore, De Witt Douglas. "Will There Always Be an England? Arthur C. Clarke's New Eden." In Astrofuturism: Science, Race, and Visions of Utopia in Space. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2003.

McAleer, Neil. Odyssey: The Authorized Biography of Arthur C. Clarke. Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1992.

Miller, Ryder W., ed. From Narnia to a Space Odyssey: The War of Ideas Between Arthur C. Clarke and C. S. Lewis. New York: IBooks, 2003.

Olander, Joseph D., and Martin Harry Greenberg, eds. Arthur C. Clarke. New York: Taplinger, 1977.

Rabkin, Eric S. Arthur C. Clarke. Mercer Island, Wash.: Starmont House, 1980.

Reid, Robin Anne. Arthur C. Clarke: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.

Samuelson, David N. Arthur C. Clarke: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1984.

Slusser, George Edgar. The Space Odysseys of Arthur C. Clarke. San Bernardino, Calif.: Borgo Press, 1978.

National Archives

JEAN COCTEAU

Born: Maisons-Laffitte, France

July 5, 1889

Died: Milly-la-Forêt, France

October 11, 1963

Cocteau's protean achievements, which encompass most literary genres and media, secured for him a place as one of the most influential French avant-gardists of the twentieth century.

BIOGRAPHY

Jean Maurice Eugène Clément Cocteau (kok-TOH) was born on July 5, 1889, in Maisons-Laffitte, on the outskirts of Paris, France, where he would spend most of his diverse, prolific, and well-publicized artistic career. A fragile child, he was introduced early to the arts by his family and their acquaintances. At the age of nine, his father, Georges, committed suicide, an event never mentioned in any of Cocteau's works; Cocteau then began his intense preoccupation with the circus, the theater, and classical music. He attended primary school from the ages of eleven to fourteen, and his three failures at the baccalauréat clearly showed his lack of taste for the regimented French educational system, which he later called being "badly brought up."

Cocteau's adolescence was spent living with his stylish and independently wealthy mother, Eugénie, whose influence he admits never diminished even with his artistic successes. Although his attempts at independence, including marriage to the actress Madeleine Carlier, failed, his mother received with hospitality his homosexual friends, and Cocteau pursued an active career in Paris's fin de siècle high society and artistic circles. After the 1908 performance of several of his poems, he was introduced to the director of the Ballets Russes, Sergei Diaghilev, and to the innovative composer

Igor Stravinsky. Cocteau served in the medical corps during World War I, returning to Paris to collaborate with Diaghilev, Erik Satie, and Pablo Picasso on a ballet, Parade, in 1917.

Cocteau's most important friendship was with the young novelist Raymond Radiguet, whom he met in 1919; the period produced a farce, Les Mariés de la Tour Eiffel (pr. 1921; The Wedding on the Eiffel Tower, 1937), and the novels Thomas l'imposteur (1923; Thomas the Impostor, 1925) and Le Grand Écart (1923; The Grand Ecart, 1925), before the tragic death of Radiguet at the age of twenty. Heartbroken, Cocteau retired to the French Riviera and turned first to the use of opium and then to religion. The next few years, in and out of opium asylums, were spent collaborating with the painter Christian Bérard on several works, including the play La Voix humaine (pr., pb. 1930; The Human Voice, 1951) and the film La Belle et la bête (1946; Beauty and the Beast, 1947). During this time, Cocteau was involved with twenty-year-old Jean Desbordes, who inspired Le Livre blanc (1928; The White Paper, 1957). He also completed Les Enfants terribles (1929; Enfants Terribles, 1930; also known as Children of the Game) and the first version of Orphée (pr. 1926, pb. 1927; Orpheus, 1933).

With the publication of Children of the Game, Cocteau achieved notoriety and success. In February, 1930, he produced his one-act, one-man play The Human Voice, which was decried by the Surrealists, who finally forgave him in 1938. Along with successes on the stage, his first film, Le Sang d'un poète (1930; The Blood of a Poet, 1949), was presented and well received in January, 1932, and was followed by his version of Oedipus in La Machine infernale (pr., pb. 1934; The Infernal Machine, 1936). During World War II and Germany's occupation of France (1940-1950), many of his plays premiered, including Les Monstres sacrés (pr., pb. 1940; The Holy Terrors, 1953) and his neo-Sophoclean tragedy Antigone (pr. 1922, pb. 1928; English translation, 1961). The success of his film L'Éternel Retour (1943; The Eternal Return, 1948) was followed by the loss of two friends, one to pneumonia in a concentration camp and the other to Gestapo torture.

With the end of the war, Cocteau presented numerous ballets, plays, and films, including his enduringly successful Beauty and the Beast. Cocteau finally left Paris for good in 1947 and moved to Milly-la-Forêt, France, where he lived with a young painter, Édouard Dermit. While writing Bacchus (pr. 1951, pb. 1952; English translation, 1955) and his Journal d'un inconnu (1952; The Hand of a Stranger, 1956; also known as Diary of an Unknown, 1988), he concentrated upon the fine arts, especially his paintings and illustrations, first exhibited in Munich in 1952. He also worked in pottery, glass, mosaic, tapestry, stained glass, and architecture.

He was elected to the Belgian Académie Royale and the Académie Française in 1955, was received into the French Legion of Honor in 1957, and died quietly at Milly-la-Forêt on October 11, 1963.

ANALYSIS

Cocteau constructed for himself a complete aesthetic universe; he wrote the texts, designed the scenery and costumes, selected the dancers, arranged the choreography, wrote the music, directed, often performed in the production, and illustrated the published book. As much as any one since the composer Richard Wagner, Cocteau demanded that his productions and publications be "total artistic experiences," under the control of a single aesthetic imperative, and that his audiences appreciate his work on its own terms, free from modish evaluations or conservative intolerance. There is a curious combination in Cocteau's work of an intense insistence both on classicism and on artificial convention and upon radicalism and individualism. The most sustained exposition of his thoughts on art and literature is his late work La Difficulté d'être (1947; The Difficulty of Being, 1966).

Rather than allying himself with fashionable authors of the day, most notably the Surrealists, Cocteau designates as his inspiration the Renaissance essayist Michel de Montaigne, who described his own writings as being "consubstantial with their author"—both mystically and physically inseparable from their author. Cocteau persistently credits the contributions of his friends to his work and insists upon the direct relationship of his own lived experience to that which he artistically represents. Yet his work is not simply an autobiographical expression of a personal experience to be assimilated exactly to the copious personal remarks and records that the author has left behind. Indeed, critics have even accused Cocteau of a lack of artistic and theoretical originality. Even as familiarity with such biographical details as the artistic society of the Café aux Deux Magots, frequented by the philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre and the Parisian avant-garde, is necessary to the full appreciation of the satire that opens the 1950 film Orpheus, for example, so, too, a knowledge of Cocteau's theoretical indebtedness is crucial. Cocteau never claims to be original and often attributes his theoretical and artistic borrowings, claiming in this scholarly respect, as well as in other artistic aspects, to strive for clarity and lucidity, to "show darkness in broad daylight."

Cocteau's emphasis upon neoclassical simplicity and order in works such as Orpheus and Antigone stands in apparent contradiction to his recurrent interest in many of the metaphysical questions raised by German Romanticism in particular. In many of his works, from The Blood of a Poet and Bacchus to Children of the Game, as well as Beauty and the Beast and Orpheus, Cocteau develops commentaries upon, and versions of, central Romantic themes such as the inextricability of love and death, divine poetic intoxication, the inevitability of suffering for the artist, and the incomprehension and lack of appreciation of bourgeois society for radical art. Cocteau himself cites as inspirations the importance of philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche's theory of Dionysiac poetic inspiration and of the unparalleled polymathy of the German writer Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Perhaps the single most persistent theme in Cocteau is that love can only be perfected in death. Like his precursor the French Romantic poet and novelist Victor Hugo, Cocteau sees the poet as the écho sonore, whose voice echoes both the events of the external world and such intense internal orphic realizations.

If love and death is a central theme, then the conduct and destiny of the poet is his dominant theoretical preoccupation. For Cocteau, “poetry” encompasses all media, and his own corpus contains experiments in dozens of literary genres and artistic media. For Cocteau, poetry is not an esoteric preoccupation of an elite group of aesthetes. Although often criticized as being precisely such a precious enterprise destined for a marginal coterie, Cocteau’s “poetry,” like the productions of so many artistic movements of the first half of the twentieth century, insists upon the universal relevance and importance of poetry as that alone that makes life worthwhile in a materialistic age, as the only remaining “spiritual luxury.” Cocteau’s work is committed to the double imperative both continually to shock its audience and uncompromisingly to create a radically individualized system of its own artistic fabrication.

The phenomenon of Cocteau, patron of new talent, scintillating conversationalist, homosexual, opium addict, and grand maître of the French avant-garde, especially after his self-imposed exile from Paris, often obscures the substance of his artistic achievement. Perhaps more so than any of his extraordinary fictional poets, Cocteau himself has become one of his own monstres sacrés.

ANTIGONE

First produced: 1922 (first published, 1928;
English translation, 1961)

Type of work: Play

Antigone, the cursed descendant of Oedipus, must decide between familial duty and the laws of the state in order to bury her brother.

Cocteau chose in 1922 to translate Sophocles’ famous tragedy Antigonē (441 B.C.E.; Antigone, 1729) into French. Cocteau himself, in his diaries, declares that he was motivated by a feeling of sympathy with the heroine, who like Joan of Arc, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and Jean Genet, shares the condition of being both persecuted and inspired. For Cocteau, the persecution of Antigone will be based on her purity, which distinguishes her from the rest of corrupt society. The first production of Antigone in 1922 was staged at the At  lier in Paris with settings by Pablo Picasso, music by Arthur Honegger, and costumes by Gabrielle “Coco” Chanel. Charles Dullin and Antonin Artaud played the parts of Creon and Tiresias, Cocteau himself took the part of the Chorus, and Genica Atanasiou played Antigone. This collaboration of innovators in all fields of the arts is typical of Cocteau’s productions and films.

Cocteau’s text shortens Sophocles’ tragedy, adapting the Greek tragedy to a unified French dramatic form, and shifts many of the psychological and verbal emphases of the ancient play. Cocteau’s prose is itself shortened; it is often not only concise but abrupt, giving a feel of avant-garde modernity to the play’s language. Cocteau describes his effort as a reduction and “scouring” of language to the point at which the play “hurtles toward its conclusion like an express train.” At the same time that the play is accelerated by Cocteau’s streamlined language, it is transformed from the record of the majestic actions of kings, a traditional definition of a tragedy, to a minimalist melodrama that restricts and schematizes the characters and the scale of their actions. Even with stage directions, its text can never adequately record the rich visual and auditory experience of the play in performance. Many of the stage directions and costuming directions suggest, but cannot represent, the boldness of the play’s staging:

beneath the masks one could make out the actor’s faces, and ethereal features were sewn onto the masks in white millinery wire. The costumes were worn over black bathing suits, and arms and legs were covered. The general effect was suggestive of a sordid carnival of kings, a family of insects.

The theatricality of the performance, such expressionist stage directions as “Antigone . . . braces herself for the day ahead,” and all the mentions of musical interludes indicate the multimedia nature of this piece of “performance art.” This version of Sophoclean theatricality, which also relied upon masks and music, both insists upon the connection between Cocteau’s piece and the Greek original and emphasizes the degree to which it has transformed the classical material that it invokes.

Cocteau emphasizes both the translation of the Antigone myth by time and the persistence of the importance of myth and its accompanying spectacles.

In scenes such as the encounter between Creon and Antigone, Sophocles himself carefully presented and questioned the nature of legal justice and its relationship to human emotions and familial duty. With Cocteau's treatment of the myth, another issue emerges clearly, however—that of Antigone's nature as a poet. Other playwrights, notably Cocteau's contemporary Jean Anouilh, insist upon the defiant heroism of Antigone in the face of political oppression in their adaptations of Sophocles' play. In Cocteau's version, such political, or even religious or familial, defiance gives way to an emphasis upon Antigone's autonomy and her status as a poet. She does not present an elaborate defense of her actions; instead, she offers the spectacle of her demise as the gesture that will testify to her innocence. Creon corroborates the theatricality of the drama, when, in the last moments of the play, he describes his plight as the cause of three deaths, as "not knowing where to look."

CHILDREN OF THE GAME

First published: Les Enfants terribles, 1929
(English translation, 1930)

Type of work: Novel

Two children, Paul and Elizabeth, play a dangerous and amoral game that substitutes fantasy for reality and finally kills them.

Much of Children of the Game is drawn from Cocteau's experiences from 1900 through 1903 as an unhappy student at the "Petit Condorcet," a college in the rue Amsterdam. Indeed, the opening description of a visit to the Cité des Monthiers, a hidden courtyard of artists within an international diplomatic neighborhood of Paris, is a recollection of many such visits that Cocteau himself made with school friends. Cocteau uses the same autobiographical material in his The Blood of a Poet, which represents a development of ideas raised by Children of the Game, and in the famous film noir version directed by Jean-Pierre Melville. The symbolic meanings that will be assigned to the later cinematographic versions of the story are already present in the story of these children, who, Cocteau will say later in his journals, did not recognize their own poetry, who "were not playing horses but actually became horses."

Written in three weeks in 1929 while Cocteau was being treated for opium addiction, the novel focuses on the theme of the adolescent, a new creation of the years following the end of World War I, whose sense of prestige and freedom in the first half of the decade would decay into disenchantment in the second half. The plot of the novel itself is simple and absolute in its construction, revolving around the promise made between Paul and Elizabeth to adhere to a pact, which excludes the rest of the world and love. They are "angelic," in the sense of being both innocent and uncompromising. For a few years, they are granted a carefree life in their world of childish, if nightmarish, performances and images before the encroachment of a race of adults perverts and destroys them. The novel opens and closes with snow scenes, which establish the emotional coldness of the life that it depicts. Like the falling snow, which blocks out the world, the children's game substitutes their nocturnal performances and an absolute code of rules for all the accepted ways of ordering reality.

The novel opens with the school bully throwing a deadly snowball at Paul. This childhood rite of initiation, which is repeated in the autobiographical The Blood of a Poet, forms an ominous frame for the whole novel. Although scarcely present in the novel, Dargelos remains a haunting threat, an avenging angel, from whom the children retreat into their symbolic world of the game. He finally sends poison, a more incontrovertibly lethal symbol than the snowball, into that children's room, whence the rules of the game originate. Only with Paul's death, Elizabeth's suicide, and the poisonous invasion of their sacred, and yet horrendous, magical space, the “theater of the bedroom,” will the curse be lifted. Cocteau consistently emphasizes the theatricality of their game through a careful attention to stage lighting for their vignettes, an attention that slowly seeps beyond the room to alter the balance of light and dark in the real world outside the room. Even natural phenomena are subject to distortion in this ever-expanding theater of cruelty. The unnerving combination of perversion and order within the constructed security of the children’s game-world will be accompanied in the film version not only by chiaroscuro lighting but also by the deceptively soothing music of Johann Sebastian Bach and Antonio Vivaldi.

Elizabeth’s suicide appropriately ends the game, for she has always been the stronger player, controlling both Paul’s behavior and that of his friend Gerard. Although brutalized and terrified by her brother, Elizabeth finally causes the death of her brother when he breaks their childhood contract and falls in love with Agatha. Elizabeth, in a fever both jealous and physical, shoots both her already poisoned brother and herself in the head with a revolver. As an avenging Electra, she brings a final terrifying consummation of the tragic ritual, on a white and snow-covered stage, by playing the horror absolutely according to the rules.

SUMMARY

At the age of forty-one, in his 1930 account of opium addiction, Jean Cocteau would write that even a poet cannot write his own biography. In the broadest sense, however, Cocteau’s life was an exercise in being as many different poets as possible. In media ranging from fresco to film to the novel, Cocteau attempted to bring together a perfection of classical form and a wildly innovative modernity. By placing the debris of World War I on the stage of Greek tragedy behind a veil of medieval mysticism, he created a revolution not only in art but also in society. As flamboyant in life as in art, his agility and intensity continue to impress and sometimes to offend.

Elizabeth Richmond

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- Le Dieu bleu*, pr. 1912 (ballet scenario; with Frédéric de Madrazo)
- Parade*, pr. 1917 (ballet scenario; music by Erik Satie, scenery by Pablo Picasso)
- Le Boeuf sur le toit*, pr. 1920 (ballet scenario; music by Darius Milhaud, scenery by Raoul Dufy)
- Le Gendarme incompris*, pr. 1921 (ballet scenario; with Raymond Radiguet; music by Francis Poulenc)
- Les Mariés de la Tour Eiffel*, pr. 1921 (ballet scenario; music by Les Six; The Wedding on the Eiffel Tower, 1937)
- Antigone*, pr. 1922, pb. 1928 (libretto; English translation, 1961)
- Les Fâcheux*, pr. 1924 (music by George Auric)
- Les Biches*, pr. 1924 (ballet scenario; music by Poulenc)
- Orphée*, pr. 1926, pb. 1927 (Orpheus, 1933)
- Oedipus-Rex*, pr. 1927, pb. 1928 (libretto; English translation, 1961)
- La Voix humaine*, pr., pb. 1930 (The Human Voice, 1951)
- La Machine infernale*, pr., pb. 1934 (The Infernal Machine, 1936)
- L'École des veuves*, pr., pb. 1936
- Les Chevaliers de la table ronde*, pr., pb. 1937 (The Knights of the Round Table, 1955)
- Les Parents terribles*, pr., pb. 1938 (Intimate Relations, 1952)
- Les Monstres sacrés*, pr., pb. 1940 (The Holy Terrors, 1953)
- La Machine à écrire*, pr., pb. 1941 (The Typewriter, 1948)
- Renaud et Armide*, pr., pb. 1943
- Le Jeune Homme et la mort*, pr. 1946 (ballet scenario; music by Johann Sebastian Bach)
- L'Aigle à deux têtes*, pr., pb. 1946 (The Eagle Has Two Heads, 1946)
- Phèdre*, pr. 1950 (ballet scenario; music by Auric)

Jean Cocteau

Bacchus, pr. 1951, pb. 1952 (English translation, 1955)

Théâtre complet, pb. 1957 (2 volumes)

Five Plays, pb. 1961

L'Impromptu du Palais-Royal, pr., pb. 1962

The Infernal Machine, and Other Plays, pb. 1964

SCREENPLAYS:

Le Sang d'un poète, 1930 (The Blood of a Poet, 1949)

Le Baron fantôme, 1943

L'Éternel retour, 1943 (The Eternal Return, 1948)

L'Aigle à deux têtes, 1946

La Belle et la bête, 1946 (Beauty and the Beast, 1947)

Ruy Blas, 1947

Les Parents terribles, 1948 (Intimate Relations, 1952)

Orphée, 1950 (Orpheus, 1950)

Les Enfants terribles, 1950

Le Testament d'Orphée, 1959 (The Testament of Orpheus, 1968)

Thomas l'Imposteur, 1965

LONG FICTION:

Le Potomak, 1919

Le Grand Écart, 1923 (The Grand Écart, 1925)

Thomas l'imposteur, 1923 (Thomas the Impostor, 1925)

Le Livre blanc, 1928 (The White Paper, 1957)

Les Enfants terribles, 1929 (Enfants Terribles, 1930; also known as Children of the Game)

Le Fantôme de Marseille, 1933

La Fin du Potomak, 1939

POETRY:

La Lampe d'Aladin, 1909

Le Prince frivole, 1910

La Danse de Sophocle, 1912

L'Ode à Picasso, 1919

Le Cap de Bonne-Espérance, 1919

Poésies, 1917-1920, 1920

Escales, 1920

Vocabulaire, 1922

Discours du grand sommeil, 1922

Plain-Chant, 1923

Poésie, 1916-1923, 1924

L'Ange Heurtebise, 1925

Prière mutilée, 1925

Cri écrit, 1925

Opéra, 1927

Morceaux choisis, 1932

Mythologie, 1934

Allégories, 1941

Poèmes, 1945

Léone, 1945

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Investigate Jean Cocteau's motives in reworking the material of Sophocles' Antigone.
- What does it mean to construct "a complete aesthetic universe"?
- What advantages do you see in a writer disclaiming originality, as did Cocteau?
- Defend or refute the proposition that Cocteau, a versatile writer, excelled primarily in his plays.
- Restate Cocteau's "double imperative" in your own words.

La Crucifixion, 1946
Anthologie poétique, 1951
Le Chiffre sept, 1952
Appogiatures, 1953
Clair-obscur, 1954
Poèmes, 1916-1955, 1956
Gondole des morts, 1959
Cérémonial espagnol du phénix, 1961
Le Requiem, 1962

NONFICTION:

Le Coq et l'Arlequin, 1918 (Cock and Harlequin, 1921)
Le Secret professionnel, 1922
Le Rappel à l'ordre, 1926 (A Call to Order, 1926)
Lettre à Jacques Maritain, 1926 (Art and Faith, 1948)
Opium: Journal d'une désintoxication, 1930 (Opium: Diary of a Cure, 1932)
Essai de la critique indirecte, 1932 (The Lais Mystery: An Essay of Indirect Criticism, 1936)
Portraits-souvenir, 1900-1914, 1935 (Paris Album, 1956)
La Belle et la bête: Journal d'un film, 1946 (Beauty and the Beast: Journal of a Film, 1950)
La Difficulté d'être, 1947 (The Difficulty of Being, 1966)
Journal d'un inconnu, 1952 (The Hand of a Stranger, 1956; also known as Diary of an Unknown, 1988)
The Journals of Jean Cocteau, 1956
Poésie critique, 1960

TRANSLATION:

Roméo et Juliette, 1926 (of William Shakespeare's play)

About the Author

Bentley, Eric. The Playwright as Thinker. New York: Reynal & Hitchcock, 1946.
Brown, Frederick. An Impersonation of Angels: A Biography of Jean Cocteau. New York: Viking Press, 1968.
Cocteau, Jean. Past Tense: Diaries. Translated by Richard Howard. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1987-1988.
Esslin, Martin. The Theatre of the Absurd. 1961. Reprint. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin Books, 1980.
Fifield, William. Jean Cocteau. New York: Columbia University Press, 1974.
Knapp, Bettina Liebowitz. Jean Cocteau. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
Steegmuller, Francis. Cocteau, a Biography. Boston: Little, Brown, 1970.
Tsakiridou, Cornelia A., ed. Reviewing Orpheus: Essays on the Cinema and Art of Jean Cocteau. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1997.
Williams, James S. Jean Cocteau. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2006.

© Jerry Bauer

J. M. COETZEE

Born: Cape Town, South Africa
February 9, 1940

The recipient of numerous prestigious writing awards, Coetzee's cryptic, many-layered novels explore the spiritual, moral, and sociopolitical context of human experience.

BIOGRAPHY

John Michael Coetzee (koot-SEE) was born in Cape Town, South Africa, on February 9, 1940. His grandparents were farmers who descended from a long line of white Afrikaners, Dutch settlers who came to South Africa in the seventeenth century. Coetzee's father was an attorney, and his mother was a schoolteacher whose free spirit Coetzee much admired. As a child, Coetzee grew up in and around the Karoo desert, an arid South African landscape that provided him with many of the settings for his novels. The author spoke English at home and, after attending various English-language schools, became knowledgeable in Afrikaans, Dutch, and several other languages. Coetzee's wide intelligence is reflected in his academic degrees, as well as in his publications in a variety of disciplines. He received two bachelor of arts degrees from the University of Cape Town, one in English and the other in mathematics. In 1963, he also received an M.A. in English from the university. After graduation, he entered the private sector in England, working for International Business Machines in London and for International Computers in Bracknell, Berkshire. Coetzee's marriage in 1963 produced a daughter and son; the couple divorced in 1980.

In 1965, Coetzee began his doctoral education in English at the University of Texas at Austin as a Fulbright scholar. There, he completed his dissertation on Samuel Beckett. He was offered a teaching position at the State University of New York (SUNY) at Buffalo in 1968, but he was denied permanent residence in the United States because of his involvement in protests against the Vietnam War. Although he left the United States in 1971, he returned in 1983 and 1986 as visiting professor at SUNY-Buffalo and Johns Hopkins University, respectively.

In 1972, Coetzee returned to South Africa to become a professor of English literature at the University of Cape Town. Retiring in 2002, he relocated to Australia, teaching at the University of Adelaide, where his partner, Dorothy Driver, also teaches. He became an Australian citizen in 2006.

A reclusive man, Coetzee has nevertheless achieved renown as a major public intellectual, recognized for his principled stands on such issues as censorship, ethical vegetarianism, and animal rights.

Coetzee's first novel, Dusklands, was published in 1974. It was followed by In the Heart of the Country (1977), which won the South African Central News Agency (CNA) Award and the Mofolo-Plomer Prize. Both these novels rely on first-person perspectives to convey the manner in which South Africa has dehumanized its inhabitants. Successive novels also won critical acclaim for their portrayals of introspective characters living in South Africa at various historical periods. In 1980, Coetzee published Waiting for the Barbarians, which won the South African CNA Award, the Geoffrey Faber Memorial Prize, and the James Tait Black Memorial Prize. The enigmatic Life and Times of Michael K (1983), which drew for inspiration on the work of Franz Kafka, won two awards, the prestigious Man Booker Prize from Britain in 1983 and the French Prix Femina Etranger in 1985. Coetzee also was awarded the Jerusalem Prize for the Freedom of the Individual in Society in 1987. In 1999 he won a second Man Booker Prize for his novel Disgrace (1999), and in 2003, Coetzee was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature.

Foe, a version of the Robinson Crusoe narrative by Daniel Defoe, was published in 1986, and Age of Iron appeared in 1990. These two novels are narrated by women who are deeply troubled and affected by the societies in which they live. In 1994, Coetzee published the novel The Master of Petersburg, set in Russia, which draws on the life of Russian writer Fyodor Dostoevski and addresses the tragic accidental death of Coetzee's son at the age of twenty-three. That novel won the Irish Times' International prize in 1994. In 1999, Coetzee published Disgrace, a novel set in postapartheid South Africa; a 2006 poll of experts compiled by The Observer newspaper named it the "greatest novel of the last 25 years" written in English outside the United States. There followed a series of books in which Coetzee introduced Elizabeth Costello, a character similar to the author in everything but gender: The Lives of Animals (1999), Elizabeth Costello (2003), and Slow Man (2005), a novel in which the lonely and troubled protagonist appears to be a character imagined by Costello herself. At the end of 2007, Coetzee published Diary of a Bad Year, a novel that features an Australian writer addressing a variety of political and moral issues.

In addition to writing novels, Coetzee is a prolific scholar who has published essays on European writers such as Beckett, Dostoevski, Leo Tolstoy, D. H. Lawrence, Franz Kafka, and Vladimir Nabokov. More notable are his nonliterary essays, which deal with his training in linguistics and mathematics. In 1988, he published a collection of essays, White Writing: On the Culture of Letters in South Africa, which examines the literary production of his native country. He also has written two autobiographies, Boyhood: Scenes from Provincial Life (1997) and Youth: Scenes from Provincial Life II (2002), and has collected all his essays into several separate volumes.

ANALYSIS

For the uninitiated reader, Coetzee's fictional texts are highly sophisticated, featuring complex plot development and character formation. Furthermore, the mostly short novels are dense in their allusions to historical and political facts, which contribute to the difficulty of their comprehension. Although the situations in his novels derive from the realities of South Africa in the second half of the twentieth century, Coetzee's fiction often breaks with the conventions of realistic narration, creating stories that have a timeless and fablelike aspect and carry numerous layers of meaning. Very often, the novels are constructed from interior monologues, in which the narrator seems to be speaking to himself or herself. The specifics of historical time and space must be inferred from the characters' plights. In this way, Coetzee allows the personal experiences to speak the truth of the social and cultural situations.

In his first novel, Dusklands, Coetzee seems to indicate that South Africa does not have a monopoly on human cruelty. The two-part novel consists of two "reports" on the warfare that the government has waged against civilians. The first report is narrated by Eugene Dawn, a specialist for the United States military, who reports to a supervisor named Coetzee on war against the North Vietnamese in the twentieth century. The second part is written by Jacobus Coetzee in the eighteenth century, and it is translated by a Dr. S. J. Coetzee. Of the two narrators in the novel, Eugene Dawn and Jacobus Coetzee, one is introspective and sensitive, while the other is arrogant and aggressive. By naming the supervisor of the first part and the narrator and translator of the second part after his own last name, Coetzee seems to be issuing an indictment against his own forbears who, centuries earlier, had migrated to South Africa. The fictional character, Jacobus Coetzee, reveals his cruelty in a series of violent acts directed against the natives, whose land he has invaded.

Coetzee's second novel, In the Heart of the Country, which was published in the United States as From the Heart of the Country (1977), contains the Afrikaans language in the novel's dialogues. For the English-language edition, Coetzee himself translated the dialogues. The narrator of this novel records her observations in the form of a journal, but there are apparent inconsistencies, which provide the reader with a clue to the ways in which isolation from other people might direct the narrator to think and behave in a disturbing manner. There is some indication that the narrator's madness may be the product of the South African farm itself. The theme of a hostile environment and the human isolation that hostility produces also appears in the next novel, Waiting for the Barbarians. The Magistrate, like Coetzee's other characters, is an introspective narrator who is pitted against a variety of circumstances over which he has little control. As a war between the Third Empire and the natives (or "barbarians," as the empire refers to them) unfolds, the Magistrate begins to sympathize more and more with the victims of the regime.

Coetzee's novels emphasize the cruelty of which all human beings are capable. Sometimes, as in the case of the Magistrate, his characters realize too late their roles in helping to advance the cruelty. Other times, his characters choose to disappear altogether from society. That appears to be the case with the main character, a gardener named Michael, in Life and Times of Michael K. From birth, Michael is an outcast who spends his childhood in an orphanage among other unwanted children. The novel focuses on Michael's journey to the farm where his mother spent part of her girlhood. Mother and son begin the journey to escape the violence that has followed the collapse of the government after years of civil war; ultimately Michael realizes that his obligation to his mother has put him in conflict with the government. Michael's mother dies on the way to the farm, and he resumes the journey, taking her ashes with him—but the war follows him, and he is captured by guerrilla soldiers who interpret his withdrawal from society and his determination to honor his mother's wishes as a revolutionary act. His response to his imprisonment is passive resistance—a fast that infuriates but ultimately deeply impresses his captors. The novel ends with the enigmatic observation that people do what they can under the circumstances, suggesting that even under tremendous limitations and pressures, the individual can live with some integrity and sense of principle.

As was true of Waiting for the Barbarians, Coetzee's novel Foe is an allegorical novel that examines the relationship between an empire and its colonized peoples. Retelling Defoe's classic novel Robinson Crusoe (1719), Foe features a woman, Susan Barton, who is cast away on the same island as Robinson Crusoe (here called Cruso) and Friday. Issues such as the relationship of gender to power, European cultural domination, and race are explored; as in Waiting for the Barbarians, the character of Friday represents both the consequences of oppression and a capacity for resistance that defies the power of the colonizers.

As in Foe, layers of telling and retelling of a single story occur with variation in Coetzee's next novel, Age of Iron. In Age of Iron, Mrs. Currens tells her grown daughter living in the United States the story of a vagabond named Vercueil, who one day appears at her home. Mrs. Currens and Vercueil become involved in unraveling the murder of two young black boys in one of the townships. When she is questioned by the police for her concern, Mrs. Currens shows the reader that her allegiances are no longer simply to the state; her knowledge of death and violence has sensitized her to the way that her government operates. She achieves an ethical status greater than that of her powerful government by becoming a surrogate parent first to the vagabond, and then to the children of her black housekeeper. The Master of Petersburg also demonstrates the way in which Coetzee's characters become alienated from a fascistic social environment. As in Waiting for the Barbarians, this novel suggests that much evil arises from the human tendency to demonize the marginal and the disempowered. As is characteristic of Coetzee's work, the resolution of the story takes place inside the psyche of his protagonist, rather than externally. Despite its internal resolution, however, this novel suggests a society on the brink of a new era, and in his next major novel, Disgrace, Coetzee explores a South Africa that has changed dramatically by overturning apartheid. Here, the powerful and the powerless are beginning to change places, and the white characters in the novel must find new ways to live, and, indeed, new philosophies of life. Disgrace introduces a major new theme in Coetzee's work, namely, the situation of exploited and brutalized animals, a theme he continues in subsequent work. Novels such as Elizabeth Costello and Slow Man also explore the way in which mortality inspires soul-searching with regard to what makes for a good and meaningful life.

IN THE HEART OF THE COUNTRY

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

The narrator, Magda, keeps a journal that reflects a psychological disorientation attributable to living on a South African farm at the beginning of the twentieth century.

The narrator of Coetzee's second novel, In the Heart of the Country, is a virginal white spinster named Magda, who is living at the beginning of the twentieth century on a South African farm with her father and several servants and field hands. Magda's father is the callous ruler of the farm; his character and the isolation of farm life in South Africa have a decided effect on Magda's psychology. When her father takes a black mistress, Magda's reactions are not only extreme, but the line between reality and fantasy begins to blur.

In conventional literary terms, Magda's narrative may be considered "unreliable," because of inconsistencies in the sequence of events and in the manner of presentation. For example, in one scene, Magda brutally kills her father and his mistress with an ax while they are in bed; a little later, her father is up and about. A little later still, Magda once again enacts a scenario motivated by both envy and vengeance, shooting her father as he is in the midst of a sexual act; toward the novel's end, after an elaborate and illegal burial of her father, Magda is nevertheless still conversing with him. There are a variety of sexual encounters, although these seem to arise from Magda's wishful imagination, rather than as a record of actual happenings. There are sexual undercurrents in her relationships with the two men, her father and the servant Hendrik; even her conversations with Hendrik's young wife, Klein-Anna, seem filled with erotic tensions, and in one scene, Magda makes a proposition to the couple that suggests the existence of a love triangle. Magda's narrative, like that of Eugene Dawn and Jacobus Coetzee, is motivated by highly intense and personal wishes and desires. If the accounts themselves appear dubious to the reader, however, they are accurate renditions of the narrator's troubled psychological state. Coetzee seems to pose this question throughout the novel: What is real, what is reality? At the heart of the journal entries, what is actual may remain forever unknown, but what is certain is the disorientation and alienation that Magda experiences as a result of her life in South Africa.

WAITING FOR THE BARBARIANS

First published: 1980

Type of work: Novel

The Third Empire wages a war with natives who are governed by the Magistrate, whose more liberal policies lead to his persecution by his own people; in the process, he begins to question the moral status of the empire and his own previous role as a member of its bureaucracy.

Waiting for the Barbarians is narrated by a man known only as the Magistrate, who administers an outpost of an unnamed empire. The time and place of the novel's plot are also unspecified, and these indeterminacies allow the reader to perceive the events as universal. The novel begins with the arrival of Colonel Joll from the Third Empire, which has declared war against the "barbarians," the natives indigenous to the area. Among the captives, the Magistrate witnesses the killing of an old man and the torture of a young boy. Later, he encounters a young woman whose body bears the visible cruelties of the empire.

It is in his relationship with the young woman that the Magistrate begins to reexamine the goals of the empire. Before Joll's arrival, the Magistrate had lived without incident among the natives; some of his leisure time was spent excavating and deciphering the artifacts of those who had lived there before him. In the young "barbarian" woman, the Magistrate begins to understand that he, along with those in the service of the empire, helped to destroy an innocent and peaceful civilization. After the Magistrate embarks on a journey to return the woman to her people, he is perceived as an enemy of the state, and, upon his return, is tortured, humiliated, and imprisoned. This process allows the Magistrate to recognize his body's vulnerability; the honesty and authority of his body's pain expresses essential realities ignored by his surface personality.

The military expedition fails to engage the barbarians successfully and disintegrates; the barbarians have made themselves utterly inaccessible, frustrating Joll, whose failed campaign has turned the outpost into a wasteland devoid of the vegetation of human life. As the novel comes to a close, the Magistrate and the remaining inhabitants of the outpost are left to await the barbarians, but in point of fact no one is coming; it is the barbaric Joll, who, at last, is leaving in disgrace. The last words the Magistrate speaks to Joll are of the crimes latent in the empire itself, which he tells Joll must not be inflicted on others. He has come to understand that the empire's citizens cannot depend on invading barbarians to justify the monsters they have made of themselves; the barbarians in this regard are an elaborate misdirection. Alone once again, the Magistrate watches children happily build out of the snow a "not bad" image of a man; this reasonably decent snowman can also describe the Magistrate's own developing character.

DISGRACE

First published: 1999

Type of work: Novel

After a sex scandal, a South African professor is stripped of his status; this disgrace is compounded by a devastating sexual attack on his daughter and the consequent dismantling of his illusions about himself and his place in the world.

The novel's protagonist, David Lurie, is a womanizing professor in his early fifties, teaching romantic poetry in the postapartheid world of Cape Technical University. Appearing before a tribunal because of a sex scandal involving one of his young students, David is remorseful, but he also justifies his actions as the outcome of valid romantic passions like those of Lord Byron, an aspect of whose life David is attempting to convert into an opera.

Dismissed from his teaching position, David takes refuge with his daughter, Lucy, on her farm on the Eastern Cape. The central event of this novel is Lucy's rape by three black men, during which David is brutalized and set on fire. The three men are linked to Petrus, a formerly disenfranchised black South African, who, in the new post-apartheid society, is slowly taking over Lucy's land. It becomes clear that the attack on Lucy was a way to bring her under Petrus's power; pregnant by the impaired young boy who was actually the only male permitted to have sex with her, Lucy will, as a result, come under the protection of Petrus as his nominal third wife and live as a tenant on his land. David is appalled that Lucy will accept this humiliation; Lucy agrees it is humiliation but believes she must start at ground level, with nothing, no rights, no dignity, like a dog.

The metaphor of a dog is also a reality; David's current job is at the local animal shelter, where he helps Bev Shaw, a middle-aged local woman, dispose of the abandoned dogs of the now-fled white South African populace. However, David's new status as the "dog-man" is not only an image of his fall from grace; he finds that the humiliations he has undergone have given him the ability to sympathize with suffering. He develops a compassionate relationship with Bev and with the doomed animals, in whom he sees dignity and spirituality. Although for Lucy neither she nor the dogs have any political or metaphysical status, David begins to feel that both he and animals possess souls, and that his journey is ultimately a spiritual one.

In the end, the foundations of David's life are destroyed; he has lost his job, his possessions, his identity, his status, and his daughter, and his opera project comes to nothing and expresses nothing. However, when the father of the young student he had seduced suggests that his new, difficult path is one that God has ordained for him, David immediately agrees. His work at the shelter becomes a form of penance that can possibly lead to his salvation.

ELIZABETH COSTELLO

First published: 2003

Type of work: Novel

An aging Australian writer who travels the world struggles with serious issues, such as sexuality, art, evil, mortality, and spirituality.

This novel is organized around the character of Elizabeth Costello, who is virtually an alter ego for the author himself. While a famous and successful writer, she is also a lonely, confused, and sad old woman who knows that other people find her infuriating, which further isolates her. As she travels from Amsterdam to South Africa, Massachusetts, and to what appears to be the gates of Heaven, she gives readers what are described as lessons, eight in toto. The first two chapters of this novel, "The Philosophers and the Animals" and "The Poets and the Animals," argue that the slaughtering of animals is a crime that leads to moral corruption and spiritual disaster. Related to this is the overvaluation of human reason, which Costello suggests is simply the mask that power wears and which has made it impossible for humans to empathize with the situation of animals. She suggests that human beings have forgotten their own animal natures, especially their shared mortality. In contemplating her own death she feels she shares the existential situation of animals, and at the end of her two lessons on this issue, her son, John, indeed comforts her as if she were a miserable suffering creature approaching death.

A second topic concerns the issue of evil and is organized around Costello's reaction to a novel written about Nazi Germany. She concludes the author may be too pleasurably involved with his subject, as a result becoming demonic; Costello suspects this demonic presence in herself as well. In the next section, the voice of Costello gives way to that of her sister, a Catholic nun, who denounces the study of the humanities, art, and the privileging of reason. When her sister suggests that the humanities have lost their spiritual dimension, Costello agrees that if art is to survive, it must respond to the human craving for salvation.

Eventually, Costello's final destination is a strange prison camp; here she must make a case for herself before a mysterious panel of judges in order to get past the gate into the next world. She finally produces an enigmatic statement that deploys the situation of the common frog as a metaphor not just for death but also for redemption.

A final chapter also takes readers into a more phantasmagoric reality. It is inspired by Hugo von Hofmannsthal's "Letter of Lord Chandos to Lord Bacon" (1902) but imagined from the perspective of Lord Chandos's wife. She appears to mediate the rationality of Bacon and the mysticism of her husband, but whether it is possible for her to successfully accomplish this mission is open to question. Beginning with the body, both animal and human, Costello's lessons move through considerations of good, evil, death, sexuality, and art to a more fantastic mode of consciousness that never absolutely reveals its purposes or meanings.

SUMMARY

J. M. Coetzee's novels are dense and filled with philosophical awareness of the situation of people living with or under oppressive circumstances, but, more importantly, his novels explore the way in which a false self, associated with a powerful but corrupt political or social system, must be dismantled. In creating realistic interior and external worlds that reflect human cruelty and atrocity, Coetzee never lets the reader forget that his protagonists are vulnerable men or women who have lost their way, and who are now on reparative journeys that involve serious moral and spiritual issues. His protagonists are not so much the victims of crime as they are themselves criminals who are unaware of their criminal natures, or, more often, they are ordinary people implicated in criminal systems, and for this they must atone. The novels are difficult to comprehend at times because the subject matter and the characters that inhabit the devastated worlds do not lend themselves to easy simplifications, especially since the reader must accept that pain and suffering is often the pathway to enlightenment, and that humiliation and disempowerment are necessary to achieve a full humanity.

Cynthia Wong; updated by Margaret Boe Birns

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Dusklands, 1974

In the Heart of the Country, 1977 (pb. in the U.S. as

From the Heart of the Country, 1977)

Waiting for the Barbarians, 1980

Life and Times of Michael K, 1983

Foe, 1986

Age of Iron, 1990

The Master of Petersburg, 1994

Disgrace, 1999

Elizabeth Costello, 2003

Slow Man, 2005

Diary of a Bad Year, 2007

NONFICTION:

White Writing: On the Culture of Letters in South Africa, 1988

Doubling the Point: Essays and Interviews, 1992 (David Attwell, editor)

Giving Offense: Essays on Censorship, 1996

Boyhood: Scenes from Provincial Life, 1997

Stranger Shores: Literary Essays, 1986-1999, 2001

Youth: Scenes from Provincial Life II, 2002

Inner Workings: Literary Essays, 2000-2005, 2007

TRANSLATION:

Landscape with Rowers: Poetry from the Netherlands, 2003

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Lives of Animals, 1999 (with others; Amy Gutmann, editor)

About the Author

Attridge, Derek. J. M. Coetzee and the Ethics of Reading. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.

Gallagher, Susan. A Story of South Africa: J. M. Coetzee's Fiction in Context. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1991.

Head, Dominic. J. M. Coetzee. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Huggan, Graham, and Stephen Watson, eds. Critical Perspectives on J. M. Coetzee. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Kosew, Sue, ed. Critical Essays on J. M. Coetzee. New York: G. K. Hall, 1998.

Poyner, Jane, ed. J. M. Coetzee and the Idea of the Public Intellectual. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2006.

Wright, Laura. Writing "Out of all the Camps": J. M. Coetzee's Narratives of Displacement. New York: Routledge, 2006.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In his novels, J. M. Coetzee subjects his major characters to considerable suffering of one kind or another. Is there a meaning or purpose to this suffering? Are there lessons to be learned?
- How do Coetzee's novels explore the relationship between the powerful and the powerless?
- Discuss Coetzee's novels in the context of the violent history and politics of South Africa, especially apartheid.
- Discuss the way in which the suffering of animals has developed into an important aspect of Coetzee's fiction.
- Often Coetzee's narratives frustrate a desire for clarification and will defer meanings indefinitely. What is the purpose of this cryptic aspect of his novels?
- In awarding Coetzee the Nobel Prize in Literature, the Swedish Academy praised him for his exposure of the "cosmetic morality and cruel rationalism" of Western civilization. How do his novels explore this critical problem?

Library of Congress

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE

Born: Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, England
October 21, 1772

Died: Highgate, London, England
July 25, 1834

Coleridge is one of the most important and prolific English Romantic poets. His contributions to the art and philosophy of the age include some of the greatest literary criticism ever written, as well as one of humanity's most innovative biographical documents.

BIOGRAPHY

Born in Ottery St. Mary, at the vicarage of a small town in rural Devonshire, England, on October 21, 1772, Samuel Taylor Coleridge (KOH-lirihj) was the tenth and last child of the Reverend John and Ann Bowden Coleridge. John was an ambitious and scholarly man who served his community not only as parish priest but also as headmaster of the local grammar school, the site of his youngest child's first formal education. Many of Coleridge's early family associations seem fraught with anxiety and pain. His elderly parents doted upon their clever and eager child, which his siblings resented, and Coleridge developed an intense dependency upon those whom he perceived to be stronger and better than he—a pattern that persisted throughout his life. Thus, intellectual precocity brought him much attention and affection at the same time that nearly insatiable appetites, manifest as greed for books and food, prevented his ever feeling fully satisfied and cherished.

Whatever possibilities might have existed for bliss at home were thwarted, however, when John Coleridge died suddenly when the boy was about to turn nine. His mother was nearly destitute, so her youngest son was dispatched to London to attend Christ's Hospital Grammar School, originally a charity school for the children of indigent clergy. The boarding school was conservative and strict, but Coleridge, despite claims of homesickness and loneliness, flourished in the urban academic environment under the unflinching and at times painfully demanding tutelage of James Bowyer, who encouraged the youth's poetry writing and guided his inaugural study of Continental philosophy, which continued throughout his life. Moreover, Coleridge was viewed by many of the other boys as gregarious and charming, although his lifelong friend Charles Lamb, also enrolled there, wrote later of Coleridge's unhappiness at Christ's Hospital.

Shortly before his twentieth birthday in 1792, Coleridge matriculated at Jesus College, Cambridge University, on a scholarship designated for those intending to take Holy Orders in the Church of England. From an initially rigorous regimen of mathematics and the classics, Coleridge drifted by his third and final year toward no less intensive but more idiosyncratic and less respectable pursuits. For a youth of slender means, he contracted sizable debts and became a supporter of religious and political radicals such as William Frend and William Godwin. England, in the initial period following the start of the French Revolution, harbored a number of young and idealistic sympathizers to the French, and Coleridge found himself in intelligent and congenial company. Overcome by guilt for his financial state, however, which was also undermining his chances with a young woman with whom he was in love, Coleridge impulsively and secretly enlisted in the Light Dragoons as Silas Tomkyn Comberbacke, preserving the initials by which he preferred to be known. The dragoons were cavalry units, requiring equestrian skills beyond those of Coleridge. After a month, he appealed to his brothers, who paid off his debts and the cost of his discharge.

Returning to Cambridge in the spring of 1793, Coleridge met Robert Southey, another improvident young intellectual poet, recently at Oxford and also unwillingly destined for the church. They instantly became great friends, with Coleridge virtually idolizing Southey, sharing ideas and interests and formulating Pantisocracy, a utopian community to be established in the United States along the Susquehanna River in Pennsylvania. In Bristol, where Coleridge began delivering successful public lectures on various literary and philosophic topics, he contributed journalistic articles and essays, wrote poetry, and undertook in-depth study and reflection, which he recorded in notebooks and the margins of published books. All of these occupations lasted his entire life.

In October, 1795, Coleridge wed Sara Fricker. They settled in Clevedon on the Bristol Channel, while he prepared to launch his own (short-lived) weekly newspaper, The Watchman. Idyllically happy, Coleridge wrote one of his most famous poems, "The Eolian Harp," in which he explores the idea of the "One Life."

Around this time, too, Coleridge met William Wordsworth, also a young, restless, and penurious Cambridge radical and aspiring poet. As he had with Southey (with whom Coleridge had now quarreled), Coleridge fell into a kind of hero worship of Wordsworth, although in many ways their relationship was mutually sustaining.

Coleridge's first book of poems appeared in 1796, along with the first issue of his newspaper, but neither was very successful. This same year, Coleridge was reconciled with Southey, who was now his brother-in-law, and Coleridge's first son, Hartley, was born. Coleridge decided to move his young family to Nether Stowey in the rural west of England, where he had been born. The year was also marked by an outbreak of facial neuralgia, for which Coleridge amply medicated himself with laudanum, an alcoholic tincture of opium; at that time, laudanum was as readily used as aspirin is today and was a recourse that was already habitual with Coleridge.

Coleridge had been a sickly child. When he was eighteen, he developed serious rheumatic fever and very likely received a considerable amount of laudanum for anesthetic relief. In addition, opium initially offered him an escape from his inadequacies. Despite some periods of remission, the rheumatic fever seems to have become a chronic condition progressing over the course of his life to rheumatism and rheumatic heart disease. As a result of his ill health, coupled with his dependent personality, Coleridge swiftly capitulated to opium addiction, which itself compromised his health, as well as the conduct of his life.

While living in Stowey, Coleridge labored on the play Orosio, completed in 1797 and destined for the Drury Lane Theatre in London—which, however, rejected it. (In 1813, revised and renamed Remorse, it triumphed at that theater.) Meanwhile, he also wrote more conversation poems, including "This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison," about a walk in the country made by a group of his friends whom he was unable to accompany because Sara had spilled hot milk on his foot, and "Frost at Midnight," in which he pledges a childhood nurtured by nature for baby Hartley, unlike his own London-bound experiences at Christ's Hospital. Coleridge also is thought to have written the mysterious, exotic "Kubla Khan" around this time.

During the last years of the eighteenth century, Coleridge was increasingly drawn to Wordsworth. In discussing their craft, the two poets decided to collaborate first on a poem, then on a collection. The poem was to be a narrative about the wandering, guilt-ridden Cain; the idea dissolved into Coleridge's magnificent The Rime of the Ancient Mariner (1798), which was published as the first poem of their joint Lyrical Ballads (1798). This collection is generally seen as heralding the English Romantic movement. The volume ends with Wordsworth's masterpiece "Lines: Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey," the philosophic underpinnings of which are clearly Coleridge's notion of the One Life, transmuted through Wordsworth's childhood mysticism. Shortly after writing The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Coleridge wrote the fragmentary Christabel (1816), and the Wedgwood family of pottery wealth, whose sons were sympathetic to Coleridge's writing, settled a £150 annuity on the perpetually indigent poet. It was well timed, for the Coleridge family now included a second son, Berkeley.

One of the reasons for publishing Lyrical Ballads

was to underwrite a winter in Germany, which Coleridge believed was the essential place to study. He had originally planned to write the age's great philosophic poem; now he turned the responsibility for that work over to Wordsworth, typically deferring to one deemed superior. (Wordsworth accepted the charge and felt burdened by it for life, haunted by Coleridge's specter, though Coleridge himself by no means escaped the self-inflicted obligation of producing a magnum opus). The Wordsworths and Coleridge, with his wife and family left in the care of friends, set sail for Germany before the collection appeared, toward the end of 1798. The Wordsworths were cold, poor, lonely, and miserable in Goslar, while Coleridge reveled in the social and intellectual ferment at the university town of Göttingen. In April, he finally received word that Berkeley had died two months before, although he did not return to Stowey until July, which aroused accusations of neglect. Once back in England, Coleridge decided that he and his family would follow the Wordsworths to the Lake District, and he installed his family in Greta Hall in Keswick. In 1800, a third son, Derwent, was born, and Coleridge devoted himself for a time to journalism to support his family.

Coleridge's health, as a result of both genuine malady and the opium use, was suffering, and his marriage was seriously foundering. Although he and Sara had seemed ecstatically happy at first, the full burden of the household had fallen to Sara, who was unable to rely upon her husband for assistance or steady financial support. Moreover, he had, since his earliest married days, been unable to stay in one place or at one task for very long; he was alternately indolent, fidgety, moody, and infirm of purpose and of place, for which the encumbered Sara had no sympathy. For emotional and physical sanctuary, he fled frequently to the Wordsworths in Grasmere, where he encountered the sister of Wordsworth's intended bride, Sara Hutchison, whom he rendered anagrammatically as "Asra" when he fell madly in love with her. A verse letter to her, much revised, became his moving and melancholic paean to his inability to feel and, ironically, to write. It became "Dejection: An Ode." His ardor for Sara seems not to have been consummated.

Coleridge increasingly chose prose over poetry to channel his emotional and creative furies. At times, he tried to make his marriage work, and his last child and only daughter, Sara, was born at the end of 1802. Coleridge, however, effectively ceased being a member of his family after young Sara was born. His marriage was virtually over, though divorce, in keeping with the mores of the day, was never seriously contemplated. In 1804, Coleridge set off for Malta to recover his health in a foreign and presumably more hospitable climate, to break his addiction, and to produce some serious writing, including some philosophical notes to buttress Wordsworth's grand poem. He traveled around southern Europe, skirting the movements of Napoleon I's armies, and returned to England in 1806, still addicted, still ill, and claiming that the notes for the poem had been lost at sea. In the meantime, Wordsworth was writing his great autobiographical The Prelude: Or, The Growth of a Poet's Mind (1850), which he always considered as his poem addressed to Coleridge. Nonetheless, Coleridge had clearly tried and expended the good favor of his friends.

Although Coleridge remained in touch with his family, his base of operations was henceforth London, where he lectured to great acclaim on poetry, both contemporary and Renaissance, and philosophy, publishing a journal, The Friend (1809-1810, 1818), which was notable but insolvent. His youthful radicalism had almost entirely eroded, so that now he wrote positively and enthusiastically about the English establishment and the Church of England, trying to contrive his magnum opus now in religious terms.

In 1810, Coleridge moved in with the Montagus, who endeavored to cure his addiction, although Wordsworth, their friend, warned them of the hopelessness of helping Coleridge. When Wordsworth's warning came true, they revealed it to Coleridge, who thereupon broke off all relations—already somewhat cooled—with Wordsworth. The breach was healed two years later, although the two were never what they had been to one another, despite a joint trip to Germany in 1828.

In 1815, Coleridge began what became an innovative document, the unfinished Biographia Literaria: Or, Biographical Sketches of My Literary Life and Opinions, eventually published in 1817. Sibylline Leaves, a collection of verse, also appeared in 1817.

Coleridge resided for about six years with the Morgan family, wealthy admirers who failed to eliminate his dependency on opium, and then for the remainder of his life with Dr. James Gillman in Highgate, who seems to have finally controlled the habit. Coleridge was particularly fortunate in this hospitality, for his health remained very poor, and in 1812 he willingly surrendered his annuity when the Wedgwoods experienced financial reverses. He continued various writing projects, which earned for him some economic relief and growing respect as a literary critic and as an architect of a modern temperament in art.

Coleridge regretted the unfolding patterns of the lives of his abandoned children. His son Hartley, who had seemed the quintessential Romantic child, had to leave Oxford and great academic promise owing to alcohol abuse, drifting into alcoholism and homelessness. His brilliant daughter Sara had married her cousin Henry Coleridge; the blood relationship concerned her father, although the couple proved their devotion by serving as the first editors of Coleridge's writings. Drawing upon his faith at the end, Coleridge died of a massive heart attack compounded by rheumatic hypertension on July 25, 1834, in London and was buried at Highgate Cemetery.

ANALYSIS

As one of the three primary figures of the first generation of the traditional canon of English Romantic poets, Coleridge is responsible along with Wordsworth for the Lyrical Ballads, which is generally viewed as the opening salvo of English Romanticism. Coleridge's masterwork is that great vision of sin and Redemption, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, which begins the volume, but he wrote other magnificent poems and contributed substantially to literary theory.

In fact, in many respects, English Romanticism might not have occurred without the synergy of the two poets in the mid- to late 1790's and into the first decade of the nineteenth century. Critics have interpreted Wordsworth's "Peter Bell" and "The Idiot Boy" as reactions to or attempted corrections of The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Also, Wordsworth's "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" is often seen as engaged in a "lyrical dialogue," to use critic Paul Magnuson's expression, with Coleridge's "Dejection: An Ode," in which both poets ponder emotional despair and what it means for themselves in the world and as poets, as well as what each thinks of the other's ideas.

One of Coleridge's earliest contributions to English Romanticism was the "conversation poem," a form that he invented, which critic M. H. Abrams later termed the "greater Romantic lyric." In this form, a speaker describes to a silent listener the physical surroundings and the passage of his thoughts until some insight, related to the landscape and yet also transforming both it and him, arises. Other Romantic poets borrowed the form (William Wordsworth's "Lines: Composed a Few Miles Above Tintern Abbey," Percy Bysshe Shelley's "Mont Blanc," and John Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale" might be considered examples), but no one surpassed the compact power of "The Eolian Harp," "This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison," and "Frost at Midnight."

For Coleridge, the conversation poem was particularly well suited to his evocation of the One Life, a philosophy of pantheism with which he was much taken in the 1790's. In brief, this philosophy holds that the Creator and the created are one, that God suffuses and interfuses the universe, and that all that lives is in and of God. Coleridge, however, was uncomfortable subscribing to this idea for very long, and age, care, and experience seem to have taken their toll and restored him to the Church of England. Nonetheless, his restless imagination explored the implications of the established religion, as well. Late in life, his prose works reflected these interests.

Many of Coleridge's projects share the recurring Romantic characteristic of fragmentation. For the Romantics, the fragment was testament to the partiality of the human ability to understand and to re-create the world. For Coleridge, in particular, the fragment also testified to his own tendencies to start vast projects that would, for a variety of reasons, fail to be realized in their entirety. Nonetheless, in the Romantic period great merit was located in the portion that abided, and fragments by Wordsworth, Shelley, Keats, and Lord Byron have all been published, while Coleridge's "Kubla Khan," and Biographia Literaria are all billed as incomplete. Despite their tentativeness, however, they are triumphs of artistry, celebrating the mystery of the universe coupled with the insatiable and indestructible talent to fabricate, which Coleridge understood, both as practitioner and as philosopher.

Coleridge devised theories to account for the functioning of the imagination and offered inspired commentary on many other great writers, including William Shakespeare and John Milton, as well as his former collaborator, Wordsworth. For Coleridge, creativity imitated the divine act recorded in the biblical book of Genesis, not as blasphemy but as homage and as the best of which humanity was capable. Also, aesthetic value, he believed, derived from the degree to which art achieved or approached organic form rather than stylized or artificial construction. Thus, he linked art with the vitality of the living thing, which he saw as also celebrating multifaceted integrity, what he called “multeity in unity”—a phrase that sums up, as well, the varied legacy subsumed under the name of Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

THE RIME OF THE ANCIENT MARINER

First published: 1798 (collected in Lyrical Ballads, 1798)

Type of work: Poem

On a long sea voyage, a sailor kills the faithful albatross, which then brings down upon him ghostly punishment and penance.

Coleridge’s masterpiece, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, was first published as part of the Lyrical Ballads (1798), which thereby secured its position as one of the landmark poems of its age, despite its archaic ballad form. Structured as a frame narrative, the poem begins with the Mariner’s detaining a guest on his way to a wedding with the spellbinding account of a most strange ocean voyage. The Mariner tells of a southbound voyage to the Antarctic. He describes how the ship, as it clears the horizon, ominously dips below the church and below all of civilized and conventional authority, descending toward the unknown, the wild, and the hellish. Reaching the frozen, seemingly blank, polar world, the sailors call to and feed a white albatross, a large seabird, as an apparent friend or messenger from another realm. The Mariner inexplicably shoots it, sacrificing it, innocent and pure, with his crossbow (echoing Easter imagery). Thereupon, the ship idles without wind to move it while the superstitious crew grows increasingly thirsty and hangs the dead bird around the Mariner’s neck to punish him for his cruelty, which they feel in some way has stalled their trip.

At last, a ship is sighted, but it is a skeleton ship, carrying the Spectre-Woman, “Life-in-Death,” and her mate Death, who are types of avenging spirits of the albatross. The two of them toss dice to determine who will decide the fate of the Mariner’s ship, and the Woman wins. She imposes a penance on the Mariner, which begins with the death of the crew while the Mariner lives on, unable to die, unable even to sleep. Watching the now-beautiful phosphorescent water snakes, which earlier looked monstrous to him, the Mariner is impelled to bless them, and at once the albatross slides off his neck into the sea. His unconscious action restores a balance upset by his murder of the albatross, although his penance is not finished, as disembodied spirit voices assert.

The Mariner is now able to sleep, and he dreams while the ship sails home, manned by spirits animating the crew’s corpses. At length, the ship escapes the haunted universe to return to home port, but then it suddenly sinks, while the Mariner is rescued and immediately absolved of his sins, if only for a time, by the Hermit of the Wood. Nonetheless, his need for penance remains, for the Mariner must wander endlessly and solitarily, until an agony seizes him, and he in turn seizes one whom he knows must hear his tale. The Wedding Guest misses the marriage ceremony, but he has been irrevocably changed by the Mariner’s words.

The poem has given rise to a multitude of interpretations, stressing the existential, meaningless murder of the albatross in an incomprehensible world; the Christian pattern of sin, confession, and penance within a sacramental universe; the functioning of the symbolic or nightmare imagination as the Mariner’s fate unfolds; and the necessity, even the desperation, of narration. Coleridge himself after the first publication appended marginalia that recapit-ulated the poem in an effort to clarify, although what it actually did was to retell the plot at a slant and thereby distance the author, as well as the frame, from the poem's peculiar and disturbing nature, relinquishing responsibility for interpretation to each reader.

CHRISTABEL

First published: 1816 (collected in Christabel, 1816)

Type of work: Poem

The maiden Christabel finds the mysterious, serpentine Geraldine in the woods at midnight and brings her home to her castle with subsequent emotional chaos.

Christabel has two parts, written in 1797 and 1800, with the second part a distinct falling-off from the preceding. In the first part, the maiden Christabel, rather unwisely for a defenseless young girl, goes into the woods at midnight to pray for her betrothed knight, where she discovers the beautiful but evil Geraldine, who claims that she has been abandoned by five would-be rapists. At once, the idea of sexual violation comes into the poem. Christabel takes pity upon Geraldine and brings her to the home that she shares with her father, Sir Leoline. Geraldine, like evil spirits traditionally, cannot cross the threshold of the castle, so poor, duped Christabel carries her, in an ironic inversion of the marriage ritual.

Christabel brings Geraldine to her bedchamber and tells her guest about her mother's having died when she was born. They undress, Geraldine revealing her magic and mystery in an undescribed horror visible on her chest and side. Naïvely, Christabel sleeps with her visitor. In the conclusion to the first part, the narrator acknowledges that Geraldine now has Christabel at her mercy and that only the unlikely aid of the spirit of Christabel's mother can save her. Geraldine probably is a lesbian vampire, as is most persuasively argued by James Twitchell and Camille Paglia in Harold Bloom's collection of essays on Coleridge.

The second part of the poem concerns the day after the previous waking nightmare. Sir Leoline arises to note that he awakes to a world of death, which clearly characterizes the experience to which his daughter is now subject. He meets Geraldine, who discloses that she is the daughter of his youthful best friend, from whom he is now estranged. He decides to use this visit to mend fences, while the watching Christabel is reminded of how chilled she was when she touched Geraldine the night before.

Similarly, Bard Bracy, the resident poet who is by virtue of his craft gifted with the artist's intuition of truth, describes a dream that he has just had, in which Sir Leoline's pet dove, named for his daughter, has been captured by a green snake. Moreover, Christabel, under the magnetic but malevolent influence of Geraldine's serpentine eyes, reflects the same diabolic appearance, which renders Sir Leoline, interpreting it as jealousy, enraged at his evidently inhospitable child. Christabel's troubles are only just beginning, it seems, as the poem breaks off.

Coleridge talked of completing the poem, but starting as it does with the rise of evil, he was uncomfortable pursuing that to its anticipated and un-Christian triumph. It remains, then, a provocative fragment of innocence in the grasp of potent, malicious, and unconventional female sexuality.

"KUBLA KHAN"

First published: 1816 (collected in Christabel, 1816)

Type of work: Poem

In a fragment of an opium dream, the Mongol emperor builds a crystal palace; then an Abyssinian maiden and a flashing-eyed prophet reproduce it.

"Kubla Khan," tagged as a fragment, has two parts. The first is a mostly prose introduction in which Coleridge recounts the circumstances under which he composed the following lines of verse. He confesses to having fallen asleep after taking medication for a minor complaint while meditating upon a voluminous travelogue. Asleep, he dreams the images that, upon waking, he dashes down as the poem. Unfortunately, he is interrupted by a man from Porlock, a nearby town, and when he is again able to write, he recalls little more. Additionally, Coleridge announces that he is publishing this fragment, written years before, only at the behest of the deservedly famous (as he ingenuously notes) Lord Byron. Thus, in short order, Coleridge blames a book, sleep and dreams, drugs, a visitor, and Byron for this curious and cryptic poem rather than bravely taking responsibility for it himself.

Coleridge's insecurities prevented his claiming a masterpiece. The poem proper is also bipartite. Its first section describes how, godlike, Kubla Khan creates an entire world, a kind of Eden, merely by utterance. His decree animates a world of fountains and rivers, caves and gardens, energy and peace, an enchanted and hallowed place that seems to represent the origins of life, consciousness, and art. Within this Eden, conflict, a fall, is predicted, for the emperor hears ancient war prophecies.

Abruptly, the poem switches to a dream of an Abyssinian dulcimer-playing maiden singing of a holy mountain. The poet declares that, were he able to recall her song, which in a way he has just done with lines that evoke her, he would also be able to duplicate Kubla Khan's invention, which he has actually also just done in writing the foregoing, and his witnesses would attest to his inspiration, his art, and his prophecy.

What Coleridge has done is to celebrate his poetic artistry and its kinship with the creative and prophetic powers of religion and humanity's deepest desires.

BIOGRAPHIA LITERARIA

First published: 1817

Type of work: Autobiography

In an unfinished autobiography, Coleridge considers his childhood, the rules of poetry, Wordsworth's poetry, the nature of creation, and German philosophy.

Ostensibly a literary biography, Biographia Literaria: Or, Biographical Sketches of My Literary Life and Opinions, is also one of the greatest works of literary criticism. Coleridge begins by discussing his secondary education, particularly in classical poetry, under James Bowyer at Christ's Hospital Grammar School. From there, he launches a discussion of Wordsworth's poetry, to which he later returns. Coleridge takes Wordsworth at face value and applies to Wordsworth's poetry what Wordsworth in his 1800 preface to the Lyrical Ballads claimed to do. Coleridge shows that Wordsworth's protestations that his craft was the common language of common people was not strictly true, and that his poetry is nonetheless artifice, consciously crafted and not the unreflective, thoughtless speech he said it represented. Still, Coleridge argues that Wordsworth is the finest contemporary poet and an example of poetic genius. He also gives his version of the origin of the Lyrical Ballads of 1798, saying that Wordsworth was to write of natural scenes made extraordinary by his craft, while Coleridge was to write of the supernatural rendered credible by his art. This interpretation is somewhat at odds with Wordsworth's emphasis in his preface on the volume's intended singular purpose.

Coleridge also proffers his definition of imagination. He distinguishes the "primary," which he describes as the divine ability to create, the source of all animate power. The "secondary" imagination is the human ability to create through the inventive perception and recollection of images. Last is the "fancy," which is simply the ability to remember.

Coleridge, in addition, discourses at length on philosophy. Beginning with Thomas De Quincey, who was himself later similarly charged, critics have noted, censured, or excused the extensive portions of the Biographia Literaria that correspond to translations of the German philosopher Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling. Commentator Thomas McFarland has pointed out that Schelling did not consider his work to have been plagiarized and that in large measure what Coleridge was doing was registering a congruence of his thinking with that of Schelling, before both diverged in opposite directions. Moreover, McFarland notes that Coleridge fully intended to return to the manuscript later to insert his own words for the words of the German, which were at the moment merely holding a place in the text, as it were, for Coleridge's words. Alas, Coleridge never returned, never substituted, and never completed the work. Thus, it might be described most accurately as an “anatomy,” as critic Northrop Frye defines it, a congeries of digressions, meditations, and reflections, the unity of which may be unclear but the sum of which clearly exceeds its parts.

SUMMARY

Samuel Taylor Coleridge was justly celebrated during his lifetime for his wide learning and wonderful powers of conversation, which competed personally with devastating opium addiction, deep-seated miseries, and emotional insecurities. Yet he is also remembered for his poetic gifts, which enabled him to explore extraordinary worlds opened up by creative powers, and his philosophical inquiries, which attempted to account for those worlds, those powers, and his own complex self.

Laura Dabundo

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

A Sheet of Sonnets, 1796 (with W. L. Bowles, Robert Southey, and others)

Poems on Various Subjects, 1796, 1797 (with Charles Lamb and Charles Lloyd)

Lyrical Ballads, 1798 (with William Wordsworth)

The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, 1798

Christabel, 1816

Sibylline Leaves, 1817

The Complete Poetical Works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, 1912 (2 volumes; Ernest Hartley Coleridge, editor)

DRAMA:

The Fall of Robespierre, pb. 1794 (with Robert Southey)

Remorse, pr., pb. 1813 (originally Osorio)

Zapolya, pb. 1817

NONFICTION:

The Watchman, 1796

The Friend, 1809-1810, 1818

“The Statesman’s Manual,” 1816

Biographia Literaria: Or, Biographical Sketches of My Literary Life and Opinions, 1817

“A Lay Sermon,” 1817

“Treatise on Method,” 1818

Aids to Reflection, 1825

On the Constitution of the Church and State, According to the Idea of Each: With Aids Toward a Right Judgment on the Late Catholic Bill, 1830

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Were Samuel Taylor Coleridge’s health problems and remedies in any way beneficial for his literary work?
- Consider the Lyrical Ballads as a landmark work of English Romanticism.
- Consider the Lyrical Ballads as a source of subsequent conflict and confusion for its two authors.
- The Rime of the Ancient Mariner stands as a particularly long-running required poem for relatively young students. What qualities of the poem enable it to remain a more successful educational venture than some of the other curricular standbys from its time and from the nineteenth century?
- In what ways was Biographia Literaria an original work of literary criticism?
- How can Coleridge’s “conversation poems” be so justified? Was it a matter of the poet having a conversation with himself?
- What habits or circumstances sometimes prevented Coleridge from completing poems successfully?

Specimens of the Table Talk of the Late Samuel Taylor Coleridge, 1835
Letters, Conversations, and Recollections of S. T. Coleridge, 1836
Letters of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, 1855 (2 volumes; E. H. Coleridge, editor)
Coleridge's Shakespearean Criticism, 1930
Coleridge's Miscellaneous Criticism, 1936
Notebooks, 1957-1986 (4 volumes)

TRANSLATION:

Wallenstein, 1800 (of Friedrich Schiller's plays Die Piccolomini and Wallensteins Tod)

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Collected Works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, 1969-2001 (13 volumes; Kathleen Coburn et al., editors)

About the Author

Blades, John. Wordsworth and Coleridge: Lyrical Ballads. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
Bloom, Harold, ed. Samuel Taylor Coleridge: Modern Critical Views. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
Christie, William. Samuel Taylor Coleridge: A Literary Life. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
Holmes, Richard. Coleridge: Early Visions. New York: Penguin Books, 1989.
McFarland, Thomas. Romanticism and the Forms of Ruin: Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Modalities of Fragmentation. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1981.
Magnuson, Paul. Coleridge and Wordsworth: A Lyrical Dialogue. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1988.
_____. Coleridge's Nightmare Poetry. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1974.
Miller, Christopher R. The Invention of Evening: Perception and Time in Romantic Poetry. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
_____, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Coleridge. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
Perry, Seamus. Samuel Taylor Coleridge. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
Stevenson, Warren. A Study of Coleridge's Three Great Poems—"Christabel," "Kubla Khan," and "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner." Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2001.
Twitchell, James. The Living Dead: A Study of the Vampire in Romantic Literature. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1981.

Library of Congress

COLETTE

Born: Saint-Sauveur-en-Puisaye, Burgundy, France
January 28, 1873

Died: Paris, France
August 3, 1954

Colette is one of France's most popular novelists, noted especially for her depictions of love, animals, and nature.

BIOGRAPHY

Sidonie-Gabrielle Colette (kaw-LEHT) was born in Saint-Sauveur-en-Puisaye, a small town in south-west France, on January 28, 1873, to Jules-Joseph Colette and Adèle-Sidonie Landoy Robineau-Duclos. Jules-Joseph was a retired army captain turned tax collector, and his new profession led the family to Saint-Sauveur-en Puisaye. At first things went well, and Colette enjoyed a happy childhood in her easygoing, freethinking family. Jules-Joseph, however, was too easygoing; he was not very industrious, and he did not have much of a head for business. In 1890, the family was forced to sell its house and move in with Colette's older brother Achille Robineau-Duclos, a doctor in a nearby village.

It was there, in 1891, that the family received a visit from Henri Gauthiers-Villars (later known simply as "Willy"), the son of a former colleague of Jules-Joseph in the military. Willy had rejected his father's scientific orientation in favor of literature, aided by his father's contacts in the publishing industry. Willy was fifteen years older than Colette, but the age difference apparently did not pose a problem. They were engaged within the year, and in 1893 they were married. To what extent Colette was in love with Willy is a question that has preoccupied biographers ever since. It is certain that Colette had a considerable amount of difficulty leaving behind her mother, to whom she remained strongly attached, when the couple moved to Paris that year. Not much is known about the early years of Colette's marriage, but it was clearly a period of disillusionment. Willy, it transpired, was something of a philanderer and without real literary talent. Colette fell ill, no doubt partly as a result of her depression. It was Side (as Colette called her mother) who came and nursed her back to health, a further testimony to the close bond between mother and daughter.

As a way to lift Colette out of her depression, Willy suggested that she become one of his ghostwriters and write down some of her schoolgirl memories with a bit of added spice to make them sell. The first result of their collaboration, Claudine à l'école (1900; Claudine at School, 1956), was published in 1900 and became an immediate success. Willy and Colette quickly followed with Claudine à Paris (1901; Claudine in Paris, 1958) the following year, Claudine en ménage (1902; The Indulgent Husband, 1935; also translated as Claudine Married, 1960) in 1902, and finally Claudine s'en va (1903; The Innocent Wife, 1934; also translated as Claudine and Annie, 1962) the year after that. The series was a resounding success and led to a "Claudine craze" that made the authors household names.

All four novels contained a strong autobiographical element, characteristic of all Colette's work, and as the heroine Claudine evolved through each story, so, too, did Colette. Like her heroine, she had left school, got married, moved to Paris, and grown more and more independent. By 1904, Colette no longer needed Willy as coauthor and her first solo novel appeared, signed merely by "Madame Colette Willy."

Colette's new confidence and independence put increasing distance between her and Willy. The stress on their relationship was intensified by the death of Colette's father in 1905, and in 1906 the couple separated and Colette's life entered a new phase. She began appearing on the stage, notably in mime-dramas that often led to controversy because of the roles that she played. She also became involved in a relationship with the Marquise de Belboeuf (known as "Missy"), which would last for several years. During this time, Colette continued publishing, and several important novels appeared during this period, including La Retraite sentimentale (1907; Retreat from Love, 1974) and La Vagabonde (1911; The Vagabond, 1954).

In 1912, a death in the family once again precipitated a change. Colette had been living with Henri de Jouvenel, whom she had met the previous year. Henri was then a vigorous newspaper editor and a thirty-five-year-old divorcé with two children. In September, 1912, Colette's mother, Sido, died. In December, Colette married Henri, and their daughter (also named Colette) was born the following year. Family life was interrupted by World War I, but Colette continued to write, travel, and publish. Her work was recognized after the war, in 1920, when she was awarded membership in the French Legion of Honor in recognition of her contributions to literature. This award coincided with the publication of one of her best-known novels, Chéri (1920; English translation, 1929), in 1920. The novel was successfully adapted for the stage the following year.

In the early 1920's, Colette's relationship with Henri began to deteriorate. He was very busy, was having affairs with other women, and would occasionally disappear without explanation. In 1923, Colette announced her intention of divorcing him, a process completed the following year. Shortly afterward, Colette met Maurice Goudekot, a pearl dealer some eighteen years her junior, in the south of France. Although they were not married until 1935, this quickly became the central relationship in Colette's life and it would last until her death nearly thirty years later.

Colette was by now a very successful writer, with an apartment in Paris and a house near St. Tropez in the south of France. She was kept busy writing, adapting for the stage, and traveling. She published a number of novels, including Le Blé en herbe (1923; The Ripening Corn, 1931; also translated as The Ripening Seed, 1955), La Fin de Chéri (1926; The Last of Chéri, 1932), La Naissance du jour (1928; A Lesson in Love, 1932; also translated as Break of Day, 1961), and La Chatte (1933; The Cat, 1936).

Domestic and professional happiness were once again interrupted by war when the Germans invaded France in World War II. Colette left Paris briefly but returned in 1941 to endure the Occupation. She was forced to be separated from Maurice, who was first arrested by the Germans and then fled to the unoccupied zone to avoid further danger. Colette was far from idle, however, and it was during the war, in 1944, that one of her most popular works, Gigi (1944; English translation, 1952), first appeared. Published originally in a periodical in Lyon in 1942, it was published as a book in 1944 and later became an Academy Award-winning film that brought Colette an international reputation.

Gigi was the last novel that Colette would write, but she continued to receive honors. She was promoted within the Legion of Honor (she received the Grand Cross in 1953); she was elected to the Académie Goncourt (in 1945) and later became the president of that prestigious literary body; finally, when she died in Paris on August 3, 1954, she became the first French woman to be honored by a state funeral. She was, however, as controversial in death as she had sometimes been in life. The Catholic church would not permit a religious funeral because of her two divorces, a stand that generated considerable criticism.

ANALYSIS

The majority of Colette's works are so short as to call into question whether they should be labeled "novels" or "short stories." Although relying heavily on description and evocation of mood, her works are not given to prolixity. Her literary output was nevertheless quite prolific, with one edition of her complete works stretching to fifteen volumes. The consistent quality of this large volume of works, their style and themes, brought Colette popularity and recognition during her lifetime and have contributed to the maintenance and spread of her reputation since her death.

Colette was not a deep or philosophical writer, and she left no profound thesis on the meaning of her writing, but she was a keen observer of life and of nature, and she possessed a gift for turning those observations into stories that illuminated human experience with charm and humor, stories that appealed to and were admired by her vast readership. The Claudine stories illustrate the devices that initially gained for her a following and continue to entertain today. Based heavily on autobiography, the subjects of the stories are unpretentious: In the first volume of the series, the young Claudine shares her memories of schooldays, using the provincial school as a forum to observe the vagaries of human behavior. Colette would often draw on such autobiographical sources for the inspiration for her stories. For all of this, her work does not suffer from a lack of originality, for not every author shares Colette's ability to see the interest of a subject or her ability to set the scene so delicately.

Thus, in Claudine at School, the reader shares Claudine's glimpses of budding, burgeoning, and dying love, for example—a subject that might be banal in the hands of a less talented writer but that takes on a universal quality when treated by Colette. Moreover, the fact that some of these moments occur between women seems perfectly natural when presented through Claudine's eyes. All human beings are entitled to their happiness as well as to their weaknesses, and Claudine's nonjudgmental attitude illustrates Colette's talent for showing the human side of everyone. The same openness and sympathy are evident in Colette's presentation of marginal social figures such as the courtesans of Chéri and Gigi and the homosexual character Marcel, Claudine's friend in Claudine in Paris. It is also evident in the more complex Ces plaisirs (1932; better known as Le Pur et l'impur, 1941; The Pure and the Impure, 1967), a work of memoirs and biography that some critics find the most challenging of Colette's works, but which presents memories of Colette's personal acquaintances in the same nonjudgmental way.

Colette's gift for evoking credibility and sympathy is such that her ability to render human qualities extends even to animals. One of her most popular novels, The Cat, depicts a love triangle between a husband and wife (Alain and Camille) and the husband's cat, Saha. Colette depicts the bond between a man and his cat with such insight that the intrusion of a cat into a marriage does not appear at all farfetched, and the reader is quickly caught up in the tensions of the conflicting pull of emotions.

Because of the autobiographical nature of her work, many of Colette's novels are told from the perspective of a first-person narrator (again, the Claudine series offers an illustration), but a number of works are written in the third person. Even so, the narrator is not an intrusive presence, and the stories somehow seem to tell themselves. This narrative strategy and Colette's use of dialogue perhaps explain why so many of her works were successfully adapted to the stage.

Colette created a number of characters who are remembered vividly by readers. Chief among these is the figure of the gamine, the assertive but endearing girl represented by (among others) Claudine and Gigi. While Colette does not neglect male characters (the figure Chéri must certainly be mentioned here), many of her creations are women, and it is no doubt Colette's attention to the problems and intricacies of women's lives that has earned for her a large following among women readers.

CHÉRI

First published: 1920 (English translation, 1929)

Type of work: Novel

The handsome Chéri falls in love with an older courtesan, whom he leaves when his mother arranges a marriage.

One of Colette's contemporaries suggested that Chéri was one of the most important love stories ever written. Despite the many unconventional aspects of the story—love between an older woman and a younger man, the sympathetic depiction of a courtesan, and the willingness with which Chéri submits to an arranged marriage—the novel indeed remains an engrossing portrait of doomed love.

Léonie Vallon, known as Léa de Lonval, a courtesan nearing the end of her career, falls in love with Fred Peloux, known as Chéri, the son of one of her rivals. Although they live together for several years and seem to love each other, their relationship is precarious, and indeed when Chéri announces that he is going to marry Edmée for money, Léa accepts the inevitable breakup. She maintains a strong exterior so as not to give her rivals the satisfaction of seeing her pain. The reader, however, sees a different side, as the narrator shows Léa's loneliness and desperate attempts to fill the time. The reader is also made aware that Chéri is not entirely happy and comes to see—even before Chéri himself is aware of it—that Chéri misses the comfort and love of his former mistress. The climax comes after Léa returns from a mysterious vacation, and Chéri, more aware of his feelings for having missed her, shows up one night to confess his love.

A happy ending would have satisfied many readers, but Colette does not compromise for effect: After Chéri spends the night with Léa, he returns the next morning to Edmée. The bittersweet ending reveals Colette's preoccupation with harmony rather than happiness. The story achieves its resolution from the fact that Chéri realizes his true feelings. This confrontation with the past frees him to continue his relationship with Edmée in the present. Avoiding facile wish fulfillment, Colette instead offers a profound insight into human nature.

THE LAST OF CHÉRI

First published: La Fin de Chéri, 1926
(English translation, 1932)

Type of work: Novel

Chéri attempts to revive a former love, but when it fails, he commits suicide.

While the first volume of Chéri's story, set in the pre-World War I Paris of 1912, conveyed the light, carefree mood of the belle époque, The Last of Chéri has the somber, sober mood of postwar France, when many illusions had been lost. Five years have passed since Chéri left Léa, but he has been unable to find a purpose in his life to replace his lost love.

His thoughts turn back to this idealized past, as many in France also thought back to prewar days with nostalgia, and he decides to revive his relationship with Léa.

Chéri's attempt to recapture the past, however, fails. When he does see Léa again, he does not even recognize her because she has changed so much. She has stopped trying to disguise her age and appears transformed into an unattractive old woman. Significantly, when Chéri sees her, he thinks of his mother. With this realization that he cannot return to the past and yet cannot live with or in the present, Chéri resolves that the only remaining choice is suicide. In this act, he symbolically returns to his happy prewar days with Léa by surrounding himself with pictures of her as he remembers her, as a beautiful young woman, at the moment of his death.

Once again, Colette maintains a light touch in a novel that has philosophical underpinnings in its representation of human attempts to recapture the past. Chéri appears as a tragic hero who has brought about his own suffering by giving up love for money and who now pays a fatal price for his blindness, but the tragic elements never dominate the narrative. Subtle comparisons (Chéri compares Léa to the war, for example, to explain his inability to come to terms with the present), well-chosen adjectives placed for effect—these are the techniques whereby Colette suggests to her readers that the story of Chéri may have a more universal message than its unusual aspects might at first suggest.

GIGI

First published: 1944 (English translation, 1952)

Type of work: Novella

Gigi, reared to be a courtesan, instead marries the rich Gaston Lachaille.

Colette once again provides an indirect comment on contemporary France. With Paris occupied and in the grip of war, readers of Colette's Gigi are transported to a less complicated and painful time. Set in 1899, the story once again orchestrates a small but intimate cast of characters in a personal drama with a twist. The plot focuses on the “gamine” character of Gigi (a nickname for Gilberte), a young woman who has been reared by her grandmother and great-aunt to follow in their profession as a courtesan. They hope to make her the mistress of Gaston Lachaille, but Gigi instead becomes his wife. This conclusion introduces an ironic twist. In the conventional love story, the resolution of the plot through marriage is usually the desired outcome, but in Gigi marriage appears as a frustration rather than a fulfillment of plans. The story serves as a light-hearted reminder that the best laid plans may go astray, especially if love is involved.

In once again portraying the charm and humor of an independent and mischievous adolescent,

Colette comes full circle in her career, ending her writing with a character very similar to the one who made her reputation, Claudine. It is through her ebullience and love of life that Gigi wins Gaston’s true affection, a message of optimism and faith in the power of love.

SUMMARY

Colette’s state funeral was a symbol of the popularity that her works had gained by the time of her death. Her numerous works of fiction were accessible and highly readable, yet they presented a unique perspective on everyday human problems and experiences. From the girlish figures of Claudine and Gigi to the lonely old women such as Léa, from finely drawn tragic figures such as Chéri to the almost human Saha, Colette’s characters are memorable individuals. Her twists on conventional love stories are imaginative and frequently more complex than their superficial simplicity and light tone would suggest.

Melanie Hawthorne

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Claudine à l’école*, 1900 (Claudine at School, 1956)
- Claudine à Paris*, 1901 (Claudine in Paris, 1958)
- Claudine en ménage*, 1902 (The Indulgent Husband, 1935; also known as Claudine Married, 1960)
- Claudine s’en va*, 1903 (The Innocent Wife, 1934; also known as Claudine and Annie, 1962)
- La Retraite sentimentale*, 1907 (Retreat from Love, 1974)
- L’Ingénue Libertine*, 1909 (The Gentle Libertine, 1931; also known as The Innocent Libertine)
- La Vagabonde*, 1911 (The Vagabond, 1954)
- L’Entrave*, 1913 (Recaptured, 1932; better known as The Shackle)
- Mitsou: Ou, Comment l’esprit vient aux filles*, 1919 (Mitsou: Or, How Girls Grow Wise, 1930)
- Chéri*, 1920 (English translation, 1929)
- Le Blé en herbe*, 1923 (The Ripening Corn, 1931; also known as The Ripening Seed, 1955)
- La Fin de Chéri*, 1926 (The Last of Chéri, 1932)
- La Naissance du jour*, 1928 (A Lesson in Love, 1932; also known as Break of Day, 1961)
- La Seconde*, 1929 (The Other One, 1931)
- La Chatte*, 1933 (The Cat, 1936)
- Duo*, 1934 (English translation, 1974; also known as The Married Lover)
- Le Toutounier*, 1939 (English translation, 1974)
- Julie de Carneilhan*, 1941 (English translation, 1952)
- Gigi*, 1944 (English translation, 1952)
- Seven by Colette*, 1955 (includes short fiction)

SHORT FICTION:

Les Villes de la vigne, 1908 (The Tendrils of the Vine, 1983)
L'Envers du music-hall, 1913 (Music-Hall Sidelights, 1957)
La Chambre éclairée, 1920
La Femme cachée, 1924 (The Other Woman, 1971)
Bella-Vista, 1937 (English translation, 1996)
Chambre d'hôtel, 1940 (Chance Acquaintances, 1952)
Le Képi, 1943
Gigi et autres nouvelles, 1944
La Fleur de l'âge, 1949 (In the Flower of the Age, 1983)
The Stories of Colette, 1958 (also known as The Tender Shoot, and Other Stories)
Paysage et portraits, 1958
Contes des mille et un matins, 1970 (The Thousand and One Mornings, 1973)
The Collected Stories of Colette, 1983

DRAMA:

Chéri, pb. 1922 (with Léopold Marchand; English adaptation, 1959)
L'Enfant et les sortilèges, pb. 1925 (opera; music by Maurice Ravel; The Boy and the Magic, 1964)
Gigi, pr., pb. 1952 (adaptation of her novel; with Anita Loos)

ANIMAL VIGNETTES AND DIALOGUES:

Dialogues de bêtes, 1904 (Creature Conversations, 1951)
Sept dialogues de bêtes, 1905 (Barks and Purrs, 1913)
Prrou, Poucette, et quelques autres, 1913 (Other Creatures, 1951)
La Paix chez les bêtes, 1916 (revision of Prrou, Poucette, et quelques autres; Cats, Dogs, and I, 1924)
Douze Dialogues de bêtes, 1930 (Creatures Great and Small, 1951)
Chats, 1936
Splendeur des papillons, 1937
Chats de Colette, 1949

NONFICTION:

Les Heures longues, 1914-1917, 1917
Dans la foule, 1918
La Maison de Claudine, 1922 (My Mother's House, 1953)
Le Voyage égoïste, 1922 (Journey for Myself: Selfish Memories, 1971)
Sido, 1929 (English translation, 1953)
Histoires pour Bel-Gazou, 1930
Prisons et paradis, 1932
Paradis terrestres, 1932
Ces Plaisirs, 1932 (better known as Le Pur et l'impur, 1941; The Pure and the Impure, 1967)
La Jumelle noire, 1934-1938
Mes apprentissages, 1936 (My Apprenticeships, 1957)
Mes cahiers, 1941
Journal à rebours and De ma fenêtre, 1941, 1942, respectively (translated together as Looking Backwards, 1975)
Flore et Pomone, 1943

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Few authors begin their career as coauthors, as did Colette. How did this early experience benefit her career?
- Colette is well known for her gamins, of whom Gigi is probably best known to Americans because of the film based on the story. By what means can an author contrive characters both “assertive” and “endearing”?
- To what extent was Colette, by then a senior citizen, able to convey successfully the era of the Nazi invasion of France in World War II?
- In what ways did Colette’s nation far exceed the United States in honoring a literary woman with a sensational personal reputation?
- Is Colette open to the charge of repetitive plotting of her fiction?

Colette

Nudité, 1943

Trois . . . Six . . . Neuf, 1944

Belles Saisons, 1945

Une Amitié inattendue: Correspondance de Colette et de Francis Jammes, 1945

L'Étoile vespér, 1946 (The Evening Star, 1973)

Pour un herbier, 1948 (For a Flower Album, 1959)

Le Fanal bleu, 1949 (The Blue Lantern, 1963)

Places, 1970 (in English; includes short sketches unavailable in a French collection)

Letters from Colette, 1980

MISCELLANEOUS:

Œuvres complètes de Colette, 1948-1950 (15 volumes)

The Works, 1951-1964 (17 volumes)

About the Author

Cottrell, Robert D. Colette. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1974.

Crosland, Margaret. Colette: The Difficulty of Loving. London: Peter Owen, 1973.

Cummins, Laurel. Colette and the Conquest of Self. Birmingham, Ala.: Summa, 2005.

Eisinger, Erica M., and Mari Ward McCarty, eds. Colette: The Woman, the Writer. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1981.

Kristeva, Julia. Colette. Translated by Jane Marie Todd. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.

Lucey, Michael. Never Say I: Sexuality and the First Person in Colette, Gide, and Proust. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2006.

Massie, Allan. Colette. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin Books, 1986.

Peebles, Catherine M. The Psyche of Feminism: Sand, Colette, Sarraute. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 2004.

Richardson, Joanna. Colette. London: Methuen, 1983.

Sarde, Michèle. Colette: Free and Fettered. New York: Morrow, 1980.

Stewart, Joan Hinde. Colette. Updated ed. Boston: Twayne, 1996.

Library of Congress

WILLIAM CONGREVE

Born: Bardsey, Yorkshire, England

January 24, 1670

Died: London, England

January 19, 1729

Congreve is considered the most brilliant of the Restoration dramatists, a writer who used sharp wit, vision, and comic dialogue to expose the hypocrisies of society.

BIOGRAPHY

William Congreve (KAWN-greev) was born in Bardsey, Yorkshire, England, on January 24, 1670. In 1674, his father, William, an army officer, was stationed in Ireland. Congreve was sent to school in Kilkenny, where he met Jonathan Swift, the future satirist. The two formed a lifelong friendship. In 1686, Congreve entered Trinity College, Dublin, earning his M.A. in 1696. Around 1688, the family moved to the Congreve home at Stretton, Staffordshire, where Congreve's father was estate agent to the earl of Cork. Congreve entered Middle Temple, London, to read law in 1691, but he soon abandoned his studies to write. He produced a light novel, Incognita: Or, Love and Duty Reconcil'd, in 1692. The following March, Congreve was catapulted to fame with the production of The Old Bachelor (pr., pb. 1693), a play he wrote to amuse himself while recovering from an illness. It was an enormous success, highly praised by the poet and essayist John Dryden, who remained an enthusiastic supporter of Congreve's work.

His next play, The Double-Dealer (pr. 1693, pb. 1694), opened later in 1693. Though now considered a much better play than his first, it was unpopular with audiences of the time. Love for Love followed in 1695, enjoying great success as the first performance staged for the new theater in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Congreve became one of the managers of the theater, promising to write a new play every year—a promise that he failed to keep. The year 1696 saw publication of Congreve's essay "A Letter Concerning Humour in Comedy."

By now, Congreve was firmly established as a man of letters. The government rewarded him with a salaried position somewhat of the nature of a sinecure. He was made a commissioner for licensing hackney coaches—the first of several undemanding yet lucrative civil service posts that he accumulated throughout his life. In 1697, a tragedy, The Mourning Bride (pr., pb. 1697), was produced at Lincoln's Inn Fields theater. In 1698, Jeremy Collier published a vicious attack on Congreve in A Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage. Congreve replied with his Amendments of Mr. Collier's False and Imperfect Citations (1698). Two years later, in March, 1700, Lincoln's Inn Fields produced Congreve's greatest work, The Way of the World (pr., pb. 1700). In spite of a brilliant cast, the play was poorly received. Congreve is said to have appeared onstage at the end to rebuke the audience.

Congreve never wrote another full-length play, though he did produce other work: a masque, The Judgement of Paris (pr., pb. 1701); an opera, Semele (pb. 1710, pr. 1744); a prose tale; and several unremarkable poems. The Collier attack and the cold reception given The Way of the World are often cited as reasons for his early retirement from writing for the stage. Other contributing factors may have been poor health—he suffered from gout—and his affluence. His civil service posts, added to a private income, meant that he did not need the modest earnings that his plays had generated.

Some scholars suggest that Congreve had always placed a higher priority on cultivating high society than on writing. They cite an occasion in 1726 when the French writer Voltaire came to request an audience with Congreve and was granted it only on the condition that he be considered a “gentleman” rather than a playwright. Voltaire replied in disgust that if that were the case, he would not have bothered to visit. Congreve’s remark is, however, open to interpretations other than the snobbery imputed to him by Voltaire. It could as easily have been prompted by weariness caused by illness and a reluctance to defend and explain plays written more than twenty years previously. Indeed, Congreve was known for his constant and warm friendships with people from all social circles, from his early companions in Ireland to the nobility of England. His literary friends (including Swift, John Dryden, the poet Alexander Pope, and dramatist John Gay) were unanimous in their warm praise of his character, as well as his writing.

Congreve never married, but his mistress of many years was the actress Anne Bracegirdle, who played many of his female leads. In his later years, he formed a devoted attachment to Henrietta, second duchess of Marlborough, and it is probable that he fathered her second daughter, Lady Mary Godolphin, later duchess of Leeds. Congreve never fully recovered from a carriage accident in Bath in 1728, and he died in London on January 19 the following year. He left two hundred pounds to Anne Bracegirdle and the rest of his large fortune to the duchess of Marlborough.

ANALYSIS

Congreve has become known as the most brilliantly witty of the group of Restoration dramatists that included Dryden, George Etherege, and William Wycherley. Restoration drama is a comedy of manners showing a metropolitan society in pursuit of pleasure. It takes a satirical view of the hypocrisy, sexual freedom, and moral degradation of the sophisticated class of people that would have formed its audience. Congreve’s characters are variations on Restoration stock types: On one side, there are the fools, including “coxcombs,” “fops” (vain, self-deluded followers of fashion), and dullards pretending to wit. In this category also are the predatory old men and women who set their sights on handsome young spouses. On the other side of the fence are the people of sense—characters who carry the audience’s sympathy because they have a higher degree of awareness of self and others and a genuine wit.

The desired outcome in these plays is the marriage between a young couple of sense and their secure possession of the fortune due to them. Working against this desired outcome are schemes engineered by the old, deluded, or wicked against the young couple. The prizes at stake are a young and handsome spouse and the fortune. Sometimes the fortune is already in the possession of the young person, becoming part of the prize. More often, it is still in the control of the old and foolish and will only descend to the young person at the old person’s discretion.

The Double-Dealer and The Way of the World are remarkable among Restoration comedies; though they feature many brilliantly caricatured schemers driven by folly and weakness, such characters are not the primary engineers of trouble. Instead, the seeds of evil are sown and tended by villains of almost tragic status—Maskwell in The Double-Dealer and Mrs. Marwood (and, to a less intense degree, Fainall) in The Way of the World. Characters such as Lady Touchwood and Lady Wishfort, powerful though they be in their ability to frustrate the desired outcome, are instruments in the hands of these grand destroyers of happiness.

Many of Congreve’s characters are drawn with a complexity and insight not seen in other plays of the type. The witty “whirlwind” character of Millamant in The Way of the World remains a challenge for any actress. Foolish characters evoke pathos even as they do laughter—for example, Lady Wishfort in The Way of the World, with her hopeless attempts at reconstructing her long-lost beauty by artificial means, and Sir Paul Plyant in The Double-Dealer, nightly swaddled in blankets that prevent him from fathering the son for whom he longs. More than any other Restoration dramatist, Congreve saw the tragedy underlying the ridiculousness of his subjects.

In the world of Congreve’s plays, values are inverted, and characters pretend to be the opposite of what they really are. Mirabell’s epigrammatic couplet at the end of the first act of The Way of the World summarizes this unnatural moral condition: “Where modesty’s ill-manners, ’tis but fit/ That impudence and malice pass for wit.” Hence, in The Double Dealer; Brisk's obsession with his "wit" belies his true status as a "pert coxcomb"; Lady Plyant's harping on her "honour" as she capitulates without much resistance to Careless's seduction reveals her promiscuity. The constant abuse of such terms by hypocritical or foolish characters makes them gain ironic weight at every repetition. The pointedness and brilliance of Congreve's wit have remained unrivaled, except possibly in the plays of Oscar Wilde three centuries later. Congreve's dialogue has a rhythm, cadence, and rhetorical structure at times approaching the status of poetry.

THE DOUBLE-DEALER

First produced: 1693 (first published, 1694)

Type of work: Play

In a sophisticated social circle of fops, wits, fools, and hypocrites, two schemers try to foil the intention of a young couple to marry.

The action of The Double-Dealer is governed by the Machiavellian schemes of Maskwell and the manipulative Lady Touchwood, with whom he is in league. Maskwell and Lady Touchwood both want to break the intended match between the innocent couple Cynthia and Mellefont—Maskwell, because he wants Cynthia for himself, and Lady Touchwood, because she wants Mellefont for herself. Most of the characters' lives revolve around hidden motives, secret intrigues, and deception. Nobody, except Mellefont and Cynthia, is what he or she seems. Sir Paul and Lady Plyant pretend to the world to be the happiest married couple; Lady Plyant pretends to her husband that she is too chaste to grant him her sexual favors, while enthusiastically pursuing intrigues with others. The fop Brisk sets himself up as a wit; the giggling Lord Froth affects solemnity; the vacuous Lady Froth sees herself as a writer of heroic epic poems.

The supreme embodiment of deception is Maskwell. He pretends to be Mellefont's loyal friend, defending him against Lady Touchwood's plotting and supporting the marriage with Cynthia. In fact, he is using every weapon in his armory to discredit Mellefont in the eyes of his uncle and benefactor-to-be, Lord Touchwood, and his bride's parents, Sir Paul and Lady Plyant. Such is Maskwell's skill that he prevails upon the unwitting Mellefont to conspire in his own undoing: In a seeming effort to put an end to Lady Touchwood's activities, Maskwell suggests that Mellefont appear in her bedroom at a time calculated to compromise her; Maskwell, however, ensures that it is Mellefont who is compromised and risks the wrath of Lord Touchwood. Neither Mellefont nor anyone else sees through Maskwell's guise until Cynthia points out a discrepancy in his instructions to her and Mellefont toward the end of the play. Others are also fooled: Lord Touchwood almost disinherits Mellefont in favor of Maskwell; and, ironically, Lady Touchwood herself mistakenly believes that Maskwell is motivated by his attachment and obligations to her.

Maskwell creates a labyrinth of confusion, symbolized by the many references to private stairs, hidden passages, and back ways and put into words by the baffled Mellefont: "I am confounded in a maze of thoughts, each leading into one another, and all ending in perplexity." Maskwell's controlling genius lies in his ability to play upon the desires and weaknesses of his dupes. As he says, those who want to be deceived will be, "and, if they will not hear the serpent's hiss, they must be stung into experience, and future caution." The theme of willful self-deception is strong. Even when Sir Paul has written evidence of his wife's intended infidelity thrust into his hands, he is eager to swallow the hastily engineered explanation provided by her and Careless. Once again Sir Paul submits to being swaddled in blankets in the marital bed.

The unpopularity of The Double-Dealer in and after Congreve's time may have been attributable to unease at the extreme nature of the evil represented in it. Maskwell's coolness and single-mindedness in plotting evil, his flawless mask of honesty and loyalty, and his unrepentant silence after his villainy is finally unmasked recall William Shakespeare's villain Iago in Othello, the Moor of Venice (pr. 1604, pb. 1622) and place him beyond the conventions of Restoration comedy. Lady Touchwood, too, attains a sinister status beyond that of a hot-tempered woman scorned; in the scene with Mellefont in her chamber at the end of act 4, against all odds she makes herself appear innocent and Mellefont appear the criminal in Lord Touchwood's eyes. As she leaves, she turns and smiles malevolently at Mellefont—a truly spine-chilling image.

That this uncompromising sense of evil was intentionally created by Congreve is suggested by constant references to witchcraft, possession, and the devil used in connection with Maskwell and Lady Touchwood. The good-evil polarity is reinforced by the strong visual symbolism of the final expulsion of Maskwell and Lady Touchwood by Mellefont and Lord Touchwood dressed in parsons' costumes. The schemers are undone by their own machinations, in the absence of any conscious campaign on the part of the good characters, and the young couple are free to marry. As Brisk says, Love and Murder will out—in the unfoldment of time and by the workings of Providence.

THE WAY OF THE WORLD

First produced: 1700 (first published, 1700)

Type of work: Play

A deceiver in league with his lover plots to prevent the marriage between Mirabell and Millamant and to secure Millamant's fortune.

The Way of the World is generally viewed as the supreme example of its genre. Its characters—the vengeful and ultimately pathetic Lady Wishfort, the sparring lovers Mirabell and Millamant, the dark and devious Mrs. Marwood—remain in the mind long after the play is over. The complexities and subtleties of relationships are observed with a keen psychological insight: the domineering nature of Lady Wishfort turning to abject dependence on her mentor Mrs. Marwood; the carefully manipulated shifts of power between Fainall and Mrs. Marwood; and the passionate attraction between Mirabell and Millamant, disguised beneath a covering of mockery and indifference.

As in The Double-Dealer, covert motives and hypocrisy govern the action of the play. Old Lady Wishfort has loved Mirabell since he pretended to love her in order to woo her niece Millamant: Her ostensible motivation in opposing the young couple's marriage is to protect her daughter from a deceiver, but her actual motivation is to avenge herself on Mirabell. Mirabell counters with an equally underhanded plan to foil Lady Wishfort's plots with a decoy—his servant Waitwell disguised as wealthy suitor Sir Rowland. Waitwell is to prepare to marry Lady Wishfort, and Mirabell is to reveal his servant's true identity and release her from the match on condition that she release Millamant's fortune and grant Mirabell her hand in marriage.

Mrs. Marwood, at the center of the scheming, exploits Lady Wishfort's dislike of Mirabell to pursue her own ends. Her ostensible desire throughout is to protect Lady Wishfort's interests. Her actual desire, however, is to fan the flames of Lady Wishfort's fury against Mirabell and to persuade her to disinherit Millamant in favor of Fainall, Mrs. Marwood's lover. Fainall, meanwhile, means to denounce his wife (Lady Wishfort's daughter) publicly for infidelity with Mirabell in an effort to blackmail Lady Wishfort into making over Mrs. Fainall's estate to him. The blatant hypocrisy of his scheme becomes evident in the light of his true motivation: to have his wife's fortune under the control of himself and his mistress, Mrs. Marwood. Congreve depicts a constant satirical tension between outward self and inward self, between the mask and the face behind it.

Deception is not only an interface between the characters and the world; it also serves to illustrate the characters' view of themselves. Lady Wishfort's attempt to turn back the years by painting herself a new face is an image whose symbolism reverberates throughout the play. It is a visual illustration of the affectations in which the foolish characters indulge. In the same vein, Petulant pays prostitutes to hire a coach and call on him in order to give the impression that he is in demand among ladies; and Mrs. Marwood makes a great show of hating men even while her actions are motivated by desire for them. All these characters are, metaphorically speaking, painting their own faces—cultivating appearances that are at odds with reality. Hence, Mirabell's premarital condition to Millamant—"I article, that you continue to like your own face, as long as I shall, and while it passes current with me, that you endeavour not to new-coin it"—suggests a conscious rejection of the affectation and pretense that characterize the foolish sector of society.

The appearance of the unsophisticated, country-bred Sir Wilful Witwoud shows the extent to which this world has become divorced from the natural order. Lady Wishfort condemns his uncouth manners as barbaric—though shortly afterward she displays true cold-blooded barbarity in her relish at the prospect of Mirabell's slowly starving to death. The metropolitan Witwoud disowns his brother (Sir Wilful Witwoud) because it is not fashionable to acknowledge relations in town. One treasures Sir Wilful's ingenuous response to Witwoud's snub: "The fashion's a fool; and you're a fop, dear brother."

Mirabell and Millamant, with their wit and good sense, stand in contrast to the fops and fools. They embrace the pleasures of the town—indeed, Millamant is uncompromising in her disdain for the country—yet are not blind to its folly. The famous scene in which Mirabell and Millamant barter conditions and provisos for their life together shows a couple who see their world as it is and prefer not to waste time pretending it is otherwise. It is significant that Mirabell's clear-sighted, if cynical, understanding of "the way of the world" helps him foil the plot against Mrs. Fainall and restore himself to Lady Wishfort's good graces. Lacking faith in Fainall's integrity, Mirabell had previously ensured that Mrs. Fainall's estate was made over to him in trust, making her husband's claim on it ineffective. Lady Wishfort is happy to offer Millamant to Mirabell in exchange for her daughter's honor and fortune intact, and the prospect of their marriage makes a satisfying resolution to this complex plot.

SUMMARY

The satirical vision and pointed wit of William Congreve's plays expose the hypocrisy, affectation, and moral degradation of the affluent society of his time. The extreme complexity of his plots makes his plays notoriously difficult to follow on the page. It is on the stage that their superbly entertaining quality is most evident: The rapid-fire wit of the dialogue, lively action, and psychological truth of the characterization carry the audience through labyrinthine twists and turns of plot. Indeed, the plays' complex form aptly reflects the confusion created by the manipulative and self-deceiving characters, for whom no word or action is straightforward, simple, or what it seems. In Congreve's universe, inverted or perverted values predominate, but truth and good sense must finally prevail.

Claire Robinson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

The Old Bachelor, pr., pb. 1693

The Double-Dealer, pr. 1693, pb. 1694

Love for Love, pr., pb. 1695

The Mourning Bride, pr., pb. 1697

The Way of the World, pr., pb. 1700

The Judgement of Paris, pr., pb. 1701 (masque)

Squire Trelooby, pr., pb. 1704 (with Sir John Vanbrugh and William Walsh; adaptation of Molière's Monsieur de Pourceaugnac)

Semele, pb. 1710 (libretto), pr. 1744 (modified version)

The Complete Plays of William Congreve, pb. 1967 (Herbert Davis, editor)

William Congreve

LONG FICTION:

Incognita: Or, Love and Duty Reconcil'd, 1692 (novella)

POETRY:

"To Mr. Dryden on His Translation of Persius," 1693

Poems upon Several Occasions, 1710

NONFICTION:

Amendments of Mr. Collier's False and Imperfect Citations, 1698

William Congreve: Letters and Documents, 1964 (John C. Hodges, editor)

TRANSLATIONS:

Ovid's Art of Love, Book III, 1709

Ovid's Metamorphoses, 1717 (with John Dryden and Joseph Addison)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Examen Poeticum, 1693

The Works of Mr. William Congreve, 1710

The Complete Works of William Congreve, 1923 (reprint, 1964; Montague Summers, editor; 4 volumes)

About the Author

Dawson, Mark S. Gentility and the Comic Theatre of Late Stuart London. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.

Lindsay, Alexander, and Howard Erskine-Hall, eds. William Congreve: The Critical Heritage. New York: Routledge, 1989.

Lyons, Patrick, ed. Congreve Comedies: A Selection of Critical Essays. London: Macmillan, 1982.

Morris, Brian, ed. William Congreve. Totowa, N.J.: Rowman & Littlefield, 1972.

Novak, Maximillian E. "The 'Fashionable Cutt of the Town' and William Congreve's The Old Batchelour." In Eighteenth-Century Contexts: Historical Inquiries in Honor of Philip Harth, edited by Howard D. Weinbrot, Peter J. Schakel, and Stephen E. Karian. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2001.

Owen, Susan J. A Companion to Restoration Drama. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2001.

Van Voris, W. H., ed. The Cultivated Stance: The Designs of Congreve's Plays. Dublin: Dolmen Press, 1965.

Williams, Aubrey L., ed. An Approach to Congreve. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1979.

Young, Douglas M. The Feminist Voices in Restoration Comedy: The Virtuous Women in the Play-Worlds of Etherege, Wycherley, and Congreve. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1997.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- With William Congreve, comic drama in Restoration England reached a high point. In what manner does this theater mirror the rejection of Puritan values under the later Stuart kings?
- What was Congreve's point in having his characters cultivate appearances at odds with reality?
- Consider the appropriateness of Congreve's title The Way of the World.
- Was Congreve a moralist? Explain your response.
- Since a reader can go back and study the text of a drama, how can you explain the assertion that the complexity of Congreve's drama is more difficult for the reader than the playgoer to understand?

Library of Congress

JOSEPH CONRAD

Born: near Berdyczów, Podolia, Poland (now Berdychiv, Ukraine)
December 3, 1857

Died: Oswalds, Bishopsbourne, England
August 3, 1924

One of the most original and innovative writers of English prose, Conrad was a pioneer of the psychological novel, and his characters reflect the moral dilemmas of the modern world.

BIOGRAPHY

Joseph Conrad was born in Poland, spent much of his childhood in Russian exile with his parents, was orphaned at an early age and reared by his uncle, lived as a young man in France, and then, after a career with the British merchant marine, became one of the major writers in English literature. He lived a life as adventurous as that portrayed in any of his novels, and, in fact, many of the episodes of Conrad's later fiction were rooted in his own experiences.

He was born near Berdyczów on December 3, 1857, and christened Józef Teodor Konrad Nałęcz Korzeniowski. Conrad was particularly proud of his ancestry, which, rooted in the Polish nobility, had a long and distinguished history. Apollo Korzeniowski, his father, was a Polish intellectual and writer whose works included original verse and translations of William Shakespeare. Apollo Korzeniowski was also a fervent Polish patriot at a time when Poland was a part of the Russian Empire. In 1861, his activities with the Polish independence movement caused his arrest and exile by Czarist authorities. He, along with his wife Ewa and his young son, Józef, was sent to Vologda, a dismal town northeast of Moscow.

At Vologda, the climate was severe and living conditions were harsh. Ewa, who suffered from tuberculosis, died in April, 1865, when Józef was only seven years old. A few years later, Apollo was released from exile because of his own ill health. Shortly after returning to his native Poland, he died, and at eleven years old Józef was left to the care of his maternal uncle. Fortunately, the uncle was a kindly man who provided for Józef's education and supported him for many years.

Because of his painful memories and his own intense Polish patriotism, Conrad found life in occupied Poland unbearable; when doctors recommended a seaside environment to improve his health, he gladly moved to Marseilles, France, in October, 1874.

In Marseilles, he lived on funds from his uncle and made several voyages as a sailor on French ships. In 1877, he was part of an attempt to smuggle weapons to royalist rebels in Spain, a cause that excited his romantic nature, but their plot was betrayed and the vessel, the Tremolino, had to be deliberately run aground to avoid capture.

About this time Conrad seems to have had an unhappy love affair. The details are unclear and not totally convincing, but in the spring of the following year Conrad attempted suicide. The cause may have been his unhappy romantic attachment, or it may have been the loss of all of his money while gambling at Monte Carlo. Whatever the reason, the wound was minor, and within a month he was able to sign aboard his first English ship, the Mavis. On April 24, 1878, Józef Korzeniowski, soon to be known as Joseph Conrad, became an English sailor. He would remain with the British merchant marine for the next seventeen years, serving on eighteen different vessels, rising through the ranks as second mate, first mate, and finally captain, commanding the Otago, in 1888. He became a British citizen in 1886.

During these voyages, Conrad traveled to the settings that inspired his later stories. In 1883, he was second mate on board the Palestine, which caught fire and later sank, leaving the crew to survive in open boats until it reached land. The events are brilliantly re-created by Conrad in his short story "Youth." In 1890, Conrad was in the Belgian Congo as part of a European trading company but left before the year had ended. His health was seriously weakened by malaria, and his psychological and moral senses were severely shaken by the ruthless, amoral exploitation of the natives by Europeans desperate for ivory. These experiences remained with Conrad for many years and found their powerful, searing expression in the short novel Heart of Darkness (serial, 1899; book, 1902).

Conrad had grown increasingly despondent about his opportunities in the merchant marine. Although he was a competent, even outstanding officer, commands were difficult to obtain and the financial rewards were small. Conrad concluded that his seafaring career was unsuccessful; he had already started work on his first novel, Almayer's Folly (1895). In January, 1894, Conrad ended his seagoing career, determined to make his living as a writer. Almayer's Folly gained favorable critical notice, mostly for its exotic setting and characters. Conrad's next work, An Outcast of the Islands (1896), seemed to mark him as a talented but perhaps limited author of exotic romances. With the appearance of The Children of the Sea: A Tale of the Forecastle (1897; republished as The Nigger of the Narcissus: A Tale of the Sea, 1898), however, the literary world was forced to take note of a new and strikingly original talent.

After the turmoil and adventures of his earlier life, Conrad's middle and later years were relatively peaceful and uneventful, marred only by tight financial conditions, a situation not uncommon for writers. Conrad settled at Pent Farm in Kent with his wife Jessie George, to whom he was married on March 24, 1896. The Conrads had two sons, Alfred Borys and John Alexander. The family life of the Conrads does not appear to have been especially close, largely because of Conrad's own innate reserve and aloofness. He was also plagued by bouts of severe illness and the anguish of composition, which, for him, could be almost unbearable.

As an author, Conrad was critically acknowledged but not popular until fairly late in his career. Classic novels such as Lord Jim (1900), Nostromo (1904), or Under Western Eyes (1911) had relatively modest sales. Even collaboration with the well-known English author Ford Madox Ford failed to bring wide sales. To supplement his income, Conrad frequently contributed short fiction to popular magazines, and eight volumes of these stories were collected and published during Conrad's lifetime.

It was not until 1913 that Conrad wrote his first truly popular work, Chance (pb. 1913). Ironically, many literary critics have marked this novel as the beginning of his decline as an artist. Its success, however, gave Conrad financial stability, and in 1919 he moved to a country estate at Oswalds, near Canterbury, England. It was there that Conrad spent the remaining years of his life. He declined a knighthood in 1924, and that same year, after a long struggle with ill health, died in Oswalds of a heart attack on August 3. He was buried at Canterbury.

ANALYSIS

Conrad is notable for three major contributions to English and world literature: his unique style, his addition of new settings and genres to serious writing, and his creation of the psychological story. Conrad's style is remarkable, not least because he was already an adult by the time he had learned to speak and write English. In early works such as Almayer's Folly, or An Outcast of the Islands, the descriptions of jungle or exotic landscapes are remarkable for their precision and detail. In the short story "The Lagoon," the landscape itself becomes a character in the tale rather than merely a setting or background.

The early stories, as critics have noted, tend to be static and somewhat slow-moving, and Conrad's style accounts for much of this, especially his extensive descriptions. These tendencies, however, were refined by Conrad as his career developed so that his language, still using numerous modifiers, was able to express action concisely and vividly. His mature style is capable of both description and action, so that a story such as "Youth" easily combines rousing action at sea with delicate, almost elegiac memories.

Conrad's second contribution to modern literature was his introduction of new settings and types of novels, which extended the range of literature. Conrad used exotic locations, such as the Far East, the African jungle, or the Caribbean, which had traditionally been reserved for light romantic or escapist fiction, and made them the settings for serious literature. This device also allowed Conrad to develop his characteristic themes in appropriate settings, most notably the confrontation of conflicting moral and ethical codes.

Conrad also expanded literature by creating political fiction—or more specifically, what might be termed the spy novel. In works such as The Secret Agent (1907) and Under Western Eyes, Conrad literally established this particular genre of literature, creating the prototypical characters and situation that have remained constant through the work of such later authors as Graham Greene and John le Carré. Conrad's novels of espionage and intrigue are always more than exciting adventures because they inevitably contain considerations of deep moral and ethical dilemmas, highlighted by the shadowy situation in which the characters are placed.

The emphasis on the interior lives of his characters, on their hidden motivations and desires, is undoubtedly Conrad's most famous and lasting accomplishment. Working at a time when Sigmund Freud's writings and other psychological theories were opening new aspects of human personality, Conrad in his stories and novels delved deeply into facets and features that earlier fiction had either neglected or treated briefly and often superficially.

Conrad's single greatest achievement was his virtual creation of the psychological story, in which the interior lives of the characters achieve an immediacy and importance comparable to actual life. In stories such as "The Secret Sharer" or Heart of Darkness, the events are filtered through the perceptions and minds of characters who are changed by what they see and experience. The novel Lord Jim, one of Conrad's most famous and impressive works, contains many vivid and exciting scenes, but its essential action is internal and takes place within the mind and soul of its title character.

Even when Conrad's stories are spread across a vast canvas with a number of characters, as is the case with Nostromo, much, if not most, of the key action remains internal and psychological. In this fashion, Conrad's works are not simply stories of adventure but contain full and fully believable human beings whose actions, however exciting or unusual, still spring from recognizable human impulses and causes.

LORD JIM

First published: 1900

Type of work: Novel

Having failed his own inner moral code in a moment of crisis, a man struggles to redeem himself.

Lord Jim, Conrad's most famous work, is also his most extensive examination of a persistent theme: the conflict between an individual's inner moral code and his or her outward actions. Throughout Conrad's short stories and novels, his characters are often afraid, even obsessed, with the concern of how their personal standards will bear up under the stress of events. This situation is explicit in Lord Jim. As a young boy learning the sailor's craft, Jim is certain he will meet the test of moral courage, but later, while serving as a first mate on the Patna, an old, unseaworthy steamer carrying Moslem pilgrims across the Indian Ocean, he fails the test. The Patna strikes an unknown object in the night and seems ready to sink. The crew, including Jim, abandons the ship and its passengers. When the drifting Patna is discovered and the events are revealed, Jim becomes an outcast, both literally and morally.

These events occur quickly, and the bulk of the novel consists of Jim's personal and moral redemption. For a while, he drifts from port to port, leaving when his identity is discovered. Finally, he abandons the world of Europeans altogether and heads upriver to a small Malay village. Even there, however, he finds he cannot escape the demands of his sensitive moral feelings and must prove to himself that he is not a coward.

Jim's early efforts win praise, especially when he rids the countryside of the notorious bandit, Sherif Ali. Yet this is not enough for Jim, who intuitively senses that his honor has not been restored nor his moral balance satisfied. That occurs only at the end of the novel, after Jim has inadvertently caused the death of a Malay friend, the son of a powerful local chief. Knowing that it will mean his own death, Jim accepts his responsibility without hesitation or fear, and his action redeems the long years of exile caused by his moment of fear and indecision on the Patna.

Such a relatively simple tale might seem more suitable for a short story than a full-length novel, and when Lord Jim was first published, many critics complained that it was too long. Such is not the case, however, for the power and impact of Lord Jim lie not in narrative actions but in psychological nuances and meanings.

Once again, Conrad uses Marlow as both a character and a narrator. Marlow, who went through his own testing experiences in the short story "Youth" and was more severely tested in Heart of Darkness, comes to know Jim by accident and then follows his career as if by fate. It is Marlow, for example, who obtains Jim's positions after the Patna incident, and it is Marlow who visits Jim in the small Malay village of Patusan, which is the setting for the second part of the novel. Throughout the story, Marlow is concerned, even obsessed, with Jim's actions and thoughts.

The presentation of these actions is not straightforward; Conrad's narrative seldom is, especially when he is concerned with revelation of character. Marlow is less interested in what Jim does than what those actions reveal of the inner man. Much of the novel concerns Marlow's speculations on Jim's actions, and often Marlow seems to be the central character of the book.

In the end, however, the actions of the mysterious Jim command the reader's attention. Significantly, Conrad allows his title character no last name, letting him be known by his Malay title of Tuan Jim, or Lord Jim. This title is given sincerely by the Patusan villagers, but Jim and the reader both understand the implicit irony of the title, an irony that can be resolved only by Jim's final, deliberate actions.

NOSTROMO

First published: 1904

Type of work: Novel

Caught in the moral ambiguities of a South American revolution, an essentially good man finds his innocence corrupted.

Nostromo is Conrad's most expansive and ambitious political novel, a story that examines how both societies and individuals are adversely affected by the process of government in its most brutal form. The book combines several of Conrad's recurring themes, most notably the harmful effects of imperialism, the baleful influence of wealth, and the evil results of individuals acting without the restraints of inner moral codes.

The story is set in the Occidental Province of Costaguana, a nation in Central America. Isolated behind an almost impassable mountain range and situated on a broad but windless bay, the Golfo Placido, Sulaco, the capital city of the province, has for centuries remained outside of events. Sulaco's only importance comes from the riches of its nearby silver mine, known as the Gould Concession because it is operated by an English family of that name. The Goulds, who have lived in Costaguana for three generations, are permitted to work the mine so long as they pay sufficient bribes to whatever government happens to control Costaguana. Charles Gould, who has brought the mine to its greatest productivity, has grown tired of this endless extortion and resolves to throw his great wealth behind a revolution that will finally bring a responsible government to power in Costaguana.

The novel also follows the career of its title character, an Italian immigrant who is the leader of the stevedores and other dockworkers in Sulaco harbor and whose real name is Gian' Battista Fidenza. Fidenza has been given the nickname "Nostromo," meaning "one of ours," by the Englishmen who operate Costaguana's shipping line and is valued by his English masters for his ability to discipline his fellow workers. He is also a brave and resourceful individual, and when the Gould-inspired government seems about to collapse following another revolution, Nostromo is ordered to transport a shipment of silver to safety outside Costaguana.

After his small craft is nearly wrecked by a passing ship during the dangerous night crossing, Nostromo hides the treasure on a deserted island in the Golfo Placido. When he learns that Gould and the others believe the silver lost, Nostromo resolves to keep it for himself. Nostromo's realization of the loss of his integrity weighs heavily on him, and although his death at the novel's end comes from a tragic mistake, Conrad makes it clear that the real cause is Nostromo's sense of overwhelming guilt.

As is typical of Conrad, these events are not related in strict chronological sequence or through simple narrative. Instead, the novel moves forward and backward in time, arranged more by themes than events. Following a natural metaphor suggested by the silver mine, Conrad pursues each vein of his story until it seems exhausted, then turns to another. Only gradually, as the narrative strands are connected, does a total picture of events and characters emerge. Because nothing is simple in Costaguana, Conrad implies, its history must also be told in an oblique fashion.

Conrad uses several different narrators. Much of Nostromo is told by a third-person narrator who seems to have visited the place and perhaps even participated in some of the actions. Two of the most important accounts of the novel's central events, the defeat and resurgence of the Gould-backed revolution, are told indirectly. The first is presented in a letter written by one of the revolutionaries, Decoud, to his sister. The second is retold years after the events by another character, the Englishman, Captain Mitchell. Ironically, neither man understands fully what he has related; only the reader can place their stories into perspective.

Such irony, an essential trait of Conrad, runs strongly through Nostromo. Not only do the characters engage in actions whose importance and results they cannot comprehend, their very names signal a gulf between perception and reality. Most notable, of course, is the title character himself. Nostromo, as he is called by his supposed masters, is anything but "one of ours," and his real name, Fidenza, or "Faithful," becomes a cruel joke when he steals the silver he has been entrusted to preserve.

For Conrad, irony was inevitable in a political situation because politics is the exploitation of the split between the real and the perceived. In such a fashion, Charles Gould defends his silver mine and his backing of yet another revolution for Costaguana because they will bring "law, good faith, order, security." As he tells his wife:

That's how your money-making is justified here in the face of lawlessness and disorder. It is justified because the security which it demands must be shared with an oppressed people. A better justice will come afterwards. That's your ray of hope.

"Afterwards," Conrad implies in Nostromo, never comes. There will always be one more revolution, one more justification for money-making above justice itself. In Conrad's most ironic novel, nothing is more bitterly ironic than Charles Gould's "ray of hope."

HEART OF DARKNESS

First published: 1899, serial; 1902, book

Type of work: Novel

On a voyage up the Congo River, a man confronts the savagery and inner darkness that is part of all human nature.

Heart of Darkness was based upon Conrad's own experiences in the Congo as first mate on the riverboat Roi des Belges in 1890, during which he was overwhelmed by intense moral revulsion at the degradation and exploitation of the natives by the ruthless European traders. Conrad noted that, in turn, the savage jungle quickly eliminated the slight beneficial effects that civilization gave to the white plunderers. His observations and reactions to this situation were transmuted into one of his most powerful works.

The character of Marlow, introduced in the short story "Youth," reappears as the narrator and central character of Heart of Darkness. The center of Heart of Darkness is a trip by Marlow up the Congo River in search of a mysterious Mister Kurtz. The events that take place during this river voyage constitute both a literal and a symbolic journey by Marlow into that “immense heart of darkness” that is both the African jungle and the human soul.

The events of the story are relatively simple. Marlow finds himself, as sailors often do, without a position, a situation Conrad knew well. Against his better judgment, Marlow contracts to serve as a riverboat captain for a Belgian company that exports ivory from the Congo. Exactly as happened to Conrad, however, Marlow’s boat is wrecked before he arrives, and he is assigned to serve as a mate on a company steamboat sailing upriver. Marlow goes willingly because he wishes to meet the famous Mister Kurtz, a man who has become renowned equally as a trader of ivory and as a champion of civilization.

Marlow learns, however, that Kurtz is more than an ivory trader, and that the man’s vision of civilization and progress has been changed by contact with the African wilderness. When Marlow arrives at Kurtz’s station, he finds that Kurtz has reverted to savagery and is alternately feared or worshiped by the terrified natives whom he oppresses. Kurtz’s station is ringed with posts decorated with human skulls, and unspeakable rites are celebrated there in honor of the man-god Kurtz. Marlow loads the sick, delirious Kurtz on the boat and hurries back down the river, narrowly escaping an ambush by the terrified and outraged natives. Kurtz dies on the journey.

Marlow takes Kurtz’s belongings, including his precious journal, back to Kurtz’s fiancé in Europe. Having carefully removed the increasingly frenzied and desperate passages that occur toward the end of the diary, Marlow lies to the woman, claiming that Kurtz died as he had wished and as she herself would have wanted, as an apostle for civilization and Christianity. Still, Marlow must recognize the truth that he has witnessed.

The impact of Heart of Darkness comes from the nearly devastating effects Marlow experiences in the Congo. As the story unfolds, the world in which Marlow finds himself grows both more corrupted and more corrupting, so that nothing is left untouched or untainted. Marlow’s adventures become stranger, and the characters he meets grow increasingly odd, starting with the greedy traders whom Marlow ironically describes as “pilgrims,” through an eccentric Russian who wanders in dress clothes through the jungle, to Kurtz himself, that figure of ultimate madness. Only the native Africans, whether the cruelly abused workers who slave for the trading company or the savages who serve Kurtz out of fear and superstition, retain some of their original dignity. To Marlow, however, they are initially beyond his comprehension. Heart of Darkness shows the reader the world through Marlow’s eyes, and it is a strange and terrifying place where the normal order of civilized life is both inverted and perverted.

In Heart of Darkness, Conrad presents his narrative in a carefully distanced fashion; little is told directly. The story begins with Marlow and four friends aboard a small boat on the Thames River, talking about their experiences. One of the listeners, who is never named, is the actual narrator of the story he has heard from Marlow; while readers may believe they are listening directly to Marlow, actually they hear his story secondhand. Within this narrative framework, the tale shuttles back and forth as Marlow recounts part of his story, then comments upon it. At times, Marlow makes additional reflections upon his own observations. It is only by retelling the events that Marlow comes to understand them, a gradual revelation that is shared by the reader.

Heart of Darkness makes substantial use of symbolism. Conrad used symbolism—the literary device that uses the images of a work to underscore and emphasize its themes and meanings—in many of his works, especially in his descriptions of the landscape, which grows denser and darker as Marlow’s journey progresses. The technique is essential for Heart of Darkness; the underlying meanings of the story are too terrifying and bleak to be expressed openly. Conrad also uses imagery throughout his story to underscore the meaning of events as Marlow comes to understand them. Opposites are frequent, so that brightness is contrasted with gloom; the lush growth of the jungle is juxtaposed with the sterility of the white traders; and the luxurious, even alarming, life of the wild is always connected with death and decomposition. Running throughout the story are images and metaphors of madness, especially the insanity caused by isolation. In particular, the decline of Kurtz is a powerfully symbolic expression of the weaknesses of supposedly civilized Europeans. The dominant symbol for the entire work is found in its title and final words: All human nature is a vast “heart of darkness.”

“THE SECRET SHARER”

First published: 1912 (collected in Twixt Land and Sea, Tales, 1912)

Type of work: Short story

A young ship's captain hides a murderer in his own cabin to maintain his own inner moral code.

“The Secret Sharer” is Conrad’s most famous short story and one that has long puzzled readers and critics. The story’s central character is a young captain, whose name the reader never learns and who has just assumed his first command. The man is nervous, wondering if he will be able to fulfill the obligations of his new position and, more importantly, his own ideals. As he paces the empty deck of his ship during the night, he is startled to discover a naked man swimming by his ship’s side. Once aboard, the swimmer, Leggatt, confesses that he is fleeing from his own ship, the Sephora, because he murdered a fellow sailor. As the young captain and Leggatt talk, it appears that the act was justified because the Sephora was in danger during a violent storm and Leggatt had to strike the man down in order to save the ship. Because the letter of the law makes no provision for this particular situation, however, Leggatt is condemned as a criminal and will be punished, perhaps executed, if captured. That places the young captain in a moral dilemma: Should he hide Leggatt or turn him over to the authorities? Almost without hesitation, the captain puts Leggatt in his own cabin, where the fugitive remains hidden until the captain sails his new ship dangerously close to land, allowing Leggatt the chance to swim for safety and escape.

The young captain upholds his own moral code by pledging and keeping his word to the mysterious murderer Leggatt, even though his code stands in opposition to conventional law and morality. By taking this action, which some might see as willful, even perverse, the young captain demonstrates to himself that he is capable of fulfilling that “ideal conception of one’s personality every man sets up for himself secretly.” This ideal conception is not presented explicitly in the story. Rather, readers see the captain’s code in action and perhaps assess its consequences but must decide for themselves what the young captain considers his standards and why he must uphold them even in the face of danger and disgrace.

Creating and living by a morality that must be a secret, in this case literally so, is an instance of irony by Conrad and a central paradox of “The Secret Sharer.” The captain’s code requires him to protect a murderer and to risk his own ship and crew. He faces this danger when he steers dangerously close to shore, risking shipwreck. Since the captain cannot tell his crew the true reason for his baffling action, another secret is present in the story. When the captain succeeds, however, he feels a secret bond between himself and his ship.

“The Secret Sharer” hides these mysteries in the mask of a straightforward narrative, and all of its ambiguity and double meanings are presented in a simple fashion. Even the title is multiple: Since only the captain knows about Leggatt, Leggatt’s presence is indeed a secret. On another level, however, the murderer and the young commander also share common secrets—Leggatt’s presence on board the ship and the “ideal conception of one’s personality” that seems to be their joint moral code.

Doubling, in the physical and moral sense, is found throughout “The Secret Sharer.” The young captain and Leggatt are so similar that they seem to be twins, an identification that Conrad clearly intends the reader to take in more than one sense. Both men feel themselves to be outcasts—Leggatt actually so, because of his crime, the captain, psychologically, because of his newness to the ship and its crew. Leggatt can be regarded as the alter ego of the captain, perhaps a reflection of the darker, even criminal, aspects of the captain’s personality. Some readers have argued that Leggatt does not even exist but is only a figment of the young captain's imagination.

"The Secret Sharer" is one of the most complex and multilayered short stories in literature. Without resorting to technical devices such as using several narrators or switching back and forth in time, Conrad tells a story that presents the reader with a mystery that cannot be resolved even as it cannot be ignored.

SUMMARY

Joseph Conrad's mastery of the psychological story and his creation of memorable and highly complex characters established him as one of the most important authors in world literature. In exploring such concepts as the double and the human subconscious, Conrad both anticipated and complemented many modern psychological theories. In addition, Conrad is one of the most original and influential of modern English prose stylists. His densely written and often highly descriptive passages reflect perfectly the complex world of his narratives and his often mysterious but always memorable characters.

Michael Witkoski

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Consider Lord Jim as an example of Joseph Conrad's ability to combine exciting external action and psychological intensity.
- Conrad used Marlow in several works as a narrator or viewpoint character. Does the reader learn the essential truth from Marlow, or is this character just one of the revealing sources?
- In Heart of Darkness, what are the ingredients of the darkness?
- Is it possible to establish the true self of the captain in "The Secret Sharer"? Explain your position.
- What resources was Conrad able to bring to the creation of what is often called the "spy novel"?
- It is very difficult to understand how Conrad wrote compellingly in a language which he never managed to speak very well. How did his early life and young adulthood prepare him to be a writer?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Almayer's Folly, 1895

An Outcast of the Islands, 1896

The Children of the Sea: A Tale of the Forecastle, 1897 (republished as The Nigger of the Narcissus: A Tale of the Sea, 1898)

Heart of Darkness, 1899 (serial); 1902 (book)

Lord Jim, 1900

The Inheritors, 1901 (with Ford Madox Ford)

Romance, 1903 (with Ford)

Nostromo, 1904

The Secret Agent, 1907

The Nature of a Crime, 1909 (serial), 1924 (book; with Ford)

Under Western Eyes, 1911

Chance, 1913

Victory, 1915

The Shadow-Line, 1917

The Arrow of Gold, 1919
The Rescue, 1920
The Rover, 1923
Suspense, 1925 (incomplete)

SHORT FICTION:

Tales of Unrest, 1898
Youth: A Narrative, and Two Other Stories, 1902
Typhoon, and Other Stories, 1903
A Set of Six, 1908
Twixt Land and Sea, Tales, 1912
Within the Tides, 1915
Tales of Hearsay, 1925
The Sisters, 1928
The Complete Short Stories of Joseph Conrad, 1933

DRAMA:

One Day More: A Play in One Act, pr. 1905
The Secret Agent: A Drama in Four Acts, pb. 1921
Laughing Anne: A Play, pb. 1923

NONFICTION:

The Mirror of the Sea, 1906
Some Reminiscences, 1912 (pb. in U.S. as A Personal Record)
Notes on Life and Letters, 1921
Last Essays, 1926
Joseph Conrad's Diary of His Journey Up the Valley of the Congo in 1890, 1926
Joseph Conrad: Life and Letters, 1927 (Gérard Jean-Aubry, editor)
Joseph Conrad's Letters to His Wife, 1927
Conrad to a Friend, 1928 (Richard Curle, editor)
Letters from Joseph Conrad, 1895-1924, 1928 (Edward Garnett, editor)
Lettres françaises de Joseph Conrad, 1929 (Jean-Aubry, editor)
Letters of Joseph Conrad to Marguerite Doradowska, 1940 (John A. Gee and Paul J. Sturm, editors)
The Collected Letters of Joseph Conrad, 1983-2005 (7 volumes; Frederick R. Karl and Laurence Davies, editors)

About the Author

Bloom, Harold, ed. Joseph Conrad's "Nostromo." New York: Chelsea House, 1987.
Gillon, Adam. Joseph Conrad. Boston: Twayne, 1982.
Kaplan, Carola M., Peter Mallios, and Andrea White, eds. Conrad in the Twenty-First Century: Contemporary Approaches and Perspectives. New York: Routledge, 2005.
Leavis, F. R. The Great Tradition. London: Chatto & Windus, 1948.
Meyers, Jeffrey. Joseph Conrad: A Biography. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1991.
Middleton, Tim. Joseph Conrad. New York: Routledge, 2006.
Najder, Zdzislaw. Joseph Conrad, A Chronicle. Translated by Halina Carroll-Najder. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1983.
Peters, John G. The Cambridge Introduction to Joseph Conrad. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
Simmons, Allan H. Joseph Conrad. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
Tennant, Roger. Joseph Conrad: A Biography. New York: Atheneum, 1987.

Library of Congress

PIERRE CORNEILLE

Born: Rouen, France

June 6, 1606

Died: Paris, France

October 1, 1684

Corneille helped to create neoclassical theater in France. His thirty-three plays, written between 1629 and 1674, attained a standard of excellence and a psychological depth equalled in the seventeenth century only by Molière and Jean Racine.

BIOGRAPHY

Pierre Corneille (kawr-NAY) was born in the Norman city of Rouen, France, on June 6, 1606. He was the eldest of the six children born to Pierre and Marthe Corneille. His younger brother Thomas also became a very successful playwright. Between 1615 and 1622, Corneille studied at the Jesuit high school in Rouen. He was a learned Latinist and remained a fervent Catholic for his entire life. In 1624, he received his law degree and was admitted to the bar in Rouen. It is not known if he ever practiced law. He lived in his native city until 1662, when he moved to Paris with his family.

Beginning in 1629, Corneille began writing plays for Parisian theater companies. His early plays revealed both his skill as a dramatist and the diversity of his interests. He wrote witty comedies, a powerful tragedy titled Médée (pr. 1635, pb. 1639), and L'Illusion comique (pr. 1636, pb. 1636; The Illusion, 1989), which contains a series of plays-within-a-play. His 1637 tragicomedy Le Cid (pr., pb. 1637; The Cid, 1637) provoked an extremely positive reaction from Parisian theatergoers and much criticism from writers who were clearly jealous of Corneille's success. The decade that followed the first performances of The Cid was a very productive period for him. He wrote a series of excellent plays inspired largely by Roman and Spanish sources; these works established his reputation as the most creative and influential French playwright of his generation. Plays such as The Cid, Horace (pr. 1640, pb. 1641; English translation, 1656), Cinna: Ou, La Clémence d'Auguste (pr. 1640, pb. 1643; Cinna, 1713), Polyeucte (pr. 1642, pb. 1643; English translation, 1655), and Le Menteur (pr. 1643, pb. 1644; The Liar, 1671) are considered masterpieces of French theater. They are regularly performed by modern French theatrical companies and are frequently studied in courses on French theater.

In 1641, Corneille married Marie de Lampérière. The Corneilles had seven children. In 1647, he was elected to the French Academy, whose meetings he attended quite regularly until 1683, when he became very ill. The money that he received from theatrical troupes and the annual grants that he received from King Louis XIV for his contributions to the cultural life of France enabled the Corneilles to lead a comfortable life in Rouen.

Between 1648 and 1653, however, there was a civil war in France called the Fronde. The resulting social instability caused a decrease in theater attendance in Paris. After the first performances of his tragedy Nicomède in 1651 (English translation, 1671), Corneille stopped writing plays for several years. Between 1651 and 1656, he worked on a verse translation of Thomas à Kempis's influential Latin book of lay piety, Imitatio Christi (c. 1427; The Imitation of Christ, c. 1460-1630). Corneille's translation, Imitation de Jésus-Christ (1656), contained more than thirteen thousand lines of poetry. He was very interested in religious subjects and, in 1670, he published Office de la Sainte Vierge, a fine translation of Saint Bonaventure's literary work on the Virgin Mary. His contemporaries were greatly impressed by the quality of these translations. For the 1660 edition of his works, Corneille undertook a systematic revision of his earlier plays and also wrote three very influential essays of dramatic criticism. These essays are generally considered to be the clearest descriptions of such conventions of neoclassical French theater as the importance of respecting social decorum and the three rules requiring the unities of time, place, and action.

Although the nine plays that Corneille wrote between 1659 and 1674 reveal that his skills as a dramatist had not diminished, Parisian theatergoers responded more favorably to the plays of Molière and Racine than to those of Corneille. Discouraged by this popular reaction to his later plays, Corneille retired definitively after the first performances of Suréna (pr. 1674, pb. 1675; English translation, 1960) in 1674. Although Parisian theatergoers reacted coolly to Suréna during its first run, critics now consider Suréna to be a brilliant tragedy. During the last ten years of his life, Corneille wrote occasional poems, corresponded with fellow writers, and continued to attend the meetings of the French Academy. Very poor health prevented him from leaving his house in Paris after August, 1683. He died there on October 1, 1684, and was succeeded in the French Academy by his brother Thomas.

ANALYSIS

Corneille is famous for his skill in creating dramatic tension by placing sympathetic characters in situations that require them to make difficult moral choices. As a lawyer, Corneille understood that the motivation for human behavior is rarely simple. Individuals wish to believe that their personal search for happiness should not conflict with the allegiance owed to state and family, but this is not always the case. In both The Cid and Horace, Corneille shows that characters can react very differently during the same moral crisis. In several plays, he made effective use of blocking characters who created problems that would not have existed if all the characters had been tolerant and understanding. The Roman tragedy Horace illustrates nicely how Corneille integrated moral conflicts into his plays.

From the opening scenes in Horace, audiences realize that several generations of Albans and Romans have lived together in peace and that numerous marriages between Albans and Romans seem to have cemented the links between their two countries. At the beginning of Horace, one cannot imagine what could possibly destroy the stability and peace between Rome and Alba. Sabine (an Alban noblewoman) has married the Roman nobleman Horace, and his sister Camille is in love with Sabine's brother Curiace and hopes to marry him. The Roman king decides, however, to invade Alba in order to expand his political power. Corneille's audiences understand that this is a totally unjustified and unnecessary invasion, because the Albans have not the slightest desire to threaten the security of Rome. They simply want to live in peace with their more powerful neighbors in Rome. The Roman invasion provokes extreme reactions from both Sabine's husband and her father-in-law, the older Horace. Both affirm that Romans must prove their loyalty by hating the Albans. Neither the younger nor the elder Horace believes that one can separate political service to one's country from commitment to one's beloved. Both the younger and older Horaces are fanatics who refuse to accept the fact that Camille can love Curiace and still be a loyal Roman. In combat, Camille's two other brothers and Curiace are all killed. The grieving Camille tells Horace that Rome has dishonored itself by killing peaceful Albans. The enraged Horace takes out his sword and kills his sister offstage. In a very real sense, the war between Alba and Rome was the equivalent of a civil war, the two countries having lived together in peace for generations. In Horace, Corneille shows that the combination of civil war and blind patriotism can transform otherwise decent people into violent characters. Patriotism is an admirable virtue, but one should never allow patriotism to corrupt moral judgment. Blinded by his hatred for Alba, Horace concludes that killing Camille was "an act of justice." It is obvious that this murder of his sister had absolutely nothing to do with "justice" and represented, on the contrary, the moral degeneracy of Horace.

Corneille lived during a very turbulent period of French history. During his childhood in Normandy, peasant revolts against the royal forces were suppressed with incredible cruelty. During the 1630's, the intolerance of Cardinal Richelieu (the French prime minister under King Louis XIII) caused much suffering among French Protestants. The abuse of power by Cardinal Mazarin (the French prime minister during the early years of the reign of King Louis XIV) created great resentment and provoked a civil war that lasted from 1648 until 1653.

Several of Corneille's most effective plays, such as Horace, Polyeucte, and Suréna, illustrate the extraordinarily destructive effect on society when political power is used abusively or arbitrarily. The action in his major plays takes place in different countries, but the game of political power unfolds in very similar ways. Corneille's political plays warn that the misuse of political power can have a long-term negative effect on society as a whole. Corneille created much sympathy for characters who adhered to high ethical standards and refused to commit amoral actions in order to advance their careers, but these same morally admirable characters are frequently destroyed by those who played the political "power game" more ruthlessly and effectively.

Corneille is justly famous for the finely crafted speeches that his characters use in order to defend their political decisions. The formal eloquence of these speeches is not misleading once it is realized that selfish and intolerant characters such as Horace use specious reasoning in order to justify their refusal to respect the basic freedom and dignity of other characters. When Horace tries to justify his murder of his sister Camille, the audience is not persuaded by his arguments.

It would be hasty to conclude that Corneille did not believe in the basic goodness of people. He spent years translating into French Thomas à Kempis's The Imitation of Jesus Christ, a famous work of lay piety that affirmed that systematic meditation and prayer can enable all Christians to develop a rich understanding of the divine perfection in every believer. Corneille felt that people can attain true happiness and spiritual growth in their personal lives as long as they are not tempted by the Machiavellian world of politics.

THE CID

First produced: Le Cid, 1637 (first published, 1637; English translation, 1637)

Type of work: Play

In the feudal society of medieval Spain, the sympathetic lovers Rodrigue and Chimène must choose between duty and love.

Although it was Corneille's eighth play, The Cid was his first great popular and critical success. He transformed the medieval epic legend of the Cid into a very intimate play in which Rodrigue and Chimène suffer unnecessarily because of the selfishness of their fathers. Rodrigue and Chimène love each other very much and want to get married. Instead of considering the happiness of their adult children, Don Gomès (Chimène's father) and Don Diègue (Rodrigue's father) become involved in a petty argument that turns violent. Each claims to merit the honor of serving as the governor to King Fernand's eldest son, a purely honorary position. The king's decision is totally arbitrary and does not imply any criticism of the man not chosen. When Don Gomès realizes that his rival will receive this appointment, he loses his temper and slaps Don Diègue, who interprets this not as the crime of battery but rather as an offense against his family's honor. He demands that his son avenge this insult by killing Don Gomès in a duel—a request that places Rodrigue in a terrible situation and does not give him enough time to consider an alternative. As a lawyer, Corneille knew that there were obvious legal remedies available for Don Diègue. Charges should have been brought against Don Gomès, and a court should have tried him for his physical attack against Don Diègue, who could also have begun a civil suit against his attacker. Death was an excessive penalty for the crime of battery. In act 1, both Don Diègue and Rodrigue deliver monoboth Don Diègue and Rodrigue deliver monologues that create very negative impressions on listeners, who conclude that both characters are irrational and violent men who do not respect the absolute value of human life.

After the death of Don Gomès, the king finds himself in a very delicate situation. As an absolute monarch, he has the authority to judge criminal cases. Although Rodrigue is a military hero, the king cannot excuse Rodrigue's crime because it is very dangerous for individuals to place themselves above the law. Society cannot permit young soldiers to kill elderly gentlemen in duels. Although Chimène demands justice, she does not want to have Rodrigue executed for the murder of her father. King Fernand is a patient and objective judge. He comes to understand that it was the fanaticism of Don Diègue that caused Rodrigue to commit his heinous crime. There were extenuating circumstances. Although Rodrigue is guilty, the king pardons him and allows him to resume his military career. King Fernand suggests that after an appropriate period of mourning Chimène may want to marry Rodrigue. He strongly recommends that Chimène take at least one year before deciding whether she can forgive Rodrigue for his crime.

The Cid shows that chaos may result if individuals place their own desires above the needs of society as a whole. Whatever his motivation may have been, Don Diègue did not consider the effect of his fanaticism on others. Only the wisdom and compassion of King Fernand resulted in a solution that both preserved the rule of law and spared the life of Rodrigue. King Fernand accorded equal importance to both justice and mercy.

When he first published The Cid, Corneille referred to it as a tragicomedy, although he later decided to call it a tragedy. There is, however, no tragic vision of the world in The Cid. Although this play explores serious themes, such as death and justice, it does have a relatively optimistic ending. King Fernand may well succeed in restoring order to his kingdom while at the same time allowing Rodrigue and Chimène to live emotionally satisfying lives.

POLYEUCTE

First produced: 1642 (first published, 1643;
English translation, 1655)

Type of work: Play

Polyeucte describes the heroism of converts to Christianity who willingly accept martyrdom.

The action in Polyeucte takes place in the Roman colony of Armenia. Emperor Decia hates Christians and insists that all of his governors enforce his draconian laws against them. Practicing Christianity is a capital offense. Polyeucte has married Pauline, the daughter of Félix, the Roman governor in Armenia. Although she loved Sévère, she acceded to her father's wishes and married Polyeucte because he was then richer than Sévère. Things have changed, and Sévère is now an influential adviser to Emperor Decia. Polyeucte seems to be a very ordinary person. No one expects any surprises from him, but his friend Nérarque persuades him to embrace Christianity. Both Polyeucte and Pauline speak of her recurring nightmare in which she sees Polyeucte's death. He does not take this nightmare seriously, but she is terrified. Although he wants to become a Christian, he does not want to anger Pauline and Félix, who hold Christians in contempt. After much hesitation, Polyeucte publicly reveals his conversion.

This development creates an immediate problem for Félix, Sévère, and Pauline. Should Decia's arbitrary law against Christians be enforced? At first, Félix thinks that he can profit from Polyeucte's martyrdom if Pauline then marries the influential Sévère. Pauline rejects this proposal and vows never to marry Sévère; she appeals to Sévère's love for her and begs him to intervene with her father. Félix is intransigent but gives his son-in-law one last opportunity to avoid death. He forces Polyeucte to watch the execution of Nérarque offstage. Far from discouraging him, this martyrdom only serves to strengthen Polyeucte's commitment to his new religion, and he is executed. The martyrdom of Polyeucte unexpectedly affects Félix and Pauline, who are so moved by his courage that they both convert to Christianity. As this tragedy ends, Sévère expresses admiration for Christians and promises not to persecute them. He believes that Félix and Pauline can serve both God and Decia.

Polyeucte is a very powerful tragedy that explores with much sensitivity the importance of courage, loyalty, and personal commitment to ethical and religious beliefs. Although Polyeucte had no intention of converting to Christianity before his conversations with Néarque, he comes to realize that his life would have no meaning if he were to deny his faith. He refuses to lose his immortal soul in order to save his life. Although Pauline would have preferred to marry Sévère, Polyeucte is her husband and she admires his courage. Her love and respect for him made her ready to accept the gift of faith after his execution. Similarly, Félix was displeased that his son-in-law was not as skilled a politician as Sévère, but he did recognize Polyeucte's honesty. Félix's conversion to Christianity has struck many critics as almost incredible, but one cannot question his sincerity. Félix tells Sévère: "I made him a martyr, his death made me a Christian." Polyeucte continues to fascinate readers and theatergoers by its very effective representation of heroism through characters who refuse to compromise their moral beliefs.

SUMMARY

Pierre Corneille was a gifted playwright who has remained justly famous for his treatment of moral problems. Audiences can identify with the universal moral dilemmas he described so well. In depicting the feudalism in The Cid or the Roman imperial power in Horace and Polyeucte, Corneille described problems that exist even today. Like Pauline, Polyeucte, Rodrigue, and Chimène, one recognizes that there are still conflicts between one's personal ethical beliefs and the demands that society imposes on the individual.

Edmund J. Campion

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

Mélite: Ou, Les Fausses Lettres, pr. 1630, pb. 1633 (English translation, 1776)

Clitandre, pr. 1631, pb. 1632

La Veuve: Ou, Le Traître trahi, pr. 1631, pb. 1634

La Galerie du palais: Ou, L'Amie rivale, pr. 1632, pb. 1637

La Suivante, pr. 1633, pb. 1637

La Place royale: Ou, L'Amoureux extravagant, pr. 1634, pb. 1637

Médée, pr. 1635, pb. 1639

L'Illusion comique, pr. 1636, pb. 1639 (The Illusion, 1989)

Le Cid, pr., pb. 1637 (The Cid, 1637)

Horace, pr. 1640, pb. 1641 (English translation, 1656)

Cinna: Ou, La Clémence d'Auguste, pr. 1640, pb. 1643 (Cinna, 1713)

Polyeucte, pr. 1642, pb. 1643 (English translation, 1655)

Le menteur, pr. 1643, pb. 1644 (The Liar, 1671)

La Mort de Pompée, pr. 1643, pb. 1644 (The Death of Pompey, 1663)

La Suite du menteur, pr. 1644, pb. 1645

Théodore, vierge et martyre, pr. 1645, pb. 1646

Rodogune, princesse des Parthes, pr. 1645, pb. 1647 (Rodogune, 1765)

Héraclius, pr., pb. 1647 (English translation, 1664)

Don Sanche d'Aragon, pr. 1649, pb. 1650 (The Conflict, 1798)

Andromède, pr., pb. 1650

Nicomède, pr., pb. 1651 (English translation, 1671)

Pertharite, roi des Lombards, pr. 1651, pb. 1653

Œdipe, pr., pb. 1659

Théâtre, pb. 1660 (3 volumes)
La Toison d'or, pr. 1660, pb. 1661
Sertorius, pr., pb. 1662 (English translation, 1960)
Sophonisbe, pr., pb. 1663
Othon, pr. 1664, pb. 1665 (English translation, 1960)
Agésilas, pr., pb. 1666
Attila, pr., pb. 1667 (English translation, 1960)
Tite et Bérénice, pr. 1670, pb. 1671
Pulchérie, pr. 1672, pb. 1673 (English translation, 1960)
Suréna, pr. 1674, pb. 1675 (English translation, 1960)
The Chief Plays of Corneille, pb. 1952, 1956
Moot Plays, pb. 1960

NONFICTION:

Examens, 1660
Discours, 1660

TRANSLATIONS:

Imitation de Jésus-Christ, 1656 (of Thomas à Kempis's poetry)
Office de la Sainte Vierge, 1670 (of St. Bonaventure's poetry)

About the Author

Abraham, Claude. Pierre Corneille. New York: Twayne, 1972.
 Brereton, Geoffrey. French Tragic Drama in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. London: Methuen, 1973.
 Carlin, Claire. Pierre Corneille Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1998.
 Elmarsafy, Ziad. Freedom, Slavery, and Absolutism: Corneille, Pascal, Racine. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 2003.
 Goodkin, Richard E. Birth Marks: The Tragedy of Primogeniture in Pierre Corneille, Thomas Corneille, and Jean Racine. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.
 Harwood, Sharon. Rhetoric in the Tragedies of Corneille. New Orleans: Tulane University Press, 1977.
 McMahon, Elise Noël. Classics Incorporation: Cultural Studies and Seventeenth-Century French Literature. Birmingham, Ala.: Summa, 1998.
 Mallinson, G. J. The Comedies of Corneille. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 1984.
 Muratore, Mary Jo. The Evolution of the Cornelian Heroine. Potomac, Md.: Studia Humanitatis, 1982.
 Pocock, Gordon. Corneille and Racine: Problems of Tragic Form. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1973.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Explain how the themes of Pierre Corneille's political plays can have relevance in the twenty-first century.
- To what extent was Corneille's tragic vision governed by the principles of French neoclassicism?
- Reveal how training in the law assisted Corneille in constructing his plays.
- Tragedy, as the modern world understands it, did not exist in Europe before the Reformation because Romantic Catholic faith militated against a tragic outlook. What circumstances allowed the Catholic Corneille in the seventeenth century to compose tragedies?
- What is a tragicomedy, and how does The Cid fulfill the definition?

Library of Congress

JULIO CORTÁZAR

Born: Brussels, Belgium

August 26, 1914

Died: Paris, France

February 12, 1984

Cortázar is the most widely known in a generation of Latin American writers and has significantly raised the status of Argentine literature.

BIOGRAPHY

Julio Cortázar (KOHR-tah-sahr) was born on August 26, 1914, in Brussels, Belgium, where his Argentine parents, Julio José and María Herminia (Descotte) Cortázar, were on business. When he was four years old, the family returned to Argentina to establish permanent residence in Banfield, a suburb of Buenos Aires. When he was still very young, Cortázar and the family were abandoned by his father; his mother and aunt reared him and his sister.

Cortázar earned a degree as a primary and secondary schoolteacher in 1935, but before finishing his first year of studies at the University of Buenos Aires, he left to take a position as a high school teacher, which he held until 1944. Presencia (1938), published under the pseudonym of Julio Denis, was his first publication. It is a collection of poems, a genre in which he was to work again in later years. From 1944 to 1945, he taught literature at the University of Cuyo in the province of Mendoza, where he was briefly imprisoned for participating in anti-Peronist demonstrations.

In 1946, he returned to Buenos Aires, where he worked as the manager of Cámara Argentina del Libro (the Argentine Publishing Association). After passing examinations in languages and law, he worked as a public translator from 1948 to 1951. In 1946, his first short story was published by Jorge Luis Borges. In 1951, he was awarded a scholarship by the French government to study in Paris. He left Argentina the same month that Bestiario (1951), his first collection of short stories, was published. The eight stories in Bestiario reflect the influence of the French Surrealists on his writing. Each situation in Bestiario confronts the reader with that point at which fantasy emerges as a product of logical order.

The rest of Cortázar's life was spent in Paris, where he began working as a translator for UNESCO (the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization) in 1952. He also translated into Spanish the works of such authors as Louisa May Alcott, Daniel Defoe, G. K. Chesterton, André Gide, John Keats, Edgar Allan Poe, and Marguerite Yourcenar. Cortázar married the Argentine translator Aurora Bernárdez in 1953.

Cortázar's first novel, Los premios (1960; The Winners, 1965), is a thriller about a cross section of Argentine society, the winners of a lottery whose prize is a cruise on a ship. The author's revolutionary approach to the novel as a genre is only partially realized in The Winners. It reached maturity with Rayuela (1963; Hopscotch, 1966), the novel that definitively established Cortázar's international reputation as one of the most important twentieth century Latin American writers. In this novel Cortázar not only challenges traditional novelistic structure but also revolutionizes conventional modes of expression. In Hopscotch Cortázar's expression is lyrical, comic, mystic, esoteric, ironic, and inventive.

Cortázar thrived in France both personally and professionally. In 1974, he was awarded the Prix Médicis for his fourth and most political novel, Libro de Manuel (1973; A Manual for Manuel, 1978). He donated the prize money to an organization aiding families of political prisoners in Chile. In 1976, he received the Grand Aigle d'Or de la Ville de Nice for his entire work to date. Without relinquishing his Argentine citizenship, he acquired French citizenship in 1981. He returned to Argentina for several short visits; he also visited Cuba and Nicaragua, maintaining ties with the socialist regimes of those countries. In 1975, he participated as a member of the Second Russell Tribunal investigating violations of human rights in such Latin American countries as Brazil, Chile, Uruguay, Bolivia, and Paraguay. After 1960, he also visited the United States on several occasions, lecturing as a distinguished writer at universities from coast to coast. He died of leukemia in Paris on February 12, 1984.

ANALYSIS

Cortázar always preferred French and English literature to Spanish. As a young man he was particularly attracted to French Surrealism and recognized its influence on his work. In his later years he was fascinated by books on psychology, psychoanalysis, and anthropology.

Cortázar considered himself to be the only one of his generation to employ the techniques and themes of both of the schools of writing that dominated Buenos Aires between 1920 and 1940: One was the Florida group, with its European intellectualism, polished style, and universal themes; the other was the Boedo group, with its realistic urban scenes and unkempt style. Cortázar used characters whose language reflects the Argentine Spanish of several different social classes, which is in the style of the Boedo group, yet his fiction has a universal appeal, dealing with the fantastic that lurks beyond everyday reality, which is characteristic of the Florida group.

For Cortázar the fantastic represents an alteration in the laws, based on the Western notion of logic and reason, that supposedly regulate an ordered reality. As in the works of Alfred Jarry, a French writer whom Cortázar admired, the exceptions are as significant as the rules in fully understanding the hidden and perhaps ignored realities impinging upon human life.

In his short stories Cortázar initially creates normal settings and conventional characters in familiar situations. Soon the reader is caught up in some strange, even nightmarish, turn of events that threatens the established order. This fantastic, illogical dimension infiltrates and subverts everyday reality, allowing both reader and writer to experience an exception to the rules.

In his first collection of stories, Cortázar exhibits a worldview that coincides with that of the Surrealists: The so-called real, concrete world is only one side of a coin whose opposing face is the fantastic, the repressed, the hidden, and the taboo. Like the Surrealists, Cortázar ventures upon the darker, ignored, and repressed side of humanity. He did not consider these darker human dimensions to be pathological; instead, they served as exciting keys to a full appreciation of life. In a work as early as the dramatic poem Los reyes (1949; the kings), Cortázar adapted and altered the Greek myth of the Minotaur—half man, half bull—using him as a sympathetic character to show acceptance of humanity's basic dichotomy.

Although certain common elements exist between Cortázar's short stories and his novels, he always differentiated the two fictional forms, depicting the novel as the more dangerous of the two because of the liberties it permits. He maintained that he identified with particular characters in his novels—for example, Horacio Oliveira in Hopscotch and Andrés in A Manual for Manuel. These characters seek a way of life and love and a more just social order.

In Hopscotch, the reader is exposed to Cortázar's theory of the antinovel. Morelli, an old man, is a famous author, one read by bohemians; his manuscript notes on the antinovel are discovered while he is in the hospital recovering from a car accident. It is Morelli who proposes to make the reader an accomplice in the creative process.

The concept of the antinovel—the fragmented literary structure—was popular in the early 1960's, when Hopscotch was published. Hopscotch can also be seen as a natural consequence of the dissolution of the novelistic form. The phenomenon began in the late nineteenth century with modernist novels by the Colombian José Asunción Silva and by the Argentine Eugenio Cambaceres. Moreover, by the early 1920's and 1930's, Latin American vanguard poets such as Pablo Neruda and César Vallejo were revolutionizing and demystifying poetry.

Cortázar not only challenges the traditional novelistic structure but also revolutionizes language. He aims to destroy literary rhetoric and outmoded forms. His use of imagery is richly varied. His characters play with words, engage in word games, and invent languages. In addition to inventing language, Cortázar makes unusual orthographic changes based on phonetics, joining words in strings to emphasize their vulgarity.

In Hopscotch and A Manual for Manuel eroticism plays a dominant role in the concept of revelation and revolution, for to Cortázar rebellion is sexual and political; it is a liberation of society collectively and of the individual's desires.

Structural and stylistic playfulness in his fiction is always a means of saving oneself from the crushing seriousness of the world. In the final years, humor was still to be found in his poetry and in the collage travelogue he wrote with his companion Carol Dunlop. The title of the book indicates Cortázar's playfulness: Los autonautas de la cosmopista: O, Un viaje atemporal Paris-Marsella (1983; Autonauts of the Cosmoroute: A Timeless Journey from Paris to Marseille, 2007).

HOPSCOTCH

First published: Rayuela, 1963 (English translation, 1966)

Type of work: Novel

In Hopscotch, Julio Cortázar revolutionized the conventional modes of novelistic expression and strives toward a new mode of consciousness.

Hopscotch is divided into three sections: "From the Other Side," "From This Side," and "From Diverse Sides." At the beginning of the novel Cortázar offers a "Table of Instructions" for reading the novel and suggests that while Hopscotch consists of many books, it most importantly consists of two books. He invites the reader to choose between, first, a traditional reading of chapters 1 through 56 (the first two sections) and, second, a more unconventional reading that begins with chapter 73 and proceeds in hopscotch fashion through a sequence of at least 153 brief chapters.

The traditional reading revolves around Horacio Oliveira, an unemployed Argentine intellectual in his forties, living first in Paris and then in Buenos Aires around 1950. He and his bohemian friends—a Russian, a North American couple, two Frenchmen, a Chinese, and a Spaniard—form a group, called the Serpent Club, that spends hours discussing art, literature, music, and philosophy, and listening to jazz recordings in smoke-filled rooms. The novel, however, focuses on Oliveira's persistent and anguished self-analysis; he agonizingly questions his every thought, emotion, word, and action. A product of Western civilization, Oliveira constantly rationalizes and drowns in his own well of dialectic possibilities. Oliveira is aware of the absurdity of daily life but is not yet sure of how to contend with it. He searches, feeling alone and condemned to conformity.

The novel begins with Oliveira asking himself if he would find La Maga. She is his lover, an Uruguayan woman living in Paris with her baby. Unlike Oliveira, she is spontaneous and intuitive. Dissatisfied with his routine, self-centered life based on logic, Oliveira seeks out unusual experiences and unconventional reactions, all the while envying La Maga's unfettered consciousness.

Oliveira leaves Paris and returns to Argentina in the two sections of the traditionally read novel. Although La Maga disappears in Paris, she remains present in Oliveira's mind, as does his desire to rid himself of the trappings of Western civilization. In Buenos Aires, his relationships with an old friend, Traveler, who ironically has never journeyed far from home, and with his wife, Talita, are the material for most of his soul-searching. Traveler becomes a double for Oliveira; Traveler is without intellectual and existential anguish, at home in his own territory. Talita replaces La Maga, becoming her double. The three work in a circus and then in a sanatorium for the insane, where the final chapters of the second section take place. The reader is never told if Oliveira commits suicide or goes insane in the final chapters. In the second version of the book, the author tells the reader that life is a commentary on something else that can never be attained.

In the more unconventional, hopscotch reading of the novel, the “Table of Instructions” guides the reader through all but one of the fifty-six chapters in the first two sections and all of the chapters in the third section. In this reading, these “expendable” chapters are interspersed randomly within the chronological sequence of the first fifty-six chapters of the book. The reader, who must piece together the collage of chapters, is aided by the author’s introductory instructions and numbers at the end of each chapter. In this way Cortázar exacts the reader’s participation in constructing the second reading of a novel that ends in a deadlock, alternating between chapters 58 and 131. Hopscotch is a double—even multiple—novel. On at least two levels it involves a search for authenticity: the story of a man’s self-analysis and search for an absolute, and a reevaluation of traditional novelistic structure, carrying out its destruction and planning for its revival.

62: A MODEL KIT

First published: 62: Modelo para armar, 1968
(English translation, 1972)

Type of work: Novel

In 62: A Model Kit, certainties about plot and character are sacrificed to opportunities for extending and making elaborate patterns of narrative surfaces.

Unlike Oliveira in Hopscotch, who plays a game in order to save himself from reality, the characters in 62: A Model Kit are played like pawns on a chessboard. The novel is a juxtaposition of the protagonist’s experiences in two different but related territories called the Zone and the City. The former is a meeting place for the group of characters while the City has no geographic limitation, only high sidewalks and a hotel with labyrinthine rooms.

The novel’s protagonist is actually a group of characters. These characters are deliberately sketchy. Echoes of one another, they perceive a subliminal level of reality and intuit associations that reveal what life is about.

The associations, in constant, dreamlike metamorphosis, justify the novel’s chronological order of episodes and the utilization of private symbols. The opening scene gives a clear example of how events reverberating in the mind of a character initiate a chain of associations.

Juan, an Argentine interpreter living in Paris, is seated in the Polidor restaurant facing a wall of mirrors when he overhears a customer asking for château saignant, a rare steak. These words remind Juan of a book he just bought by Michel Butor in which he found a description of Niagara Falls by another Frenchman, François René de Chateaubriand, the author of Atala (1801; English translation, 1802). They also remind him of a related phrase, château sanglant, the “bloody castle.” Free associating from this last phrase, other images occur to him: Frau Marta, Transylvania, and the word “Sylvaner,” the name of the wine he has just ordered. Word associations open up onto mysteriously disturbing worlds. This particular association exposes the reader to the novel’s Gothic episodes about Vienna and the Baslisken Haus, with its legends of the Blood Countess Elizabeth Bathory, who bled and tortured girls in her castle and bathed in their blood. More associations occur to Juan and are borne out in the novel’s plot, in which desire without love, ill-fated relationships among characters, and vampirism all play a part.

62: A Model Kit is a dialectic between the exploratory nature of language and experience, and the forces—the conscious mind and its manipulation of the narrative—that counter the liberation offered by this exploration.

A MANUAL FOR MANUEL

First published: Libro de Manuel, 1973
(English translation, 1978)

Type of work: Novel

A Manual for Manuel, Cortázar's most politically committed work of fiction, is an exposé of human rights violations in Latin America within an imaginatively crafted narrative structure.

The novel, a mixture of fact and fiction, humor and eroticism, concerns itself with political conditions in Latin America. Cortázar wrote the novel in order to expose the systematic torture of political prisoners. Since his other books had been best sellers throughout Latin America, he hoped that this novel would enjoy wide circulation and influence. In part to avert censorship, he did not include a political treatise, expressing his socialist vision for Latin America, in the book. Instead, he chose a bizarre mixture of fantasy and fact: The plot is fiction, but the news articles inserted in the text are factual. The novel's protagonist, Andrés, is, like Cortázar, the product of two worlds—middle-class comfort and socialist commitment—and Cortázar implies that a blind adherence to either might deny the individual the very freedom that he most values.

A Manual for Manuel is about the kidnapping of a Latin American diplomat by a group of strange guerrillas in Paris. It has two narrators. One is one of the guerrillas, jokingly referred to as “you know who,” who takes notes on the assault plans. The other is Andrés, who is indecisive about joining the group and who uncovers the plot of the novel by reading those plans. The articles that interrupt the plot are from actual French and Latin American newspapers. These articles concern individual protests against the torture of political prisoners in such countries as Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay, reports of guerrilla activities in Latin America and Europe, and discussions of taboos such as homosexuality. The articles are being collected for two members of the group, Susana and Patricio, who are making a scrapbook for their baby boy, Manuel. They aim to educate him—along with the reader—about protest, change, and revolution in Latin American societies.

The group incites unrest in middle-class neighborhoods with provocations that are a strange mixture of guerrilla activity and pranks that disturb bourgeois sensibilities. Apart from these uprisings and the kidnapping, the social commitment seems to be consistently undermined by Andrés's erotic preoccupations and adventures and by the strange undertakings of another very colorful member of the group. This member is Lonstein, an Argentine Jew, who washes bodies in the morgue and speaks an inventive language combining musical rhythms and sounds, Argentine slang, and neologisms based on French and English. A Manual for Manuel is not only the author's assertion of his adherence to socialist revolution but also his statement that he will not sacrifice personal freedom of expression—erotic rites, aesthetic predilections, humor, and imagination—to any ideology.

Cortázar devotes twelve of the final seventeen pages to two factual excerpts: the testimony of political prisoners in a press conference of the Forum for Human Rights denouncing cases of torture in Argentina and a section from Conversations with Americans (1970), testimony taken by the attorney Mark Lane from thirty-two Vietnam War veterans who attested the acts of torture they committed, acts for which they were trained and commended during that war. These texts run down the pages in two parallel columns and end with a shocking statistical table from the United States Department of Defense that shows, by country, numbers of Latin American military personnel trained in the United States. Cortázar points out thereby that the United States aids oppressive regimes in their programs of torture by training their police.

SUMMARY

In theory and practice, Julio Cortázar seeks a total fictional renovation, not out of an eagerness for originality but out of necessity. This renovation consists of the destruction of character, situation, literary style, form, and language. His is an anti-literature that seeks to transgress the literary deed, the book. He wishes to open up the closed literary order—even to create disorder—to establish new perspectives.

Genevieve Slomski

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

El examen, wr. 1950, pb. 1986 (Final Exam, 2000)
Los premios, 1960 (The Winners, 1965)
Rayuela, 1963 (Hopscotch, 1966)
62: Modelo para armar, 1968 (62: A Model Kit, 1972)
Libro de Manuel, 1973 (A Manual for Manuel, 1978)

SHORT FICTION:

Bestiario, 1951
Final del juego, 1956
Las armas secretas, 1959
Historias de cronopios y de famas, 1962 (Cronopios and Famas, 1969)
End of the Game, and Other Stories, 1963 (also as Blow-Up, and Other Stories, 1967)
Todos los fuegos el fuego, 1966 (All Fires the Fire, and Other Stories, 1973)
Octaedro, 1974 (included in A Change of Light, and Other Stories, 1980)
Alguien que anda por ahí y otros relatos, 1977 (included in A Change of Light, and Other Stories, 1980)
Un tal Lucas, 1979 (A Certain Lucas, 1984)
A Change of Light, and Other Stories, 1980
Queremos tanto a Glenda y otros relatos, 1980 (We Love Glenda So Much, and Other Stories, 1983)
Deshoras, 1982

POETRY:

Presencia, 1938 (as Julio Denís)
Los reyes, 1949
Pameos y meopas, 1971
Salvo el crepúsculo, 1984

NONFICTION:

Buenos Aires Buenos Aires, 1968 (English translation, 1968)
Último round, 1969
Viaje alrededor de una mesa, 1970
Prosa del observatorio, 1972 (with Antonio Galvez)
Fantomas contra los vampiros multinacionales: Una utopía realizable, 1975
Literatura en la revolución y revolución en la literatura, 1976 (with Mario Vargas Llosa and Oscar Collazos)
Paris: The Essence of Image, 1981
Los astronautas de la cosmopista: O, Un viaje atemporal Paris-Marsella, 1983 (with Carol Dunlap; Autonauts of the Cosmoroute: A Timeless Voyage from Paris to Marseille, 2007)
Nicaragua tan violentamente dulce, 1983 (Nicaraguan Sketches, 1989)
Cartas, 2000 (3 volumes)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Did Julio Cortázar's works, which he wrote mostly after moving to Europe, depend more on his earlier experiences in Argentina or on his capacity for contemplating his Argentinian background from abroad?
- What does the variety of the writers whose works Cortázar translated reveal about the man?
- Discuss Cortázar's determination to enrich Spanish literature by taking advantage of his mastery of French and English.
- How did the myth of the Minotaur help Cortázar develop one of his important themes?
- What is the likely reason for Cortázar's use of Hopscotch as a title, and how does the work undermine the traditional structure of the novel?
- To what extent can a mixture of fact and fiction, as in A Manual for Manuel, succeed in enhancing his reader's concept of political reality?
- Is an intention to "create disorder" truly a "necessity" for a man with Cortázar's literary ambitions?

TRANSLATIONS:

Robinson Crusoe, 1945 (of Daniel Defoe's novel)

El inmoralista, 1947 (of André Gide's L'Immoraliste)

Vida y Cartas de John Keats, c. 1948-1951 (of Lord Houghton's Life and Letters of John Keats)

El hombre que sabía demasiado, c. 1948-1951 (of G. K. Chesterton's The Man Who Knew Too Much)

Filosofía de la risa y del llanto, 1950 (of Alfred Stern's Philosophie du rire et des pleurs)

La filosofía de Sartre y el psicoanálisis existencialista, 1951 (of Stern's Sartre, His Philosophy and Psychoanalysis)

MISCELLANEOUS:

La vuelta al día en ochenta mundos, 1967 (Around the Day in Eighty Worlds, 1986)

Último round, 1969

Divertimiento, 1986

About the Author

Alazraki, Jaime, and Ivar Ivask, eds. The Final Island: The Fiction of Julio Cortázar. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1978.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Julio Cortázar. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.

Boldy, Steven. The Novels of Julio Cortázar. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1980.

Garfield, Evelyn Picon. Julio Cortázar. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1975.

Harss, Luis, and Barbara Dohmann. "Julio Cortázar, or the Slap in the Face." In Into the Mainstream: Conversations with Latin-American Writers. New York: Harper & Row, 1967.

Schmidt-Cruz, Cynthia. Mothers, Lovers, and Others: The Short Stories of Julio Cortázar. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2004.

Sharkey, E. Joseph. Idling the Engine: Linguistic Skepticism in and Around Cortázar, Kafka, and Joyce. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 2006.

Standish, Peter. Understanding Julio Cortázar. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2001.

Library of Congress

SOR JUANA INÉS DE LA CRUZ

Born: San Miguel Nepantla, New Spain (now in Mexico)
November, 1648 (baptized December 2, 1648)

Died: Mexico City, New Spain (now in Mexico)
April 17, 1695

Primarily known for her poetry, Sor Juana was a leading writer of Mexico's colonial period and is appreciated today as an important figure in Latin American literature.

BIOGRAPHY

Juana Inés de Asbaje y Ramírez de Santillana was born in the small village of San Miguel Nepantla, New Spain (now in Mexico), probably in November, 1648. Although a biography by the Jesuit Diego Calleja lists the date as November 12, 1651, many scholars believe that a baptismal record from her parish dated December 2, 1648, is hers. Her parents, Pedro Manuel de Asbaje and Isabel Ramírez de Santillana, were not officially married, and her father left the household when she was very young. Her writings hardly mention him.

Juana Inés was one of six children, and she was reared by her maternal grandfather at his country home. His library fascinated her. By the age of three she learned to read and by six or seven expressed her desire to go to the university in Mexico City. At the age of eight she composed a dramatic poem to the Eucharist, using the poetic style of the seventeenth century. Her able mind allowed her to learn Latin on her own after only about twenty lessons. This established a pattern of independent learning that was to continue throughout her life.

When she was sixteen, Juana Inés went to the viceroy's court as a lady in the service of the vicereine, Marquesa de Mancera. The two apparently became good friends; they shared a love of the intellectual life. A young woman of Juana Inés's social position had no opportunity for marriage, however, and she had no wish to marry. Her desire to continue studying helped persuade her to enter a convent. In 1667, she entered the Convent of the Discalced Carmelites, but the order was too severe for her. A year later, she found her place in the Order of Saint Jerome and on February 24, 1669, officially became Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (krews).

The regulations of her religious order were not especially strict, although the communal life led by the nuns sometimes interrupted her studies. From 1669 to 1690, she built up a personal library and was able to read broadly to fill in gaps in her education. She also wrote extensively.

The reign of the Marqués de la Laguna as viceroy (1680-1688) was a very productive period in Sor Juana's intellectual life. In true Baroque tradition, she greeted his arrival with a symbolic work, Neptuno alegórico (1680; allegorical Neptune). Among her other works are Primero sueño (1692; First Dream, 1983), which uses mythology and philosophical argument to discuss the relation of the intellect to the senses, and El divino Narciso (pr. c. 1680, pb. 1690; The Divine Narcissus, 1945), a sacramental play with allegorical characters. Poems for special occasions make up much of her other work, and a collection of some of them was published in 1689.

In 1690, Sor Juana's Carta atenagórica (letter worthy of Athena) was published. The letter is a critique of a sermon given by the Portuguese Jesuit Antonio de Vieira on Holy Thursday, 1650, and was published with a brief prologue by the Bishop of Puebla, Manuel Fernández de Santa Cruz. He signed his prologue Sor Filotea de la Cruz and dated it November 25, 1690. The bishop's suggestion that Sor Juana direct her study more to the area of sacred letters brought her famous reply, Respuesta de la poetisa a la muy ilustre Sor Filotea de la Cruz (1700; The Poet's Answer to the Most Illustrious Sister Filotea de la Cruz, 1994). With this famous manuscript, Sor Juana defines herself as an intellectual and defends her thirst for knowledge. She also addresses the question of whether women should be allowed to study. Given the century in which she lived, it is not surprising that she met much opposition to her desire to study.

These letters caused disagreement within the Church, and her confessor, Jesuit Father Antonio Nuñez de Miranda, broke all ties with her. Sor Juana's reply was written in a very frank style because she never expected the letter to be published. When she lost the protective support of her court patronage, her life became more difficult; she experienced increasing opposition within her community.

In 1692, hunger riots and increasing pressure for penitential acts left Sor Juana feeling isolated, and the next year she wrote an affirmation of faith. She renounced her worldly interests, sold her library, and for the last two years of her life wrote nothing. When an epidemic struck the convent, Sor Juana was among those who became ill. She died on April 17, 1695.

ANALYSIS

Sor Juana's fame rests on her lyrical poetry. Her work is highly praised for its use of symbolism, decorative and exotic imagery, hyperbole, contrast, paradox, and references to important fields of learning in her time, such as philosophy, theology, and science. While the modern reader may occasionally wish for a more personal and individual voice behind her writings' highly stylized conventions, her work clearly places her among the poets of the Baroque tradition of Spain. She shares in this tradition with writers like Luis de Góngora y Argote and Pedro Calderón de la Barca. Her poems are demonstrations of talent in manipulating language and form, rather than personal revelations. From the beginning, Sor Juana's writing shows skill in using the styles of her time. Her intelligence and extensive reading are evident. From the time she entered the convent in 1669, Sor Juana wrote many poems, but it is impossible to date them exactly because the originals have been lost and because her style does not exhibit much change. Her works show a great sense of form and proportion and an ability with wordplay and contrasts.

Sor Juana cultivated the full range of poetry typical for her times, including courtly poems, occasional verse (for special occasions and poetry contests), humorous poetry, religious verses (especially villancicos, carols composed to be sung on a religious holiday), and love poetry. Her courtly poems are numerous, but the love poetry is considered more important—among them are some poems considered to be Sor Juana's best.

The critics of her time did not find it strange that a nun would write love poetry. She wrote as a woman of the upper classes and enjoyed the protection of the court. Of course, at the same time she was writing villancicos, an appropriate activity for a nun. Her love poems explore conventional aspects of the theme: the pain of rejection, the beauty of the beloved, the irrationality of being in love, and the emotion of pure and distant love. Some of the poetry is addressed to a shadowy male figure named Silvio or Fabio while other times she speaks in a male persona and addresses her verses to a woman. The latter poems correspond most nearly to convention.

Baroque poetry is characterized by extravagant description and a love of the exotic. Sor Juana's verses incorporate her homeland, Mexico, which was certainly an exotic place from the European perspective. As Mexican poet and cultural critic Octavio Paz has noted, the mestizos and mulattoes she describes are primarily picturesque and semicomical, in keeping with the seventeenth-century view of the low position of such people. One poem introduces an herb doctor and his sorcerer's brew, while another, a villancico, presents the tocotín, a lively Aztec dance complete with Nahuatl words.

When Sor Juana describes her world at court, she creates portraits, exploring as she does so the differences between the subject and his or her portrait. One poem, speaking of a flattering portrait of herself, reflects upon life's illusion and vanity, which ends with death and a return to dust. Other portraits, like one of Lisarda, make fun of the literary style in which they are written, using self-parody. This type of literary game, which is hard for the modern reader to appreciate, contains many imaginative and charming moments.

Writing was an integral part of Sor Juana's identity, and some of her poems use imagery that identifies her with her pen. In one example, her pen produces words of mourning, which she calls black tears. Since pluma in Spanish means both pen and feather, flight and writing can be related with a play on the same word. Pluma in turn represents the whole wing, and the wing contributes to an image of flight. First Dream, for example, identifies intellectual striving and boldness with Phaeton's mythological failed flight in Apollo's chariot.

In the area of religious drama, Sor Juana wrote three plays of the type called an auto sacramental, a one-act play performed during the feast of Corpus Christi. Her best known of these is The Divine Narcissus. Although performed for Corpus Christi, the theme of the Eucharist is very often not central to the action of an auto. These plays, derived from medieval religious plays, were often performed with much pageantry and elaborate costumes. All of Sor Juana's three autos were introduced with prologues called loas. The loa before The Divine Narcissus portrays an Aztec ceremony in which Huitzilopochtli, the god of war, was broken apart and eaten—a clear parallel to the Christian Eucharist.

Sor Juana's most personal works are the poems that address the price of her intellectual distinction. One of her most famous asks why the world hounds her and what harm is done if she chooses to fill her mind with things of beauty rather than worry about outward, physical beauty. She was certainly well aware that being a woman attracted gushy, condescending praise, as well as harsh criticism, for her intellectual accomplishments. In one poem, she wonders whether European readers are too willing to see perfection in her work because a woman who writes well is so unusual, such a special case. Whether criticized or praised, Sor Juana surely experienced the isolation of a woman who was not living within the accepted sphere.

THE DIVINE NARCISSUS

First produced: El divino Narciso, c. 1680
(first published, 1690; English
translation, 1945)

Type of work: Play

This poetic drama presents a series of allegorical tableaux in which Human Nature reveals her search for Christ in the form of Narcissus.

The Divine Narcissus, based in part on the Greek myth of Echo and Narcissus, is considered Sor Juana's masterpiece of religious theater. The characters are all allegorical. The divine Narcissus represents Christ. Human Nature appears as a woman searching for her lover, Narcissus. Echo represents fallen nature or evil and is accompanied by Pride and Self-Love. The play is written in verse and divided into five tableaux with fifteen scenes. Although there is little action, the play is notable for Sor Juana's beautifully lyrical descriptions, as well as the imaginative use of two well-known stories.

In the introductory scene, Synagogue and Gentilism decide to stage a play in which revelation and pagan antiquity will be represented. Human Nature explains the imagery and announces that she must find a spring to cleanse her image, distorted by guilt, so that the Divine Narcissus can again recognize his image in her. Then Echo appears, telling of Narcissus's rejection, which makes her wish to keep Human Nature from achieving a union with him. The second tableau portrays the temptation of Narcissus by Echo. In one of the best scenes of the play, Echo approaches Narcissus as a shepherd maid who pays in unhappiness for the gift of her great beauty. The association of unhappiness and beauty is a common theme of the period. The parallel is to Lucifer, the most beautiful of angels, who, in exile from God, was also the most unhappy. The temptation scene just as clearly parallels Christ's temptation by the devil. The skillful meshing of biblical themes and pagan literature is characteristic of Sor Juana's autos.

Human Nature appears, singing of her despair and longing for Narcissus in the style of the Song of Songs: "Worn out with searching for Narcissus,/ granting my wandering foot no respite." Grace, sent by God, reveals the waters of a fountain that will cleanse Human Nature and that in their purity symbolize the Virgin Mary. Then, in the fourth tableau, Narcissus perceives the beautiful reflected image of himself and Human Nature at the same time and sings of his love: "What surpassing beauty is this,/ beside whose purest light/ the whole celestial sphere turns pale?"

Echo is defeated and can only repeat the last syllables spoken by Pride and Self-Love. The tableau ends with Narcissus expressing the terrible suffering of human love as he yields his spirit to death with the biblical words lamenting his abandonment by the Father. Although Human Nature grieves at first, she is assured that Narcissus lives and that she will be protected by the sacraments.

Sor Juana weaves biblical and pagan elements together to form a unique presentation of a religious theme. Octavio Paz rates it as one of the few autos having the mark of true poetry.

FIRST DREAM

First published: Primero sueño, 1692
(collected in A Sor Juana Anthology, 1988)

Type of work: Poem

The account of a dream remembered during waking hours tells of a search for knowledge that ends in disillusionment.

First Dream, Sor Juana's longest and most ambitious poem, takes the form of a dream retold after waking in the morning. It focuses on a matter of great importance to her: the human desire to know and understand the world. The text demonstrates Sor Juana's own extensive scholarship. It also showcases her poetic skill with images. Central to this work are the numerous images associated with sleep that are woven into her account: night contrasted with day, the dominion of sleep over human beings, sleep as a type of death, the deception of dreams. Sor Juana herself attached great personal significance to this work, and she makes special mention of it in her famous letter, The Poet's Answer to the Most Illustrious Sister Filotea de la Cruz.

In the opening lines, the shadow of night reaches toward the stars, but its "frowning gloom" surrounds only the earth. Night is not able to put out the light of the stars, "splendid lights, forever free, aglow forever." Sor Juana calls the shadow "pyramidal," and her interest in pyramids is explored later in a more intellectual fashion as she discusses Homer's ideas regarding pyramids. The shape reflects the ambition of the mind, mounting upward and attempting ambitiously to grasp the essence of life and the First Cause of creation. Throughout her text, Sor Juana makes use of rhetorical figures to illustrate the action of the searching intelligence. Other parallel images refer to daring flight, including the failed flight of Icarus, whose wings, held on with wax, melted when he flew too close to the sun.

The poem explores the effects of night and darkness, commanding every living creature to sleep. First the animals, then people, fall under the spell. Morpheus, an image of death, is all-powerful—ruler and peasant alike must give in and rest. As the soul frees itself of the body, it begins to contemplate Creation. Scientific references to the four humors and the workings of the body give way to intellectual flight, with references to Atlas, Olympus, and the pyramids of Egypt.

The soul then enters the upper sphere and tries to grasp the immense complexity of creation, but the sheer numbers of creatures and elements in the universe overwhelm the mind. Sor Juana then explores the mental processes of scholastic doctrine, taking up one thing at a time and dividing things into categories. She introduces representative features of the total system but finds her mind frustrated. Debating whether it is wise to try again, the soul is caught by the rising sun. Night gives way, in images of a military retreat. Human senses take over again, and the sleeper, identified as Sor Juana herself, awakes.

Although the ideas are deeply philosophical, the poem derives much of its beauty and subtlety of meaning through references to mythology and the scientific ideas of Sor Juana's time. The verses describing the night and nature's slow yielding to sleep are particularly beautiful. She uses the silva, with eleven-syllable and seven-syllable lines that occasional rhyme but are often free in order and may not rhyme. Once the world has gone to sleep, Sor Juana's soul explores the nature of human intellect. Since the life of the mind was so central to her identity, it is not surprising that this work had a special place in Sor Juana's affections.

"FOOLISH MEN"

First published: "Hombres necios," 1700
(collected in The Answer: Including a Selection of Poems, 1994)

Type of work: Poem

Using logical argument, Sor Juana attacks men's double standard.

Sor Juana's reputation as an early feminist rests upon The Poet's Answer to the Most Illustrious Sister Filotea de la Cruz and upon the poem "Foolish Men." The poem is commonly known by its first two words, "Hombres necios," which translate as "Foolish Men," or by its first line, which translates as "foolish men, who accuse. . . ." "Foolish Men," a poem in defense of women, is among her best-known works. Written in a relatively frank and idiomatic tone, the verses seem strikingly modern. Clearly, Sor Juana had difficulty in her own life with the role assigned to women. Sor Juana's poetry often portrays women as the more logical partners in battles of love with men. Her view of love is certainly not idealized; relationships between men and women are necessarily problematic, and love itself is an unreasonable emotion filled with tension and strife.

"Foolish Men" opens with a blunt accusation against men who are very good at blaming women for faults that men themselves have caused. Sor Juana argues for women, although she never refers to women as "we." Her short verses, in the form of redondillas—stanzas of four lines rhyming abba—move forcefully through her logical argument. The content is easy enough to follow, and Sor Juana repeats her view in various forms of rephrasing. Men win over women's resistance and then, becoming self-righteous, blame them for feminine frivolity. Furthermore, a woman cannot win. If she refuses her suitor, she is ungrateful and cold; if she gives in, she is lewd.

After establishing the problem, Sor Juana poses the question: Who is guiltier if their passion leads to sin? Her implicit answer is obvious. Her concluding verses challenge men to either love women as they have made them, or make them into whatever they would prefer. It is, after all, men's pursuit that leads to women's fall. Her final stanza speaks by her personal authority ("I well know . . .") of men's arrogance. Contrary to the male view of women as the occasion of sin, she presents her own view of men as allied with the devil, the flesh, and the world.

While Sor Juana was not a feminist in the sense of an activist fighting in the public sphere for women's rights, she was conscious of her position as a woman writer, and she did assert her right to develop her intellectual ability. "Foolish Men" confronts prejudice against women directly, but the logical and witty form of the poem puts it in the tradition of seventeenth century Baroque literature.

SUMMARY

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz produced an impressive body of work, including poems and poetic drama. She was admired and considered exceptional during her lifetime. It should be remembered that originality in the seventeenth century meant cleverness in using traditional forms. Sor Juana used her intelligence and perceptiveness to create unique combinations while writing of known themes and ideas. Her work is a pleasure to the senses; her images often surprise and delight.

Susan L. Piepke

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Inundación castálida, 1689

Segundo volumen de las obras, 1692 (the long poem

Primero sueño is translated as First Dream, 1983)

Fama y obras póstumas, 1700

The Sonnets of Sor Juana Ines de la Cruz in English Verse, 2001

DRAMA:

Amor es más laberinto, wr. 1668, pr. 1689 (with Juan de Guevara)

El divino Narciso, pr. c. 1680, pb. 1690 (The Divine Narcissus, 1945)

Los empeños de una casa, pr. c. 1680, pb. 1692 (adaptation of on Lope de Vega Carpio's play La discreta enamorada; A Household Plagued by Love, 1942)

El cetro de José, pb. 1692

El mártir del Sacramento, San Hermenegildo, pr. c. 1692, pb. 1692

The Three Secular Plays of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, pb. 2000

NONFICTION:

Neptuno alegórico, 1680

Carta atenagórica, 1690

Respuesta de la poetisa a la muy ilustre Sor Filotea de la Cruz, 1700 (The Poet's Answer to the Most Illustrious Sister Filotea de la Cruz, 1994)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Obras completas de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, 1951-1957 (4 volumes: I, Lírica personal, poetry; II, Villancicos y letras sacras, poetry; III, Autos y loas, drama; IV, Comedias sainetes y prosa, drama and prose; Méndez Plancarte, editor)

A Sor Juana Anthology, 1988

About the Author

Flynn, Gerard. Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Boston: Twayne, 1971.

Gonzalez, Michelle A. Sor Juana: Beauty and Justice in the Americas. Maryknoll, N.Y.: Orbis Books, 2003.

Hill, Ruth. Sceptres and Sciences in the Spains: Four Humanists and the New Philosophy, c. 1680-1740. Liverpool, England: Liverpool University Press, 2000.

Kirk, Pamela. Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Religion, Art, and Feminism. New York: Continuum, 1998.

Luciani, Frederick. Literary Self-Fashioning in Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 2004.

Merrim, Stephanie, ed. Feminist Perspectives on Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1991.

Montross, Constance M. Virtue or Vice? Sor Juana's Use of Thomistic Thought. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1981.

Paz, Octavio. Sor Juana: Or, The Traps of Faith. Translated by Margaret Sayers Peden. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1988.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Point out some of the ways in which the themes of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz reach far beyond the scope one might expect from a seventeenth-century Mexican nun.
- What themes in Sor Juana's work have generated the interest of readers in the late twentieth century and early twenty-first century?
- Consider First Dream as a poem on the life of the mind.
- Are the "foolish men" in the poem so titled all men or just some men? How effective is this poem more than three centuries after it was written?
- Sor Juana was, and had to be, an obedient member of a religious community. In what ways was she a truly independent woman?

Library of Congress

ROALD DAHL

Born: Llandaff, Wales
September 13, 1916

Died: Oxford, Oxfordshire, England
November 23, 1990

Dahl is noted for his darkly humorous stories of grotesque characters who meet even more grotesque fates as poetic justice, particularly in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, which has twice been adapted for film.

BIOGRAPHY

Roald Dahl was born on September 13, 1916, to a Norwegian family living in Wales. When he was three, his older sister Astri suddenly became ill and died, and his father subsequently lost his will to live, dying from pneumonia shortly afterward. The elder Dahl's last wish was to put the surviving children in English schools, which he perceived as being superior. As a result, Dahl's mother could not return to Norway, where she could receive assistance from family.

However academically rigorous English schools might be, the young Dahl found their discipline policies monstrous and oppressive. Decades afterward he would vividly recall his terror at the continual threat of being beaten with a bamboo or wooden cane. This weapon could create vicious welts on its victim's back and buttocks and leave painful bruises for weeks. Although some of the canings Dahl and his friends received may have been deserved, many of them were the result of the capricious exercise of authority by ill-tempered teachers and older students. The experience left him with a lifelong sympathy for the small and weak and an active detestation of bullies.

However, Dahl's schooldays were not a period of unrelenting horror. While at one school, he was part of a program by which the Cadbury Chocolate Company tested new formulations. At regular periods each student would receive a box containing twenty small bars of chocolate to evaluate. Dahl came to look forward to each distribution, and often imagined the laboratory in which they were created.

When Dahl finished school, he decided not to pursue a university degree because he wanted to see the world. He obtained a job with Shell Oil, which sent him to Tanganyika (now Tanzania) in Africa. While he was there, World War II broke out and he volunteered for the Royal Air Force (RAF). After learning how to fly, he was sent north to another airbase. However, the directions he was given were faulty, and he ran out of fuel before reaching the runway. Injured in the crash landing, he barely escaped his plane before it caught fire.

While he was recuperating from his injuries and it became increasingly clear that he would never again be fit enough to fly, the RAF sent him to Washington, D.C., to serve as an attaché in its embassy. There he was interviewed about his experiences, only to run out of time to answer all of the reporter's questions. He offered to send the reporter some notes to fill in what he had omitted, but the paper he delivered was practically a finished story. The reporter then suggested that he might have a career in writing.

Dahl proved an adept writer, and after some early realistic stories he began to delve into psychological horror in the tradition of Edgar Allan Poe, albeit in contemporary settings. Even after he returned to England after the war, he continued to find American publications his best markets, simply because they paid so much more than British ones. As a result, he made multiple trips to New York, and on one of them he met his future wife, actress Patricia Neal. He nearly missed the opportunity with her, for while he could be a witty conversationalist, he could also be very rude to those he found boring. The evening he met her, he was more interested in talking with another of his dinner companions, and Neal felt so slighted that when he called to ask her on a date the following night, she turned him down. Only when he persisted did she finally relent.

After they married and had children, they settled into a routine by which they summered in England but lived in New York during the rest of the year so that Neal could continue her acting career. However, that arrangement was disrupted when their infant son Theo was struck by a taxicab and nearly killed. Dahl decided New York was simply too dangerous for families and moved back to England full time. The badly injured Theo developed hydrocephalus and required a shunt, which caused troubles of its own. Dahl worked on an improved shunt in an effort to better his son's condition.

Just as things seemed to be improving for Theo, their eldest daughter Olivia died from complications of measles. Then Neal experienced a series of strokes while expecting yet another of their children. At first she was left unable to speak, and only by rigorous therapies designed by Dahl himself did she slowly and painfully regain enough function to return to acting, even if only on a limited basis.

This series of misfortunes left the family in awkward financial straits, and to earn extra money Dahl turned to screenwriting. He wrote the screenplays to two Ian Fleming novels, the James Bond story You Only Live Twice (1967) and the children's story Chitty-Chitty-Bang-Bang (1968).

By the 1970's and 1980's, Dahl's financial situation had become more comfortable. However, he remained a difficult person to deal with, and he often quarreled with his publishers over changes with which he disagreed. After one particularly harsh quarrel, the leading New York publisher Alfred A. Knopf dropped him from its stable of writers. However, Dahl was sufficiently well known that another publisher was willing to put up with his moods, and his intransigence was not the end of his career, as it might have been with a lesser writer.

His moods also destroyed his marriage with Neal, and he subsequently went on to marry Felicity d'Abreau Crossland, whom he had first met when she was a stylist working in the film industry. However, by this point Dahl's health was deteriorating and recurring back and joint problems made it increasingly difficult for him to write. Finally he developed a rare form of leukemia, and on November 23, 1990, he died, leaving a wealth of unpublished manuscripts in various stages of completion.

ANALYSIS

Although Dahl's career began with realistic pieces, such as his fictionalized account of his experience escaping from a wrecked airplane, he soon became known for tales of strange and extreme human behavior. His short stories for adults were often dark and brooding, sometimes involving characters making desperate gambles for extremely high stakes or responding to emotional stresses with sudden outbursts of violence. For instance, in "A Man from the South," the protagonist becomes involved in a gamble in which he will have a finger cut off should he lose his bet.

In his novels for children, he expanded upon this fascination for the macabre, adding fantastical elements. In addition, he drew even deeper upon his childhood experiences of bullies and of abusers of authority to create worlds in which such individuals come to bad ends of the sort that not only perfectly suit their failings and cruelties but often include an element of grotesque humor. Although occasionally an innocent character is harmed, this generally happens "off-camera," often as part of the backstory of the protagonist.

For instance, in James and the Giant Peach (1961), which was inspired when Dahl noted that the peaches in his orchard grew to a certain size before stopping and wondered what would happen if one of them did not stop growing, the title character's parents are killed by a rampaging rhinoceros in a freak accident at the zoo. However, this incident is only told in summary narration as the readers are introduced to James, and it is never actually shown. By contrast, James's wicked aunts, who enjoy tormenting the boy while they have him in their guardianship, are squashed when the giant peach falls from its branch.

Similarly, in The Magic Finger (1966), the protagonist uses her gift to transform a pair of nasty neighbors who refuse to stop hunting the local wildlife. Their transformation, spectacular in its poetic justice, is a surprise which would have been given away had Dahl not yielded to his editor's insistence that he change the original title, The Almost Ducks. In The Twits (1980), the vile and cruel Mr. and Mrs. Twit enjoy tormenting a troop of monkeys by forcing them to stand on their heads. The monkeys have their revenge by tricking the Twits into standing on their heads and promptly stick them there with a powerful glue that Mr. Twit had previously used to capture birds that Mrs. Twit then cooked for supper.

Because of the sheer frequency with which the antagonists of Dahl's stories for children come to grotesque bad ends, Dahl's works have consistently appeared high on the American Library Association's list of most frequently challenged books. However, not every adult in Dahl's books comes to a horrible end. In fact, several of the books feature close bonds between children and adult mentors. In The Witches (1983), the protagonist is aided by his grandmother in defeating the witches' plot to murder all the world's children. In Charlie and the Chocolate Factory (1964, 1973), Charlie chooses Grandpa Joe rather than one of his parents as his adult companion on the tour of the Wonka factory.

"LAMB TO THE SLAUGHTER"

First published: 1953 (collected in Someone Like You, 1953)

Type of work: Short story

An abused young wife murders her husband and tricks the investigating detectives into eating the murder weapon.

In "Lamb to the Slaughter," Dahl shows his mastery of short-form psychological horror, in which the very absence of overtly fantastical elements only accentuates the building atmosphere of horror. The entire story takes place within the apartment of one Mary Maloney, pregnant wife of a loudish and incompetent police detective. Hers has been a steadfastly domestic existence, and she has ignored her husband's misbehavior until one night, when he comes home late after yet another round of drinking and informs her that he is going to leave her for another woman. Still she clings to her illusion of happy domesticity, telling him she will fix supper.

Only when he sneeringly tells her not to bother with supper does she snap and bludgeon him with the frozen leg of lamb that was to have been their meal. After the initial fit of anger, she comes back to her senses and realizes what she has done. Not wanting to ruin the life of the baby she is expecting, she puts the leg of lamb into the oven and goes to the grocery store to get some vegetables. While there, she makes a point of talking cheerfully with the grocer about fixing her husband's supper.

Upon returning to their apartment, she screams in horror and makes a great commotion at finding her husband's body lying on the floor. She then calls the police, and within the hour they are investigating. Agreeing that he was killed by a heavy, blunt object, they begin a search for the murder weapon and are quite puzzled at being unable to find it. After a few hours, Mary comments that she had forgotten to turn the oven off in all the confusion and suggests that the officers might wish to eat the now-cooked leg of lamb. Without a second thought they all set to eating and discussing the case, never realizing that the meat they are avidly devouring is in fact the missing murder weapon. Meanwhile, Mary sits in the living room and giggles softly to herself in amusement at the way in which she has tricked the police.

The ending is particularly striking because it so blatantly violates the expectation of the murder mystery, namely, that the culprit should be caught at the end. Yet at the same time there seems to be a certain justice in Mary's not being caught, that she was in fact justified in taking the life of a man so loudish as to not only betray his wife by dallying with another woman but also to abandon his wife when in the vulnerable state of pregnancy, thus also abandoning his unborn child.

CHARLIE AND THE CHOCOLATE FACTORY

First published: 1964

Type of work: Novel

A poor but virtuous boy wins a ticket to tour a wondrous chocolate factory alongside four vice-ridden children.

As a result of having been adapted to the screen not once but twice, Charlie and the Chocolate Factory is the best known of Dahl's works. Although both the cinematic adaptations follow the general story line, each introduces a certain amount of artistic liberty, which has resulted in some confusion as to the actual plot line of the original novel. For instance, in the 1971 adaptation, the squirrels that are the downfall of Veruca Salt are replaced by giant geese that lay golden chocolate eggs and Slugworth is revealed to be an agent of Wonka's, while in the 2005 adaptation an extensive backstory is created for Wonka. In the first film, the Oompa-Loompas, the midget workers in Wonka's factory, do not sing the songs from the book, while the second film adapts Dahl's lyrics.

The story centers around the title character, Charlie Bucket, who lives with his parents and all four grandparents in a tiny house. Although the story is clearly set in the modern world, as television plays an important part in the plot, there is no evidence of modern social welfare services to ameliorate the poverty of the Bucket family's life, which seems more reminiscent of the Victorian era and Gilded Age. None of Charlie's grandparents seems to be receiving government assistance, and when Charlie's father is laid off from his low-paying job as a result of automation, there is no unemployment check to fend off impending starvation.

However, the anachronistic impoverishment only serves to underline Charlie's love for chocolate and the seeming impossibility of his hopes when he hears reclusive chocolatier Willy Wonka's announcement that he has placed five golden tickets in bars of chocolate around the world. These tickets will admit the bearer to a tour of Wonka's famous candy factory, after which each lucky person will be given a lifetime supply of chocolate.

One by one the golden tickets are found by children whose moral failings are palpably obvious to even the youngest readers. Twice Charlie is given a bar of chocolate as a gift, but neither is a winner. Just as all appears to be lost, he finds some money under a storm grate and uses it to buy a bar of chocolate that contains the final golden ticket.

On the appointed day, Charlie and Grandpa Joe join the other four children and their parents at the steps of the Wonka chocolate factory, where they are admitted for the first time to a wonderland of magical confections. One by one, the other four children fall victim to traps laid by their own vices. The gluttonous Augustus Gloop tries to drink from a river of chocolate, only to fall in and be sucked up by an intake piped directly to the fudge-cooking room. Obsessive gum-chewer Violet Beauregarde chews an experimental meal in a stick of gum and is turned into a giant human blueberry. Spoiled rich kid Veruca Salt tries to seize one of Wonka's nut-sorting squirrels for her own and is dropped down an incinerator chute, although that incinerator was fortunately shut down for maintenance, and she will find not an inferno but a three-day accumulation of garbage to cushion her fall. Obsessive television watcher Mike Teavee tries to teleport himself by Wonka's chocolate-transporting television system and is reduced to a midget only a few inches high.

With the bad children removed, Charlie's virtue becomes obvious and Wonka announces that Charlie has won the biggest prize of all. He will become Wonka's heir and student, and all of his family are invited to move into the chocolate factory with him. In a moment of triumph, Wonka leads Charlie and Grandpa Joe into the Great Glass Elevator, which proves capable not only of moving in every direction within the chocolate factory but also can fly.

SUMMARY

Roald Dahl's greatest strength lies in his mastery of the grotesque, by which he can evoke both humor and horror. Again and again in his works villains meet comeuppances at once bizarre and red-olent of poetic justice. Bullies and abusers of authority come in for particular attention in Dahl's fun-house-mirror worlds, regularly meeting absurd ends that perfectly match their vices. Yet at the same time Dahl never crosses the line to the gruesome or disgusting. The ends to which his villains come, particularly in his writing for children, are just absurd enough to be clearly divorced from reality, and thus the reader feels free to laugh.

Leigh Husband Kimmel

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

- The Gremlins*, 1943
James and the Giant Peach, 1961
Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, 1964, 1973
The Magic Finger, 1966
Fantastic Mr. Fox, 1970
Charlie and the Great Glass Elevator, 1972
Danny, the Champion of the World, 1975
The Wonderful World of Henry Sugar, 1977 (pb. in England as The Wonderful Story of Henry Sugar and Six More, 1977)
The Complete Adventures of Charlie and Mr. Willy Wonka, 1978 (omnibus edition)
The Enormous Crocodile, 1978
The Twits, 1980
George's Marvelous Medicine, 1981
Revolting Rhymes, 1982
The BFG, 1982
Dirty Beasts, 1983
The Witches, 1983
The Giraffe and the Pelly and Me, 1985
Matilda, 1988
Rhyme Stew, 1989
Esio Trot, 1990
The Minpins, 1991
The Vicar of Nibbleswicke, 1991
My Year, 1993
The Umbrella Man, and Other Stories, 1998 (pb. in England as The Great Automatic Grammatizator, and Other Stories)

LONG FICTION:

- Sometime Never: A Fable for Supermen*, 1948
My Uncle Oswald, 1979

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What cues does Roald Dahl use in "Lamb to the Slaughter" to create the false expectations that one is reading a murder mystery and thus set the reader up for the shocking ending?
- Discuss the multiple meanings of the title "Lamb to the Slaughter."
- How does Dahl use the unusual names of his characters to telegraph their flaws?
- Compare and contrast the original book version of Charlie and the Chocolate Factory and the two cinematic adaptations: Willy Wonka & the Chocolate Factory (1971), starring Gene Wilder, and Charlie and the Chocolate Factory (2005), starring Johnny Depp.
- Discuss the changes made to Charlie and the Chocolate Factory in response to charges of racism.
- Compare the protagonists' relationships with their grandparents in Charlie and the Chocolate Factory and The Witches.
- Discuss the significance of the order in which the bad children are eliminated from the tour of the Wonka factory.

Roald Dahl

SHORT FICTION:

Over to You: Ten Stories of Flyers and Flying, 1946

Someone Like You, 1953

Kiss, Kiss, 1959

Twenty-Six Kisses from Roald Dahl, 1960

Selected Stories of Roald Dahl, 1968

Twenty-Nine Kisses, 1969

Selected Stories, 1970

Switch Bitch, 1974

Tales of the Unexpected, 1977

The Best of Roald Dahl, 1978

Taste, and Other Tales, 1979

A Roald Dahl Selection: Nine Short Stories, 1980

More Tales of the Unexpected, 1980

Completely Unexpected Tales, 1986

The Roald Dahl Omnibus, 1986

Two Fables, 1986

A Second Roald Dahl Selection: Eight Short Stories, 1987

Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life, 1989

The Collected Short Stories of Roald Dahl, 1991

Skin, and Other Stories, 2000

DRAMA:

The Honeys, pr. 1955

SCREENPLAYS:

You Only Live Twice, 1967 (with Harry Jack Bloom)

Chitty Chitty Bang Bang, 1968 (with Ken Hughes)

The Night-Digger, 1970

The Lightning Bug, 1971

Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory, 1971 (adaptation of his novel)

NONFICTION:

Boy: Tales of Childhood, 1984

Going Solo, 1986

Memories with Food: At Gipsy House, 1991 (with Felicity Dahl)

About the Author

Cooling, Wendy. D Is for Dahl. New York: Viking Penguin Young Readers Group, 2005.

Donkin, Andrew. Roald Dahl and His Chocolate Factory. London: Scholastic, 2002.

Farrell, Barry. Pat and Roald. New York: Random House, 1969.

Gelletly, LeeAnne. Gift of Imagination: The Story of Roald Dahl. Greensboro, N.C.: Morgan Reynolds, 2006.

Treglown, Jeremy. Roald Dahl: A Biography. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1994.

Library of Congress

DANTE

Born: Florence (now in Italy)

May or June, 1265

Died: Ravenna (now in Italy)

September 13 or 14, 1321

Dante introduced the use of vernacular language in poetry and pioneered the secular use of allegory, creating verse which is simultaneously historical, universal, and intensely personal.

BIOGRAPHY

Dante (DAH-n-tay) Alighieri was born in Florence sometime in May or June, 1265. His family was of the minor nobility, though neither wealthy nor particularly famous. What details exist concerning his background and career come from his own writings, from the sketch written by his neighbor Giovanni Villani, from the eulogy written after his death by Giovanni Boccaccio, and from the fifteenth century biography written by Leonardo Bruni. The miscellaneous nature of these sources, the fictive elements incorporated in Dante's own biographical references, and the welter of legend that surrounds his life make it difficult to isolate fact from fiction; nevertheless, certain things are clear.

Dante's family name was Alagherius in its latinized form, was spelled Alaghieri during his lifetime, and was written Alighieri in the centuries following his death. His given name is a shortened form of Durante. He was deprived of both parents relatively early in his life, his mother having died when he was a boy and his father (who had subsequently remarried) in the year 1283. His father's death thus corresponds exactly to Dante's coming-of-age. He had a half brother, Francesco, and a half sister, Tana, both children of his father's second marriage. There was another sister, though it is impossible to say whether she was Dante's full or half sister. Based on Dante's own testimony, he had a happy childhood.

It is clear that Dante came from a family that valued education. He had his elementary training from the Dominicans, and he attended the Franciscan school of Santa Croce in his youth. His writings indicate a close familiarity with both country and city life, which he acquired at a relatively early age. Dante's interests in his youth thus paralleled those of other young men from his class and background; they included travel, a knowledge of art and drawing, music, but most of all, an abiding interest in poetry.

The most important early counsel that Dante received in his youth came from Guido Cavalcanti, who was twelve years Dante's senior and came from the wealthy Cavalcante family. Guido would become Dante's first friend in the personal, as well as the literary, sphere. More questionable insofar as its desirability was Dante's early association with Forese Donati, brother of Corso Donati. Corso was the leader of the Florentine political faction known as the Blacks. It was Corso who massacred and expelled the opposing Whites in 1301. The story of Corso's death appears in Purgatorio 24 of La divina commedia (c. 1320; The Divine Comedy, 1802), related by Forese. These political involvements would provide an important element in Dante's poetry but would also be the source of his personal frustration and the reason for his eventual exile from the city. It was possibly at the urging of Forese that Dante took part in the Battle of Campaldino on June 11, 1289, the decisive engagement of Florence's campaign against the neighboring town of Arezzo. By this time, Dante was a young husband, having married Gemma Donati, a fourth cousin to Forese and Corso, sometime between 1283 and 1285. It was an arranged marriage with a relatively wealthy family, the dowry set as early as 1277, but it also solidified Dante's political connections with the Donati family.

Subsequent to his marriage, between the years 1287 and 1289, Dante was in Bologna, possibly for university-level studies. The deep debt into which he fell between the years 1290 and 1300 was likely aggravated by the cost of these studies combined with those of Dante's growing family. He and Gemma would have two sons, Pietro and Jacopo, and one daughter, probably named Antonia Beatrice. Nothing is known of a child named Giovanni, whose signature appears on a contract drafted at Lucca in 1308, except that he calls himself the "son of Dante Alighieri of Florence."

Dante's first involvements in the political life of Florence date from 1295. He worked tirelessly during this period for Florentine independence and against extension of papal political influence. For two months during the summer of 1300, he served as one of the six priors of the city, served as Florence's representative to San Gimignano in the same year, and was commissioned in 1301 to supervise the widening of a street. While on a mission to Rome, opposing political factions indicted him on a trumped-up charge of embezzlement and condemned him first to payment of a fine, then to exile, and then to death. It is likely that Dante could have restored himself to the city through payment of a fine; yet he refused to do this. Instead, he spent the first few months of 1302 in conspiracy with other Florentine exiles, but soon thereafter, disgusted by their violent radicalism, he went his own way and accepted the life of an exile. His wife and family, however, remained in Florence, so the years that followed were increasingly lonely and filled with frustration.

Fortunately, Dante could turn for assistance to several wealthy friends and patrons during his years as a wandering exile, and the first of these was the Scala family of Verona. Alberto della Scala and his three sons Bartolommeo, Alboino, and Francesco (Can Grande) held sovereignty in Verona from 1262 to 1329 and brought a period of unparalleled peace and stability to the city. Each would provide the Florentine exile, at various times of his wanderings, with the support necessary to sustain him.

Dante left Verona in 1304, most likely after the death of Alberto's eldest son, Bartolommeo. He returned to Bologna at this time, probably to the university, where he had been known as early as 1287. His wanderings subsequently brought him to Padua and in the same year, 1306, to Lunigiana, the city of the Malaspina family. The period at Lunigiana is documented by Dante's service to the Malaspinas both as negotiator and attorney, assisting in their conclusion of an agreement of peace with the bishop of Luni. Boccaccio and Villani report Dante's subsequent travels throughout northern Italy, following the course of the Arno and perhaps, from 1307 to 1309, establishing residence in Paris.

When Henry VII (Henry of Luxembourg) became Holy Roman Emperor in 1312, Dante hoped that some rapprochement of church and state would be possible. Three letters that Dante wrote in 1310 and 1311 praise Henry's idealism and indicate the poet's support for the imperial program. Still, Henry's invasion came to naught; the papacy, which had promised its support, turned against him, and Henry died near Siena in 1313. Dante's own hopes for triumphant return to Florence died with the emperor.

Two cities offered Dante sanctuary from the political turmoil that attended Henry's death: Verona and Ravenna. Francesco (Can Grande) della Scala of Verona provided immediate asylum, though Dante would spend his final years under the patronage of Guido Novello da Polenta of Ravenna. Guido was a nephew of Francesca da Rimini, whose illicit love for Paolo da Malatesta had by this time been immortalized by Dante in Inferno 5 of The Divine Comedy. Ravenna would be Dante's home until his death. He spent his final years engaged on occasional diplomatic missions for Guido, one of which was an embassy to Venice. Though he never returned to Florence, he died hoping that Can Grande, influential among the Ghibellines, would bring stability and an end to factionalism in northern Italy. Dante died in Ravenna, Italy, on September 13 or 14, 1321.

ANALYSIS

Political alignments caused Dante's exile, but exile broadened Dante's historical perspective and thus provided an important dimension for his verse. The attribute one most closely associates with Dante's mature poetry is, indeed, his ability to universalize particular historical details. He is able to see all human experience in terms of his own, and there is little doubt that his long period of wandering and his life as an exile, begun in middle age and continued through the rest of his life, furnished the salvation metaphor central to The Divine Comedy.

From the earliest period of his life, Dante was fascinated with the possibilities of vernacular Italian as the medium for his poetry. Even in his student verse, he had moved away from classically inspired convention and what he considered its artificiality. His relationship to the classical past is something that he clearly acknowledges; it is implied by the fact that he elects to have Vergil, the prominent poet of Latin literature, lead his Pilgrim through Hell and Purgatory. It is also the writers of classical Greece and Rome who welcome the Pilgrim as one of their fraternity in the Limbo of the Poets (Inferno 4). This reception and its location in the region of the unbaptized indicate that, at the beginning of his journey, and correspondingly at the beginning of his career as a poet, Dante derived satisfaction from his relationship to the classical tradition. Correspondingly, the fact that the Pilgrim leaves Vergil behind when he enters Paradise implies more than that only the baptized can enjoy the Beatific Vision. In effect, the progress of the Pilgrim equals the progress of the Poet. The wandering exile, the man searching for meaning in his own life and in life generally, the poet who is ambitious and who seeks to surpass the poets who have influenced him—all of these are simultaneously Dante.

Still another indication that Dante would accept such a description of his life and work (which became for him synonymous) appears in his treatment of Brunetto Latini in Inferno 15. Brunetto, his former teacher, appears among the sodomites. This sensational context, seen in terms of Dante's aesthetics, becomes, however, an argument against stultifying imitation, a verbal sodomy that feeds upon the conventions of the past and thus inhibits genuine progress. In truth, the meaning of the Brunetto canto is one of the most disputed in Dante's poem; yet, this view of its meaning, that it provides an important key to Dante's philosophy of composition through the criticism that it implies, does not preclude the debt that Dante felt to Brunetto as his teacher. If anything, it underscores the difference between a teacher (who privileges the value of the past and transmits it) and the superior creative artist (who uses the past but privileges innovation and originality).

One measure of Dante's ability to make innovative change appears in the figure of Beatrice. It is likely that he based his creation upon the daughter of Folco dei Portinari, a wealthy Florentine who died in 1289. It matters relatively little whether one accepts this testimony, provided by Boccaccio. If so, however, it makes the relationship poignant and Platonic, for this Beatrice died a young bride (the wife of the banker Simone dei Bardi) at the age of twenty-four. What is important for Dante's aesthetics is that Beatrice illustrates the remarkable way that Dante alters the conventions of courtly love as it had appeared in medieval poetry.

If one believes the tradition, Dante saw Beatrice for the first time when she was nine years of age, on May 1, 1274. His love grows, documented in La vita nuova (c. 1292; Vita Nuova, 1861; better known as The New Life), though his lady remains unnamed and never reciprocates the poet's attentions. The unnamed persona of The New Life finds her ultimate development in the Paradiso, the final canticle of The Divine Comedy. In this context, she literally shows the Pilgrim the way to blessedness, and she figuratively allows the Poet to describe infinite love through finite language. She intercedes to secure the Pilgrim's initial impetus toward salvation, but she simultaneously employs Vergil, whose Aeneid (c. 29-19 B.C.E.; English translation, 1553) had helped inspire the formation of the Poet, as the primary agent of that salvation.

THE NEW LIFE

First published: La vita nuova, c. 1292
(English translation, 1861)

Type of work: Poetry

This collection of verse and commentary traces the progress of the poet's love for an unnamed woman and the progress of the poet in the pursuit of his art.

The New Life is a logical precursor of The Divine Comedy; both involve the figure of Beatrice, and both show a marked concern with the aesthetics of writing verse. Both also deal with love, though at this point arises the important distinction: Though pure in both works, the love in The Divine Comedy is divine and therefore infinite. It engineers the Pilgrim's salvation through the figure of Beatrice and guides the Poet's progress as would a Muse. The unnamed woman of The New Life, identifiable with Beatrice, is closer, as portrayed, to the feminine persona of courtly poetry, and the love that she represents is transcendent.

The poems of The New Life, though arranged as chronological narrative, were not written as a cycle; indeed, many date from Dante's youth. The first, for example, is an extraordinary dream poem originally sent for comment to Guido Cavalcanti. Guido was older than Dante and a proud, disdainful Florentine Gueff. He was quick to seize on the sonnet's strong psychological implications. Love appears as a feudal lord. In his arms he holds a sleeping woman, who is naked except for a blood-red cloak thrown about her. In his hand he holds the poet's heart. Love then awakens the woman, convinces her to eat the poet's heart, then departs with her, and the dream ends. Though written considerably earlier than The New Life, this sonnet sets the psychological tone for the entire work. Without knowing, the lady has consumed the poet's heart and, by extension, his soul and his life; the poet's own love is the means by which she has done this.

Poems, however, constitute only one part of The New Life. Accompanying them are two kinds of commentary. The first is prose narrative that illuminates the verse that follows it. The second, which immediately follows and appears whenever the poet deems necessary, is a commentary on the poem's prosody itself. For example, the commentary on the dream poem notes that it is divided into two parts, that it initiates a response and resolves it, and that it was controversial when Dante had first circulated it, but that it ultimately won for him a special friend and mentor (Cavalcanti), who, however, remains unnamed.

This second variety of commentary breaks the narrative of the prose commentaries that introduce and link the verse; nevertheless, the commentaries on prosody indicate that the process through which Dante created The New Life is just as important to him as the work itself. Admittedly, Dante handles his concern with aesthetics less gracefully in this work than in The Divine Comedy; still, the privileged place that he implicitly assigns to prosody by including technical commentaries indicates his clear thesis that a poet grows artistically in direct proportion to the poem as it is written.

Even at the point when Beatrice dies, the logical climax and the place where one might expect some particularly personal element to appear, Dante refuses to allow it. Instead, he introduces a quotation from the lamentations of the book of Jeremiah to suggest the depth of his grief, notes that he cannot provide details about her death, and in the following section precisely calculates by the Arabic method the hour, day, and month on which she died. The result is that the reader dwells upon the mystical nature of the experience. The poet first encounters the woman as she begins her ninth year, and she dies on the ninth day of the ninth month. Thus, although one can calculate that the unnamed love dies on June 8, 1290 (by the Roman calendar), the affair becomes universalized, even stylized, in a way that implies a symmetry in the stages of life.

The depersonalization of the poet's style underscores the poet's thesis: to fix upon those moments that mark the beginnings of a new life. To provide every detail would limit the experience to only those persons immediately concerned. Leaving such details unwritten makes memory, that of the reader, as well as of the poet, essential to a reading of the work. The New Life thus marks an important stage in the poet's development as a poet. It logically precedes The Divine Comedy insofar as it lacks the latter poem's highly personal references; yet it resembles this work as a journal of universalized human experience.

The New Life provides additional linkages that unify its discontinuous narrative. Besides the numerology that frames the poet's encounters with the Beatrice figure, the three meetings themselves occur at times that mark stages of the poet's own life. The first, discussed above, is the childhood meeting that occurs at the end of the poet's ninth year and the beginning of the Beatrice figure's ninth year. This point marks the poet's boyhood; he realizes that the encounter is meaningful, for it affects his vital, animal, and natural spirits. Yet this tumult is sexless; what has taken place is a fundamental alteration in the poet's perceptions and a basic development in his personality.

The second encounter takes place nine years later in the ninth hour of the day. Now the poet sees the Beatrice figure, who actually greets him. The physical dimension adds to the nature of the experience. Again, the poet has reached a new stage in his life. He retires to his room and experiences the dream noted above. The personification of Love, his declaration Ego dominus tuus (I am your master), the naked Beatrice figure clothed only with a crimson cloth, and her eating of the poet's heart all add to the sexual innuendo. That the woman is the same one who greeted the poet is clear. She is both la donna de la salute (the lady of the greeting) and the lady of the poet's salvation. The poet inquires of many trovatori (troubadours), somewhat naïvely, the meaning of the dream, and this juncture introduces his primo amico (first friend), the otherwise unnamed Cavalcanti. Again, the poet realizes that he has reached a new stage in life but senses even more that the physical dimension has lessened the spirituality of his love. The overwhelming emotion is regret, not lust, and the screen-love device, the poet's substitution of another woman for his true love, represents his attempt to preserve the purity of the original experience. Appropriately, it is the Love persona himself who counsels the poet to adopt this ruse, and it succeeds so well that the poet acquires the reputation of a roué. When Beatrice next passes him, she withholds her greeting. The greeting in this context assumes the dimension of a benefaction, akin to the creative inspiration that a Muse might furnish. That it is withheld signals a nadir of the poet's creative activity, just as it indicates another stage in the poet's life.

Sorrow is the predominant emotion at this point, and the Love figure reappears to counsel that the poet abandon his screen-love ruse. The Love figure, who speaks only in Latin, declares that he is the center of a circle at which all points of the circumference are equidistant. In other words, the poet, though he recognizes the transcendence of love, cannot know love's eternity. That, in essence, is the creative problem with which Dante as a poet must grapple; indeed, it is one that he manages to surmount only in The Divine Comedy.

Fate increasingly informs the pattern of life after this experience. At a wedding reception, the poet suddenly senses the presence of Beatrice. He attempts to distract himself by looking at the paintings that adorn the walls of the house, then raises his eyes only to discover Beatrice herself. Again, he swoons and observes that at this point he has moved to that stage of life beyond which it is impossible to return to what had been. Death and the poet's awareness of his mortality intrude when a young woman dies, when Beatrice's father dies, and when the poet himself falls seriously ill. In the ninth day of his illness, the poet reflects on the inadequacy of life and its brevity. Again a dream intrudes, this time a nightmare, in which disheveled women in mourning first warn the poet of his mortality, then declare him dead. Beatrice is among them, and in the same dream a friend appears to tell the poet that Beatrice herself has died. The landscape clouds over, and the natural world appears fundamentally changed, much as it had at the death of Christ. Even so, the poet now witnesses his beloved's assumption into heaven. The poet recognizes the beatitude that attends death, and he himself wishes to die.

This vision foreshadows the actual death of Beatrice. The poet sees her death as a divine judgment that the world had been unworthy of one so perfect. Following the death of Beatrice, a young woman pities the poet in his mourning. He accepts her pity and thereby recognizes the mortal, as well as the transcendent, power of love. His sorrow thus passes beyond mortal bounds and arrives at the Empyrean, the largest sphere of First Cause, in which Beatrice herself dwells for all time.

THE DIVINE COMEDY

First published: La divina commedia, c. 1320
(English translation, 1802)

Type of work: Poetry

Through the medium of secular allegory, Dante simultaneously individualizes, universalizes, and describes symbolically the circularity of life's journey.

The Divine Comedy represents the mature Dante's solution to the poet's task announced in The New Life. Its three canticles (the Inferno, the Purgatorio, and the Paradiso) display a nearly limitless wealth of references to historical particulars of the late Middle Ages and to Dante's life. Even so, its allegorical form allows these to function as symbols. The Pilgrim's journey through Hell to Heaven thus becomes an emblem of all human experience and a recognition of life's circularity. The "Comedy" of its title is, therefore, the situation of life and the accumulation of experience that attends it.

Correspondingly, however, chronological placement of the narrative from Good Friday through Easter Sunday, 1300, particularizes the experience even as it implies the death and rebirth that attends a critical stage of any person's life. The poet tells his readers in the first line of the Inferno that he is midway through life, and indeed Dante would have been thirty-five years of age in 1300. Though he maintains present tense throughout the poem, he is, however, actually writing in the years that follow the events that he describes. This extraordinary method allows the Poet to place what amounts to prophetic utterance in the mouth of the Pilgrim. Dante thus maintains and further develops the thesis of The New Life, that the progress of the Pilgrim corresponds directly to the progress of the Poet. The literal journey that the Pilgrim undertakes toward the Beatific Vision succeeds only insofar as the Poet can transcend the finite barriers that signification imposes upon language.

If one understands the task of the poem in these terms, the exponential symbolism of The Divine Comedy becomes inescapably clear. Like every human being, Dante carries the intellectual burden of what has formed him. At midlife, this includes the historical influences of his time and the artistic influences of what he has read. His task is to use these to direct his life's journey and, if he is able, to transcend them. His inspiration for doing this is the same feminine persona that appears in The New Life, though in The Divine Comedy Dante specifically identifies her as Beatrice. Her name implies the grace that she represents, and it is noteworthy that she intercedes with St. Lucy, patroness of the blind, and with the Blessed Virgin Mary to set the Pilgrim on the course toward Paradise. Beatrice thus represents efficient grace, Lucy illuminating grace, and Mary prevenient grace. Collectively, they oppose the three visions of sin (Leopard, Lion, and She-wolf) that obstruct the Pilgrim's path.

The women logically employ the Roman poet Vergil as the Pilgrim's guide through Hell and Purgatory. Vergil represents the achievement of pre-Christian antiquity. His poem the Aeneid (c. 29-19 B.C.E.; English translation, 1553) is the logical forerunner of the poem that Dante hopes to write. Dante, if successful in his journey as Pilgrim and Poet, will synthesize the epic of classical antiquity with the allegory of biblical literature. Understandably, the Pilgrim protests to Vergil that he is neither Aeneas nor St. Paul. This protestation reflects the Poet's awareness of the daunting artistic task of fusing pre-Christian and Christian thought as much as it does the Pilgrim's awareness of the long distance between Hell and Heaven. In reality, they are one and the same journey, and Dante undertakes both tasks simultaneously in The Divine Comedy. Appropriately, Vergil can guide the Pilgrim only through Hell and in the ascent of Mount Purgatory. Past that point the pre-Christian past cannot venture. St. Bernard and ultimately Beatrice will guide the Pilgrim through Heaven; yet Vergil (and the pre-Christian wisdom that he represents) offers enough direction to ensure that the Pilgrim reaches Heaven's threshold.

The sinners whom the Pilgrim beholds as he descends through the circles of Hell correspond generically to the three specters that had haunted him in the wood before Vergil's arrival. The sins of the Leopard are serious but unpremeditated. Paolo da Malatesta and Francesca, the adulterous lovers of Inferno 5, are good representatives of this grouping. For political reasons and as an alliance of families, Francesca was married to the deformed Gianciotto, son of Malatesta da Verrucchio and ruler of Rimini, but she fell in love with Gianciotto's handsome younger brother Paolo. Gianciotto caught Paolo and Francesca in adultery and murdered them both. Dante bases his depiction of their affair upon these historical personages; Francesca was aunt to Guido Novello di Polenta, Dante's friend and host at Ravenna during his years of exile. Even so, he makes the immediate cause of their adultery their reading of a book, the tale of Guinevere and Lancelot. Guinevere, too, had married a man older than she, King Arthur of Camelot; like Francesca, she fell in love with a handsome younger man. Lancelot thus corresponds to Paolo, Guinevere to Francesca, and Arthur to Gianciotto. Dante thus describes seduction by language, calling the book that Paolo and Francesca read a panderer. Its language has seductive charms but was wrongly directed. Paolo and Francesca burn intertwined in a single flame in punishment for their sin, but their punishment effectively extends their passion into eternity.

The Brunetto Latini episode of Inferno 15, the soothsayers' canto of Inferno 20, as well as many of the other encounters that the Pilgrim has with sinners stress wrong use of language. Brunetto's was wrong because it pridefully paid too great a debt to the past and did not seek transcendence. When Dante's Vergil recounts a version of the founding of his native Mantua, which differs from that which the Roman poet had provided in his own Aeneid 10.101, then makes the Pilgrim promise to believe only that which he has now spoken, Dante questions in another way the timeless signification of words with reference only to the natural order. He also implies that there is nothing inherently mantic about a poem, not even Vergil's Aeneid, and makes Vergil himself articulate the thought.

The topography of Dante's Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven violates the conventional Christian conception of these states because of his use of the gyre to describe each. As the Pilgrim descends Hell's circles, the sinners appear more bound to their sin. Paolo and Francesca burn in perpetual consummation of their passion at Hell's top, but at its frozen core Vanni Fucci curses God, and Judas Iscariot stands frozen beside Satan. The topographical arrangement implies degrees of offense, yet all sinners in Hell have mortally offended God. Gyre imagery continues as the Pilgrim and Vergil ascend Mount Purgatory. Though its gyres are more discrete than those of Hell, the chaos of sin rules within each of its precincts, mitigated only to the degree that the sinners trust in the divine mercy that will allow them to reach Heaven.

Dante's Mount Purgatory consequently has three major regions through which the Pilgrim and Vergil ascend: ante-Purgatory, occupied by those who failed to use the grace that divine mercy had provided them in life; lower Purgatory, the region for the proud, envious, and wrathful; and upper Purgatory, reserved for the slothful, covetous, gluttonous, and lustful. At its summit is an earthly paradise corresponding to Eden, as well as to the Elysium of Aeneid 6. Logically, Vergil cannot venture beyond this stage both because of his status as pre-Christian and because of his achievement as a poet. As Purgatory implies the reconstitution of a soul, its mountain requires an ascent that corresponds to the descent through Hell. The process that it imposes upon its sinners is purificatory rather than penal, and so it is appropriate that all of its souls at some period, whether on arrival or after preliminary cleansing in ante-Purgatory, must pass through Peter's Gate. After the sinners have demonstrated their desire for Heaven by ascending the three steps of penitence (confession, contrition, and satisfaction), an angel inscribes seven P's upon their foreheads (peccata) for the seven capital sins (pride, covetousness, lust, anger, gluttony, envy, and sloth). These vanish singly as the soul ascends each cornice. Once again, signification emerges as a dominant aspect of Dante's allegory. Inscribing the P's enforces the souls' awareness of the sin that had existed hidden in life. The Pilgrim grows in his appreciation of the unspoken word as the Poet grows in his ability to express the ineffable in words whose signification is conventionally finite.

It is in Purgatorio 30 that the Pilgrim, awakened in the Edenic paradise by the approach of Beatrice, realizes that Vergil is no longer with him. The fears of the Pilgrim at this apparent abandonment by his guide correspond to those of the Poet, who realizes that from this point the artistic task is his alone. This realization creates impressive tension between the status of the journey, whose successful outcome would appear assured, and the task of the Poet, whose task of reconciling heavily weighted allegorical language with the limitless signification of the infinite necessary to describe the nature of Heaven grows more challenging.

The poetry of Paradiso does assume a more mystical character, which enlists the full imaginative powers of the reader. In a way impossible in either the Inferno or the Purgatorio, the reader becomes a participant in the transforming experience that Heaven imposes. The gyres recur, though as circles of the blessed grouped around the Beatific Vision. Even among those saved, the capacity to appreciate the infinite varies directly with their distance from the Vision itself. The Poet thus asks the reader to accept a paradox, which once granted, allows finite language's reconciliation with the Logos itself. It is Dante's most extraordinary achievement of all, and it is the key to an appreciation that is worthy of the Paradiso.

Beatrice now assumes an active role in the direction of the Pilgrim. They rise from the earth into the heavenly Empyrean, the abode of God, within which revolves the Primum Mobile, the swiftest and outermost of the heavens. The light of the sun, the music of the spheres, and the gaze of Beatrice, all representing spiritual illumination and enlightenment, increasingly fill the cantos of the Paradiso and replace the doubt, darkness, and periodic faintings of the Pilgrim on his passage through Hell and Purgatory.

Much emphasis rests upon the degrees of happiness that the blessed of Heaven experience. Piccarda dei Donati and the Empress Constance both reside in a lesser sphere of bliss; both had been forced to leave the spiritual life that they would have preferred and enter into forced marriages. Even so, Piccarda and Constance experience a full measure of happiness. In another paradox, they know the infinite bliss of Heaven to the full measure of their ability to comprehend it. Their joy is no less than that of the souls that are closer to the Beatific Vision, even though they reside within a considerably lower sphere.

In the Ptolemaic cosmos, which informs The Divine Comedy, all the planets (including for Dante the Sun and Moon) orbit the earth upon a series of transparent concentric spheres. These celestial spheres provide the external order that characterizes Heaven. They guide the seven heavenly bodies that circle the earth: Moon, Mercury, Venus, Sun, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. Beyond the planets is the Sphere of Fixed Stars, and still further is the Primum Mobile. Beyond all nine spheres lies the Empyrean, Dante's unmoved, eternal, boundless region in which the Logos and the saints reside. This conception of Heaven is another means by which the Poet allows his poem to move beyond limited signification and approach the unchanging infinity of First Cause.

Central to portrayal of the Primum Mobile is the symbol of the Celestial Rose. It is a circle of white light within which is a golden center of God's glory. White petals rise in a thousand tiers, and upon these sit the blessed: saints of the old law at one side, saints of the new on the other; little children arranged immediately around the golden center; virtuous women in one descending portion, saintly men in another opposite location. Beams of divine glory, comparable to sunbeams but carried by angels, bear divine love to the created world, not of necessity but from divine graciousness.

As the Pilgrim nears the Beatific Vision, he comprehends all the contradictions that had filled his life's journey. He compares himself to the geometer, who knows it is theoretically possible to square the circle, yet he recognizes the limitations that language imposes upon any attempt to describe accurately what he sees. The image of divinity seems self-sufficient, self-defined, simultaneously that of the Pilgrim and of all humanity. The single word that allows the Poet to describe it is "love," the boundless ability that is assuredly human but that also moves the sun and stars.

SUMMARY

Love's transcendent power directs both The New Life and The Divine Comedy to their conclusions. Though entirely different in their scope and complexity, both works ratify this transcendence through the signification of language and the figure of Beatrice. Still, one indication of the aesthetic distance between the two works is that the former emphasizes that love offers the means by which life evolves, while the latter identifies pure love as the First Cause of the cosmos itself. It is a mark of Dante's artistry that he manages to universalize the highly personal situations upon which both works depend. Ultimately, in The Divine Comedy, the mode of allegory allows him to do that even as he retains thousands of particularized references; yet the anonymity of The New Life is a clear indication that he had always sought the dolce stil nuovo ("sweet new style") that he would realize in his maturity.

Robert J. Forman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

La vita nuova, c. 1292 (Vita Nuova, 1861; better known as The New Life)

La divina commedia, c. 1320 (3 volumes; The Divine Comedy, 1802)

NONFICTION:

Epistolae, c. 1300-1321 (English translation, 1902)

De vulgari eloquentia, c. 1306 (English translation, 1890)

Il convivio, c. 1307 (The Banquet, 1887)

De monarchia, c. 1313 (English translation, 1890; also known as Monarchy, 1954; better known as On World Government, 1957)

"Epistola X," c. 1316 (English translation, 1902)

Eclogae, 1319 (Eclogues, 1902)

Quaestio de aqua et terra, 1320 (English translation, 1902)

Translation of the Latin Works of Dante Alighieri, 1904

Literary Criticism of Dante Alighieri, 1973

About the Author

Bemrose, Stephen. A New Life of Dante. Exeter, England: University of Exeter Press, 2000.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Dante Alighieri. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

Boyde, Patrick. Dante's Style in His Lyric Poetry. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1971.

Dronke, Peter. Dante and Medieval Latin Traditions. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985.

Freccero, John, ed. Dante: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1965.

Gragnotati, Manuele. Experiencing the Afterlife: Soul and Body in Dante and Medieval Culture. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame, 2005.

Jacoff, Rachel, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Dante. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Lansing, Richard, ed. Dante: The Critical Complex. New York: Routledge, 2003.

Limentani, Uberto. Dante's Comedy: Introductory Readings of Selected Cantos. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1985.

Quinones, Ricardo. Dante Alighieri. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1979.

Sayers, Dorothy L., and Barbara Reynolds. The Comedy of Dante Alighieri the Florentine. 3 vols. New York: Penguin, 1949-1962.

Scott, John A. Understanding Dante. Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press, 2004.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Consider The New Life of Dante as an innovative way of perceiving and presenting a life.
- To what extent is The New Life a review of Dante's own life?
- Why is life to the medieval Dante a comedy? Why is tragedy impossible?
- What are limitations to Vergil's role as a guide to a Christian pilgrim?
- How do the punishments of sinners in The Divine Comedy differ from those that might be considered conventionally Christian?
- What are the ingredients of Dante's success in managing a rarity in medieval poetry: the blending of personal and universal truths?
- Conveying Paradise in literature is an extraordinarily difficult feat. How does Dante solve the problem, and how effective is his solution?

RUBÉN DARÍO

Born: Metapa (now Ciudad Darío), Nicaragua
January 18, 1867

Died: León, Nicaragua
February 6, 1916

Influenced by French writers in his development of a uniquely Latin American style of writing, Darío became the preeminent writer of the Modernismo movement, forging a revolutionary, dynamic style that inspired future writers in both Latin America and Spain.

BIOGRAPHY

Rubén Darío (dah-REE-oh), born Félix Rubén García Sarmiento in Metapa (now Ciudad Darío), Nicaragua, on January 18, 1867, shaped a revitalized Spanish literature. He began life in poverty, a circumstance that would beset him all his life. The marriage between his mother, Rosa Sarmiento, and Manuel García soon ended, and their son was adopted by his mother's aunt Bernarda Sarmiento de Ramírez and her husband Colonel Félix Ramírez of León, Nicaragua. The boy began writing verses in primary school. He studied Greek and Latin in a Jesuit school, but when economic difficulties prohibited more formal education he learned on his own, reading widely and voraciously. At age fourteen, the young writer adopted the name Rubén Darío and so impressed the Nicaraguan president with his poems that he was offered educational support.

The offer of formal education financed by the government never materialized, but this limitation did not stop Darío. Throughout his life he thrived on intellectual kinships. As an adolescent he was introduced to the occult by an early teacher. He read Ecuadorian writer Juan Montalvo, sharing with him hope for the reestablishment of a Central American union. Through acquaintance with El Salvadorian writer Francisco Gavidia, he discovered the French Romantic and Parnassian writers. Later he read the French Symbolists, American writers Walt Whitman and Edgar Allan Poe, and other Modernista writers. With these writers, he felt a sense of alienation from the newly prosperous and materialist Latin Americans and would work to develop a new Spanish discourse.

In 1884, he accepted an appointment to the secretarial staff of the Nicaraguan president in Managua and contributed articles and reviews to local periodicals. In 1885, he took a position at the National Library in Managua that enabled him to read the Spanish classics. In 1887, he moved to Chile after discovering that his sweetheart, Rosario Murillo, had become involved with another man.

In Chile, Darío became a customs inspector. He won a poetry competition for his Canto épico a las glorias de Chile (1888), a poem celebrating the heroes in Chile's war against Peru and Bolivia, and he received honorable mentions for Rimas (1887), a collection of poems. Both of these works were inspired by Spanish Romantic poet G. A. Bécquer. He published Abrojas (1887; thistles), another collection of poems, and his first major work Azul (1888; partial English translation as Blue, 2002). Introducing a new style and new themes reflecting French writers, Azul was a literary innovation.

In 1889, Darío moved to El Salvador, where the president of the county appointed him to manage La Unión, a daily newspaper espousing the idea of a reunited Central America. There he met and married Rafaela Contreras Cañas. On the night of their wedding, the president was assassinated, and Darío fled the country. In 1891, his son, Rubén Darío Contreras, was born, and Darío accepted a position in Spain. While he was away, his wife died.

Distraught, he returned to Managua, where he was manipulated into marrying Rosario Murillo, his former sweetheart. They married and had a son who soon died. Separating himself from this marriage, Darío accepted an appointment as consul general of Columbia in Buenos Aires, Argentina. In 1896, he published Prosas profanas, y otros poemas (Prosas Profanas, and Other Poems, 1922), a work reflecting the aestheticism of the French Parnassian poets, and Los raros (the uncommon ones), a book of prose portraits.

In 1898, Darío became the Argentinean correspondent in Spain for La Nación. In Spain, he began an enduring relationship with Francisca Sánchez. He also met Spanish writers, developing a friendship with Juan Ramon Jiménez, who supervised the publication of the volumes Cantos de vida y esperanza, los cisnes, y otras poemas (1905; Songs of Life and Hope, 2004). This book, recognized as his masterpiece, assimilates a variety of influences filtered through his own poetical search for an understanding of life and art.

Living in Paris and then in Spain, Darío continued to travel, write, publish, and struggle with the financial difficulties and demons that motivated bouts with a dissipated lifestyle. In 1906, his son, Rubén Darío Sánchez, was born. Darío published a book of essays, Opiniones (opinions), followed in 1907 by El canto errante (the roving song) and Parisiense (from Paris). In 1910, he published Poema del otoño, y otros poemas (the autumn poem, and other poems). "Poema del otoño" ("Autumn Poem"), one of his best lyrical pieces, expresses both the realization of the brevity of life and an affirmation of individual and universal life. In 1911 and 1912, he published collections of essays Letras (literature) and Todo al vuelo (just in passing), and in 1914 published his last book of poems, Canto a la Argentina, oda a mitre, y otros poemas (English translation, 1920).

He began to compile his complete works and wrote several autobiographical pieces, including Historia de mis libros (1914; history of my books). Embarking on a tour to read his poems that he hoped would be profitable, he fell ill and returned to León, Nicaragua, where he died on February 6, 1916, of liver disease. Honored by a funeral service conducted in a cathedral filled with admirers, he was celebrated as the most important Spanish American poet of his era.

ANALYSIS

Rubén Darío shaped a new style of Spanish literature as part of the literary movement called Modernismo, which lasted from 1885 until 1910.

Darío was most influential figure of this movement. Reflecting an alienation from a materialistic society and seeking out new forms and themes, Darío assimilated the style of other writers, particularly the French Romantics, Parnassians, and Symbolists, with his Spanish sensibility. Writing in a self-consciously artistic style, he used language to evoke a musicality, employed images to describe the visual and to present the erotic, developed a system of symbols and myths to reflect his artistic vision, and explored themes new to Spanish literature.

Growing up in an isolated, conventional culture, Darío developed his style by reading the classics and contemporary writers outside the Spanish culture. When he was twenty, the more cosmopolitan Chile nourished his sensibilities and provided an audience eager to be delighted by art. His first poems imitated a more conventional Spanish style. In 1888, French literature became the impetus for his first major work, Blue, a literary breakthrough. The title carried symbolic meaning for Darío, suggesting the imagistic nature of the new style, the color blue corresponding both with art and the universe. Blue brought Darío transatlantic attention after sparking the praise of Spanish writer Juan Valera. Its originality illuminated new directions for Spanish writers.

While Blue presented an artistic revolution, Prosas Profanas, and Other Poems demonstrated Modernismo at its peak. Introducing the work in a prologue, "Palabras luminarias" (illuminating words), Darío summarizes his beliefs and inspirations, asserting the aristocracy of art and the mediocrity of the opinions of the masses, expressing his love for the sensual and aesthetic, and acknowledging his appreciation of French writers. The poems describe love, mythological creatures, courtiers, paganism, Christianity, and art itself. They express special adoration of women, who represent the soul and human longing. "Era un aire suave . . ." ("The Air Was Gentle . . .") praises the eternal feminine in the figure of Marquise Eulalia, an embodiment of Venus. In "Verlaine: Responso" ("Verlaine: Response"), dedicated to French Symbolist poet Paul Verlaine, Verlaine becomes symbolic of the reconciliation of the flesh and the spirit. Alternately embracing the pagan (the flesh) and the Christian (the spirit), Darío strives to yoke together opposites.

His next collection, Songs of Life and Hope, presents the work of his maturity. It explores themes ranging from the societal and political to the personal and artistic. Here the poet examines the inner spirit of great figures, the alchemy of special events, the magic of artistic creation, and the ethereal beauty of sacrifice. Throughout he reflects his sense of the alienation of the artist, as well as his preoccupation with human mortality. He describes those people capable of transforming the joy and grief of life into beauty. He pays homage to the artist, the diplomat, the optimist, and implicitly to Christ, celebrating those who express an optimistic vision and those who create tranquility and peace. He embraces the Spanish culture reflected in both Miguel de Cervantes's character Don Quixote and in the Catholic faith, and he asserts his religious belief. Using allusion, visual description, and erotic suggestion, he creates symbols to reflect emotional states or desirable personal, even national, approaches to life. Ultimately these symbols aggregate into a personal mythology, affirming the values of faith, hope, and love. In both its thematic import and elegant style, Cantos presents Darío at his most masterful.

Other poetry collections followed. He followed Songs of Life and Hope with El canto errante (1907). In Poema del otoño, y otras poems, the title poem explores the cycle of life and death, affirming life. Facing the inevitable destruction of time, the poet, with other Modernista writers, finds correspondences among the elements of the universe. Canto a la Argentina, oda a mitre, y otros poemas reiterates themes that are Darío's particular and universal concerns. While this was his last collection of poems, he continued publishing individual pieces of merit in periodicals until his death.

BLUE

First published: Azul, 1888 (partial English translation in Cuentos y poesías/Stories and Poems: A Dual Language Book, 2002)

Type of work: Short stories and poems

These stories and poems employ an innovative, self-consciously artistic style, often addressing the role of the artist in society.

Blue, a collection containing more stories than poems, demonstrates the new style and themes that Darío initiates in Spanish. Unlike conventional Spanish literature to this date, these works carry no moral purpose, describe no feats of heroism, and do not use any clichéd Spanish themes. The stories adopt a new worldly-wise tone, often suggesting Paris or some other place of mystery or intrigue. They evoke an erotic, sensual mood, create vivid, ethereal images, and describe the artist and the unappreciated role of art in a bourgeois society. They describe nymphs, fairies, and other characters that become symbolic or mythic.

Some of the stories Darío considered prose poems used the literary techniques of rhythm and repetition to achieve the musicality characteristic of his work. He reflects the inspiration of William Shakespeare in the story "El velo de la reina Mab" ("The Veil of Queen Mab"). Two stories, "El rey burgués" ("The Bourgeois King") and "El pájaro azul" ("The Blue Parrot"), describe how a poet suffers for art. Ostracized by society in the first story and by his father in the second, the poet is cast off and forgotten.

The poems introduce the Alexandrine sonnet in "Caupolicán" and further imitate French poetry in free verse, line length, and syntax. In "Venus," the poet addresses the planet as a symbol of art and beauty and languishes in its silent response to his attraction. The collection dazzles with artistry.

SONGS OF LIFE AND HOPE

First published: Cantos de vida y esperanza, los cisnes, y otros poemas 1905 (English translation, 2004)

Type of work: Poetry

These poems describe and exemplify the ways that attitudes, beliefs, beauty, and art redeem the tragic in life.

Songs of Life and Hope confirms Darío's position as not only the exemplar of Modernismo but also as Spanish poet par excellence. This work elucidates his tragic vision of life and articulates its redemption. As Darío focuses on these themes, he continues to extend innovations of style, form, and development of ideas.

In the preface Darío reasserts his belief in the supremacy of art and his disdain for the conventional-minded. In the poems, he develops the free verse, rhythms, and repetitions that contribute to the poems' lyrical qualities. He uses symbols to reflect the fusion of contrasting spirits. He laments the fate of humankind, then explains and exemplifies what redeems life, what offers comfort and hope.

The first poem, "Nocturno" ("Nocturne"), an autobiographical piece, describes his struggles and longing. Awareness of loss, of time wasted, and of mortality reverberate throughout. Comfort and hope are offered in descriptions of both how to live—engage in life fully and passionately—and where to find inspiration—in the sources of redemption, beauty, and harmony. For Darío, the comfort of the flesh makes life whole and even makes the spiritual accessible. "Leda" explores this impetus and result.

Religious belief and recognition of harmony and beauty also provide comfort. The tragic life is relieved by spiritual belief. In "Spes." the poet prays for the grace that will purge his unworthy impulses and the guilt that follows. Recognizing a universal mood of despair and pain, the speaker waits in "Canto de esperanza" ("Song of Hope") for a second coming and mourns the sterile, hopeless world of no belief. The optimistic spirit, he explains in "Salutación del optimista" ("Greetings from an Optimist"), enables doleful misgivings to melt away.

Harmony is created by the uniting of contrasting elements. In "Al rey Óscar" ("To King Oscar"), the regal emissary from Norway brings to Spain a spirit that complements the Spanish spirit. Art and artists create this harmony as well. "Cyrano en España" ("Cyrano in Spain") and "Salutación a Leonardo" ("A Salutation to Leonardo") describe other felicitous unions. Again, Darío uses symbols to create a mythology of life and hope. Classical figures of mythology and everyday creatures, such as swans, represent beauty and life.

"POEM OF AUTUMN"

First published: 1910 (collected in Cuentos y poesías/Stories and Poems: A Dual Language Book, 2002)

Type of work: Poem

The poem reassesses a life and explores the redemptive effect of beauty and love.

The collection Poema del otoño, y otras poemas reflects the last stage of Darío's literary career. The long title poem, "Poem of Autumn," the most important work in this collection, alternates between lamenting mortality and affirming life. The poet looks at life through the lens of the autumn of his life, a time of meditation and reflection. The reflective spirit observes what has been and expresses hope for more of the same. At times the past provokes remorse, at other times joy and an accompanying melancholy. In either case the speaker longs for more of the sensual and the beautiful. The poet finds that savoring the flowers and the honey of the moment—that is, living in the present—revives the downcast spirit.

In advising those growing old to seek pleasure, he reflects Modernismo's recognition of correspondences in the world. Expressing love and experiencing its pleasure enables humankind to participate in the universal force of creation. Human beings feel the surge of life in their blood just as the tree experiences the surge of life in the flowing of its sap. The human body, Darío asserts, contains the earth, the sun, and the sea. Consolation comes in recognizing the universal, timeless, cyclical qualities of life. Life, the poem confirms, unfolds as a journey to death, but the way is paved by love.

SUMMARY

Born into poverty in a Nicaraguan village, Rubén Darío became the most important transformer of the conventional Spanish literature of the nineteenth century. Inspired by French writers, Darío imitated and assimilated the styles and themes of French literature into his works. Raised in the Spanish, Catholic culture, Darío always felt closely connected to his heritage. He felt a similarly strong connection to the sensual life, and he found in experience with women both physical and spiritual comfort. Darío often lived a bohemian lifestyle motivated both by his artistic temperament and economic necessity. Periods of despair provoked bouts of debauchery, which in turn caused him much guilt resulting in periods of intense religiosity.

Existential awareness of the mortal fate of mankind became a preoccupation of his more mature works. His underlying despair, however, was contrasted by a love of life and the beautiful. He felt the tragedy of life could be redeemed by savoring the sensual, embracing the spiritual, and experiencing art. Art represented harmony and tranquillity and soothed the troubled soul of humankind. His innovations in literature resulted in his being recognized as the most outstanding writer of the literary movement Modernismo.

Bernadette Flynn Low

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Abrojos, 1887

Rimas, 1887

Canto épico a las glorias de Chile, 1888

Azul, 1888 (partial translation as Blue in Cuentos y poesías/Stories and Poems: A Dual Language Book, 2002)

Prosas profanas, y otros poemas, 1896 (Prosas Profanas, and Other Poems, 1922)

Cantos de vida y esperanza, los cisnes, y otros poemas, 1905 (Songs of Life and Hope, 2004)

El canto errante, 1907

Parisiense, 1907

Poema del otoño, y otros poemas, 1910

Canto a la Argentina, oda a mitre, y otros poemas, 1914 (English translation, 1920)

Selected Poems of Rubén Darío, 1965

SHORT FICTION:

Cuentos completos de Rubén Darío, 1950

NONFICTION:

La caravana pasa, 1903

Tierras solares, 1904

Opiniones, 1906

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Discuss circumstances or personal traits in Rubén Darío's life that shaped his work.
- Describe artistic elements in Darío's work that reflect Modernismo.
- Identify some themes that recur in Darío's work.
- Describe some of the artistic differences between his early work of Modernismo, Blue, and his mature work, Songs of Life and Hope.
- Describe the mood of "Poem of Autumn" and what it expresses of Darío's attitudes toward life.

Letras, 1911

Todo al vuelo, 1912

Historias de mis libros, 1914

MISCELLANEOUS:

Obras desconocidas de Rubén Darío, 1934

Escritos inéditos de Rubén Darío, 1938

Rubén Darío: Obras completas, 1950-1953 (5 volumes)

About the Author

Applebaum, Stanley, ed. and trans. Introduction to Cuentos y poesías/Stories and Poems: A Dual Language Book, by Rubén Darío. Mineola, N.Y.: Dover, 2002.

Derusha, Will, and Alberto Acereda, eds. Introduction to Songs of Life and Hope/Cantos de vida y esperanza, by Rubén Darío. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2004.

Imbert, Enrique Anderson. "Rubén Darío." Translated by Peter Latson. In Latin American Writers. Vol. 1 in The Scribner's Writers Series. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1989.

Jrade, Cathy L. "Socio-Political Concerns in the Poetry of Rubén Darío." The Latin American Literary Review 18, no. 36 (1990): 36-49.

Pym, Anthony, "Strategies of the Frontier in Spanish-American Modernismo." Comparative Literature 44, no. 2 (Spring, 1992): 161-173.

Stavans, Ilan, ed. Introduction to Rubén Darío: Selected Writings. New York: Penguin Books, 2005.

© Jerry Bauer

ROBERTSON DAVIES

Born: Thamesville, Ontario, Canada

August 28, 1913

Died: Toronto, Ontario, Canada

December 2, 1995

One of Canada's leading novelists, Davies meshes comedy and serious discussions of complex philosophical issues to produce works that are both enjoyable and thought-provoking.

BIOGRAPHY

William Robertson Davies was born in the small town of Thamesville, Ontario, Canada, on August 28, 1913. His father, William Rupert Davies, had immigrated with his parents to Canada from Wales in the 1890's and had married Florence Mackay, a woman of Scottish-Dutch descent whose family had been in North America since the 1680's. By the time Robertson was born, Rupert Davies had become an influential newspaper publisher. Both of Robertson's parents had strong personalities and greatly influenced Davies's intellectual development; his novel Murder and Walking Spirits (1991) is a fictionalized homage to his ancestry. His parents read often to their children; in an interview, Davies remarked that these stories "marked me forever as a lover, and victim, of myth."

When Davies was five years old, his father bought a newspaper business in the small Ontario town of Renfrew and moved the family there. Davies went to the country school with the children of farmers and woodcutters, and his experiences there—he was teased, beaten, and terrorized—parallel those of Francis Cornish in What's Bred in the Bone (1985). The family lived in Renfrew until 1925, and it was in his father's Renfrew newspaper that Davies had his first work published at the age of ten. Everyone in the family was expected to write clearly and accurately, and Davies was sent to report on a slide show and lecture on William Shakespeare's England.

In 1925, father bought a newspaper in the college town of Kingston, Ontario. In 1928, Davies began attending Upper Canada College, a prestigious boys' school. Here, he won prizes for speech and acted in school plays; he recalled that he was "capable of learning anything that interested me in record time, but cretinous in my failure to comprehend whatever I did not like." He did not like mathematics and failed both geometry and algebra in his matriculation examinations, which meant that he could not attend university as a regular student.

Queen's University in Kingston, however, allowed Davies to enter as a "special student." He was able to take classes but could not receive a degree. He took courses in literature, drama, and history and, as at Upper Canada College, participated as often as possible in drama productions. While Davies was at Queen's, his father, while on a trip to Great Britain, inquired about admission to Oxford; Davies was accepted by Balliol College and left Queen's University in 1935. Davies thoroughly enjoyed the Oxford atmosphere and did very well there. He soon joined the Oxford University Dramatic Society and stage-managed and acted in several productions. He read Elizabethan drama and was awarded a bachelor of literature degree in 1938. He was able to publish his university thesis in 1939 as Shakespeare's Boy Actors.

After finishing at Oxford, Davies toured with a theater company for several months before going to London and joining the Old Vic, which was then managed by Tyrone Guthrie. He was assigned minor acting roles, but his chief duties were to teach theater history in the school attached to the company and to act as a literary assistant to Guthrie. The Old Vic disbanded in 1939 because of World War II; Davies tried to enlist but was rejected because of his poor eyesight.

At the Old Vic, Davies met Brenda Mathews, an Australian woman who worked as a stage manager for the company. On February 2, 1940, they were married and in December had their first child. Upon their return to Canada that same year, Davies worked briefly for his father's newspaper in Kingston before being offered the job of literary editor at Saturday Night, which was then a well-respected Canadian paper. He wrote on music, theater, and ballet, as well as literature.

Davies stayed at Saturday Night until 1942, when his father bought the Peterborough Examiner. Davies became the editor of that newspaper; during his years there, the paper was favorably regarded and his editorial comments were often quoted elsewhere. Davies created the character of Samuel Marchbanks for the Examiner, and the column in which Marchbanks acidly and wittily commented on the mores of the times appeared in several other newspapers. During his time in Peterborough, Davies helped form the Peterborough Little Theater. He wrote plays for it and for professional companies, and his plays Eros at Breakfast (pr. 1948, pb. 1949) and Fortune, My Foe (pr. 1948, pb. 1949) won the awards for best production at the Dominion Drama Festival. In 1951, Davies published his first novel, Tempest-Tost, which drew on his knowledge of nonprofessional acting companies in its comic portrayal of a Little Theater production of Shakespeare's The Tempest (pr. 1611, pb. 1623).

From 1953 to 1959, Davies, while continuing to edit the Peterborough Examiner, also wrote for Saturday Night's book column. In 1953, Davies was elected to the board of directors of the Stratford Shakespeare Festival, on which he served until 1971. In 1955, Davies' second novel, Leaven of Malice (1954), was published and received the Leacock Medal for humor in Canadian writing. This second novel is also set in the fictional town of Salterton and with Tempest-Tost and A Mixture of Frailties (1958) forms a loose trilogy.

In 1960, Davies spent a year as a visiting professor of English at Trinity College, University of Toronto, and in 1963 he was appointed the first master of the newly opened Massey College, University of Toronto. He taught English and drama at the university until his retirement in 1981. In 1970, he published Fifth Business, the first novel in the Deptford Trilogy, which brought him much acclaim. The Manticore (1972) and World of Wonders (1975) followed. During the 1970's, Davies also wrote a number of critical studies.

In his retirement, Davies continued writing, publishing a third trilogy during the 1980's that began with The Rebel Angels (1981) and continued with What's Bred in the Bone (1985) and The Lyre of Orpheus (1988). In 1991, his novel Murther and Walking Spirits, a kind of fictional history of Canada and of the author's ancestry, was published. Davies and his wife continued to live in Toronto, where he died on December 2, 1995.

ANALYSIS

In Stage Voices: Twelve Canadian Playwrights Talk About Their Lives and Work (1978), edited by Geraldine Anthony, Davies said that his work might be categorized as comedy, in the broadest sense of the term. But I take it to include a great measure of romance, of pathos, of the rueful awareness that life is short in time and that what we understand of it is only a trifle of the whole. . . . The greater part of life is lived in the mode of comedy.

Davies' comment applies to his novels quite as much as to his plays; they are comedies in the broadest sense of the term. His novels are witty and occasionally even slapstick, as when Professor Vambrace, in Tempest-Tost, attempts to eat grapes while declaiming one of Prospero's speeches. In a somewhat more technical sense, Davies' novels are comedies because they are about real human frailties and limitations. If tragedy can be described as the great brought low through the actions of their faults, then perhaps comedy can be defined as the ordinary muddling through while occasionally appearing ridiculous because of their faults. In Tempest-Tost, Hector Mackilwraith, a middle-aged teacher of mathematics, attempts to hang himself in the middle of a production of the The Tempest because he loves a young woman, Griselda, who he knows will never love him. Instead of being tragic, Hector's suicide attempt is ridiculous: He is told off by the director for disrupting the play and has broken a number of bottles of homemade champagne in his fall, so that at first everyone thinks he is merely drunk. There is pathos in this account of Hector's misery, but not tragedy.

Hector's fault is that he has lived an almost purely intellectual life and disregarded, or buried, his emotional side. Even when he ponders being attracted to Griselda, he makes a list of the pros and cons of pursuing her. This theme of the overreliance on intellect to disastrous effect appears also in Fifth Business and, more explicitly, in The Manticore, in which it is treated much more seriously than in Tempest-Tost. In fact, it is a theme that reappears in one guise or another in most of Davies' novels. In The Rebel Angels, it appears as a conflict between a beautiful graduate student's "root" and "crown" (using the metaphor of a tree): Maria Theotoky wants to jettison her emotional, irrational Gypsy background, her root, while living in the intellectual ivory tower of the university, her crown. In A Mixture of Frailties, Monica Gall must learn to release the emotion trapped inside her if she wants to become a great singer. Dunstan Ramsay, in Fifth Business, spends his life intellectually examining the lives of saints, something that is at heart intuitive and emotional, and at fifty his "bottled-up feelings have burst their bottle and splashed glass and acid everywhere."

It is in The Manticore, however, that Davies illustrates this theme most effectively. David Staunton's whole life has been an attempt to bury his emotions and live by his intellect. He wrongly believes that this is the only way he can survive; upon his father's mysterious death, emotion breaks through and he decides to enter Jungian analysis to bring order back into his life. The analysis brings David's true feelings to the fore, and David must acknowledge these feelings before he can be "cured."

The Manticore is also the book that most explicitly makes use of the work of Carl Jung. As David undergoes analysis and works through his memories and dreams, Davies explains some of the archetypes that Jung identified in his work, such as the shadow, friend, and anima; the aim is to acknowledge and accept these elements in oneself and so achieve a wholeness and knowledge of oneself. David, in his diary, dreams of escaping "the stupider kinds of illusion." Jung's ideas are important in most of Davies's works. In the Cornish Trilogy, especially in The Lyre of Orpheus, Davies makes much of the idea that "we all have a personal myth . . . that has its shape and its pattern somewhere outside our daily world." Simon Darcourt, a character in The Lyre of Orpheus, learns that his myth is not that of Servant, as he had once thought, but of Fool—the Fool on the tarot card who is being pushed by instinct, represented by a dog, into making discoveries that would otherwise remain in mystery. In the same novel, Arthur, his wife Maria, and Geraint, the father of Maria's baby, are playing out the roles of the cuckolded King Arthur, Guenevere, and Lancelot. Dunstan Ramsay, in Fifth Business, is Fifth Business, the man in opera who, while not the most important character, "knows the secret of the hero's birth, or comes to the assistance of the heroine when she thinks all is lost."

To Davies, a myth is a way of approaching the archetypes that are true for all people at all times. It provides people with the "power to see themselves objectively" because it is an outside measure, not one made up by the individual. Personal myth acknowledges one's place in the scheme of things; it allows one to know what and who one is while escaping "the stupider kinds of illusion." Jung is also an important presence in Murder and Walking Spirits, in which the protagonist meets and converses with his anima, his feminine inner self, consistent with one of Jung's most important concepts.

In identifying Dunstan Ramsay as Fifth Business, Davies uses characters from opera that are essentially melodramatic: the Hero, the Heroine, the Villain, the Rival, and Fifth Business. Davies has written that "Melodrama is an art in which Good and Evil contend, and in which the dividing line between Good and Evil may often be blurred, and in which Good may often be the winner." In World of Wonders, the hero, Magnus Eisengrim, undergoes severe mistreatment as a child; he is abducted and sodomized by a magician with a traveling carnival, made to spend long hours hidden inside a mechanical effigy, working its machinery so as to impress the carnival-goers, and is otherwise abused and ignored. That is certainly evil. Yet the result is that Magnus becomes a very great magician, a master illusionist, something that he would never have become had he spent his life in Deptford, where he was born. Here the dividing line between good and evil is blurred, and it seems that good is the winner.

Davies also employs elements of satire, especially in his earlier works. In Tempest-Tost and Leaven of Malice, particularly, Davies pokes fun at some of the social conventions of Salterton, the town in which they are set, and deflates the pretensions of some of the characters. Yet rather than satire, which Davies claims he never intended to write, perhaps one should use the term “comedy of manners” to describe these novels. He examines the follies of the opinions and behaviors of various characters, and his favorite target is the person with a self-deluding sense of importance. In Leaven of Malice, he pokes fun at a character who tries to apply psychological precepts facilely: “The chapter on Freudian psychology in his general textbook had not, after all, equipped him to deal with a tiresomely literal professor of classics who knew Oedipus at first hand, so to speak.”

Davies is convinced of the importance of the individual, but he is concerned with the individual who knows or comes to know himself or herself, not the self-deluding fool. The books of the Deptford Trilogy, in particular, written for the most part in the first person, are about the growth in self-knowledge of the individual. Several of Davies’ books are bildungsromans; they recount the development, the education, of a young person reaching for maturity. World of Wonders is one such novel; so is A Mixture of Frailties, the third novel in the Salterton Trilogy. In it, Monica Gall leaves her family and Canada for England, where she has several teachers who each, in their way, teach her not only music and singing but also how to value herself and her opinions. Monica comes from an essentially anti-intellectual, culturally deprived background; part of her development is learning which parts of her background are part of her and valuable to her and which are not.

This tension between family and individual is a recurrent pattern in Davies’ novels. In Tempest-Tost and Leaven of Malice, Solly Bridgetower and Pearl Vambrace each have an overpowering parent to overcome; in A Mixture of Frailties, Solly’s mother even exerts her dominance beyond the grave in her humiliating will, which says that Solly will not inherit until he and Pearl have a son. Making a break between domineering parent and submissive child is not the only way to portray and deal with the tension between the two, however; that would be far too simplistic. Both Monica in A Mix- ture of Frailties and Maria in The Rebel Angels have to come to terms with their parents, accepting them for what they are. Maria fights her mother’s Gypsy inheritance but must acknowledge it if she wants to be wholly herself.

Davies includes a huge amount of ideas, themes, and arcane knowledge in his books. What’s Bred in the Bone discusses undertaking, art, alchemy, astrology, and spying. The Rebel Angels includes François Rabelais, Paracelsus, Gypsy lore, the tarot, and more. Davies does not expect his reader to be knowledgeable about these things; what the reader needs to know is adequately, and often amusingly, explained.

THE DEPTFORD TRILOGY

First published: Fifth Business, 1970; The Manticore, 1972; World of Wonders, 1975

Type of work: Novels

A snowball thrown with a stone in it has consequences for the lives of three men.

The publication of Fifth Business, the first novel in the Deptford Trilogy, marked a deepening of Davies’ novelistic talents. His previous novels (the Salterton Trilogy), while amusing and certainly not devoid of ideas, lack the depth of thought and power that characterizes Fifth Business. Davies has said that when he began Fifth Business, he had no intention of writing a trilogy; the subsequent two novels arose because he found that he had more to say about some of the characters. Each novel can stand completely on its own, yet there is a link between the novels. They express some of the same ideas and themes in different ways, and the reader is richer for having read the others.

In a speech transcribed in One Half of Robertson Davies (1977), Davies commented that Fifth Business arose from his examination of the extent to which one is responsible for the outcome of one’s actions and when this responsibility begins. He decided that it began with life itself, and that a child was as responsible as anyone else if it chose a course of action knowingly. In Fifth Business . . . a boy makes a choice: he wants to hurt his companion, so he throws a snowball at him, and in the snowball is a stone. . . . The consequences of the snowball with the stone in it continue for sixty years, and do much to shape the lives of three men.

The boy who threw the stone is Percy Boyd Staunton; He aimed it at Dunstan Ramsay, and it hit the mother of Magnus Eisengrim. Fifth Business examines the life of Ramsay; The Manticore looks at Boy Staunton's life and the effect it has had on his son, David Staunton; and World of Wonders concerns Magnus Eisengrim.

Fifth Business begins at 5:58 P.M. on December 27, 1908, in a small Canadian town in Ontario called Deptford. That is the exact time that Percy Boyd Staunton threw the snowball that Dunstan Ramsay sidestepped. Ramsay took evasive action knowingly and feels guilty when he realizes that the snowball meant for him has caused Mary Dempster to lose her wits and to have her baby, Paul, prematurely. This scenario is the beginning of Ramsay's involvement with Mrs. Dempster, who becomes more than simply a responsibility to him; Ramsay comes to see her as a saint. Whether or not she is a saint is important only to Ramsay. An old Jesuit questions him: "who is she in your personal world? What figure is she in your personal mythology? . . . [Y]ou must find your answer in psychological truth, not in objective truth." What Mary Dempster has done is to enrich Ramsay's life. Through her ability to love without fear, she has given him an entry into the world of the spirit.

After being wounded at Passchendaele, Ramsay's is not a particularly unusual life. He attends a university, gets a position as a teacher of history at a boys' school, and begins writing books on saints for travelers, as well as producing a book on the psychology of myth and legend. Finally, on a sabbatical to South America visiting churches and studying local legends of saints, he again meets Paul Dempster, who has become Magnus Eisengrim, and meets Magnus's manager, Liesl Vitzliputzli. Liesl is a gargoyle of a woman who, along with Mrs. Dempster and the Jesuit priest, becomes one of Ramsay's most important teachers. She forces him to find out who he is in his "personal world": "Who are you? Where do you fit into poetry and myth? Do you know who I think you are, Ramsay? I think you are Fifth Business."

Fifth Business quite accurately reflects the role Ramsay has played in his relationship to Boy Staunton. Boy considers Ramsay an eccentric and old friend but one who is unsuccessful in the way in which Boy measures success. If Fifth Business "knows the secret of the hero's birth," then Ramsay fits the bill, for he knows Boy's beginnings, his traits established from boyhood, better than Boy does himself. Ramsay's final act as Fifth Business in Boy's life is to force him to examine his actions and take responsibility for them: "I'm simply trying to recover something of the totality of your life. Don't you want to possess it as a whole—the bad with the good?" Possessing one's life as a whole—the bad with the good—is essentially what Fifth Business is about.

Ramsay, over many years and with the help of such teachers as Liesl, comes to know himself essentially through his own efforts. In The Manticore, David Staunton, the son of Boy Staunton, has inherited his father's lack of self-knowledge and goes to Switzerland for Jungian analysis in an attempt to put his life back together. Boy's ignorance of his true nature has a lasting detrimental effect on his son: David struggles very hard before he can break down the false image his father has created and see him as he was and before he can stop putting himself on trial for not living up to his father's standards of manliness.

Like Fifth Business, The Manticore is written in the first person; It is David's record of his analysis. His analyst asks him to prepare a "brief"—David is a successful Toronto lawyer—which consists mainly of a chronological account of David's childhood memories. Like Fifth Business, the plot of The Manticore does not reveal a wildly unusual life, but the events of David's life show why he is who he is. He has taken refuge from his feelings because, in effect, every time he had strong feelings he was punished for them. By denying them and creating a shell of rationality, he protects himself. One of his tasks under analysis is to recall and recognize his true emotions.

David's analysis only goes so far in helping him recognize and accept both sides of himself, the emotional and the intellectual. His analyst helps him identify the ways in which Jungian archetypes apply to the people in his life and helps him strip the archetypes away to allow these people to be themselves, real people and not images created by David. It takes an encounter with Liesl, however, to truly put him on the path to wholeness. Liesl, whom David has met in a chance encounter with Ramsay during the Christmas holidays, takes David to a cave in the mountains where the remains of a group of primitive men have been found. She leads him further into the mountain, forcing him to crawl and wriggle through the narrow passageway to a kind of holy of holies, the place where these primitive men worshiped bears. David is uncomfortable and wants to go back to the light; darkness and bear-worship are unreasonable to him, and he wants to run back to rationality. On the way out, David becomes severely frightened and empties his bowels. Before this trip, Liesl has suggested that learning "to know oneself as fully human" must involve a kind of "rebirth"; "It's more a reentry and return from the womb of mankind. A fuller comprehension of one's humanity. . . . It's not a thinker's thing." David's trip back from the cave is his rebirth; the terror is something he feels deeply. It gives him the "glimmering" of his own humanity and perhaps the ability to face the "inner struggle" to become whole, which is what Liesl describes as heroic behavior.

World of Wonders presents the life of the third man affected by that stone-filled snowball. Unlike Ramsay and David's, Paul Dempster's life has been far from ordinary. Eisengrim (the name Paul Dempster has finally taken) is asked to tell his story as a kind of subtext for a film he is starring in about the life of the magician Jean-Eugène Robert-Houdin. He tells it to Ramsay, Liesl, and the director, cinematographer, and producer of the film and begins with what he calls his descent into hell.

His particular hell is Wanless's World of Wonders. He has stolen fifteen cents to go to the fair, and five of that buys him entry to a carnival show—the World of Wonders—where he sees a fat woman, a man who writes with his feet, and Willard the magician. After the show, Willard, on the pretext of showing Paul a trick, rapes him and then, in a panic, abducts him. Paul spends the years of his adolescence and young adulthood being sodomized by Willard and shut inside a mechanical effigy called Abdullah, used to fool carnival-goers. After Willard's death, Paul travels to England, where he joins a theater troupe as the double of the leading man, Sir John Tresize, in a series of melodramas. After Sir John's death and a period of odd jobs, he travels to Switzerland, where he gets a job repairing mechanical toys that have been smashed to bits by the adolescent Liesl, who suffers from a disease that has thickened the bones of her head, distorting her features. Magnus teaches her to be human again, and they later perform a magic show that makes Magnus the world's greatest illusionist.

During most of his life, Magnus has been forced to be someone other than himself, to the point of being given names not of his own choosing. Yet these experiences have not made him a non-person; they have made him a very great magician, who knows himself very well. Out of evil has come good. Liesl attributes this to what she calls Magnus's "Magian World View": "It was a sense of the unfathomable wonder of the invisible world that existed side by side with a hard recognition of the roughness and cruelty and day-to-day demands of the tangible world."

All three of the Deptford novels have this concern with the "invisible world." In Fifth Business, it expresses itself in Ramsay's concern with saints; in The Manticore, it is represented by the cave in which David is at last freed to have feelings; in World of Wonders, it is this "Magian World View" that finds art in low places. Magnus has survived and prospered because he has always had an art to sustain him—conjuring with Willard, acting with the Tresizes, and fixing clocks in Switzerland. Art has allowed Magnus to remain an individual who is wholly himself.

THE CORNISH TRILOGY

First published: The Rebel Angels, 1981;
What's Bred in the Bone, 1985; The Lyre of Orpheus, 1988

Type of work: Novels

The life of Francis Cornish and his influence after his death lay the groundwork for these novels.

The Cornish Trilogy shares many of the themes that run through the Deptford Trilogy, and it is these themes as much as the characters that link the three novels that can be read completely independently. Davies is once again concerned with finding one's personal myth, becoming fully oneself—something that often is connected with art or pure scholarship in these novels—and in each book he again approaches the topic somewhat differently.

The Rebel Angels is the only novel in the trilogy to be written in the first person; the main narrative voice is passed back and forth between Maria Theotoky, a beautiful graduate student who narrates the sections titled "Second Paradise," and Simon Darcourt, an Anglican priest and teacher at the university, who narrates the chapters called "The New Aubrey." Maria's sections focus on her love for Clement Hollier, her dissertation director, and her problems with John Parlabane, a renegade monk who teaches skeptic philosophy and was a boyhood friend of Hollier. Darcourt is one of Francis Cornish's executors, along with Hollier and Urquhart McVarish, and his chapters attempt to provide a broader view of the university, especially of its personalities. As Darcourt and Maria's experiences overlap, the effect of two separate narrators is not a disjointed story line but one that is dovetailed. Maria's voice, in fact, is much like Darcourt's, and while this is a weakness in terms of portraying Maria, it does give the novel a continuity and a unity of vision.

The main thrust of the story comes from the actions of Parlabane, who deliberately sets out to get everybody excited. He badgers Maria, poking and prying into her personal life and giving her long lectures on his philosophy; he cadges money from Darcourt and Hollier; and he plays the sycophant to Urky McVarish, the professor everyone else is united in loathing. At the end of the novel, he kills McVarish in a gruesome way and then kills himself, leaving a letter explaining the circumstances of the murder to Hollier and Maria. Parlabane also writes a long, rambling novel called Be Not Another's, which he thrusts on Hollier, Maria, and Darcourt, asking for their opinions and then ignoring them.

Parlabane—though his book is based on his own life, though he seems to obey no rules but his own, and though he gives perfectly good advice to Maria on knowing herself—does not fully know himself. For Dunstan Ramsay, David Staunton, and Magnus Eisengrim, knowing oneself involves a balance between intellect and wonder; Parlabane has no balance and relies on his intellect, despite his claim of belief in God. Parlabane is an egotist and, as such, cannot fully know himself, for he does not really accept anything outside his own authority. Nevertheless, he is able to become one of Maria's Rebel Angels, helping her to realize that she must accept her Gypsy background as much as her university education if she wants to be herself. Maria also calls Hollier and Darcourt her Rebel Angels, placing them in her personal mythology, for the Rebel Angels taught wisdom to men after being thrown out of heaven, and Maria believes that the three have taught her much about herself.

What's Bred in the Bone is the strongest novel of the Cornish Trilogy, perhaps because it is the most focused. It tells the story of what is bred in the bone of Francis Cornish, the experiences and inheritances that make him who he is. It begins prior to his birth by describing the town of Blairlogie, Ontario, and the family into which he was born, and goes on to describe all the events that are important in forming Cornish's character, from his first discovery that the world is separate from him to his death. Francis discovers that art is his talent and develops it by sketching the corpses at the undertaker's, where his grandfather's coachman holds a second job. At the university, he practices drawing in the manner of the Old Masters, using the silver-point technique, and after Oxford he takes a job helping Tancred Saraceni, an art restorer. When Saraceni challenges him to paint a picture in Old Master style, mixing paints as they would have done and using a wooden panel of the right age, Francis paints "the myth of Francis Cornish." It is a triptych of the Marriage at Cana, and every figure in it is significant for whom Francis Cornish has become.

In What's Bred in the Bone, Davies again strongly emphasizes the importance of discovering one's personal myth. In an early conversation with Francis, Saraceni says that modern artists "are painting the inner vision . . . but they depend only on themselves, unaided by religion or myth, and of course what most of them find within themselves is revelation only to themselves." One needs a connection with the "world of wonders" to produce a life that is meaningful. Davies does not imply that finding one's personal myth is easy or that knowing oneself solves all problems. Because Francis expresses himself best in Old Master style, he is effectively prevented from painting anything, for he would simply be accused of fakery. Though in his old age he seems to the world an "eccentric and crabbed spirit, there was a quality of completeness about him." Francis dies laughing, having recognized the allegory of his own life.

The Lyre of Orpheus, which further develops several of the main characters of The Rebel Angels, pursues several threads of plot. Simon Darcourt, whose discoveries while writing a biography of Francis Cornish provided the framing fiction of What's Bred in the Bone, is studying Francis's art and discovering his own personal myth in the process. His plan to prove and reveal Francis as a great artist and not a skillful faker leads him, with help from Maria's mother, to identify his personal myth as that of the Fool on the tarot cards, who is pushed by instinct, "something outside the confines of intellect and caution," into unconventional paths. Darcourt finds this identification of his personal myth gives him "a stronger sense of who he was."

The second major thread of plot involves the decision by the Cornish Foundation (headed by Arthur Cornish, Francis's nephew) to produce an opera called Arthur of Britain: Or, The Magnanimous Cuckold. The opera and the characters involved in creating it take up a large part of the narrative, but the most important facet of it is the way the plot—Guenevere and Lancelot's betrayal of Arthur—is reflected in the lives of Arthur and Maria Cornish and Geraint Powell, the director of the opera and Arthur's friend. Maria's infidelity with Geraint does not exactly parallel Guenevere's, for she does not love Geraint, and in many ways Geraint's bedding of her reflects the way Uther came to Ygraine to sire Arthur more than it does Guenevere and Lancelot's affair. During a discussion of what plot the opera should use, Darcourt recalls Ovid saying that "the great truths of life are the wax, and all we can do is to stamp it with different forms. . . . If we are true to the great myth, we can give it what form we choose. The myth—the wax—does not change." Arthur and Maria must learn how to be true to "the great myth" in order for their marriage to be enriched rather than destroyed, and that lesson is expressed in the loving charity of Sir Walter Scott's lines used in the opera's libretto:

It is the secret sympathy,
The silver link, the silken tie,
Which heart to heart, and mind to mind,
In body and in soul can bind.

MURDER AND WALKING SPIRITS

First published: 1991

Type of work: Novel

Newspaper editor Connor Gilmartin is murdered and spends his afterlife attending a film festival with his murderer; the films show him his family history since the colonial period.

Although it begins in the present day, Murder and Walking Spirits is a multigenerational novel that spans more than two hundred years of family and national history. Its narrator and protagonist, Connor Gilmartin, is the entertainment editor of a newspaper called the Advocate. It is tempting to equate Gilmartin with Robertson Davies, who was also a newspaperman and whose family histories share many details with the fictional ones presented here, but there are some significant differences, not the least of which is age; Connor Gilmartin is a full generation younger than Davies, who has perhaps as much in common with Connor's father, Brochwel, as with the narrator.

The story of Connor Gilmartin's murder and afterlife, during which he attends a film festival with his murderer and colleague Allard Going, known as the Sniffer, forms a frame for the multigenerational flashback that constitutes most of the narrative. Other significant characters from the frame portion of the novel include Gilmartin's adulterous wife, Esme Baron, and his friend and spiritual advisor, Hugh McWearie. He recounts earlier conversations with McWearie that cover Christianity, Buddhism, Celtic mythology, and Emanuel Swedenborg and continue the Jungian theme that can be found in many of Davies's other novels.

Although he is unable to haunt his killer or make himself known to anybody who is alive, Gilmartin finds himself bound to Allard Going and is forced to attend a series of films with him. However, the "films" the protagonist is shown are for himself alone. While the festival audience watches The Spirit of '76, Gilmartin's private film opens in New York in 1774 and follows his Loyalist great-great-great-grandmother's brave exodus to Canada after the American Revolution.

The third part of the novel is set in Wales. While Going views Shadows of Our Forgotten Ancestors, the ghost narrator sees a film about five generations of his Welsh Gilmartin ancestors, the last of whom, because of financial setbacks, immigrate to North America.

While Going sees a film called The Master Builder, the invisible narrator watches the unfolding of the next chapter of his family history from the perspective of his grandfather Gil and Gil's unstable father-in-law, the builder and opium addict William McOmish. Gil's marriage to Malvina McOmish represents the merging of the Dutch and Welsh family lines. Scenes from a Marriage depicts the youth of Gilmartin's father, Brochwel, who will one day be a university professor specializing in the poetry of Robert Browning; appropriately, this section of the novel uses interior monologues from multiple points of view, providing Gilmartin and the reader with a variety of viewpoints that require some assembly in order to understand the situation.

The novel concludes with the ghost revisiting those who have survived him: his wife, who is parlaying her bereavement into a book deal, and his murderer, who is taking over his victim's job even as he is consumed with grief over his crime. The book concludes with a conversation between the ghost and his anima, a Jungian term for the feminine, true inner self of a man. While there is no absolution as such for the murderer Going or the unfaithful wife Esme, the novel concludes, in conversation between self and soul, with acceptance.

SUMMARY

Murder and Walking Spirits and the novels of the Deptford and Cornish trilogies are rich in character and complex in theme. They are engagingly written; Robertson Davies entertains at the same time that he makes the reader think. The foregoing analyses can cover only a small fraction of the ideas Davies brings to his writing and point out what is perhaps the overriding theme of his novels: the importance of recognizing the wonder of the world, whether one calls it God, myth, mystery, the realm of "the Mothers," the unconscious, or all of the above.

Karen M. Cleveland Marwick; updated by James S. Brown

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Tempest-Tost*, 1951
- Leaven of Malice*, 1954
- A Mixture of Frailties*, 1958
- Fifth Business*, 1970
- The Manticore*, 1972
- World of Wonders*, 1975
- The Rebel Angels*, 1981

What's Bred in the Bone, 1985
The Lyre of Orpheus, 1988
Murther and Walking Spirits, 1991
The Cunning Man, 1994

SHORT FICTION:

High Spirits, 1982

DRAMA:

Overlaid, pr. 1947, pb. 1949
The Voice of the People, pr. 1948, pb. 1949
Eros at Breakfast, pr. 1948, pb. 1949
Fortune, My Foe, pr. 1948, pb. 1949
Hope Deferred, pr. 1948, pb. 1949
At the Gates of the Righteous, pr. 1948, pb. 1949
Eros at Breakfast, and Other Plays, pb. 1949 (includes Hope Deferred, Overlaid, At the Gates of the Righteous, and The Voice of the People)
At My Heart's Core, pr., pb. 1950
King Phoenix, pr. 1950, pb. 1972
A Masque of Aesop, pr., pb. 1952
A Jig for the Gypsy, pr. 1954 (broadcast and staged), pb. 1954
Hunting Stuart, pr. 1955, pb. 1972
Love and Libel: Or, The Ogre of the Provincial World, pr., pb. 1960 (adaptation of his novel Leaven of Malice)
A Masque of Mr. Punch, pr. 1962, pb. 1963
Hunting Stuart, and Other Plays, pb. 1972 (includes King Phoenix and General Confession)
Question Time, pr., pb. 1975

TELEPLAY:

Fortune, My Foe, 1953 (adaptation of his play)

NONFICTION:

Shakespeare's Boy Actors, 1939
Shakespeare for Younger Players: A Junior Course, 1942
The Diary of Samuel Marchbanks, 1947
The Table Talk of Samuel Marchbanks, 1949
Renown at Stratford: A Record of the Shakespeare Festival in Canada, 1953, 1953 (with Tyrone Guthrie)
Twice Have the Trumpets Sounded: A Record of the Stratford Shakespearean Festival in Canada, 1954, 1954 (with Guthrie)
Thrice the Brinded Cat Hath Mew'd: A Record of the Stratford Shakespearean Festival in Canada, 1955, 1955 (with Guthrie)
A Voice from the Attic, 1960
The Personal Art: Reading to Good Purpose, 1961
Marchbanks' Almanack, 1967
Stephen Leacock: Feast of Stephen, 1970
One Half of Robertson Davies, 1977
The Enthusiasms of Robertson Davies, 1979
The Well-Tempered Critic, 1981
Reading and Writing, 1993

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does Robertson Davies use autobiography and history in his novels? How does one account for the differences between the author's experiences and those of the characters who seem to represent him?
- What role does the psychology of Carl Jung play in Davies' works? How does the concept of archetypes manifest itself in the novels?
- What role does Canadian nationalism play in the novels? Can the author's attitude toward his nation be considered positive, negative, or ambivalent?
- Artistic creation is an important theme in many of Davies' novels—the visual arts, as well as music, opera, and drama. How might one characterize the author's attitude toward art and the artist?
- Robertson Davies has been characterized as a comic novelist. Is this characterization accurate? Why or why not?

Happy Alchemy: On the Pleasures of Music and the Theatre, 1997

The Merry Heart: Reflections on Reading, Writing, and the World of Books, 1997

"For Your Eyes Alone": Letters, 1976-1995, 1999

About the Author

Cude, Wilfred. A Due Sense of Differences: An Evaluative Approach to Canadian Literature. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1980.

Grant, Judith Skelton. Robertson Davies: Man of Myth. Toronto: Viking, 1994.

Jones, Joseph, and Joanna Jones. Canadian Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

Keith, W. J. Canadian Literature in English. New York: Longman, 1985.

La Bossière, Camille R., and Linda M. Morra, eds. Robertson Davies: A Mingling of Contraries. Ottawa, Ont.: University of Ottawa Press, 2001.

Lawrence, Robert G., and Samuel L. Macey, eds. Studies in Robertson Davies' Deptford Trilogy. Victoria, B.C.: University of Victoria, 1980.

Little, Dave. Catching the Wind in a Net: The Religious Vision of Robertson Davies. Toronto: ECW, 1996.

Monk, Patricia. The Smaller Infinity: The Jungian Self in the Novels of Robertson Davies. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1982.

Peterman, Michael. Robertson Davies. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Library of Congress

DANIEL DEFOE

Born: London, England
1660

Died: London, England
April 26, 1731

Generally considered the most typically English of the major early eighteenth century writers, Defoe was one of the great journalists and professional authors of his age and an important contributor to the development of the novel in English.

BIOGRAPHY

Daniel Defoe (dih-FOH) was born Daniel Foe in the parish of St. Giles Cripplegate, London, England, in 1660, the son of James Foe, a tallow chandler and butcher who later held several positions of authority in the city of London, and Alice Foe. (Defoe changed his name to its more aristocratic form sometime around the age of forty.) Because there are no surviving records of Defoe's birth, biographers have surmised, on the basis of two of his off-hand statements, that he was born sometime in the autumn. Defoe's early years were eventful: When he was five, the Great Plague ravaged London and his family fled to the country; the next year, the Great Fire of London leveled thousands of houses and eighty-seven churches, including St. Paul's Cathedral. He grew up in a London wracked with political and religious controversy, and belonging as he did to a Dissenting family, he must have been more than a little interested in the events occurring around him.

Because the Foes were Presbyterians, a major Dissenting group, Daniel was denied an education at Oxford and Cambridge, from which Nonconformists were barred. Instead, from 1671 to 1679, with the intention of studying for the ministry, he attended schools founded for well-to-do Dissenters: James Fisher's school in Surrey, and the Academy for Dissenters, run by the Reverend Charles Morton, north of London. Unlike the traditional classical courses of study at Oxford and Cambridge, the curriculum at Morton's Academy emphasized modern philosophy and science, as well as the new English grammar. This practical education—especially the study of English—became the foundation on which Defoe built his later career as a professional writer.

Defoe left Morton's Academy around 1679, having at some point decided against the ministry. By the early 1680's, he had established himself as a hosiery merchant in London, and in 1684, he married Mary Tuffley, with whom he had eight children.

For Defoe, the 1680's and the 1690's saw substantial business and political activity. Although as a merchant he traveled extensively in England and on the Continent—acquiring the geographical and linguistic knowledge that his writing would later reveal—he found time for involvement in the Duke of Monmouth's Rebellion in 1685, for his first published piece of writing (a pamphlet against the Catholic James II), and for participation in William III's triumphal entry into London in 1688. Defoe's business interests included not only hosiery but also wine, tobacco, land, and civet cats; he conducted business on a grand scale—and, like other aggressive merchants of his age, was entangled in a number of legal suits. In 1692, Defoe's businesses failed, leaving him seventeen thousand pounds in debt.

After his financial collapse, Defoe used his Whiggish connections to acquire various lucrative government positions. For half a decade, he served as a trustee of the government lottery, worked as an accountant for the government office that levied duties on glassware, and even functioned as a secret agent for the Crown. By 1694, he was able to set up a brick and tile factory near London and to pay off many of his debts; by the mid-1690's, he had prospered enough to purchase a new house and a coach and horses. Sometime during these years, he also changed his name.

Defoe began writing at the end of the seventeenth century, publishing his first book, An Essay upon Projects (1697), and much Whig propaganda, culminating in his defense of the Crown in the satiric poem The True-Born Englishman: A Satyr (1701). With King William's death in 1702, resentment against Dissenters, whom the king had protected, grew. That December, Defoe published The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1702), an outrageous proposal, supposedly from a High Church extremist, for prosecuting and killing those who did not conform to the Church of England. Arrested for sedition, Defoe was pilloried, fined, and jailed. His half-year sojourn in Newgate Prison left him with huge debts and a failed brick and tile factory.

Released from prison at the behest of Robert Harley, the Tory speaker of the House of Commons, Defoe worked for Harley as a secret agent, traveling throughout England in search of political information, and writing and publishing a thrice-weekly Tory publication, The Review (1704-1713). Defoe also produced a considerable number of other journalistic pieces, familiar essays, poems, allegories, letters, and book-length works on various topics. Although he kept his Tory connections secret and publicly remained a Whig, he was criticized by the Whigs, who suspected his affiliations. Criticism was not Defoe's only problem; from 1713 to 1714, he was arrested several times either for debt or for political reasons, and each time he was released as a result of government intervention.

With the death of Queen Anne and the fall of the Tory ministry, the pragmatic Defoe offered his services to Sir Robert Walpole, the powerful Whig politician. Until the year before his death, Defoe was Walpole's secret agent working in the Tory publication network, subverting Tory propaganda from within. He also published a popular series of conduct books, including the well-received The Family Instructor, in Three Parts (1715).

With the publication of The Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, of York, Mariner, Written by Himself (1719; commonly known as Robinson Crusoe), Defoe began yet another career, producing in the remaining decade or so of his life the fictional works that assured him a place among England's literary greats. Robinson Crusoe was followed a few months later with The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe: Being the Second and Last Part of His Life (1719) and with Serious Reflections During the Life and Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, with His Vision of the Angelick World (1720). The second and third volumes never earned the acclaim of the first, and neither was worthy of the first. Defoe's success with Crusoe's story led to a number of long narratives, including those on which his enduring fame rests: Memoirs of a Cavalier: Or, A Military Journal of the Wars in Germany, and the Wars in England, from the Year 1632 to the Year 1648 (1720); The Life, Adventures, and Pyracies of the Famous Captain Singleton (1720); The History and Remarkable Life of the Truly Honourable Col Jacques, Commonly Call'd Col Jack (1722); A Journal of the Plague Year (1722; also known as The History of the Great Plague in London); The Fortunes and Misfortunes of the Famous Moll Flanders, Written from Her Own Memorandums (1722; commonly known as Moll Flanders); and The Fortunate Mistress (1724; more popularly known as Roxana). In addition, during the last decade of his life he wrote several other book-length works on a variety of topics and continued to produce pamphlets, criminal biographies, political pieces, and other journalistic works.

Defoe died in London on April 26, 1731.

ANALYSIS

Defoe's admirers sometimes call him the "father of the novel" and sometimes refer to him as the "first great realistic writer." While neither phrase is completely accurate—there is no consensus about the identity of the first novelist, and there is controversy about when realistic writing first became popular—both descriptions reveal something about Defoe's major literary contribution. He was one of the best of the earliest writers of realistic fiction, the genre that eventually evolved into the novel as it is known today.

Defoe and his contemporaries did not invent fiction or even popularize it. Elizabethan and Jacobean England produced a number of writers whose chief oeuvre was fictional writing—imitations of classical models, prose romances, biographical accounts of criminals and rogues, picaresque tales, allegories, and even translations of the lengthy and complicated narratives so popular in France. To this tradition, Defoe added the realistic first-person narrative, featuring the humble everyday occurrences that constitute the life of the ordinary—not famous or notorious—human being.

All Defoe's long major works are fictional narratives that pretend to be true autobiographies. Defoe's skill at inventing realistic episodes and providing superbly realized detail makes it difficult for the average reader to believe that the tales are fictional, that they have no basis in actuality, and that they are the creations of one man.

Defoe's fiction is notable for its verisimilitude—that illusion of reality or semblance of truth created through the use of concrete details, elaborate identifications of the sources of information or ideas, simple and unadorned prose, frequent reminders to the reader to beware of inaccuracies, and, most important, the first-person narrator. Verisimilitude is created through the naming of actual places and people, the inclusion of historical events as background, the inclusion of prefatory statements in which the narrator writes of material omitted because of lack of space or mentions corroborating testimony to the events in the narrative, and the creation of completely believable characters.

In An Essay upon Projects, Defoe suggests the creation of a Society, modeled on the French Academy, "to polish and refine the English Tongue . . . to establish Purity and Propriety of Stile. . . ." Defoe's concern with language is evident in the fact that "Purity and Propriety of Stile" are the dominant characteristics of his prose. To Defoe, clarity and plainness—qualities learned at Morton's Academy—were not only necessary for understanding but also morally correct. Plain language was, for Defoe, the language of the everyday world that he inhabited, the diction and imagery of business people, the vocabulary of the middle class, the honest communication of the common English citizen. This stylistic plainness is completely appropriate to Defoe's intentions in his fiction and lends an air of authenticity to the autobiographical discourse of his characters. Plainness of language notwithstanding, Defoe's prose is not devoid of linguistic creativity; when it is appropriate, he skillfully uses aphorisms, proverbial phrases, and figurative comparisons. He apostrophizes, uses analogies, constructs alliterative sequences and rhetorical questions. Like Alexander Pope, he is a master of periphrasis.

At first acquaintance, Defoe's first-person narrators seem unusual or uncommon—they are prostitute and courtesan, sailor and gentleman, criminal and Quaker—but they are very much of a type: They are practical, business-minded, middle-class folk who inhabit an active and vigorous world. These narrators—Roxana, Moll Flanders, Robinson Crusoe, Colonel Jack, Captain Singleton, the unnamed Cavalier—are possessed of a sturdy, irrepressible desire to conquer all circumstances; they are industrious and determined, and their ingenuity often proves their economic salvation. Indeed, Defoe's narrators seem always to be counting or tallying money or goods or movable property.

All Defoe's long narratives tell essentially the same story: An average, but prudent and hard-working, person is forced by circumstances into desperate straits but manages, through human ingenuity and determination, to gain success. Defoe's characters personify the heroic in common humanity, and their actions represent the religious significance of hard work and discipline. Defoe writes about everyday life and its temptations and compromises, but he also illustrates the workings of divine providence in the humblest of daily activities.

Defoe's fiction has often been criticized for its lack of discernible structure—he rarely uses chapter divisions, leaving no clues to the dramatic moments and internal climaxes in the narratives. He provides a stunning variety of richly detailed episodes that do little to advance what little plot there is, but which do create a sense of the importance of the mundane. Unlike the novelists who would follow him, Defoe avoids character analysis, preferring instead to concentrate on action and incident; his characters show little emotion and a considerable amount of calm reflection. Defoe's debts to allegory and the moral treatise are evident in the hortatory tone so characteristic of his tales; he moralizes frequently—to many readers' irritation—but always, it is in the service of his intentions, in the contexts of the solid middle-class fictional world that he has created.

ROBINSON CRUSOE

First published 1719

Type of work: Novel

Shipwrecked on a deserted island, an English seaman manages to create, through hard work and ingenuity, a profitable and comfortable life for himself.

Robinson Crusoe was Defoe's first-published full narrative and his most popular, appealing to both middle-class and aristocratic readers with its combination of a believable and very human first-person narrator, realistic detail, allusions and references to actual places and people, imagery drawn from everyday life and the natural world, and an appealing, if somewhat unstructured, narrative line.

The title page of the book provides a considerable amount of information for the reader. The LIFE and Strange Surprising ADVENTURES of ROBINSON CRUSOE, of YORK. Mariner: Who lived Eight and Twenty Years, all alone in an un-inhabited Island on the Coast of America, near the Mouth of the Great River of Oroonoke; Having been cast on Shore by Shipwreck, wherein all the Men perished but himself. With An Account how he was at last as strangely deliver'd by PI-RATES. Written by Himself. That, in brief, is a plot summary. It also is evidence of the ordinariness of the narrator, a seaman from York (and therefore middle class) who is forced by circumstances to fend for himself in unfriendly surroundings, a practical man who manages to survive for twenty-eight years before his rescue. Finally, within this long title is the evidence of Defoe's insistence on realism—the use of real place names, the statement that the book is an autobiographical narrative.

That Robinson Crusoe is a Defoe character is evident from the moment he finds himself shipwrecked. He acts immediately in the interest of survival, salvaging such necessities as he can from the stricken ship and building a rude shelter. Yet Crusoe's concern is not only for his physical well-being; he begins a journal in which he plans to record his spiritual progress as it is reflected in the daily activities that mark his sojourn on the island. For nearly two decades, Crusoe works to create a life for himself, building what he needs, improvising where he must, and ultimately replicating a little corner of England on the desert island. What he accomplishes is beyond basic survival; he fashions an English life that is dependent on the transformation of raw materials into the necessities of his culture. He plants grain that he bakes into bread, he domesticates goats so that he might have milk, and he turns a cave into a cozy fortified dwelling that boasts comfortable furniture. When Friday arrives, Crusoe's little English empire is complete: The conqueror has mastered both the territory and its people.

Having survived the shipwreck, Crusoe has become strongly aware of his vulnerability as a human being, and throughout the narrative he insists that his life is proof of the workings of divine Providence. Consequently, he often reflects on the spiritual lessons to be learned not only from his experiences on the island but also from the events in his life that led to his sojourn so far from home. This reflection is typical of Defoe's narrators, who look on life's experiences as a series of symbolic occurrences pointing to the connections between the spiritual and the secular.

Defoe has created in Robinson Crusoe a man very like himself—and very much a typical eighteenth century Englishman. Crusoe's plebeian origins, his earnest industry, his tendency to see religious meaning in the mundane, and his talent for overcoming misfortune are all Defoe's qualities. Like the average Englishman of his time, Crusoe is something of a bigot, and although he treats Friday well, the slave is never offered his freedom and must call Crusoe "Master." Crusoe triumphs over his circumstances and environment, and indeed he manages to provide himself with a little paradise on earth; but he is English to the core, and with the first opportunity he returns to England and settles down to family life.

Robinson Crusoe is often described as one of the major forerunners of the novel. Although written as a travel narrative, it displays many of the modern novel's major characteristics: realism (through verisimilitude, the first-person narrator, imagery from the natural world, and copious detail), interesting and believable characters engaged in plausible adventures and activities, and an engaging story.

MOLL FLANDERS

First published: 1722

Type of work: Novel

Born into poverty, a resourceful and industrious woman works her way through moral lapses and misfortunes to repentance and middle-class respectability and comfort.

If Moll Flanders is Defoe's most highly regarded fictional narrative, Moll Flanders is probably Defoe's most memorable narrator, with her compelling account of a life spent largely in attempts to survive in a society hostile to unattached women.

Born to and abandoned by a convicted felon, Moll Flanders is reared first by Gypsies and then as a ward of the parish of Colchester. At fourteen, she is hired as a servant to a kind family who educates her along with their daughters. Moll, believing she is loved, loses her virtue to the oldest son, who later pays her to marry the youngest son, Robin. Widowed after five years, Moll is married four more times, to a draper who spends all of her money, to a sea captain who turns out to be her half brother, to a roguish Irishman (from whom she separates when he decides to continue highway robbery), and to a bank clerk (with whom she finds happiness until his death). Between the brother and the highwayman, she spends six years as the mistress of a gentleman whose wife is insane. Moll also bears several children to husbands and lover, but she seems ill-suited to motherhood. In the end, she is reunited with the great love of her life—Jemmy E., the charming Irishman—with whom she resolves to live respectably.

Because she has no social status and no real financial possibilities, Moll Flanders, like so many eighteenth century women, is dependent to a great degree on men—as husbands or keepers or employers—and on her own industry for survival. Her adventures following Robin's death are focused on marrying profitably: Moll learns to say little about herself, to pretend to wealth in order to attract men, and to behave like a lady in order to appear worthy of gentlemen. Like so many women of the middle class and the aristocracy, her principal objects are money and security, and she employs all of her energy in the pursuit of a financially lucrative marriage. She has two embarrassing failures and achieves only modest success with the bank clerk, and when he dies, she is eventually tempted by her poverty to begin a criminal career that lasts for twelve years. By the time Moll is apprehended in the act of stealing two pieces of silk, she has become one of the wealthiest thieves in London.

In the story of Moll Flanders, the reader can recognize many of the concerns that Defoe addressed in his fiction. Moll is a sturdy, resourceful, intelligent woman, driven by her need to survive. She turns to a life of crime, is enabled by her industry and ingenuity to succeed to the point of minor wealth, and is forced by her Newgate incarceration to a recognition of her need for repentance.

The story of Moll Flanders's life and misadventures displays the stylistic traits for which Defoe is praised. Moll's world—eighteenth century London, with its crowded streets and throngs of humanity, with its gulf between rich and poor—is vividly realized in Defoe's attention to detail and in his frequent allusions to actual places and real people. The horrors of Newgate Prison are detailed in vigorous language that conveys strong images of confinement and inescapable poverty. Defoe's fascination with precise location and the intricacies of process allows Moll to elaborate on her plans for snaring rich husbands and on her techniques for stealing jewelry or other goods. So graphically located are Moll's exploits that at times the book reads like a criminal atlas of eighteenth century London streets or even like a manual for a would-be thief.

This focus on the minutiae of thievery, coupled with Moll's evident relish in telling stories that display her audacity and subtlety in criminal activity, her satisfaction with the expertise she developed, and her sense of triumph at acquiring wealth (albeit through crime), becomes the basis for Defoe's didacticism. The middle-class traits that Defoe admires—practicality, determination, focus on assets and liabilities—have been employed in a reprehensible life, and Moll must undergo a spiritual conversion and repent before the narrative ends.

Finally caught in the act, Moll is incarcerated in Newgate and condemned to death. She is visited by a clergyman, who prays with her and entreats her to repent her wicked past. Moved by the minister's words, Moll realizes that she must be concerned with her spiritual impoverishment. Her repentance is intensified by the imprisonment of Jemmy, her favorite husband, whose criminal life she now blames on her desertion of him. Moll and Jemmy escape execution and are transported to Virginia, where they purchase their freedom and become landowners. The elderly Moll Flanders who narrates the story is a woman who is determined to tell her story so it can serve as a deterrent to anyone who might contemplate a life of crime, as an assurance to the sinner that no life is too despicable to be salvaged through repentance.

SUMMARY

Daniel Defoe's narratives—in particular, Robinson Crusoe, Moll Flanders, and Roxana—are widely regarded as ancestors of the novel. The first two have each, at one time or another, been declared “the first novel,” although the consensus is that both books lack two essential characteristics of the novel: character development and a well-structured plot.

There is more agreement on Defoe's contribution to the development of the new genre. From Defoe's work, the novel acquired realism, moral complexity, plain language, and a focus on everyday human life. He may not be the father of the English novel, but that genre owes much of its character to the fiction he produced.

E. D. Huntley

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, of York, Mariner, Written by Himself, 1719 (commonly known as Robinson Crusoe)

The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe: Being the Second and Last Part of His Life, 1719

Serious Reflections During the Life and Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, with His Vision of the Angelick World, 1720

The History of the Life and Adventures of Mr. Duncan Campbell, a Gentleman Who, Tho' Deaf and Dumb, Writes Down Any Stranger's Name at First Sight, with Their Future Contingencies of Fortune, 1720

The Life, Adventures and Pyracies of the Famous Captain Singleton, 1720

Memoirs of a Cavalier: Or, A Military Journal of the Wars in Germany, and the Wars in England, from the Year 1632 to the Year 1648, 1720

A Journal of the Plague Year, 1722 (also known as The History of the Great Plague in London)

The Fortunes and Misfortunes of the Famous Moll Flanders, Written from Her Own Memorandums, 1722 (commonly known as Moll Flanders)

The History and Remarkable Life of the Truly Honourable Col Jacque, Commonly Call'd Col Jack, 1722

The Fortunate Mistress, 1724 (also known as Roxana)

The Memoirs of an English Officer Who Serv'd in the Dutch War in 1672, to the Peace of Utrecht in 1713, by Capt George Carleton, 1728 (also known as A True and Genuine History of the Last Two Wars and The Memoirs of Cap George Carleton)

SHORT FICTION:

A True Relation of the Apparition of One Mrs. Veal, 1706

POETRY:

The True-Born Englishman: A Satyr, 1701

NONFICTION:

An Essay upon Projects, 1697

The Shortest Way with the Dissenters, 1702

The History of the Union of Great Britain, 1709

An Appeal to Honour and Justice, 1715

The Family Instructor, in Three Parts, 1715

A New Voyage Round the World by a Course Never Sailed, 1724

A Tour Thro' the Whole Island of Great Britain, 1724-1727 (3 volumes)

A General History of the Robberies and Murders of the Most Notorious Pyrates, 1724-1728 (2 volumes)

The Complete English Tradesman, 1725-1727 (2 volumes)

The Four Years Voyages of Capt George Roberts, 1726

A New Family Instructor, 1727

A Plan of the English Commerce, 1728

Augusta Triumphans: Or, The Way to Make London the Most Flourishing City in the Universe, 1728

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Novels and Miscellaneous Works of Daniel Defoe, 1840-1841 (20 volumes; Walter Scott, editor)

Romances and Narratives by Daniel Defoe, 1895 (16 volumes; George Aitken, editor)

The Shakespeare Head Edition of the Novels and Selected Writings of Daniel Defoe, 1927-1928 (14 volumes)

About the Author

Backscheider, Paula R. Daniel Defoe: Ambition and Innovation. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1986.

_____. Daniel Defoe: His Life. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1989.

Bell, Ian A. Defoe's Fiction. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1985.

Elliott, Robert C., ed. Twentieth Century Interpretations of "Moll Flanders": A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970.

Ellis, Frank H., ed. Twentieth Century Interpretations of "Robinson Crusoe": A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1969.

Lund, Roger D., ed. Critical Essays on Daniel Defoe. New York: G. K. Hall, 1997.

Martin, John. Beyond Belief: The Real Life of Daniel Defoe. Pembroke Dock, Wales: Accent, 2006.

Novak, Maximillian E. Daniel Defoe, Master of Fiction: His Life and Ideas. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Richetti, John J. Daniel Defoe. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

_____. The Life of Daniel Defoe. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005.

Watt, Ian. The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding. 2d. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- To what extent did the rigors of Daniel Defoe's early life prepare him for the career that he had?
- Defoe is one of the earliest of the many writers whose literary career grew out of a journalistic background. What historical factors made this development possible?
- What desires of readers did Defoe understand extremely well for a man of his time?
- Explain Robinson Crusoe's creativity beyond his skill for surviving.
- How does the characterization of Moll Flanders benefit from the first-person narration of the work?
- Does the great range of techniques and literary artifices of works accepted as novels of recent decades provide a basis for arguing that Defoe should be regarded as the first true English novelist?

Hulton Archive/Getty Images

ANITA DESAI

Born: Mussoorie, India
June 24, 1937

One of the most acclaimed of contemporary Indian women novelists writing in English, Desai has made a notable contribution to women's studies and to the psychological novel.

BIOGRAPHY

Anita Desai (duh-SI) was born in Mussoorie, India, on June 24, 1937, of Indo-German parentage—her father, Dhiren N. Mazumdar, was a Bengali Hindu and her mother, Antoinette Nime, was a German. She grew up in Delhi speaking German and Bengali at home and Hindi and Urdu to her friends and neighbors. She learned English only when she went to a mission school. By her own account, she instantly fell in love with English literature and it became her lifelong obsession. Educated at Queen Mary's Higher Secondary School and later at Miranda House at the University of Delhi, she completed her B.A. in English literature with honors in 1957. Soon after her graduation, she moved to Calcutta, where she worked for a year at the Max Mueller Bhavan institute and married Ashvin Desai, an executive, on December 13, 1958. The couple had four children. Her youngest daughter, Kiran Desai, is a successful novelist herself, winning the 2006 Man Booker Prize for her second novel, The Inheritance of Loss (2006).

A gifted writer, Desai began writing at the age of seven. She published her first story in English at the age of nine in an American children's magazine. Her literary career, however, began with the publication of her first novel, Cry, the Peacock, in 1963. In this novel she presents a probing psychological study of a hypersensitive young woman obsessed with the neurotic fear of death caused by an oppressive marriage. The three parts of the novel showed her growing sense of alienation, her growing hysteria, and her eventual degeneration into insanity. Desai's effective use of the stream-of-consciousness technique in the novel and the lyrical quality of her prose attracted critical praise and launched her career.

After the success of her first novel, Desai continued to explore the interior landscape of the female psyche for the next fifteen years. Between 1965 and 1980, she wrote five novels of unusual distinction: Voices in the City (1965), Bye-Bye, Blackbird (1971), Where Shall We Go This Summer? (1975), Fire on the Mountain (1977), and Clear Light of Day (1980). Some of these novels received wide critical acclaim both in India and abroad. She received the certificate of excellence from the Authors and Publishers' Guild of India for Where Shall We Go This Summer? Fire on the Mountain won for her the Royal Society of Literature's Winifred Holtby Memorial Prize for Regional Literature and the Sahitya Akademi Award, the most prestigious literary award offered by India's National Academy of Letters. Her sixth novel, Clear Light of Day, was nominated for England's celebrated Man Booker Prize.

Two novels, In Custody (1984) and Baumgartner's Bombay (1988), in which she writes about cross-cultural concerns and experiences from a male point of view, marked a new stage of development in her career as a novelist. In Custody explores the decline of Urdu, a gracious and poetic language once cherished in northern India by both Muslims and Hindus. In Baumgartner's Bombay she portrays the life of a wandering Jew seeking refuge in India. The novel was also regarded as Desai's search for her German roots. Both these novels received a great deal of attention in the United States. Baumgartner's Bombay, in particular, aroused much interest among Jewish readers and won a Jewish prize, the Hadassah. In Custody was nominated for the Man Booker Prize. In 1993 she won the Literary Lion Award from the New York Public Library and in 1994 the Neil Gunn Fellowship of the Scottish Arts Council.

Her novel Journey to Ithaca (1995) chronicles the quest of two European hippies, the Italian Matteo and his German wife Sophie, who in 1975 join the Indian ashram of a woman guru simply called Mother. Disenchanted with Mother, Sophie leaves the ashram with her children on a mission to debunk the spiritual leader. Eventually, she learns about Mother's past and comes to see her in a different light. The novel fascinated critics and readers for its look at India from an outsider's perspective, taking up the idea introduced in Baumgartner's Bombay. Desai's next novel, Fasting, Feasting (1999) juxtaposes the lives of two Indian siblings in two distinct places in the world. While the elder sister Uma stays in India to support her aging parents, her young brother Arun earns a scholarship to the United States, where he experiences his first summer vacation with an American guest family. Contrasting descriptions of the Indian and American society, the novel was short-listed for the Man Booker Prize and won Desai the Alberto Moravia Award from Italy in 1999.

With The Zigzag Way (2004) Desai moved away from India and turned to the adventures of Eric, a young American historian, in a remote Mexican village. For Eric, it is also a voyage of discovery of his own English family roots as he encounters the mysterious Dona Vera, herself a wizened European immigrant with a shady past. The beautifully rendered Mexican landscape seemed inspired by Desai's own Mexican retreat.

In addition to the novels, Desai has published two volumes of short stories, Games at Twilight, and Other Stories (1978) and Diamond Dust: Stories (2000). The latter contains "The Rooftop Dwellers," a sequel to Fasting, Feasting, telling of Arun's humorous return to India that Desai had left out of the novel because its lighthearted tone contrasted with the novel's more somber atmosphere. Desai also cowrote a screenplay of her novel In Custody, which in 1993 was made into a film by the Bombay-born Ismail Merchant, who had coproduced films with James Ivory since the early 1960's. A prolific writer, Desai also has written three novels for children: The Peacock Garden (1974), Cat on a Houseboat (1976), and The Village by the Sea: An Indian Family Story (1982), for which she received the 1982 Guardian Award for Children's Fiction.

A major voice in Indian literature in English, Desai served for a number of years as a member of the Advisory Board for English of the Sahitya Akademi, where she was made a lifetime fellow in 2007, at age seventy. In 1978, she was elected Fellow of the Royal Society of Literature. In 1986, she was a visiting fellow at Girton College, Cambridge, England, and in 1987-1988 she taught at Smith College in the United States. From 1988 to 1993, as Purington Professor of English at Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts, she taught creative writing one semester a year and split her time between India and the United States. In 1993, she was appointed the John E. Burchard Professor of Humanities at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's (MIT) Program of Writing, teaching creative writing. By 2007, she was a professor emeritus at MIT and was giving guest lectures around the globe. Reticent about her private life, Desai does not encourage any investigation of autobiographical detail in her work.

ANALYSIS

Of all the Indian writers of English fiction, Desai is perhaps the most consummate artist. In her own account, though writing comes to her as naturally as breathing, she works consciously, laboriously, and meticulously to impose a design on the chaotic raw material of life. She regards writing as a process of discovering the truth. This truth is for the most part hidden beneath the surfaces of what people see, say, and do. Consequently, she does not give much importance to plot. Her major preoccupation as a novelist is to plunge to the depths of her characters' subconscious and reveal the interior landscapes of their minds through the use of evocative poetry, myth, symbol, image, and metaphor.

Desai's writing shows that she has the rare ability to transcend the limitations of a foreign medium of expression, the English language. In her own words, "By writing novels that have been cataloged by critics as psychological, and that are purely subjective, I have been left free to employ, simply, the language of the interior." Unlike other contemporary Indian writers who are mainly concerned with the country's social, political, or economic problems, Desai claims that her "novels are no reflection of Indian society, politics, or character." Her central concern in fiction has always been an exploration of the individual psyche.

Though the setting, the characters, the ethos, and the atmosphere of her novels are generally Indian, she successfully transcends the constraints of her contemporary social and political reality by using stylistic devices such as stream of consciousness, the interior monologue, flashback, pattern and rhythm, fantasy, and symbolism. She frequently uses remembrance as a narrative technique to probe the characters' buried selves, as well as to further the plot. Her novels show the influence of many English and European writers, including Henry James, E. M. Forster, James Joyce, D. H. Lawrence, Virginia Woolf, Marcel Proust, Rainer Maria Rilke, Arthur Rimbaud, Anton Chekhov, and Fyodor Dostoevski. In her later novels, Desai has experimented with describing India through the eyes of Europeans, or having an Indian character look at America with the eyes of a foreigner. With The Zigzag Way, Desai moved completely away from India, yet her trademark psychological introspection into her characters and her fascination with revealing the past through a series of flashbacks and stories links this novel to her previous ones with Indian themes.

Though Desai refuses to label herself as a feminist, she is gifted with an extraordinary feminine sensibility and has made female and feminist concerns the mainstay of her fiction. She may be regarded as a pioneer in exploring the lives of women in her early novels, which are dominated by compelling women, such as Maya (Cry, the Peacock), Monisha (Voices in the City), Sarah (Bye-Bye, Blackbird), Sita (Where Shall We Go This Summer?), Nanda Kaul (Fire on the Mountain), and Bim (Clear Light of Day). Her women struggle against the tyranny of a patriarchal family or an oppressive marriage to retain a sense of dignity, honor, and integrity. This is beautifully accomplished in the character of Uma in Fasting, Feasting, who sacrifices much for her aging, conservative and domineering parents, yet refuses to give up her soul.

In some of the novels she also focuses her attention on the tragic plight of the Indian widow. In Clear Light of Day, for example, she presents a haunting portrait of Aunt Mira, who was married at twelve and widowed at fifteen when she was yet a virgin. Consequently, throughout her life she is obliged to slave for others, first for her husband's family and then for the Das family. Desai lets the reader see through Aunt Mira's eyes the strangeness of life and how she shrivels in fear from it.

In Custody and Baumgartner's Bombay shift the spotlight from women to men and point to a new direction in Desai's growth as a writer. The thematic groundwork for these two novels was prepared by an earlier work, Bye-Bye, Blackbird, which dealt with the plight of Indian immigrants in England and explored the problems of cultural preservation and assimilation. In Custody makes a political statement about the loss of a civilization; Urdu was the repository of the Mughal culture in Indian history. In Baumgartner's Bombay, Desai turns to the experiences of an Austrian Jew who escapes from the Nazis and comes as an immigrant to seek refuge in India, but there, too, is always treated as an outsider. In depicting Baumgartner's view of India, Desai was probably empathizing with her own mother's experiences. By her own account, in writing the novel she found a way to explore the German side of her ancestry. The novel indicates Desai's growing political concerns and her impatience with human intolerance.

In Desai's fictional world, the predominant theme is alienation of the individual. The theme of alienation manifests itself in many forms. In her earlier novels, Cry, the Peacock, Voices in the City, Where Shall We Go This Summer?, and Fire on the Mountain, alienation results from entrapment in an unhappy and oppressive marriage. In Bye-Bye, Blackbird alienation stems from the encounter between two cultures or races. In Clear Light of Day the source of alienation is the breakup of the family as a result of India's partition. In In Custody and Baumgartner's Bombay the cause of alienation is as much a hostile social milieu as it is existential angst. In Journey to Ithaca an alternative European marriage nearly breaks under the strain of the young husband's fanatical quest for spiritual enlightenment that leaves his wife feeling left out and betrayed. Loneliness in the middle of an overbearing family is Uma's fate in Fasting, Feasting. Initially, Eric appears as a rather remote, somewhat weak but also alienated young academic in The Zigzag Way, whom only confrontation with his family's past brings to an engagement with life.

The theme of an older woman who may be either a spiritual guide or a charlatan is investigated in Desai's characters of Mother from Journey to Ithaca and Dona Vera of The Zigzag Way. Both women have their strengths and attractiveness, yet there are also some less savory details to their past lives, underlining the author's general refusal to indulge in any kind of nostalgia or idealization.

Some other themes and motifs in Desai's fiction are conflict between tradition and modernity, conflict between East and West, disharmony in marital relationships, disenchantment, loss and gain, death and violence, and the inhumane and oppressive environment of metropolitan cities like Delhi, Calcutta, and Bombay. Journey to Ithaca looked at Paris, Venice, and New York City in the 1920's, while the second half of Fasting, Feasting is set in the suburbs surrounding a Massachusetts college town. The Zigzag Way looks at remote Mexico. Her fiction is also known for its power to evoke an atmosphere. Though her major themes are universal, she successfully uses English to incorporate Indian sensibility into her fictional world.

FIRE ON THE MOUNTAIN

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

The novel portrays the tense relationship between a self-exiled old woman and her mentally disturbed great-granddaughter, a recluse who sets a mountain on fire.

Fire on the Mountain is a superbly crafted novel, known for its rich symbolic imagery and psychological insights. A winner of two prestigious awards, it tells the story of two older women and a young girl.

The first part of the novel takes the reader inside the mind of Nanda Kaul, the aged protagonist. The widow of a university vice chancellor and once at the hub of a large, demanding family and a hectic social life, she now lives in seclusion at Carignano, a desolate old house on the ridge of a mountain in Kasauli. Aloof, indifferent, and irritable, she wants no intrusion to violate her privacy. Her cloistered life is threatened when she receives a letter announcing an impending visit by her great-granddaughter Raka and when a telephone call comes from her childhood friend Ila Das, who wishes to visit her.

The second part of the novel shows the tense relationship between Nanda Kaul and Raka. A recluse, Raka has the habit of slipping away into her own private world, ignoring her great-grandmother completely. Haunted by nightmarish memories of a drunken, violent father and an unhappy, battered mother, she shuns human company and spends her time roaming the desolate hills and ravines like a bird or a lizard. This offers Desai an opportunity to weave symbolic nature imagery into the text of the novel. Challenged by Raka's indifference, Nanda Kaul reluctantly comes out of her self-imposed quietude and makes a desperate, though futile, attempt to attract the child to her by telling her fantastic stories about her own childhood.

The final part of the novel describes Ila Das's brief visit to Carignano for tea. Formerly a lecturer at Mr. Kaul's university, she now works as a welfare officer in the Kasauli area. During the visit, she nostalgically evokes memories of Nanda Kaul's seemingly glamorous past as the vice chancellor's wife. On her way home, however, she is raped and murdered. The shocking news of her tragic end shatters Nanda Kaul completely and breaks down her psychological defenses. Before she collapses, she splutters the truth that all the stories she told Raka were fabricated, that her husband never loved her and had carried on a lifelong affair with a Christian woman whom he loved but could not marry, that she always felt alienated from her children, and that she was forced into a life of exile. Meanwhile Raka slips away with some matches and sets the forest on fire.

The plot of the novel is very simple, but its rich imagery and symbolism reflect the characters' moods and mental states and reveal their interior landscapes. The fire on the mountain is symbolic of the fire that smolders in Nanda Kaul's heart for years because of her husband's betrayal in marriage. It is also symbolic of women's rage in general.

CLEAR LIGHT OF DAY

First published: 1980

Type of work: Novel

Through remembrance during a family reunion, two sisters regain a clear understanding of the importance of family in their lives.

Clear Light of Day is known for its unmatched power of conveying the atmosphere of decadence. It takes place in Delhi, in the summer of 1947—the year of India’s independence and partition. Through the interplay of memory and introspection, the novel re-creates the dull, stagnant lives of a middle-class Bengali family—the Das household. Desai describes the novel as “a four-dimensional piece on how a family moves backwards and forwards in a period of time.” Accordingly, the novel is divided into four parts.

The first part of the novel is set in the present. The second part deals with the past immediately preceding the present. The third part delves into an earlier past, and the fourth part brings the time sequence back to the present again, with an eye toward the future.

Desai’s control of the narrative, as characters slip into their subconscious and examine the past, shows her mastery of the stream-of-consciousness technique.

The novel begins when Tara returns from the United States with her diplomat husband to visit her childhood home in Delhi. Bim, her unmarried older sister, still lives in the house with her youngest brother, Baba, who is mentally retarded. Their parents are dead, and their older brother, Raja, has abandoned the family to live in another city as the rich heir of his Muslim father-in-law’s estate. As a result, Bim is left alone to take care of the house, her retarded brother, and her father’s business, in addition to pursuing her career as a history professor.

As Tara and Bim compare their memories, Tara discovers that Bim is still trapped in the past, nurturing a deep resentment against Raja over a letter he wrote to her from Hyderabad. To suggest the stagnant nature of Bim’s psyche, Desai uses an image of the stagnant well in the garden that would not release a dead cow. As Bim recounts her sacrifices for the family, Tara comes to understand why her sister has become bitter and angry. Tara’s constant prodding, however, brings Bim to the verge of neurosis when her anger erupts at helpless Baba. Bim’s loss of control, followed by repentance and compassion, makes her see things much more clearly, realizing that her siblings are part of her life, and that together they form a whole. Tara also discovers that, though she has submerged herself in her husband’s life, much of her is still anchored in Bim and Raja and the old childhood home.

Tara’s visit thus proves to be therapeutic for Bim, who finally comes to terms with the past. Though Bim decides not to attend the wedding of Raja’s daughter, she forgives him and invites him to Delhi. Her emotional conflict is resolved.

Though the characters of Bim and Tara are finely juxtaposed and fully developed, the predominant point of view in the novel is Bim’s. It is mainly through Bim’s perspective that readers see the story of the family’s disintegration and reconciliation. In Bim, Desai has created a strong, resourceful, self-reliant, and enlightened woman protagonist.

Nominated for the Man Booker Prize, Clear Light of Day has been praised for its musical structure and rhythmic devices that depict women’s memories afloat in time. In the novel, time is a destroyer and a preserver.

“A DEVOTED SON”

First published: 1978 (collected in Games at Twilight, and Other Stories, 1978)

Type of work: Short story

The story dramatizes the conflict between a physician son and his ailing father’s attitudes toward life.

“A Devoted Son” appears in Desai’s acclaimed collection of short stories, Games at Twilight, and Other Stories. Unlike her earlier novels in which female characters dominate the texts, this story is about male characters. Focusing on a father-son relationship in a traditional Hindu family, the story looks at the problem of old age from two different angles. The setting of the story is realistic. Developed with a sense of humor, the story presents a fine study in human psychology and love.

The title of the story refers to Rakesh, who is always reverential to his parents, touching their feet in devotion. A brilliant student, after getting his M.D. in India he goes to the United States on a scholarship and pursues his career in a most prestigious hospital, winning the admiration of his American colleagues. His love and devotion to his aging parents compel him to return to India, get married to an uneducated village girl in deference to his parents' wishes, start working in a city hospital, rise to the position of a director, and finally set up his own clinic and come to be recognized as the best and the richest doctor in town. People can hardly believe that a man born to illiterate parents could rise to such heights of glory and yet remain devoted to them.

The conflict between the father and the son begins when, after his retirement and the death of his wife, the old man frequently falls ill with mysterious diseases that even his physician son cannot diagnose. Worried about his father's health, the son begins to supervise his father's diet. All the mouth-watering sweets, fried savory snacks, and rich meals are forbidden. Instead he is forced to eat boiled foods and take numerous kinds of pills, powders, medicines, and tonics. The old man is shocked with disbelief at his son's tyrannical attitude, for who could ever imagine "a son who actually refused his father the food he craved?" He feels starved and complains to his neighboring friend of his son's attitude, but nobody believes him.

In the last scene, when his son brings him a new tonic to make him feel better, the father reproachfully smashes the tonic bottle on the floor and expresses his wish to be left alone to die. The father's final act of rebellion makes the reader wonder whether the son's almost tyrannical control of his father's life is justified in the name of filial devotion. Viewed in this light, the title of the story becomes ironic.

FASTING, FEASTING

First published: 1999

Type of work: Novel

The lives of two Indian siblings are contrasted: While sister Uma stays at home to care for her aging parents, son Arun goes to the United States on a scholarship.

In Fasting, Feasting Desai focuses on the children of a conservative, upper-middle-class Indian family living in a provincial town southwest of Bombay. Desai is as much interested in the family dynamics as in the effects of strict patriarchy on the next generation.

As the novel opens, husband and wife, who have become so much like one person that Uma refers to them as MamaPapa, sit on their favorite veranda swing. The place is symbolic for the static nature of their lives now that Papa has retired as a lawyer and his children are adults. Uma is there to serve them, even though she is forty-three, but unmarried. Here, such rituals of patriarchy are performed, as when Uma fetches an orange that Mama carefully peels, slices, and skins before handing each sliver to Papa.

In keeping with Desai's desire to tell the truth in her fiction, even if it is painful, Uma is denied much possibility to develop. Through her flashbacks it is revealed that she was denied the opportunity to go to her beloved convent school when she was fifteen, and she was forced to return to her parents when she ran away to attend the school. Mama decided to arrange a marriage for her at age sixteen, but the prospective groom scandalized the family when he fell in love with her younger sister Aruna. Uma then joined her widowed aunt Mira-masi on a pilgrimage to a temple, where she longed to stay but was taken home again. In Mira-masi, the reader meets one of Desai's wizened old women who have taken to spirituality as an act of defiance.

The next attempts to marry off Uma also were failures. The second fiancé's family just took her dowry, and the third married Uma in a nightmare version of a traditional wedding and intended to enslave her as a second wife. For once, she was saved by Papa.

Uma's fate is not the worst, as Desai shows through the other female characters around her. Beautiful, intelligent Anamika wins a scholarship to Oxford she is never allowed to accept because of her early marriage. Bullied by her mother-in-law, Anamika is most likely killed by her husband, who masks her death as suicide. Even Uma's younger sister Aruna, who marries a successful man whom she dominates, is trapped by her desire for perfection. Happier alternatives are hinted at in women like Doctor Dutt and young Moyna, daughter of the neighbor Mrs. Joshi, who also has a career. However, the first part of the novel ends with the dispersal of Anamika's ashes, witnessed by a grieving Uma.

The second part of the novel tells of Arun's first summer holiday in Massachusetts, where he has gone to study. He is invited to stay with the Pattons, a suburban family. Critics have complained that the Pattons are a bit of a caricature. Mr. Patton is a steak-eating businessman who bosses his wife and children; Mrs. Patton is a closet vegetarian who seeks survival through evasion; daughter Melanie is anorexic; and son Rod is a passionate jogger and football player. At the end of the novel, formal closure is achieved as Arun gives a grateful Mrs. Patton the shawl and tea that his parents made Uma send him.

Fasting, Feasting works best when it focuses on the Indian family. Even though Uma and Mama can share a joke alone on the swing, the limits of Uma's life imposed by patriarchy are painfully obvious. Desai's look at America is deliberately that of an outsider like Arun, who sees irony in everyday life. Desai had planned to write a third, humorous part of the novel, telling of Arun's return to India after graduation, but instead she published it as the short story "The Rooftop Dwellers" in her collection Diamond Dust: Stories.

SUMMARY

Focusing on the inner, private lives of people and exploring their minds, Anita Desai has made a notable contribution to the development of the psychological novel. She has also played a pioneering role, particularly in the context of patriarchal society in India, in exploring female and feminist concerns and in making the woman's viewpoint, thoughts, and behavior the central focus of her novels. Gifted with a poetic sensibility, she works on the craft of fiction with meticulous care.

Chaman L. Sahni; updated by R. C. Lutz

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Cry, the Peacock, 1963
Voices in the City, 1965
Bye-Bye, Blackbird, 1971
Where Shall We Go This Summer?, 1975
Fire on the Mountain, 1977
Clear Light of Day, 1980
In Custody, 1984
Baumgartner's Bombay, 1988
Journey to Ithaca, 1995
Fasting, Feasting, 1999
The Zigzag Way, 2004

SHORT FICTION:

Games at Twilight, and Other Stories, 1978
Diamond Dust: Stories, 2000

SCREENPLAY:

In Custody, 1993 (with Shahrukh Husain; adaptation of her novel)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

The Peacock Garden, 1974

Cat on a Houseboat, 1976

The Village by the Sea: An Indian Family Story, 1982

About the Author

Afzal-Khan, Fawzia. Cultural Imperialism and the Indo-English: Genre and Ideology in R. K. Narayan, Anita Desai, Kamala Markandaya, and Salman Rushdie. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.

Bande, Usha. The Novels of Anita Desai: A Study in Character and Conflict. Delhi, India: Prestige Books, 1988.

Cronin, Richard. "The Quiet and the Loud: Anita Desai's India." In Imagining India. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1989.

Dhawan, R. K. The Fiction of Anita Desai. Delhi, India: Bahri, 1989.

Jain, Jasbir. Stairs to the Attic: The Novels of Anita Desai. Jaipur, India: Printwell, 1987.

Kafka, Phillipa. On the Outside Looking In(dian): Indian Women Writers at Home and Abroad. New York: Peter Lang, 2003.

Khan, Nyla Ali. "Place and the Politics of Identity in Desai's In Custody." In The Fiction of Nationality in an Era of Transnationalism. New York: Routledge, 2005.

Nabar, Vrinda. "The Image of India in Anita Desai's Clear Light of Day." In Recent Commonwealth Literature, edited by R. K. Dhawan, et al. Delhi, India: Prestige Books, 1989.

Prasad, Madhusudan. Anita Desai: The Novelist. Allahabad, India: New Horizon, 1981.

Sharma, R. S. Anita Desai. New Delhi, India: Arnold-Heinemann, 1981.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How do Anita Desai's female characters cope with the demands that their society places upon them?
- What is the importance of place in Desai's novels? To what extent does Desai's description of place interact with the fate of her characters?
- Is there a difference in how a female and a male character are portrayed and develop in Desai's novels?
- What is the role of the past in Desai's novels, and how does it affect the central characters?
- Many of Desai's characters are relative outsiders of the society she depicts. What are some of the effects of their positions as outsiders?
- Looking at spiritual leaders in Desai's novels, how are they portrayed?
- Compare Desai's descriptions of India with that of another locale. Is Desai as effective in evoking non-Indian settings as Indian settings?
- Discuss how one of Desai's female characters develops in the course of one of her novels. What threatens and what promotes her development?

Library of Congress

CHARLES DICKENS

Born: Portsmouth, Hampshire, England
February 7, 1812

Died: Gad's Hill, near Rochester, Kent, England
June 9, 1870

Dickens's innovations in genre, serialization, and magazine publishing deeply affected the development of the nineteenth century novel. His social criticism had a direct influence on his country, and his extraordinary inventiveness left a legacy of memorable characters.

BIOGRAPHY

Charles John Huffam Dickens was born in Portsmouth, England, on February 7, 1812, the second child of John and Elizabeth Dickens. Following his father's work as a clerk in the Navy Pay Office, the family moved to the port town of Chatham in 1817, where for a time Dickens enjoyed an idyllic middle-class childhood—fresh country air, decent schooling, and books to read in the attic on sunny afternoons.

It was a short idyll. By 1822, improvident John Dickens's fortunes were waning. Recalled to London by his office, he placed his wife and six children in a cheap and smelly little house in the ugly new suburb of Camden Town. In late January or early February, 1824, the seminal event of Dickens's life occurred: He was sent to work sticking labels on bottles of boot polish alongside a group of ragged urchins in Warren's Blacking Factory, a tottering and rat-infested building next to the Thames River in old central London. Passersby could see him at work in the window. His degradation seemed complete.

To make matters worse, there was the loneliness. Within a month, in February, 1824, John Dickens was arrested for debt. His family joined him in the Marshalsea Prison—all, that is, except twelve-year-old Charles, who was left to survive on his own in London.

Buoyed by an inheritance, Dickens's father was released after only a few months in prison. Charles's mother, however, kept her son at the blacking factory—something he never forgot. Only after John Dickens had retired from the office and turned to freelance journalism in March, 1825, was Charles sent back to school. The nightmare had lasted little more than a year, but a year is a long time to a sensitive, brilliant, and ambitious boy; such an experience, in the class-conscious society of Victorian England, was for Dickens a deep source of shame. The adult Dickens told it only once, to his best friend and first biographer John Forster. His wife never knew.

In 1827, Dickens left school for a dull job as a lawyer's clerk. Two years later, he followed his father into journalism, first as a law reporter, then as the fastest shorthand reporter in the houses of Parliament, moving in 1834 to one of the best newspapers in the country, the Morning Chronicle. Meanwhile, he was rejected in love, dabbled in amateur theatricals, and, in 1833, had his first short story published.

Success came fast. Under the pen name of Boz, Dickens rapidly published a series of London "Street Sketches" over the next two years. These were collected together as his first book, Sketches by Boz (1836). Original, brilliantly illustrated, and intensely observant of the new phenomena of urban life, it captured the public fancy, and Dickens was invited to collaborate on another project with top cartoonist George Cruikshank. Pickwick

Papers (1836-1837) followed, in twenty monthly serial parts; its resounding success was assured when Dickens invented Sam Weller, the archetypal streetwise low-life, and teamed him with genial, portly, gentlemanly Mr. Pickwick.

Dickens needed quick success. His craving for middle-class respectability led him rapidly into marriage to kindly and unassuming Catherine Hogarth in 1836, into a growing family, and into the solid comforts of a "proper" home. This situation was also graced by his teenage sister-in-law Mary, whose sudden death in his arms in May, 1837, profoundly shook him. That same year, keen to exercise control over his own writing and thereby to maximize his profits, he first tried his hand at magazine editing. The periodical Bentley's Miscellany seemed to need rejuvenating, and although he was still in the middle of Pickwick Papers, he began serialization in the magazine of his Oliver Twist (1837-1839). That in turn overlapped with his next novel, Nicholas Nickleby (1838-1839). When Bentley's Miscellany folded in 1839, he launched his own magazine, the short-lived Master Humphry's Clock (1840-1841), and serialized in it, in forty weekly parts, The Old Curiosity Shop (1840-1841), which was both a pinnacle of Victorian sentimentality and a nightmare of threatened and dying childhood. He also published his historical novel Barnaby Rudge: A Tale of the Riots of '80 (1841).

The year 1842 saw Dickens's first visit to America. His experiences produced a controversial travel book, American Notes (1842), and his picture of a failed utopia, Martin Chuzzlewit (1843-1844). At thirty, he was already a figure of towering importance in Victorian society: Every one of his novels addressed a pressing social issue; he was heavily involved with charities and pressure groups and was increasingly attracted by the stage. Meanwhile, his wife was pregnant with their fifth child. In 1843, he wrote A Christmas Carol, following its success with another holiday offering every year.

The writing of his next big novel, Dombey and Son (1846-1848), in Italy (which was also the site of another travel book, Pictures from Italy, in 1846), went slowly: Dickens missed the direct inspiration of late-night walks in the London streets. His major autobiographical novel, David Copperfield, was published in 1849-1850. In 1850, his ninth child was born and he began his most successful venture into magazine editorship, the weekly Household Words (1849-1859), which mixed entertainment with useful information. It ran until arguments with his publishers caused Dickens to shut it down and start again under the title All the Year Round (1859-1870); in this magazine, Dickens helped launch such important fellow novelists as pioneer "sensation" and detective-fiction writer Wilkie Collins.

Dickens's other career as a semiprofessional actor-director first started to merge with his career as a writer in December, 1853, when he gave his first public reading from his own works—a seasonal offering, not for profit, of A Christmas Carol. Bleak House (1852-1853) had been published the year before, and Hard Times (1854), his exposé of industrial inhumanity, was published the year after. In 1855, Dickens again met the first love of his life, the capricious and ornamental banker's daughter Maria Beadnell, who had toyed with him in the early 1830's. She was now fat, forty, and silly. He had his revenge on her, and on the march of time, whose ravages he was himself starting to feel, in the character of garrulous Flora Finching in Little Dorrit (1855-1857).

In 1856, Dickens bought Gad's Hill Place in Kent, the gentleman's country house that he had once admired, as a boy, from the dusty highroad. In 1857, while directing and acting in a play, he met the young actress Ellen Ternan. The following year, he separated from his plump and aging wife, trumpeting his self-justification in Household Words and point-blank denying the obvious implications of his new liaison. The same year, he gave another, better performance, as the dramatic public reader of his own works: Eyewitness accounts testify to his extraordinary, almost hypnotic power over his audience and his ability to transform himself into each of his own characters. Several weeks of London engagements were followed by a three-and-a-half-month reading tour of the provinces, Scotland, and Ireland.

The first issues of All the Year Round in 1859 contained the first installment of Dickens's romantic fable of revolutionary France, A Tale of Two Cities (1859). Great Expectations (1860-1861) began serialization in 1860, the year of Dickens's second season of public readings. The deaths of his mother and (in India) of his son Walter perhaps colored his shadowy last finished novel, Our Mutual Friend (1864-1865), a tale of deceit, betrayals, and violence.

By 1865, Dickens, at fifty-three, looked twenty years older; he had lived too intensely. Death was hastened when, against doctors' orders and family pleas, he added to his public reading repertoire an adaptation of the scene in Oliver Twist, where villain Bill Sikes murders the prostitute Nancy. What brought him back to this gory scene, after nearly thirty years—acting ambition, an obsession with sex, blood, and violence, or murky impulses toward self-destruction—will never be satisfactorily explained. He died of heart failure on June 9, 1870, in Kent, England, leaving on his desk an unfinished tale of perversity and murder, The Mystery of Edwin Drood (1870).

ANALYSIS

Dickens is one of the accidental giants of literature: Only William Shakespeare has commanded anything like the same level of both extraordinary popularity and critical esteem. Dickens was the first mainstream nineteenth century writer to reach out to hundreds of thousands of lower-class semiliterate readers, for whom he retained a conscientious concern that was only partly paternalistic: When one reads in Our Mutual Friend that the urchin Sloppy, who turns the washer-woman's mangle, is "a beautiful reader of a newspaper," because "He do the police in different voices," one can laugh yet be respectful. Dickens himself did much to bring his works within the reach of ordinary people: Monthly serial parts at a shilling (one twentieth of a pound), in an age when a standard novel cost more than thirty times as much, put fiction within the reach of the lower middle classes; the twopence (a sixth of a shilling) weekly cost of Household Words made quality entertainment and useful information available to a mass audience.

One secret of Dickens's success, as the detective novelist and critic G. K. Chesterton wrote in 1906, was that Dickens was both genius and Everyman: He wanted what the people wanted. That helps explain why about a dozen pirated adaptations of Oliver Twist were playing popular theaters across London before Dickens had even finished writing the novel and why early cinema invested so heavily in his novels—the second British feature film, in 1912, was an adaptation of the very same novel. It partly accounts, too, for the wild fluctuations in his critical reputation during his lifetime and after. Other sources for this are probably his period sentimentality and his resounding anti-intellectualism—he was, above all, an instinctive performer and semieducated improviser, the master of the carnival, a self-made man who thought he had a few hard-won truths to tell but who, unconsciously, revealed considerably more. He was not really, Chesterton argues, a novelist at all, but "the last of the mythologists," whose godlike characters, from Pickwick and Sam Weller on, exist "in a perpetual summer of being themselves." A Dickens novel is theater, even circus. Not until Dombey and Son in 1846 did he (regretfully) move on from the episodic and freewheeling "life and adventures" structure of his early novels.

When the twelve-year-old Dickens walked alone through London to the blacking factory, the scene of his degradation, he learned step-by-step the map of the sprawling and frightening city that looms in nearly every one of his works, the first modern metropolis, where only one in two poor children would survive to precarious adulthood. It takes the first detective in fiction to penetrate such a labyrinth, and Dickens invents him, in Bleak House's Police Inspector Bucket. To express the image of the great city, it takes an imaginative identification of people with their houses, like the kind Dickens achieves in Little Dorrit, or the intrusion of a gigantic symbol, such as the (real-life) dustheaps that loom over the urban wasteland of Our Mutual Friend, and through which scavengers sift for coins, spoons, rags, and bits of human bone.

The story of his childhood degradation was also the source of his relentless, even desperate, creative energy and the core of the central myth he created of lost and violated childhood. As if upping the stakes of helplessness and terror, in The Old Curiosity Shop and the much-later Little Dorrit, he projects his anguish through the female persona of Little Nell, to whose deathbed the narrative inevitably marches, and "little" Amy Dorrit, the child born and bred in the Marshalsea Prison, who rises by force of humility of spirit above its degradation. In Bleak House, perhaps his masterpiece, he speaks, still more startlingly, directly through another female character, illegitimate and unattractive Esther Summerson.

In every one of Dickens's novels is embedded an attack on a specific social abuse. In Bleak House, it is the dilatory injustice of the legal system. His portrait of the vampiric lawyer Mr. Vholes, a minor character who might at any moment step to center stage, perhaps typifies Dickens's method and its biblical roots: Attempting to reassure a client, Vholes thumps his coffinlike desk, making a sound as if ashes were falling on ashes, and dust on dust. This very same example, however, points back toward the true source of Dickens's art: not a thirst for social justice, though he devoutly felt this, but an eye for the weirdness of the world and the estranged unfamiliarity of the ordinary—Vholes “skinning” his black gloves from his hands.

OLIVER TWIST

First published: 1837-1839 (originally published as The Adventures of Oliver Twist)

Type of work: Novel

An orphan survives the workhouse and London's criminal underworld to be rescued by a rich benefactor.

The first chapters of Dickens's first “true” novel, Oliver Twist, which he began to write concurrently with the picaresque adventures of Mr. Pickwick, form a hard-hitting satire on the inhuman cruelties of the New Poor Laws of 1834. These dictated that society's jobless and desperate should be virtually imprisoned in harsh institutions known as workhouses. Into one of these a little bastard boy is born—the lowest of the low, christened “Oliver Twist” by a pompous parish official, Mr. Bumble the beadle. Yet Oliver is in fact a gentleman by blood, with a fortune awaiting him, for his story is also a romance of origins, a battered child's wish fulfillment.

The Parish Boy's Progress (to use Dickens's subtitle) really starts when Oliver draws the short straw among a group of starving workhouse boys and must approach the master at dinnertime to utter his famous request: “Please, sir, I want some more.” He is promptly sold to an undertaker, whose wife locks him up among the coffins for punishment. He escapes to London, where he is befriended by a streetwise boy, the Artful Dodger, who initiates him into the all-boy household of an “old gentleman” called Fagin (the name of one of Dickens's companions at the blacking factory), a criminal mastermind. Innocent as ever, it is not until Oliver is mistakenly arrested that he realizes that his new friends are pickpockets. During his trial at the police court, the gentleman, Mr. Brownlow, whom he is supposed to have robbed, recognizes Oliver's innate goodness and takes him into his home.

All seems safe—but Oliver knows too much about wily, demonic Fagin and his companion-in-crime, Bill Sikes. Sikes's woman, Nancy, a prostitute, is employed to steal Oliver back—an act that she immediately regrets and tries to repair. Sikes tries to seal Oliver's degradation and his power over him by employing him on a housebreaking expedition. The plan misfires when Oliver is shot crawling through the window of a country house and is taken in by the gentle people he is supposed to be robbing—an old lady and her ward, who eventually turns out to be Oliver's aunt.

As this excess of coincidences indicates, the second half of the novel is inferior to the first. Good eventually defeats evil, and Oliver inherits the heaven of respectable middle-classness, hardly a radical solution to a novel that trumpets its social criticism. Creative energy dissipates, however, when the action leaves the nightmare underworld of London, which seems almost a projection or map of Dickens's own childhood terrors. The real climax of the novel is Sikes's brutal murder of Nancy—one of the scenes that led some commentators to worry that the novel belied its author's fascination with the criminality that it denounced.

NICHOLAS NICKLEBY

First published: 1838-1839 (originally published as The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby)

Type of work: Novel

A young gentleman restores the flagging fortunes of his family and exposes the villainy of his uncle.

The title character of Nicholas Nickleby sets off to be a schoolmaster in the north of England when the death of his father leaves the Nickleby family in bad straits—a trial his pretentiously genteel and garrulous mother (a comic portrait of Dickens's own mother) finds hard to bear. At Dotheboys Hall in Yorkshire, Nicholas wins a test of strength with the evil headmaster Squeers, whose reign of terror has resulted in the abuse and deaths of his cringing charges, all of whom are orphans and unwanted children—a fictionalization of the real-life horrors that Dickens documented during a visit to Yorkshire with his illustrator.

Next, Nicholas becomes an actor in the hilariously inept touring company of Mr. and Mrs. Crummies, a development that allows Dickens to demonstrate both his knowledge and his affection for the theater. Meanwhile, the rather precarious main plot of the novel concerns the pathetic Smike, a handicapped boy whom Nicholas rescued from Dotheboys; its climax occurs when the boy is revealed to be the illegitimate son of Nicholas's evil uncle, Ralph Nickleby, who has also plotted against the innocence of Nicholas's sister, Kate. Father and son both perish, but a happy conclusion is brought about by the fairy-tale benevolence of the Cheeryble Brothers. Not surprisingly, they have long been targets of attack for critics who believe that Dickens has no practical or political solutions to offer to the abuses that he exposes.

DAVID COPPERFIELD

First published: 1849-1850 (originally published as The Personal History of David Copperfield)

Type of work: Novel

David Copperfield's autobiography duplicates the rags-to-riches shape of Dickens's own life: from castaway factory boy to famous author and self-made gentleman.

Dickens's eighth novel, his favorite, has an intimate relationship to his own story: "C. D." becomes "D. C." Some months before he began it, he had sat down to write the story of his childhood degradation for the first and only time in his life. The experience was too painful and Dickens abandoned the autobiographical attempt. Yet the material found its way, often word for word, directly into the first-person fiction of David Copperfield, which, as Dickens puts it semijokingly in the subtitle, the hero "never meant to be published on any account."

Fatherless David Copperfield's idyllic relationship to his pretty and childlike mother is utterly ended by her second marriage. Austere Mr. Murdstone lives up to the fairy-tale model of the wicked stepparent, whipping the terrified boy when he stammers over impossibly long sums, sending him away to school (where he meets and worships handsome Steerforth), and finally depriving David of his inheritance when his mother dies in childbirth, consigning him instead to the hell of Murdstone and Grinby's (that is, Warren's) factory. Comfort, however, is provided by the feckless, wordy, self-important Mr. Micawber, a masterly comic transformation of Dickens's own father, with whom the lonely boy takes lodgings. Micawber suffers the same fate of imprisonment in debtors' prison but remains convinced that his luck will change.

Meanwhile, an important subplot centers on the seafaring folk David meets through his devoted nurse, Peggotty: her brother Daniel, whose house is an upturned boat, the stalwart fisherman Ham, and Little Em'ly, the reckless and beautiful girl who is eventually seduced and ruined by Steerforth, David's idol. Steerforth's treatment of Little Em'ly is only partially redeemed by his death in a storm at sea, which also kills Ham, who had hoped to marry Little Em'ly.

When Micawber departs in search of his fortune, David also leaves London in quest of love and family. Robbed even of his clothes, he walks the long miles to Dover, where he is rewarded by the half-unexpected affection of his cantankerous and eccentric Aunt Betsy. She provides the schooling proper to a gentleman at Dr. Strong's academy and sets David on the path to becoming a successful professional writer. The text pays little attention to his work; however, his romantic life looms far larger. David enters into an unsuitable marriage to sweet, frivolous, luxurious Dora Spenlow, who calls herself his child-wife.

On her deathbed—tragic but inevitable, given her inadequacies—Dora commends David to the woman who will be her successor, Dr. Strong's daughter, Agnes, an incarnation of the Victorian ideal of the domestic angel, and, as such, somewhat lifeless and unbelievable. Embedded in this development is a hint at Dickens's dissatisfaction with his own marriage and his desire for escape. Yet several hurdles must be negotiated before David can be safely delivered into the haven of a proper Victorian marriage. Dr. Strong and Agnes must be rescued from the clutches of the reptilian, mock-humble Uriah Heep, largely through the agency of Micawber. Little Em'ly must be found and rescued; old Daniel Peggotty finally immigrates with her to Australia—a treatment of the taboo fallen woman theme that was radical and humane for its time, and which reflects the lessons that Dickens learned in his ten-year involvement with a home for fallen women, Urania Cottage.

GREAT EXPECTATIONS

First published: 1860-1861

Type of work: Novel

The mysterious benefactor who turns Pip into a gentleman proves to be not the aristocratic lady he supposed but a runaway convict.

Not one of Dickens's child characters enjoys a happy and uncomplicated relationship with two living parents. In his fiction, Dickens found it necessary not only to orphan himself of the parents who shamed him but also to re-create them in ideal shapes—and sometimes, too, to be fair to them. That is what happens in Great Expectations. What strikes one most powerfully about this compact and streamlined narrative—technically, perhaps Dickens's best—is the excessive and apparently unmotivated guilt of its hero: guilt, perhaps, for the terrible snobbery into which he falls as he tries to climb the social ladder, guilt at his rejection of his parents, or the guilt of the human condition.

Pip is a village orphan brought up roughly by his unmotherly sister (her bosom bristles with pins), the wife of gentle blacksmith Joe Gargery. In the first chapter of the novel, on the memorable day when he becomes aware for the first time of his identity and his place in a hostile world, Pip meets, in the graveyard where his parents lie buried, a shivering, ravenous, and monstrous man, an escapee from the prison ships across the marshes, who terrorizes Pip into stealing food and drink for him. The convict is eventually recaptured, but not before Pip (and Joe) has come to pity him or before he has lied that it was he who stole a pie and brandy from the Gargery larder.

Next, Pip also meets the rich, weird recluse Miss Havisham, who lives in a darkened and dusty room where time has stood still, dressed always in a yellowing wedding dress. He falls in love with her petulant and beautiful ward, Estella, whom the old woman is training to break men's hearts as vengeance for her own abandonment at the altar.

Some years later, a lawyer named Jaggers appears at the smithy with the news that Pip, now Joe's apprentice, has been left a fortune and is to become a gentleman. Pip leaves for London, and inevitably a wedge is driven between him and his best friend, illiterate Joe, of whom Pip sinks so low as to become ashamed. Miss Havisham (the wordplay on "sham" is appropriate) lets Pip believe that it is she who is his benefactor, but the real benefactor is actually the least likely person imaginable: Magwitch, the monstrous convict, who has made good in Australia and now returns to England (thereby breaking the rules of his sentence) in hopes that the boy he has “made” will return his devoted affection. Pip is horrified and disgusted: His money is contaminated. The lesson of love and human decency that he must learn comes very hard indeed. Yet he learns it: By the time poor Magwitch is reclaimed by justice, Pip is prepared to stand holding his hand in the public court. Thankfully, Magwitch dies in prison before he can be hanged. Pip himself now falls seriously ill and is nursed back to life by Joe. No one, however, can turn back the clock: The moment Pip is better, Joe (calling him “sir”) retreats to the village. Pip’s loneliness at the end of the novel seems mediated only by a vague promise that a chastened Estella may some day be his—a modification of the harsher original ending Dickens had intended.

Great Expectations is psychologically Dickens’s most mature and realistic novel, although it works through his usual system of displacements and dark doublings. Loutish Orlick, Joe’s other apprentice, for example, seems to function as Pip’s alter ego when he attacks his uncaring sister, Mrs. Joe. It is also a novel that depicts the powerful influence of environment as well as of heredity: Magwitch, the convict, and bitter Miss Havisham were themselves both abused and lonely as children. For all of its somber coloring, however, the novel is also riotously funny in the characteristically Dickensian mode of excess: Pontificating Uncle Pumblechook, a seed merchant who subjected the boy Pip to humiliation over Christmas dinner, gets his poetic comeuppance, Joe reports, when Orlick robs him, “stuff[ing] his mouth full of flowering annuals to perwent his crying out.”

SUMMARY

Charles Dickens did not create novels: He created a world. Since his death in 1870, a semantic slippage has taken place, whereby he has become identified with the Victorian age and with Englishness; this is not altogether inappropriate. His fictions have frustrated and inspired writers as different as Joseph Conrad, T. S. Eliot, and Graham Greene, to name but a few; they have also profoundly influenced early filmmakers and theorists such as D. W. Griffith and Sergei Eisenstein.

Dickens was a well of creativity. Through his erratic and eccentric fiction, he probed some of the mysteries of the human heart and human society; he allows readers to experience the world over again through the eyes of his child-narrators. As a result, Scrooge, Micawber, Pickwick, Fagin, Miss Havisham, and their companions have attained a life beyond the texts that gave them birth.

Joss Lutz Marsh

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Pickwick Papers, 1836-1837 (originally pb. as The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club)

Oliver Twist, 1837-1839 (originally pb. as The Adventures of Oliver Twist)

Nicholas Nickleby, 1838-1839 (originally pb. as The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby)

The Old Curiosity Shop, 1840-1841

Barnaby Rudge: A Tale of the Riots of '80, 1841

Martin Chuzzlewit, 1843-1844 (originally pb. as The Life and Adventures of Martin Chuzzlewit)

Dombey and Son, 1846-1848 (originally pb. as Dealings with the Firm of Dombey and Son, Wholesale, Retail, and for Exportation)

David Copperfield, 1849-1850 (originally pb. as The Personal History of David Copperfield)

Bleak House, 1852-1853

Hard Times, 1854 (originally pb. as Hard Times for These Times)

Little Dorrit, 1855-1857

A Tale of Two Cities, 1859

Great Expectations, 1860-1861

Our Mutual Friend, 1864-1865
The Mystery of Edwin Drood, 1870 (unfinished)

SHORT FICTION:

Sketches by Boz, 1836
A Christmas Carol, 1843
The Chimes, 1844
The Cricket on the Hearth, 1845
The Battle of Life, 1846
The Haunted Man, 1848
Reprinted Pieces, 1858
The Uncommercial Traveller, 1860
George Silverman's Explanation, 1868
Christmas Stories, 1871

DRAMA:

The Strange Gentleman, pr. 1836
The Village Coquettes, pr., pb. 1836
Mr. Nightingale's Diary, pr., pb. 1851 (with Mark Lemon)
No Thoroughfare, pr., pb. 1867 (with Wilkie Collins)

NONFICTION:

American Notes, 1842
Pictures from Italy, 1846

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

A Child's History of England, 1852-1854
The Life of Our Lord, 1934

EDITED TEXTS:

Master Humphrey's Clock, 1840-1841 (periodical)
Household Words, 1850-1859 (periodical)
All the Year Round, 1859-1870 (periodical)

About the Author

Ackroyd, Peter. Dickens. New York: HarperCollins, 1990.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Charles Dickens. New York: Chelsea House, 2006.

Chesterton, G. K. Charles Dickens. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1906.

Collins, Philip. Dickens and Crime. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1968.

_____, ed. Dickens: The Critical Heritage. New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 1971.

Jordan, John O. The Cambridge Companion to Charles Dickens. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Kaplan, Fred. Dickens: A Biography. New York: William Morrow, 1988.

Ledger, Sally. Dickens and the Popular Radical Imagination. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Newson, Robert. Charles Dickens Revisited. New York: Twayne, 2000.

Sanders, Andrew. Charles Dickens. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Slater, Michael. Dickens and Women. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1983.

Stewart, Garrett. Dickens and the Trials of Imagination. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1974.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- By what literary techniques does Charles Dickens avoid falling into bitterness, like that which his own early life produced in him, when he writes of socially deprived characters?
- Discuss Sam Weller as Dickens's most instigative early character.
- Dickens was not a particularly successful family man, but he wrote convincingly of successful family life. What factors in his life made this achievement possible—even likely—in his case?
- Explain whether David Copperfield or Great Expectations is the more convincing bildungsroman.
- Offer evidence to show that Dickens's capacity for humor suffered (or did not suffer) in Bleak House and later works.
- Was Dickens off course in A Tale of Two Cities?
- Was there a negative side to Dickens's highly popular readings from his works on stage?
- If many readers have difficulty reading Dickens's novels today, should they be severely edited to accommodate such readers?

Library of Congress

DENIS DIDEROT

Born: Langres, France

October 5, 1713

Died: Paris, France

July 31, 1784

In addition to his many articles for Encyclopédie and his works of nonfiction, Diderot created fictional works in which he dealt with significant philosophical and moral issues.

BIOGRAPHY

Denis Diderot (dee-DROH) was born in Langres, Champagne, France, on October 5, 1713. He was the second child born to Didier Diderot and Angélique Vigneron Diderot; a son born the previous year had died in infancy. His mother was the daughter of a merchant tanner, and his father was a master cutler, well known for his surgical tools. Diderot had two sisters who survived to adulthood. His sister Denise, who remained unmarried her entire life, was born on January 27, 1715; his sister Angélique, who became an Ursuline nun in spite of the family's opposition, was born on April 3, 1720. On March 21, 1722, the last of his siblings, Didier-Pierre, was born.

From 1723 to 1728, Diderot studied at the Collège des Jésuites at Langres. He was an avid reader and a good student. He was particularly fond of the works of Horace and Homer. Diderot was destined for a career in the church and on August 22, 1726, he received tonsure.

Upon completion of his studies at Langres, he went to Paris to continue his education at the Collège Louis-le-Grand and at the Collège d'Har-court. On September 2, 1732, he was awarded a master of arts degree in philosophy from the University of Paris. Diderot was no longer interested in becoming a member of the clergy and decided to study law. By 1734, Diderot had also lost interest in becoming a lawyer and decided that he wished to be a writer. This decision was not well received by his father, who withdrew all financial support from Diderot.

During the next ten years, Diderot remained in Paris leading an impoverished and bohemian life. He supported himself by working as a law clerk, a bookseller's hack, a translator of English books, and a tutor. In 1741, he met Antoinette Champion; in 1742, he became acquainted with Jean-Jacques Rousseau, who, like Diderot, would become one of the major writers and thinkers of the period. Diderot returned to Langres in 1743 to ask for his father's blessing of his planned marriage to Antoinette Champion. Unfortunately, she was of a lower social class, fatherless, and without a dowry. The elder Diderot not only refused to approve the marriage but also had Diderot incarcerated.

In spite of his father's disapproval, Diderot married Antoinette in a secret ceremony on November 6, 1743, at Saint-Pierre-aux-Boeufs in Paris. The couple had four children. A daughter, Angélique, and a son, Denis-Laurent, died in infancy. The other son, Jacques-François-Denis, died on June 30, 1750, as a result of a fever. He was five years old. Marie-Angélique, Diderot's only child that survived to adulthood, was born three years later on September 2, 1753.

After his marriage, Diderot continued to earn his living by translating English works. In 1743, his French translation of Temple Stanyan's Grecian History (1739) was published. In 1745, he published his *Principes de la philosophie morale: Ou, Essai de M. S. *** sur le mérite et la vertu, avec réflexions*, a translation of Lord Shaftesbury's An Inquiry Concerning Virtue and Merit. From 1746 to 1748, he published Dictionnaire universel de médecine, a translation of Robert James's A Medicinal Dictionary. During this time, differences of opinion and conflicts developed between Diderot and his wife; Diderot began a liaison with Madeleine de Puisieux, a writer of novels and moral treatises. She was a demanding mistress and he gave her his earnings from the Shaftesbury translation. In 1748, he wrote Les Bijoux indiscrets (The Indiscreet Toys, 1749), an erotic novel printed in the Netherlands and gave her his earnings. Shortly thereafter, the affair came to an end. In 1755, he met Sophie Volland, who would be his lover and intellectual partner for the rest of his life.

Sometime in 1745, André le Breton had approached Diderot about translating Ephraim Chambers's Cyclopaedia: Or, Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences into French. Diderot convinced le Breton not merely to print a translation but to compile a work that would include all the arts, sciences, and trades. This momentous and mind-boggling project called Encyclopédie, was to occupy the next twenty-six years of Diderot's life. The first volume appeared in 1751; the final volume was published in 1772. These years were fraught with difficulty and setbacks, including opposition from the Church, license suspensions, and abandonment of the project by colleagues, leaving Diderot to write innumerable articles.

By 1746, Diderot had begun to publish original philosophical works in French. Although his Pensées philosophiques (English translation, 1819; also as Philosophical Thoughts, 1916), published anonymously, did contain several passages taken from Shaftesbury, it was primarily his own work. The book, which contained anti-Christian ideas, was burned by the parliament of Paris. In 1749, Diderot published his Lettre sur les aveugles (An Essay on Blindness, 1750; also as Letter on the Blind, 1916). Although the main subject of the work was the role the five senses played in the acquisition of ideas, it also brought into question the existence of God. As a result, Diderot was imprisoned at the Château de Vincennes for three months. Diderot's incarceration made him very wary about publishing controversial texts, with the result that many of his writings only appeared after his death.

While working on the Encyclopédie, Diderot became especially interested in theater. He advocated a new type of play which presented bourgeois family life, virtue, and sentiment. He wrote two plays, Le Fils naturel: Ou, Les Épreuves de la vertu (pr., pb. 1757; Dorval: Or, The Test of Virtue, 1767) and Le Père de famille (pb. 1758, pr. 1761; The Father of the Family, 1770; also known as The Family Picture, 1871), and two books of dramatic criticism, Entretiens sur "Le Fils naturel" (1757) and Discours sur la poésie dramatique (1758; English translation of chapters 1-5 in Dramatic Essays of the Neo-Classical Age, 1950).

During this time, he also wrote the majority of his major philosophical works, including Lettre sur les sourds et les muets (1751; Letter on the Deaf and Dumb, 1916) and his two posthumously published novels, La Religieuse (1796; The Nun, 1797) and Le Neveu de Rameau (1821, 1891; Rameau's Nephew, 1897), as well as Éloge de Richardson (1762; Eulogy of Richardson, 1893). In 1759, he began to write his critical commentaries on painting, Les Salons (1759-1781, serial; 1845, 1857, book). These were more often than not short stories filled with bourgeois sentiment inspired by the paintings.

Neither the Encyclopédie nor his other writings provided Diderot with a comfortable income. Therefore in 1765, in order to provide a dowry to his daughter, he sold his library to Czarina Catherine the Great of Russia, who graciously let him keep it during his lifetime and gave him a salary as librarian of the collection. Diderot traveled to Russia in 1773 to thank Catherine for her generosity.

During the 1770's and until his death, Diderot continued to write. From 1771 to 1773, he composed Jacques le fataliste et son maître (pb. 1796; Jacques the Fatalist and His Master, 1797) and Supplément au voyage de Bougainville (1796; Supplément to Bougainville's Voyage, 1926), neither of which was published until 1796. Diderot died at his daughter's home in Paris on July 31, 1784. His beloved Sophie had died only a few months earlier. Diderot was one of the great thinkers of his time and counted among his friends and colleagues Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Jean le Rond d'Alembert, Baron von Friedrich Melchior Grimm, Baron d'Holbach, and Voltaire.

ANALYSIS

As a thinker, philosopher, and writer, Diderot was a multifaceted individual. He was interested in virtually all subjects: the arts, science, literature, theater, philosophy, religion, mathematics, medicine, and mechanics. He wrote in both fictional and nonfictional genres. Throughout his writing career, Diderot was constantly in turmoil as he sought to reconcile his rational materialistic views of man and nature and his sentimentality in regard to love and family, which resulted from his bourgeois heritage. As a rational thinker, Diderot was unable to accept the orthodox doctrine of the Catholic Church. Many of his works question the existence of God, the practice of religion in general, and the human situation. Diderot expressed his ideas in many different genres, including philosophical essays, dialogues, plays, novels, art criticism, and literary criticism.

The dominant themes throughout his various writings illustrate both his inability to formulate a concise philosophical theory and his inquisitiveness. Diderot was above all else concerned with the moral responsibility of the individual in society, for he found moral responsibility essential for the successful social interaction of people. The fact that he opted for the rational tenets of materialism and fatalism over Christian doctrine and belief in free will, sin, and redemption led him into an unsolvable dilemma. How could he reconcile the lack of free will in a fatalistic world and moral responsibility? If people were predetermined to be what they were, then how could they be responsible for their actions? Diderot addresses this problem in many of his works, particularly in his narratives.

Diderot was a master of literary form and composition. His works are carefully conceived and have an identifiable structure. His novel The Nun is based on a three-part structure. Three mother superiors represent three distortions of human nature resulting from their isolation and confinement away from a natural, heterosexual society. In Jacques the Fatalist and His Master, the motif of journeys gives the novel a definite structure. Yet in each novel, Diderot saves his narrative from rigidity and stagnation by overlaying the structure with chaotic movement. Suzanne's life in the convents is one of total disorder, while Jacques and his Master are at every moment buffeted by chance.

The one element which is most characteristic of Diderot's writing is dialogue. Diderot was in a constant dialogue with himself as he attempted to reconcile rational thinking and sentimentalism. Dialogue was the perfect medium for his works.

JACQUES THE FATALIST AND HIS MASTER

First published: Jacques le fataliste et son maître, wr. c. 1771, pb. 1796 (English translation, 1797)

Type of work: Novel

A valet and his master set out on a journey, during which they discuss and experience the whims of fate.

Jacques the Fatalist and His Master is a philosophical novel in which Diderot, through a fictional narrative, examines the problem of moral responsibility and the consequences of accepting a philosophy of determinism. Jacques and his Master start out on a journey and soon find themselves the victims of chance occurrences. One of the horses suddenly bolts for no apparent reason and the two travelers end up at an inn, where they are robbed. The progress of the entire journey is governed by chance (fate); neither Jacques nor his Master has any control over where they go. Jacques explains all of these occurrences and others throughout the journey by saying that they were predetermined, or as he defines the situations, written on the great wheel of fate.

The novel has a multilayered structure in which dialogue plays an extensive role. In addition to the actual physical journey of Jacques and his Master, Diderot creates a series of other narrated journeys. As they ride along, Jacques tells of his loves, the Master attempts to recount his amorous affairs, and the people they meet tell stories of faithful and unfaithful loves. The narratives are continuously interrupted by chance occurrences. This structure serves to emphasize Diderot's intellectual belief in materialism and the constant change and movement that occur in a physical world, which is always in a state of metamorphosis.

It is in the narratives within the narrative that Diderot presents the incompatibility of moral responsibility and determinism and the difficulty of judging the acts of other people. The story of Mme de la Pommeraye and the Marquis d'Arcis, the longest interpolated story in the novel, illustrates this dilemma. The marquis and Mme de la Pommeraye have been lovers; he has tired of her and broken off the relationship. Mme de la Pommeraye vengefully arranges for him to marry a woman who is not a virgin and therefore makes him a cuckolded husband. Jacques and his Master argue about who is guilty—Mme de la Pommeraye or the marquis—or if anyone is guilty. Under a deterministic philosophy, each individual was simply doing what he or she was predestined to do; consequently, neither could be held responsible for his or her actions. For Diderot, determinism precluded moral responsibility and led to a world in which any and all acts, whether benevolent or destructive, were acceptable; he believed this led to anarchy and was unacceptable in a society.

The novel, however, is not simply a fictional consideration of a philosophical concept. Humor abounds in the work. The many tales of infidelity fill the novel with a bawdiness reminiscent of the medieval fabliaux, of François Rabelais, and of Voltaire's short stories. Using the basic materialistic idea that a human being, like everything else on the earth, is in a constant state of change, the various narrators recount satirical anecdotes of infidelity.

The riotous, good-humored amusement created by these episodes does not banish sentiment from the novel. Diderot, who was always subject to the bourgeois virtue and respect for morality that his parents instilled in him, was himself extremely sentimental and recognized the human need for enduring love and stability. Therefore, he concludes his novel with Jacques wisely saying that he prefers not to know if his future wife will or will not be faithful to him, but he will believe in her fidelity, and after that he can change nothing. Here, Diderot once again addresses the dilemma that tormented him to the end of his life: What his mind presented to him as rational truth was not what his emotional self wanted to hear.

Diderot was interested not only in using novels to express his ideas, but he was also intrigued with the novel as a genre and the relationship or dialogue which exists between the writer and the reader. As author, Diderot repeatedly interrupts his fictional creation to address his reader. He taunts his readers with his own power as author. He can continue a tale, interrupt it, or leave it unfinished and start a new one. He can take the intrigue wherever he wishes. The reader is at his mercy as long as the reading process continues. However, he also recognizes the reader's freedom of choice; the reader can simply stop reading.

Thus, Jacques the Fatalist and His Master is a philosophical novel, a bawdy comical novel, a sentimental novel, and a query into the novel as a genre.

THE NUN

First published: La Religieuse, 1796 (English translation, 1797)

Type of work: Novel

A rebellious young girl is forced to become a nun against her will and attempts to leave the convent.

The Nun, a memoir novel written in first person, was originally written as a series of letters to Marc-Antoine-Nicolas, Marquis de Croismare. Diderot was not composing a novel but participating in a ruse to bring the marquis back to Paris. The marquis, a member of the intellectual circle that frequented the home of Louise Tardieu d'Esclavelles, Marquise d'Epinay, had been called away to his lands in Normandy on business matters. Before leaving Paris, he had attempted to help a woman who had been cloistered against her will. Diderot's letters were an attempt to convince the marquis that she had fled the convent and needed his help. Developing an attachment for the character he had created, Diderot went on to write a novel about her.

The Nun is a forcible attack upon the cloistering of women. Diderot presents the convent as an unnaturally repressive institution, which degrades human nature, corrupting it to promiscuity, sadism, or insanity. The novel recounts the misfortunes and torments of the illegitimate Suzanne Simonin, who is forced to take the veil in order to expiate the sin of her mother and to enable the legitimate daughters to make more suitable marriages.

Suzanne is confined under the authority of three different mother superiors. Mme de Moni, the first mother superior, is kind to Suzanne and even favors her. However, in the closed oppressive ambiance of the convent, with its continual emphasis on expiation of sin and communion with God, Mme de Moni slips from mysticism into insanity and dies. Her successor, Sister Sainte-Christine, particularly dislikes Suzanne, who is an element of chaos and discord in the otherwise well-disciplined community. Little by little, she becomes more and more sadistic. Suzanne is deprived of furniture, bedding, and clothing. She is locked in her cell. The other nuns are forbidden to speak to her or even to recognize her existence. Broken glass is strewn in her path and she is made to walk on it. She is treated as a cadaver.

It is generally accepted that Diderot was strongly influenced in his depiction of the convent and the horrendous treatment of Suzanne by the tragic fate of his sister Angélique, an Ursuline nun. She lost her sanity and died of exhaustion from overwork at the age of twenty-eight.

Throughout her time in the convents, Suzanne has been working through legal channels to receive permission to renounce her vows. Fortunately, her lawyer, Manouri, arranges for her to be transferred to another convent before she succumbs to the sadistic mistreatment. The lesbian mother superior in this convent treats Suzanne very well. Diderot succeeds in having Suzanne describe the lesbian behavior in exact detail while remaining unaware of what is occurring between her and the mother superior.

This is the final portrayal in the novel of the deforming and corruption of human nature by the convent. The mother superior eventually falls into a state of delirium and dies in torment. Suzanne finally escapes from the convent with the help of an unscrupulous priest who takes her to a house of prostitution. At the end of the novel, she escapes and is desperately seeking the marquis's help in finding a reputable position.

RAMEAU'S NEPHEW

First published: Le Neveu de Rameau, 1821,
1891 (English translation, 1897)

Type of work: Novel

Although this work is traditionally included among Diderot's novels, it is actually a dialogue, teeming with satire and strengthened by elements drawn from reality.

In Rameau's Nephew, Lui (Rameau's nephew) and Moi (Diderot) engage in a combative conversation. The work is a totality of contradictions. Lui insists upon what he believes to be true and Moi objects that the exact opposite is right. Lui is a self-admitted parasite upon society who takes advantage of everyone and everything that he can. He admits to having taught his son that money is more important than anything else and to mourning his deceased wife because he could have profited by prostituting her. Lui insists that his lifestyle is morally correct. Moi, who is the embodiment of bourgeois morality, is appalled by Lui and vehemently objects to his assertions. Lui and Moi are both strong combatants, and Diderot does not permit either one a decisive victory. This ambiguity makes the dialogue an inquiry into morality that never finds an answer.

While neither Lui nor Moi can claim a victory, they do lead each other into a state of change, of becoming less of what they were. The character of Lui also undergoes startling physical change as he contorts himself in the most outlandish fashion, acting out what he says. Lui is like an actor, creating characters by his gestures and physical contortions. Just as Lui contorts himself to assume the various individuals he talks about, he also shapes himself into whatever he needs to be to profit from social opportunity. Lui's explanation of his relationship to the society in which he lives enables Diderot to satirize a number of his enemies in the novel.

The believability of the dialogue as a real conversation that actually took place is enhanced by Diderot's use of realism. The conversation occurs in the Café de la Régence, an actual café in Paris. The characters of Lui and Moi are drawn from real life. The musician Jean-Philippe Rameau had a nephew, and of course Diderot put himself into the dialogue as Moi. The conversation proceeds in a realistic fashion, as one topic brings up another and the two interlocutors discuss a number of topics, including music, women, making a living, and what it means to be successful.

SUMMARY

Denis Diderot's literary works reflect the two contrary aspects of his nature. His philosophical writings reveal his rational acceptance of a mechanical, materialistic world and the human being as a part of it. His plays, his critical comments on painting, Les Salons; and his novel The Nun represent the sentimental and moralistic Diderot. Jacques the Fatalist and His Master stands as the work most representative of Diderot in his totality, as it brings together his philosophical beliefs, an examination of materialism and fatalism, and his sentimentality in depicting Jacques's final attitude.

Shawncey Webb

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Les Bijoux indiscrets, 1748 (The Indiscreet Toys, 1749)
Jacques le fataliste et son maître, wr. c. 1771, pb. 1796
 (Jacques the Fatalist and His Master, 1797)
La Religieuse, 1796 (The Nun, 1797)
Le Neveu de Rameau, 1821, 1891 (Rameau's Nephew, 1897)

SHORT FICTION:

"L'Oiseau blanc," 1748
 "Les Deux Amis de Bourbonne," 1773 ("The Two Friends from Bourbonne," 1964)
Supplément au voyage de Bougainville, 1796 (Supplément to Bougainville's Voyage, 1926)
 "Ceci n'est pas un conte," 1798 ("This Is Not a Story," 1960)
 "Madame de la Carlière: Ou, Sur l'inconséquence du jugement public de nos actions particulières," 1798
Rameau's Nephew, and Other Works, 1964

DRAMA:

Le Fils naturel: Ou, Les Épreuves de la vertu, pr., pb. 1757 (Dorval: Or, The Test of Virtue, 1767)
Le Père de famille, pb. 1758, pr. 1761 (The Father of the Family, 1770; also known as The Family Picture, 1871)
Est'il bon? Est'il méchant?, pr. 1781, pb. 1834

NONFICTION:

Pensées philosophiques, 1746 (English translation, 1819; also as Philosophical Thoughts, 1916)
De la Suffisance de la religion naturelle, wr. 1747, pb. 1770
La Promenade du sceptique, wr. 1747, pb. 1830
Lettre sur les aveugles, 1749 (An Essay on Blindness, 1750; also as Letter on the Blind, 1916)
Notes et commentaires, 1749
Lettre sur les sourds et muets, 1751 (Letter on the Deaf and Dumb, 1916)
Pensées sur l'interprétation de la nature, 1754
Entretiens sur "Le Fils naturel," 1757
Discours sur la poésie dramatique, 1758 (English translation of chapters 1-5 in Dramatic Essays of the Neo-Classical Age, 1950)
Concerning the Education of a Prince, wr. 1758, pb. 1941

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What is Denis Diderot's attitude toward fidelity?
- What role does dialogue play in Diderot's fiction?
- What is the importance of gesture in Rameau's Nephew?
- Why does Diderot oppose convents and a cloistered life?
- Why does Diderot combine chaos and order in his works?

Denis Diderot

Les Salons, 1759-1781 (serial; 9 volumes), 1845, 1857 (book)

Éloge de Richardson, 1762 (Eulogy of Richardson, 1893)

Essais sur la peinture, wr. c. 1765, pb. 1796

Le Rêve de d'Alembert, wr. 1769, pb. 1830 (D'Alembert's Dream, 1927)

Entretien d'un père avec ses enfants, 1773 (Conversations Between Father and Children, 1964)

Paradoxe sur le comédien, wr. 1773, pb. 1830 (The Paradox of Acting, 1883)

Plan d'une université pour le gouvernement de Russie, wr. c. 1775-1776, pb. 1813-1814

Essai sur Sénèque, 1778 (revised and expanded as Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron, 1782)

Pensées détachées sur la peinture, 1798

Diderot's Early Philosophical Works, 1916 (includes Letter on the Blind, Letter on the Deaf and Dumb, Philosophical Thoughts)

Correspondance, 1955-1970 (16 volumes)

Œuvres philosophiques, 1956

Œuvres esthétiques, 1959

Œuvres politiques, 1962

EDITED TEXTS:

Encyclopédie: Ou, Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts, et des métiers, 1751-1772 (17 volumes of text, 11 volumes of plates; Encyclopedia, 1965)

TRANSLATIONS:

L'Histoire de Grèce, 1743 (of Temple Stanyan's Grecian History)

*Principes de la philosophie morale: Ou, Essai de M. S. *** sur le mérite et la vertu, avec réflexions*, 1745 (of the earl of Shaftesbury's An Inquiry Concerning Virtue and Merit)

Dictionnaire universel de médecine, 1746-1748 (of Robert James's A Medical Dictionary)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Œuvres, 1798 (15 volumes)

Œuvres complètes, 1875-1877 (20 volumes)

Diderot, Interpreter of Nature: Selected Writings, 1937 (includes short fiction)

Selected Writings, 1966

About the Author

Anderson, Wilda. Diderot's Dream. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.

Brewer, Daniel. The Discourse of the Enlightenment in Eighteenth Century France: Diderot and the Art of Philosophizing. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1993.

Crocker, Lester G. Diderot's Chaotic Order. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1974.

Diderot, Denis. Diderot's Letters to Sophie Volland. Translated by Peter France. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1972.

Furbank, P. N. Diderot: A Critical Biography. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1992.

Rex, Walter E. Diderot's Counterpoints: The Dynamics of Contrariety in His Major Works. Oxford, England: Voltaire Foundation, 1998.

Wilson, Arthur M. Diderot. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.

_____. Diderot: The Testing Years, 1713-1759. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1957.

Library of Congress

ISAK DINESEN

Born: Rungsted, Denmark
April 17, 1885

Died: Rungsted, Denmark
September 7, 1962

Mentioned for the Nobel Prize many times, Dinesen was admired for her unique short stories and for her brilliant memoir of her life in Africa.

BIOGRAPHY

Baroness Karen Christenze Blixen-Finecke, who later used such pen names as Isak Dinesen (DEE-nuh-suhn), Karen Blixen, Pierre Andrezel, and Tania B., was born in a house by the sea in Rungsted, Denmark, on April 17, 1885. The house in which she was born had once been occupied by Johannes Ewald, the man usually considered to be Denmark's finest poet. When she was only ten years old, her father hanged himself, a tragic event that marked the rest of her life and profoundly affected the tone of her stories.

Dinesen had no formal schooling as a child but did attend a private school in France during her teen years. In 1903, she entered the Royal Academy of Fine Arts in Copenhagen to study painting, but for the next seven years she also devoted herself to writing—and to a painful relationship with Hans Blixen-Finecke. In 1910, she left Denmark, intending to study art in Paris, but she abruptly returned home and continued her writing. Profoundly depressed by the various setbacks and apparent lack of direction in her life, she took a brief vacation trip to Rome. On returning, she became engaged to Baron Bror Blixen-Finecke, the twin brother of her former lover. In 1914, she followed Bror to Kenya, and they were married in the capital city of Nairobi.

The marriage with Bror Blixen was rocky at best. From him she contracted syphilis, which rendered her sterile and contributed to the progressive deterioration of her health over the rest of her life. Bror Blixen was a famous sportsman and notorious womanizer who mismanaged the coffee plantation he had bought with money provided by Dinesen's family. They divorced in 1921, and she took control of the plantation, which became known as the Karen Coffee Company.

Unpredictable weather and fluctuations in the world price of coffee impelled the Karen Coffee Company's decline with each succeeding year of the decade of the 1920's. The company was pulled inexorably downward by the stock market crash of 1929. The one bright spot in Dinesen's life during these dark years was the profoundly joyful association she had with Denys Finch Hatton, a big-game hunter and lover of the arts. He encouraged her to continue her writing and storytelling and shared his love for the flora and fauna of the East African plateau with her.

Denys Finch Hatton was also an aviator; Dinesen flew with him over wild, beautiful, and inaccessible country. Without the influence of this special man, who became her lover and her mentor, much of Dinesen's work might never have been produced. In 1931, Hatton died when his plane crashed, her bankrupt farm was sold off by auctioneers, and she left her beloved Africa, never to return.

Dinesen settled down in Rungstedlund, her family estate near Rungsted, Denmark, where she finished writing—in English—a book she had begun in Africa, Seven Gothic Tales (1934). The work became a great success, as did four more of her titles. During this time Dinesen's health began to decline, but she continued to write, her career having been launched by the success of Seven Gothic Tales. Her next work, her most famous, is a memoir of her years on the coffee plantation outside Nairobi. Den afrikanske Farm (1937; Out of Africa, 1937) is one of her most enduring books: She wrote it in English and Danish.

World War II and a clinical diagnosis of tertiary syphilis did not keep Dinesen from continuing to write. In 1942, she completed another set of her remarkable stories, Vinter-Eventyr (Winter's Tales, 1942), also published in Danish and English. Between 1942 and 1957, Dinesen was plagued by worsening health. Consequently, she wrote less and less, communicating with her reading public through interviews and radio broadcasts. An invalid after several operations in 1955, she published one more book of her stories in two languages, Sidste Fortællinger (Last Tales, 1957), in 1957.

She summoned the energy for a widely publicized visit to New York City in 1959, an event documented by famous photographers and painters. In 1960, she published Skygger paa Græsset (Shadows on the Grass, 1960) a brilliant reprise of her earlier African theme. Her body was wasting away even as the book appeared, and Dinesen died on September 7, 1962. She was buried on the grounds of her family estate.

ANALYSIS

In 1985, most young Americans had never heard of Dinesen, but then her longest and most famous work, Out of Africa, appeared on the silver screen, with Meryl Streep playing Isak and Robert Redford in the role of Denys Finch Hatton, her friend, lover, and artistic mentor. The screenplay is actually an amalgam of various texts about Dinesen's African experience. Drawing on biographies, letters, and other sources, the screenplay evokes the evolutionary process by which Dinesen became an artist and no longer a coffee plantation manager. In one memorable scene in the film, Isak responds to suggestions by Denys and his friend Berkeley Cole that she tell them a story. They provide the first line, and she invents, as she speaks, a complicated, magical tale.

That scene encapsulates the artistic method of Dinesen, who was a dreamer and inventor of fictions for her entire career. Even her remembrances of Africa are imbued with the sense of wonder and otherworldliness that characterize her fiction. There is an air of fantasy and fairy tale in everything that Dinesen wrote. She composed stories from the deep reservoirs of her imagination and her nightmares; she was never a strict realist or a journalist. Reality, for her, remained an internalized affair; how she remembered was always more important than what she remembered. It was the sense of a thing that counted most with her. In other days she may have been called a teller of tales, a carrier of legends and ancient wisdom. Dinesen called herself a storyteller, not a writer. Her job, she insisted, was "to create another sort of reality."

Dinesen may be classified as a romantic writer in the sense that she favors powerfully emotional and exotic stories, often filled with inexplicable or irrational events. Her emphasis is always on a few closely analyzed characters, never on society as a whole. Her world is filled with strong, often uncontrollable, forces. Readers who are familiar with the tales of Edgar Allan Poe and Nathaniel Hawthorne, with their moody atmospheres and eccentric characters, will encounter many of the same elements in the fables of Isak Dinesen.

"The Poet," for example, is the strange tale that concludes Dinesen's Seven Gothic Tales. There is virtually no plot in the story. An old businessman befriends and encourages a young poet in a remote but beautiful Danish village where they both fall in love with a young widow, who is a former dancer. Although she is in love with the poet, the young woman agrees to marry the old man. In the final scene, the poet, drunk and desperate, shoots the old man. The woman finds the old man and smashes a rock over his head. In the final pages of the story, one of the most beautiful passages ever written by Dinesen, the old man relives all the beautiful moments of his life: poetry, the smell of grass, the beautiful light of the stars. The juxtaposition of unexpected violence and pure beauty makes a powerful and unforgettable impression on the reader. Like all of Dinesen's best tales, "The Poet" represents a tragic but mystical view of life, in which the terrifying and the edifying tend to happen side by side. There is never any cheap irony or perfunctory reversals in Dinesen's stories, as one may find in the short stories of O. Henry or Guy de Maupassant. Dinesen presents the reader with a universe that is whole, inscrutable, and thrilling.

Dinesen's love of magic, mystery, and artistic creation owes much to the milieu of her upbringing.

ing. She was a member of the last genteel generation of Europeans whose cultural lives were formed before the outbreak of World War I. Dinesen was first and last an aesthete, a lover of beauty for beauty's sake. She was well traveled and multilingual. She had also been trained as a painter; indeed, she saw the world in terms of tints and colorations rather than plots and causation. For all its apparent objectivity, Out of Africa is a brilliantly subjective work, communicating her elation and awe at the sight of people, animals, and places. In all her African writings one finds very few objective descriptions of these people and things, but there are many notations of her reactions to them.

A continuous thread runs through Dinesen's works. Seven Gothic Tales, Out of Africa, and Winter's Tales all emphasize exotic characters and the themes of art and violence. In Shadows on the Grass Dinesen returns to these themes and, as she did in Out of Africa, becomes a character in her own story about Africa.

It would be wrong to conclude, however, that Dinesen distorted the details of her experiences or that she invented fictional characters not reflective of her feelings. Isak Dinesen lived the life of an authentic artist, a life in which the real and the imagined could coexist. In this she found the substance of her art.

OUT OF AFRICA

First published: Den afrikanske Farm, 1937

Type of work: Memoir

A young woman goes to Africa, runs a coffee plantation, falls in love, and collects indelible memories.

Out of Africa partakes of history, autobiography, and pastoral romance. It is a highly personal account of a period in the author's life (roughly 1913 to 1931). Unlike authors of many memoirs or autobiographies, Dinesen is largely uninterested in facts, figures, dates, historical background, or politics. World War I and the Great Depression occur within the time frame of this book, but there is little direct mention of them although Dinesen occasionally discusses their effect on people's lives. Although she spent nearly twenty years in Africa and knew hundreds of people, only a dozen or so names emerge in the narrative. The narrative itself tends to be a rather casual affair, for Dinesen tends to tell her story in episodes, rather than in lengthy sequences. Some episodes clearly overlap, like the accidental shooting of an African child, the subsequent trial, and the appearance of Chief Kinanjui, a Kikuyu tribesman, whose death is described in some detail later. The exact sequence and linkage of these events remains unclear, or rather unimportant from Dinesen's point of view.

What does matter to Dinesen is the large tapestry of events; in fact, she uses the word "tapestry" many times to describe the dappled colors of greenery and sunlight under the canopy of the African forest. In short, she sees this African interlude with the eyes of a painter; characters and events tend to be grouped into episodes or pictorial clusters. The reader goes from one cluster to another, in the manner of a tourist looking at a huge tapestry, inspecting one portion at a time.

One may simplify Out of Africa into three large clusters, the first being the coffee farm, its native inhabitants, and servants. In this cluster belong Farah, Dinesen's overseer and general manager, the Danish jack-of-all-trades Old Knudsen, and the beautiful blue Ngong Hills that border her property. She omits most of the technical details about growing and harvesting coffee beans.

Another distinct cluster belongs to Lulu, the wild female bushbuck that Dinesen tamed. She devotes many pages to the habits and appearance of this lovely creature. Despite her nearness to two large game reserves, Dinesen does not generally describe other wild creatures, with the exception of giraffes and lions. The lions actually belong to the third cluster, which is presided over by Denys Finch Hatton and his friend Berkeley Cole (who dies shortly before Hatton's plane crash). In the end, lions come to sleep over Hatton's grave, providing one of the most moving and poignant passages in the book. This brings closure to this complex and unforgettable story, which, by itself, would have permanently established the reputation of Dinesen for readers worldwide.

WINTER'S TALES

First published: Vinter-Eventyr, 1942

Type of work: Short stories

In these beautifully written tales, the reader encounters unpredictable characters.

Romantic in tone and setting, the stories of Winter's Tales have reminded many readers of the fairy tales of Hans Christian Andersen and the dark, brooding fables of Joseph Conrad. Each of these eleven tales features domineering characters who take control of their lives and who define themselves by reacting strongly to another character. Most of the tales are set in the eighteenth or nineteenth century, in a glittering world of aristocrats, sea captains, officers, lords, and ladies. In "Sorg-Agre" ("Sorrow-Acre") for example, an eighteenth century Danish nobleman tells a peasant woman that she can save her son from death only by harvesting an acre of rye in the course of one day, from sunup to sundown. The woman succeeds but dies in doing so, leaving the aristocrat—and the reader—to ponder the meaning of her death. The nobleman does not allow the field to be planted again, and erects a statue of the woman on the spot where she died, as if her death were, in fact, a kind of victory over the meanness of everyday living.

In "Heloïse" ("The Heroine"), an aristocratic Frenchwoman saves a group of tourists who are trapped in Germany at the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War. Later, one of the young men who owes his life to her discovers that she has become a dance hall girl, although she remains as proud and heroic as when he first encountered her. The air of mystery and the sense of invisible forces operating on people's lives play a major part in the overall effect of the tales. In "Fra det gamle Danmark" ("The Fish") a medieval king eats a fish containing a woman's ring with a strange blue stone. The ring belongs to the wife of a prominent courtier. In the end, the courtier murders the king who, it turns out, had been secretly wooing the woman. The fish is both a symbol and an instrument of his fate.

Stories that reflect the author's preoccupation with destiny, especially the destiny of the artist, are "Det drømmende barn" ("The Dreaming Child") and "Peter og Rosa" ("Peter and Rosa"). These stories contain artist figures as protagonists, and both of the protagonists die early deaths in a world that does not seem to be able to accommodate them. The dreaming child is an orphan who imagines he has aristocratic parents; when he is adopted by such parents, he makes them believe that they do belong to him. His sudden death leaves them utterly perplexed. In like manner, young Peter is so completely enamored of sailing that he convinces Rosa to go onto the ice floes in a recently thawed harbor. They are swept out to sea by an unseen and uncontrollable current.

SHADOWS ON THE GRASS

First published: Skygger paa Græsset, 1960

Type of work: Memoir

In four short pieces, Dinesen writes the postscript to her earlier masterpiece, Out of Africa.

Shadows on the Grass is the last book Dinesen wrote, and it is the briefest and most factual, filled with dates, names, and references to other books and writers. She was dead within a year of its publication.

Shadows on the Grass serves as a coda or giant footnote to Out of Africa, filling the reader in on what happened to Dinesen's servants and friends. The primary focus is on Farah, the Somali-born servant who acted as her chief of staff. He is depicted as fiercely arrogant and utterly loyal, and his death is one of the most moving and tragic moments in all of Dinesen's writing. In fact, the film characterization of Farah depends more on this short text than on the book Out of Africa. Other characters who figure prominently include Kamante, who goes blind, old Juma, who dies, and Abdullahi, Farah's son, who ultimately prospers. What strikes the informed reader of Dinesen's work in reading these portraits is how similar they seem to the imaginary ones in Seven Gothic Tales and Winter's Tales. Clearly, Dinesen idealized all who touched her deeply, transforming them in her imagination into the same kind of romantic, contradictory, and willful types that one encounters in her great tales.

Dinesen is unusually reflective and self-analytical in Shadows on the Grass, freely admitting that the African experiences changed her life and made her writing career possible. She also shows a new consciousness of how the Masai and Kikuyu experienced a painful culture shock after the introduction of Western technology and culture, all of which made them listless and turned their old lives into boredom. Her frustrations with these people, especially when they would not heed her medical advice, and her unconditional affection for them come through on nearly every page. In Shadows on the Grass there is less of an emphasis on the exotic landscape and its aesthetic delights and more of a premium placed on human values and spiritual appreciation. One senses that Dinesen anticipated her own death and that she wanted to acknowledge her huge debt of gratitude to all her deceased friends.

SUMMARY

Isak Dinesen was one of those rare writers who was able to combine the real and imagined spheres of existence. Her talent depended on a kind of verbal alchemy that allowed her to change words and deeds into timeless, enchanting creations. Events in her life were translated into symbolic experiences that became the basis for her tales and memoirs. Few human beings are endowed with that kind of power. After Out of Africa was released as a film in 1985, another 650,000 copies of the book were sold during the next two years. Her work still attracts readers and will continue to do so as long as people believe in a world of infinite possibilities.

Daniel L. Guillory

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

SHORT FICTION:

- Seven Gothic Tales*, 1934
- Vinter-Eventyr*, 1942 (Winter's Tales, 1942)
- Sidste Fortællinger*, 1957 (Last Tales, 1957)
- Skæbne-Anekdoter*, 1958 (Anecdotes of Destiny, 1958)
- Ehrengard*, 1963
- Efterladte Fortællinger*, 1975 (Carnival: Entertainments and Posthumous Tales, 1977)

LONG FICTION:

- Gengældelsens Veje*, 1944 (as Pierre Andrézel; The Angelic Avengers, 1946)

NONFICTION:

- Den afrikanske Farm*, 1937 (Out of Africa, 1937)
- Skygger paa Græsset*, 1960 (Shadows on the Grass, 1960)
- Essays*, 1965

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does Isak Dinesen's "storyteller" differ from a writer?
- Were there advantages for Dinesen's literary perspective in her cultural life being "formed before the outbreak of World War I"?
- Demonstrate how some of the characters in Winter's Tales take charge of their own lives.
- How did the circumstances of Dinesen's life contribute to her capacity for looking at life with the eyes of a painter?
- What did Africa do for Isak Dinesen?

Breve fra Afrika, 1914-1931, 1978 (Letters from Africa, 1914-1931, 1981)

Daguerreotypes, and Other Essays, 1979

Samlede Essays, 1985

About the Author

Brantly, Susan. Understanding Isak Dinesen. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.

Dinnage, Rosemary. Alone! Alone! Lives of Some Outsider Women. New York: New York Review Books, 2004.

Hansen, Frantz Leander. The Aristocratic Universe of Karen Blixen: Destiny and the Denial of Fate. Translated by Gaye Kunoch. Portland, Oreg.: Sussex Press, 2003.

Johannesson, Eric. The World of Isak Dinesen. Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1961.

Langbaum, Robert. Isak Dinesen's Art: The Gayety of Vision. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.

Mullins, Marie. "The Gift of Grace: Isak Dinesen's 'Babette's Feast.'" In The Gift of Story: Narrating Hope in a Postmodern World, edited by Emily Griesinger and Mark Eaton. Waco, Tex.: Baylor University Press, 2006.

Simmons, Diane. The Narcissism of Empire: Loss, Rage, and Revenge in Thomas De Quincey, Robert Louis Stevenson, Arthur Conan Doyle, Rudyard Kipling, and Isak Dinesen. Portland, Oreg.: Sussex Academic Press, 2007.

Thurman, Judith. Isak Dinesen: The Life of a Storyteller. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1982.

Trzebinski, Errol. Silence Will Speak: A Study of the Life of Denys Finch Hatton and His Relationship with Karen Blixen. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.

Library of Congress

JOHN DONNE

Born: London, England

Between January 24 and June 19, 1572

Died: London, England

March 31, 1631

Somewhat disparaged initially as a Metaphysical poet, Donne became known as one of the best poets of Renaissance England.

BIOGRAPHY

John Donne (duhn) was born to prosperous parents in London, England, sometime between January 24 and June 19, in 1572. His father, also named John, was a successful iron merchant; his mother, Elizabeth, a descendant of Sir Thomas More and John Heywood, the dramatist. Both parents were devout Catholics. Their religion and especially his mother's literary background seem to have had a profound influence upon Donne. He would not always remain a Catholic; he eventually took orders in the Anglican Church, but throughout his life, he retained a passionate interest in religion, and he was writing poetry before he was twenty-one. His parents sent him to Oxford, where he stayed for three years, but he left before he was sixteen and without a degree.

In 1590, he began his study of law at Lincoln's Inn, where he probably acquired most of his learning in law and where he entered the service of Sir Thomas Egerton, thereby establishing himself in a secular career. He took part in two military expeditions under the influence of Egerton, but they were uneventful for him; he wrote two poems based on them, "The Storm" and "The Calm."

While in Egerton's service in 1591, Donne met and in violation of canon law secretly married Ann Moore, Egerton's niece and the daughter of Sir George Moore, an event that profoundly affected

Donne's career. As a consequence of the marriage, Egerton dismissed Donne from his employ, and Moore had him imprisoned briefly. Released after the Archbishop of Canterbury declared the marriage legal, Donne, now thirty, found himself with a wife and no prospects. Egerton refused to reinstate him, and Moore implacably refused to release Ann's dowry. Donne's marriage thus marks the end of one era of his life and the beginning of another.

During Donne's earlier era, he had begun to write poetry, including songs, sonnets, satires, and elegies. These secular poems, early expressions of Donne's genius and typical of Renaissance poetry, were not originally printed but circulated among friends. Each of the songs and sonnets is unique, each looking at one of the many possible perspectives of love, its glories and its failures. His satires, all in the tradition of the seventeenth century, assault urban vice; his third satire deserves special note, for it reveals Donne's changing attitude toward religion as he moved away from Catholicism. The nineteen elegies contributed especially to Donne's reputation as Jack Donne, a man-about-town and a frequenter of the ladies. All of these early poems reveal Donne's philosophical and scientific bent, his use of rugged, dramatic verse, his references to everyday experiences, and his fondness for fantastic metaphors—qualities that identified him to the English writer and critic Samuel Johnson, at least, as a Metaphysical poet.

Following his release from prison, Donne moved from London to Pyrford and then to Mitchum, still searching for secular preferment. This period of Donne's life, characterized by fewer and different types of literary pieces, failed to produce a political appointment for him, but he did succeed in establishing himself with some worthy patrons. Among his patrons were Lady Magdalen Herbert, for whom he may have written the “La Corona” sonnet sequence and the “Autumnall,” and Sir Robert Drury. When Drury’s young daughter, Elizabeth, died, Donne wrote An Anatomy of the World: The First Anniversary (1611) and, subsequently, Of the Progress of the Soule: The Second Anniversary (1612), poems known today as the Anniversaries.

Also during this period, Donne began to establish himself as a writer of prose. His first important work was Biathanatos (1646), an argument justifying suicide and still of interest today because of what it reveals of Donne’s erudition and of his state of mind at the time he wrote the work. His prose career further developed in the service of Thomas Morton, dean of Gloucester, who retained Donne to write polemical prose against Catholics. Donne obliged with Pseudo-Martyr (1610), an attack against the Catholic Church for teaching that to remain Catholic in defiance of British law was an act of martyrdom. This work also provides the best evidence up to 1610 that Donne had reconciled himself to the Anglican Church. His most scathing attack upon Catholics was Ignatius His Conclave (1611), in which he has Ignatius, a Jesuit, depose Satan and become the sovereign of Hell.

In 1609, Sir George Moore relented and released Ann’s dowry, an event that signaled a change in fortune for Donne. He never received the secular appointment he sought, but he decided instead to become a priest and took holy orders in the Anglican Church in 1615. Close upon this appointment, his wife died in 1617 while giving birth to their twelfth child, and for the rest of his life Donne was, according to biographer Izaak Walton, “crucified to the world.” Donne quickly established himself as the leading Anglican preacher of his day, and he was appointed dean of St. Paul’s in 1621, a position he held for the remaining ten years of his life.

The last part of his life was devoted almost entirely to sermons, and although only 6 were published during his lifetime, 150 were published by the year 1700. His only important poetic accomplishments during this period were a few divine poems and hymns, including his Devotions upon Emer- gent Occasions (1624), written during a severe illness, and his “Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness,” written, Walton concludes, only eight days before he died. He preached his last sermon before King Charles I on February 15, 1631; he died on March 31, 1631, in London.

ANALYSIS

Fewer than ten of Donne’s poems were published during his lifetime, and he was better known as a preacher and a writer of prose, especially sermons. Donne himself seems not to have been sure of the value of the poetry he wrote before he became a priest. It was 1633 before his first collection of poetry was published.

Early response to his poetry was not entirely favorable. Even his friend Ben Jonson said that Donne “did not keep accent” and that he would perish for “being misunderstood.” Samuel Johnson, calling him a Metaphysical poet, said that Donne’s poetry was new but not natural, that it presented “heterogeneous ideas yoked by violence together.” He did acknowledge that Donne demonstrated intensive knowledge. Johnson’s critical views of Donne’s poetry served as a standard for years, but in the twentieth century, largely through the influence of T. S. Eliot, who perceived Donne’s images not as excesses but as significant examples of “sensuous apprehension of thought,” Donne’s reputation as a poet improved to the point that he is now regarded as a major English poet of the seventeenth century. He is still perceived as a Metaphysical poet, but the appreciation for such poetry has grown so that now Donne’s Metaphysical qualities are not disparaged but admired.

Increasingly among moderns, Donne is seen as a product and spokesperson for his age, the Renaissance, a period characterized by new discoveries and intellectual advancements but also by the fragmentation of such institutions as feudalism and scholasticism, a time of separation of the secular and the spiritual, a turbulent, confusing world where truth could no longer be perceived as one. Thinkers such as Donne would have found themselves attracted to all the new worlds but detached from them. Donne said “the new philosophy puts all in doubt.” To live in such a world invited either indifference or attempts, which Donne chose, to achieve a unified sensibility, of which his poetry becomes one of the finest statements of the period. As one might expect, unifying the fractured world of the seventeenth century proved to be a formidable task, and it is his poetic adaptations to this task that give Donne's poetry its original rhetoric and imagery.

Donne writes as a scholar, as a curious observer open to a wide range of experiences. He fills his writing with allusions to his wide reading: "A Valediction: Of the Booke" contains references to the Sybil, Homer, Platonism, national leaders, the Bible, alchemy, theology, astronomy, and languages; Biathanatos quotes more than one hundred authorities. His intellectuality shapes his rhetoric, for he crowds his ideas into his poetry. As if impatient of transition and connectives, Donne may construct a single line of poetry almost entirely of verbs: "I saw him I/ Assail'd, fight, taken, stabb'd, bleed, fall, and dye."

Well versed in casuistry and law, Donne writes analytically, dialectically, as opposed to reflectively. As one reads Donne's poetry, one senses an imagined conversation in which Donne constantly tries to convince, verbally pushing and shoving. His sentences are more faithful to the form of conversation and logic than to poetic meter; thus, his poetry seems rugged and argumentative.

Yet Donne is not just a logical analyst; he is also a sensitive poet, and as he writes in the chaos of his passion and thought, he creates some startling imagery. Thus, he can write of the heart as the seat of the emotions, or he can write of the heart as a butcher might think of it: "When I had ripp'd me, 'and search'd where hearts did lye." He can also speak of bodies as temples of souls, or he can observe that "Rack't carcasses make ill anatomies." Forcing such imagery into a poem can result in vivid poetry, but it may also necessitate a vehicle to portray such sharply contrasting modes of perception—what came to be known as one of the outstanding features of Donne's poetry, the Metaphysical conceit.

It is particularly Donne's conceits, his extended metaphors, that have intrigued his readers. Not that conceits are unique to him or even new. Previous poets such as Sir Thomas Wyatt fully and carefully developed such images, but Donne pushes the conceit to startling new capacities for meaning, to extraordinary heights of association blending quite disparate elements.

Essentially, the Metaphysical conceit joins two things not usually thought of as being together, and in this fusion creates a new apprehension of truth. For example, one may bring together flint and steel and produce fire. To understand how this analogy supports the notion of the Metaphysical conceit, it is important to see that when one strikes the flint against the steel the result is not just flint or just steel, nor is it some combination of the flint and steel; it is a new entity, fire. Similarly, Donne, in one of his most famous conceits, brings together a compass and lovers. A compass has no more to do with lovers than does flint with steel, but when Donne unites them, a new concept emerges, a new way of looking at the relationship between lovers. Again, Donne brings together a flea and an argument for seduction, and disparate as these elements are, once one sees how Donne fuses them in his poem "The Flea," one can never think of seduction in the same way again.

Reading Donne's poetry is not always easy. It is the record of a passionate, analytical intellect at work. For him, no experience is ever complete. He constantly moves ideas around, observes them from different perspectives, arranges them into new patterns of thought. Perhaps as much as anyone else, he captures the spirit of the Renaissance, and his poetry has become an embodiment of it.

"A VALEDICTION: FORBIDDING MOURNING"

First published: 1633 (collected in Poems, by J. D.: With Elegies on the Authors Death, 1633)

Type of work: Poem

In this moving poem containing Donne's most famous conceit, the compass, the poet gently argues against weeping when true lovers part.

"A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning," probably written to his wife in 1601 before Donne left on a trip to the Continent, has often been anthologized. It is not only one of Donne's most popular works but also one of his most representative.

The poem rests, as do most of Donne's love poems, in the tradition of Renaissance love poetry. There is, for example, the conventional analogy of dying and the parting of lovers; there are references to floods of tears, tempests of sighs, and the spiritualizing quality of love. The poem is not different in kind from other poetry of the period, but it is different in degree. Donne and his lover exceed the traditional model for lovers, for they have so spiritualized their love that to reveal it to common lovers by weeping at parting would profane it much as a mystic discussing his or her ecstatic union with God would cheapen that experience.

Further, the poem reveals Donne's awareness of and interest in Renaissance topics such as astronomy. For his own purposes in this poem, Donne takes the traditional view and derives his phrase "sublunary lovers" from the older Ptolemaic system, which argued that everything beneath the moon was imperfect and corruptible while all above the moon was perfect and incorruptible. Donne insists that ordinary love, being beneath the moon, is inferior to his love, which has been made perfect beyond the moon.

Typically, Donne pushes his argument to more complex levels of understanding and turns next to the notion of Platonic love, which he also compares with his own. The basic idea of Platonic love is the idea that, in another world, the Real World, there exist perfect ideals or archetypes for all particular things that exist in this, the actual world. Thus, all examples of love in human experience must be compared to the ideal of love in the Real World in order to determine their validity. In this framework, Donne argues that his love is the Platonic archetype. Unlike sublunary, inferior love, which is activated by the senses, Donne's love is nourished by the soul. Because of the superior love Donne and his lady enjoy, they should not behave as ordinary lovers and weep and sigh at parting.

Bringing to bear yet another argument against acting like inferior lovers, Donne next insists that his soul and the soul of his lover through a mystical union have become one. Thus, they do not experience a breach in parting but an expansion "like gold to avery thinnesse beate." Actually, this argument is two-pronged, for it posits the superiority of Donne's love in that he compares it to gold, the costliest metal, and it offers further support that perfect love does not weep at parting, for it cannot admit absence.

The apex of Donne's argument is developed in the last four stanzas of the poem as he unfolds his famous compass conceit. The metaphor is relatively simple; its value lies primarily in its success in shocking the reader into new sensibilities. The lady is the fixed foot of the compass; Donne is the moving foot. The firmer the fixed foot (the truer the lady's love), the more just the circle of the moving foot.

This conceit, typical of Donne's best, represents an elaboration of a metaphor to the furthest stage intellect can pursue it. It unifies sensation and reason, description of things and feelings. Donne stresses the logic of his argument more than the beauty of his metaphor, and ultimately the reader is likely to be more impressed with the puzzle of the image, with the fact that it really works, than with its delineation of character or passion. Thus, the conceit serves as a fitting climax to a powerful but gentle argument that true lovers secure in the exaltation of their love disdain public shows of affection.

"THE FLEA"

First published: 1633 (collected in Poems, by J. D.: With Elegies on the Authors Death, 1633)

Type of work: Poem

This sardonic poem of seduction traces the mind of Donne at his argumentative best.

Perhaps interest in "The Flea" is, as the English scholar and writer C. S. Lewis has suggested, mostly accidental. Perhaps, as he says, if the flea had not acquired a reputation as an unpleasant pest, the poem would not be as striking as it is. On the other hand, possibly no conceit ever developed represents as well as Donne's flea a capacity for total meaning. Such a metaphor, coupled with the argumentative ingenuity of Donne, results in a remarkable poem.

It is impossible to say when the poem was written, but it was published among his Songs and Sonnets, which was included in Poems by J. D.: With Elegies on the Authors Death (1633). The poem's irreverent tone, its mocking challenge of traditional values, and its sardonic treatment of its subject matter mark it as one of Donne's earlier poems, when he was known as Jack Donne, "a frequenter of ladies and of plays.” It is inconceivable that Donne could have written the poem after he became the dean of St. Paul’s Church.

Told in the first person, the poem is a dramatic monologue, a form often used by Donne, wherein the narrator, who is a character in the poem, is speaking to someone who never replies. The drama of the poem evolves, however, through the narrator’s response to events shared with the silent companion. In “The Flea,” the narrator has clearly been attempting unsuccessfully to seduce a lady. She has rejected his advances, remonstrating that sex for them would be a sin, a shame, and, for her, a loss of virginity—strong traditional arguments in seventeenth century England. Yet her arguments, perhaps even more than the prospect of sex, inspire the narrator to new heights of argumentative persuasion couched in the conceit of the flea.

He begins with the assertion that sex between them would have no more effect than the bite of a flea, but he then paradoxically argues for the significance of the flea he has just belittled. Now he claims that the flea represents the marriage bed, the ideal of sexuality; the Church, the sanctifier of marriage; and at least an earthly reflection of the Trinity, in that it represents three lives in one: the lives of Donne, the lady, and the flea. Why this paradoxical shift? Apart from Donne’s love of paradox, he probably expects his argument to show that since all three of the impediments to sex—marriage, Church, and Trinity—can be summed up in a flea, they are not significant obstacles.

Donne next argues that he is concerned that she will, by killing the flea, commit the triple crime of his murder, her own suicide, and the destruction of their sexual union, crimes all possible because the bloods of Donne and the woman are mixed in the flea. He believes that the lady is capable of such murder because, by withholding her sexual favors from him, she constantly kills him.

Even as Donne speaks, the lady kills the flea and triumphantly declares that his fears are unfounded, for the death of the flea weakens neither her nor Donne. In a brilliant reversal, Donne turns her argument against her, pointing out that just as she insists that the blood lost in the death of the flea is nothing, so blood lost in her yielding to him would be equally insignificant.

The argument of the poem is well wrought, and as the conceit unfolds, its elements lose their identies in a new way of looking at sexual love. Significantly, even as Donne cajoles and teases the lady into accepting his conclusion, readers find themselves drawn into the argument, shocked perhaps by the appearance and function of the flea but pleased with the overall effect, thus proving the efficacy of Donne’s conceit.

“BATTER MY HEART, THREE PERSON’D GOD”

First published: 1633 (collected in Poems, by J. D.: With Elegies on the Authors Death, 1633)

Type of work: Poem

In this intensely personal sonnet, Donne depicts in military and marital terms his ongoing struggle with God.

“Batter My Heart, Three Person’d God” is one of nineteen sonnets that Donne wrote after taking orders in the Anglican Church. Earlier in his life, before his marriage and ordination, he wrote some fifty-five poems published in Songs and Sonnets, but none of these is technically a sonnet. The latter sonnets that he wrote as an Anglican priest, however, are true sonnets, and they display Donne’s continuing love of wit and paradoxes but also his deepening concern about his relationship to God.

“Batter My Heart, Three Person’d God” is a fairly typical sonnet. It has fourteen lines, and the metrical scheme is iambic pentameter, five feet to a line; each foot contains an unstressed and a stressed syllable. The rhyme scheme is abba, abba, cdcd, ee, not the only sonnet rhyme sequence but a common one. The poem, typical of many sonnets, is made up of an octet: The first eight lines have the same rhyme scheme and develop a single image, in this poem, the image of a city under siege. The last six lines form a sestet, the first four lines having a consistent rhyme scheme and their own image, that of a marital relationship. The last two lines of the sestet form a couplet; they rhyme with each other and bring together the thought of the octet and the sestet.

As Donne matured and as his image changed from that of Jack Donne, man-about-town, to that of John Donne, dean of St. Paul's, his poetry also changed, as this poem shows. After he took Holy Orders, he directed his love poetry not to women but to God. He tempered the sardonic indifference of some of his earlier poetry with the submissiveness of faith, and the shocking conceits of his earlier writing soften. Yet his intellect remains as vigorous as ever, and his witty imagery and love of paradox still characterize his poetry.

The seemingly impatient, boundless energy of Donne's mind continues to erupt in his later poetry. Disdaining connectives and transition, it abruptly expresses itself in verb after strong verb. Thus, Donne complains in this poem that until now God has been content to "knocke, breathe, shine, and seeke to mend," but Donne desires God to "overthrow, and bend . . . to breake, blowe, burn, and make me new." These lines record a writer trying in his poetry to keep up with, to describe, somehow, the passionate, scintillating images that tumble from his mind.

The witty imagery of this poem, like much of Donne's work, is built upon paradox, not a surprising development when one couples Donne's seemingly innate love of paradox with the emphasis on paradox in the Christian tradition to which Donne turned. Donne's plea, for example, for God to overthrow him so he may stand, to enthrall him so he may be free, echoes the Christian ideas that the way up to God leads down, that one must lose one's self in order to find one's self, and that one must die to live. His appeal to God to ravish him so that he may be chaste recalls the paradox of Mary, the virgin Mother of God. Just as in the sex act the partner may aggressively surrender, so Donne "labors to admit" God. Ultimately, one finds in this poem a passionate yet reasoned attempt to resolve the Christian dilemma articulated by Saint Paul, who found himself doing not the good that he wanted to do but the evil that he did not want to do. Donne wants to be loved by God, but he finds himself "betroth'd" to God's enemy, Satan.

In this poem, however, unlike earlier poems, the metaphors do not shock; they are fairly standard in Christian writing in the seventeenth century. Nor is it Donne's argumentative wit, but perhaps the honesty of his depiction of the ongoing struggle between his body and his soul, that attracts. Vividly dramatized is his commitment to faith—his "captiv'd" reason is useless to him. The poem raises the question of whether the poetry of the dean of St. Paul's is as good as the poetry of Jack Donne, but it settles once and for all Donne's commitment to religion as a way of life.

"HYMN TO GOD MY GOD, IN MY SICKNESS"

First published: 1635 (collected in Poems, by J. D.: With Elegies on the Authors Death, 1635)

Type of work: Poem

In this poem, written perhaps as late as eight days before his death, Donne reflects upon his dying and his prospects of salvation.

"Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness" is perhaps the last poem that Donne ever wrote and thus serves as a good example of the poetic interests he maintained late in life after his wife's death and his ordination. Most critics divide Donne's career into at least two parts: an earlier, more productive period when he was known as a man-about-town and wrote primarily satires and witty treatments of love, and a later period after he accepted Holy Orders in the Anglican Church. Clearly, "Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness" belongs to the latter period. As one might expect, there are similarities and dissimilarities between it and the poems of the earlier period. "Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness" reveals Donne's continuing wide intellectual interests and his ongoing talent for bringing these interests together in vivid, insightful metaphors; but it also shows a new, humbler concern for the welfare of his soul.

A cursory look at the poem reveals examples of Donne's intellectual interests. He raises the issue of cartography, the making of maps, popular in the Renaissance when discoveries of new lands constantly made news. Donne reveals his own interest in and knowledge of geography, referring to Jerusalem, Gibraltar, the Pacific Ocean, and the Bering Strait, which had become a hoped-for passage to Eastern riches.

His use of the phrase "per fretum febris" (through the straits of fever) does not establish him as a Latin scholar, though he probably was, but it is his thorough acquaintance with religious topics that is striking. Thus, he writes about how in Christianity the East symbolizes birth and resurrection, how the West symbolizes death, and how just as on a map East and West merge, so birth fades into death and death into resurrection. He refers to Shem, Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and the theory current in the seventeenth century that after the Deluge, these three sons repopulated the entire earth.

He shows his familiarity with the classical Christian notion that the Garden of Eden was located on the same spot where Jerusalem was later built and that the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil grew on the same site where Christ's cross stood, thus locating all four of these contrasting, contradicting symbols in the same place and creating a magnificently paradoxical image. Another paradox important to Donne and also indicative of his immersion in Christian theory is the paradox of the two Adams. As Donne points out, through the first Adam humankind fell from grace, forfeited the Garden of Eden, and was condemned to earn its bread with the sweat of physical labor. Through Christ, the second Adam, however, humanity is restored to grace, regains Paradise, and, instead of the pain of the first Adam's sweat, knows the balm, the saving efficacy, of the second Adam's blood.

In one of this poem's most vivid metaphors, Donne brings his knowledge of geography and religion together in a conceit wherein spiritual and physical cosmography unite in the body of Donne. Thus, his physicians become cosmographers, map-makers, and Donne's body becomes their map. On this map, East, his birth, and West, his death, can be discerned. As surely as he began his journey in the East, he will conclude his journey in the West. Yet, asserts Donne, his West holds no fears for him, for as in all flat maps, and Donne's body is such a map, East and West meld into one, so Donne expects his death to merge into resurrection. Death will become life.

Reflecting on the poem to this point, one may discern several similarities between it and Donne's earlier poetry. It retains the same wittiness, love of learning, and penchant for striking comparisons as those earlier poems do. Yet there arises a difference in this poem. In previous poems, Donne flaunted his knowledge and used his wit to bully his opponents into submission. In this poem, Donne trusts not in his wit or argumentative acumen but in Christ's "purple" (His Lordship) to save him, and he concludes not with the original swaggering confidence that he has taught his opponent a lesson but with the humbler hope that he may learn from his own poem. Ultimately, his conceit of the map does not carry him to flights of fancy but to submission to his fate as he reflects upon the straits before him and the God who waits beyond them.

SUMMARY

T. S. Eliot perceived John Donne's worldview as one of unified sensibility, as an attempt to hold together what Renaissance thought threatened to tear asunder, and a study of Donne's poetry confirms this view. Widely read, acquainted with all worlds but committed to none, able to bring together the most heterogeneous elements in convincing if shocking images, Donne stands out as a thinker capable of moving easily between absolutes and particulars, of probing potentialities, of heightening sensuality into philosophy, of thinking and feeling simultaneously, and of distilling all of these experiences into an intimate logic. His intensely personal record of the turbulent seventeenth century has meaning in modern humanity's chaotic world; his experimental Renaissance style of writing poetry has become characteristic of modern poetics.

Ray G. Wright

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

An Anatomy of the World: The First Anniversary, 1611
Of the Progress of the Soule: The Second Anniversary, 1612
Poems, by J. D.: With Elegies on the Authors Death, 1633, 1635, 1639, 1649, 1650, 1654, 1669

NONFICTION:

Pseudo-Martyr, 1610
Ignatius His Conclave, 1611
Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, 1624
Death's Duell, 1632
Juvenilia: Or, Certaine Paradoxes and Problemes, 1633, 1923
Six Sermons on Several Occasions, 1634
LXXX Sermons, 1640
Biathanatos, 1646
Fifty Sermons, 1649
Letters to Severall Persons of Honour, 1651
Essayes in Divinity, 1651
A Collection of Letters, 1660
XXVI Sermons, 1660

About the Author

Bald, R. C. John Donne: A Life. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
Bennett, Joan Frankau. Five Metaphysical Poets: Donne, Herbert, Vaughan, Crashaw, Marvell. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1964.
Donne, John. John Donne's Poetry: Authoritative Texts, Criticism. Edited by Donald R. Dickson. New York: W. W. Norton, 2007.
Eliot, T. S. "The Metaphysical Poets." In Selected Essays. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1950.
Guibbory, Achsah, ed. The Cambridge Companion to John Donne. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
MacKenzie, Clayton G. Emblem and Icon in John Donne's Poetry and Prose. New York: P. Lang, 2001.
Saunders, Ben. Desiring Donne: Poetry, Sexuality, Interpretation. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2006.
Sugg, Richard. John Donne. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007.
Walton, Izaak. The Lives of Doctor John Donne, Sir Henry Wotton Knight, Mr. Richard Hooker, Mr. George Herbert, and Doctor Robert Sanderson. London: Oxford University Press, 1927.
Whalen, Robert. The Poetry of Immanence: Sacrament in Donne and Herbert. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002.
Williamson, George. The Donne Tradition: A Study in Elizabethan Poetry from Donne to the Death of Cowley. New York: Octagon Books, 1973.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What literary habits of John Donne kept even important later poets and critics from appreciating his poetry?
- What is there in "Metaphysical poetry" that has made it attractive from the time of T. S. Eliot on?
- Writers are often advised to take pains to begin their works well. What characteristics of Donne's poems make clear that he understood this sort of advice?
- Explain why, with respect to "A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning," mourning is forbidden.
- What literary techniques, especially the use of metaphor, in "Batter My Heart, Three Person'd God" resemble those in the poetry of "Jack Donne"?
- Donne ends "Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness" with a paradox: "Therefore that he may raise the Lord throws down." Find several other paradoxes of this type in Donne's poetry.
- What does "thinking and feeling simultaneously" mean? What does Eliot's need to emphasize this concept suggest about the ordinary state of our emotional and intellectual processes?

Library of Congress

FYODOR DOSTOEVSKI

Born: Moscow, Russia

November 11, 1821

Died: St. Petersburg, Russia

February 9, 1881

Dostoevski is widely regarded as the leading practitioner of the psychological novel in the nineteenth century and as one of the greatest novelists of all time.

BIOGRAPHY

Fyodor Mikhailovich Dostoevski (dahs-tuh-YEHF-skee), novelist, journalist, religious polemicist, and political reformer, was born in Moscow, Russia, on November 11, 1821, the second child of Mikhail Andreevich Dostoevski and Marya Fedorovna Nechaeva. His father, a surgeon, had served for eight years in the army and, at Fyodor's birth, held a staff position at St. Mary's Hospital for the destitute of Moscow. An able and intelligent man who had succeeded in pulling himself out of generations of poverty, Dostoevski's father was nonetheless often violent, moody, and given to bouts of heavy drinking that frightened his children. His mother was an engaging and attractive woman, practical, efficient, and cheerful in running her household.

Dostoevski had seven brothers and sisters. He was closest to his older brother, Mikhail, and the third child in the family, his sister Varvara. These three seem to have formed a closer relationship to their father than the youngest five, whose lives were centered almost entirely on their mother. Mikhail, Fyodor, and Varvara shared intellectual and literary interests, and Fyodor's novels and stories reveal themes, types, and motifs closely linked to his lifetime experience with these two close siblings.

Dostoevski spent the first twelve years of his life at home, where he was schooled by his father and by private tutors. He finished his early education at the best boarding school in Moscow, an educational experience recorded in fictional alteration in his novel Podrostok (1875; A Raw Youth, 1916). At sixteen, he entered the St. Petersburg military engineering school, where he was an indifferent student of soldierly science, spending much of his time at musical and theatrical performances, on nights out with fellow cadets, and especially in reading. Dostoevski was a voracious reader, working his way through the classics, being particularly fond of Homer and William Shakespeare. So taken was he with the greatness of these authors that he determined to master the literary craft in a way never before done in the Russian language. This determination, coupled with his father's murder at the hands of the peasants on a small family estate and his mother's death from tuberculosis, led Dostoevski in 1844 to begin life anew. He resigned his engineering lieutenant's commission and became a full-time writer.

His first two literary attempts illustrate the power that he was to manifest throughout his career. First, he translated into Russian the French novelist Honoré de Balzac's Eugénie Grandet (1833; English translation, 1859). Balzac had recently been lionized on a visit to St. Petersburg, and Dostoevski saw his chance to create a success and make some money. Yet it is his choice of this particular work to translate that is important: Eugénie Grandet reveals motifs of criminality, the psychology of self-sacrifice, and the power of obsessive behavior that inform much of Dostoevski's later work. Second, he produced the short novel Bednye lyudi (1846; Poor Folk, 1887), which a friend gave to the great Russian literary critic Vissarion Belinsky to read. To Dostoevski's surprise and delight, Belinsky gave it high praise, recognizing the young author's uncommon and powerful insight into the tragic victimization of people caught in circumstances beyond their control. In this novel, Dostoevski reveals the ability to show from within a character's psychology, a new technique that caused the literary elite of his day to rank him immediately with Russia's greatest writers.

During the next six years, Dostoevski wrote many works showing an astonishing range of style and form. The most important of these is the novel Dvoynik (1846; The Double, 1917), in which a morbidly delicate clerk is shown progressively sinking into insanity, an almost clinical description underscored by the hero's encounters with beings in mirrors, on the street, and in dreams, all of whom are embodiments of his worst pathological desires and which portray the disease of advancing schizophrenia in a powerful new way.

In addition to his writing, Dostoevski participated in political discussions at the homes of leading radicals. The repressive Czar Nicholas I had arrested twenty-one of the participants in these discussions. All of them, including Dostoevski, were sentenced to be shot. He was saved at the last moment by the czar's order to have him sent to prison in Siberia, to be followed by a stint in the army. The experience of a last-minute reprieve haunted him for the rest of his life, and the frightful conditions of the Siberian labor camp produced a changed man. During his imprisonment, he began to have sharp hallucinations, and this period marks the beginning of his bouts with epilepsy. Dostoevski emerged from prison and the army intensely spiritualized, so much so that he accepted his punishment as a just reward for his previous crimes, political and emotional. His intense prison experience also supplied him with material for the deeply penetrating psychological portraits that characterize the remainder of his literary output.

At the end of 1859, he was allowed to begin writing again. Returning to St. Petersburg, he found radicals against him because of his renewed interest in religion. Together with his older brother, he established the magazine Vremya (time) with the goal of drawing together into a cooperative stance the leading groups of Russian writers and intellectuals, a goal that was only partially met. In order to heal his emotional wounds and to gain breadth of experience, Dostoevski went to Germany in 1862. While he was gone, the government banned the publication of Vremya, saying that it was unpatriotic. Undaunted, he returned and again, in partnership with Mikhail, began a new journal, Epokha (epoch).

The establishment of his new magazine in 1864 marks the beginning of Dostoevski's greatest writing period, the time in which he produced Prestupleniye i nakazaniye (1866; Crime and Punishment, 1886), Idiot (1868; The Idiot, 1877), Besy (1871-1872; The Possessed, 1913; also known as The Devils), and Bratya Karamazovy (1879-1880; The Brothers Karamazov, 1912). His life was seldom happy: Problems caused by gambling and epilepsy continued to plague him, and marital peace eluded him until he met and wed Anna Grigorievna Snitkina, an unprepossessing but absolutely devoted stenographer who aided him greatly by bringing order to his emotional life and efficiency to his personal affairs. He had suffered from emphysema for years, and he died of that terrible disease on February 9, 1881, in St. Petersburg, where he is buried.

ANALYSIS

In a sense, all of Dostoevski's works are psychological accounts of obsessive behavior. There is no epic sweep to the novels, even though they are very long, and no detailed "slice of life" observation on the part of the narrators. The manner in which his fiction differs from other work of his time is that Dostoevski uncovers for the reader the detailed psychological complexity of an act (such as murder) while avoiding complexity of motif and cleverness of rhetorical patterns. His work achieves a clinical economy of both subject and treatment. This economy, coupled with the reader's natural fascination with the bizarre obsessions that focus the stories, represents the creation of a new kind of serious fiction that is related to but rises above the psycho-thriller.

It would be a mistake, however, to assume that Dostoevski's novels and stories are easy reading. His real goal is to reveal the core of human nature. To do so, he typically subjects his characters to frightening situations, then gradually removes, one by one, the psychological props that they have used to keep themselves in balance, until, finally, they are left quite alone in their dilemmas. In this way, the reader is led into the depths of the human mind's darkest chasms. The reader's absorption in the question of what a human being will choose to do when left alone in the night of previously hidden obsessions is what creates the electric suspense of Dostoevski's stories. The chief manner by which he brings about this revelation is through the subtle manipulation of imagery.

First, almost all Dostoevski's works are set in the city, that soot-stained, chaotic collection of human souls crowded into a kind of heap. There is a certain protection in a city, but also an inevitable rubbing away of individual identity by too-close contact. Cities confine rather than liberate: Symbolically, they hide the self in a welter of interpersonal relations and complexities. Second, the novels and stories tend to focus on images of lower animal life (spiders, snakes, flies, and lice, for example), providing for the reader the association of Dostoevski's obsessed characters with disease-carrying and filth-ridden loathsomeness. Finally, the use of dreams for symbolic purposes is omnipresent. There is usually a buildup of tension to the beginning of a dream, followed by a sequence that reveals a segment of a character's subconscious. Dostoevski accomplishes this very subtly, intermixing dreams as wish fulfillments, regressions, self-assertions, and foreshadowings.

The power of Dostoevski's art has been called cruel and even sadistic, seeming to revel in the morbid and abnormal. Modern psychology, however, has provided a clinical understanding of mental and emotional abnormalities, so that it is now clear how the novels and stories anticipate and artistically present many of the discoveries made by social scientists. Dostoevski's art represents the first realistic view into areas of the psyche virtually unexplored before his time. Mental illnesses now named by modern psychiatry are given life by his characters: manic depression, senile dementia, infantilism, and megalomania find form in Raskolnikov, Stavrogin, Natasha Filipovna, and Kirilov.

In fact, Dostoevski's insistent use of dreams for symbolic purposes anticipates the most influential early psychological treatise in history, Sigmund Freud's Die Traumdeutung (1900; The Interpretation of Dreams, 1913). The dream that Svidrigailov (Crime and Punishment) has just prior to his suicide, in which he violates a child, is Freudian to the core.

Stavrogin's (The Possessed) rape of a twelve-year-old girl is mirrored in his dream of the Lorraine painting, which comes to life and haunts him to the verge of insanity. Arkady (A Raw Youth) is aware that his dreams are the key to his identity, particularly the one in which a gruesome spider spins its web inside his bowels. Hippolyte (The Idiot) has a dream that perfectly reveals his split personality: A snake slithers off the wall of his bedroom and chases him around the house. It noiselessly follows him until, just as it touches his head, his dog (already dead for more than five years) runs up and bites the reptile in two. Hippolyte awakes as the leering dog stands in front of him with the two parts of the serpent still writhing in his mouth. Alyosha (The Brothers Karamazov) is spiritually transformed by the dream of his dead mentor's corpse being alive once again and present at the biblical marriage at Cana. Raskolnikov (Crime and Punishment) has a dream in which, as he is walking past a tavern with his father, he observes peasants beating a horse to death, a scene that he, upon waking, realizes represents his murder plan. The hero of "The Dream of a Ridiculous Man" eventually understands that dreams are always symbolic, always unreasonable, deeply embedded wish fulfillments. The use of dream imagery and dream analysis in Dostoevski's works has never been surpassed in Western literature and has been the most influential, along with Freud's writings, of any treatments of the idea.

In addition to Dostoevski's brilliance as a forerunner of psychoanalysis, his place as cocreator of the modern novel is secure. He produced his works while Gustave Flaubert, Leo Tolstoy, and Charles Dickens were creating theirs. Each of these writers attempted, in his own way, to describe realistically how human beings react to everyday life. Naturalistic views of heredity, environment, and human motivation are basic to the creation of the social types represented in the great nineteenth century novels, but Dostoevski treats these topics in a unique way. He is interested in throwing light on the primitive and raw elements of human nature, out of which social types may be understood. By showing characters in the grip of actual or potential crime and the consequences of these crimes, Dostoevski reveals that human ills and universal evil are not at all outside individuals: Rather, they rest squarely inside each individual.

NOTES FROM THE UNDERGROUND

First published: Zapiski iz podpolya, 1864
(English translation, 1913)

Type of work: Novella

A sick and spiteful man philosophizes about his irrationality, defending himself in advance against criticism of his negativism.

One of Dostoevski's most interesting and original works, Notes from the Underground represents the real beginning of his literary greatness, even though the earlier novel Poor Folk had already made him famous. Translated into many languages many times, this work is more widely read than perhaps any other late nineteenth century short novel or story. The "underground man" has become a literary archetype, and numerous modern movements have claimed Dostoevski's creation as their spiritual progenitor. The story consists of two parts. In the first, the underground man gives a long monologue that encapsulates his philosophy, while in the second part, adventures from his life are recounted. Together, these halves form a whole psychological portrait, making a powerful statement against the possibility of rational social progress.

By noticing that the underground man tyrannizes everyone around him, one sees how easy it is for superficial and sentimental people to be corrupted by a strong personality. Thus, the story expresses a pessimistic vision of humankind as weak, too self-centered ever to experience joy, and prone to the agony of solipsism. The essence of the underground man's meaning lies in his assertion that, as far as he is concerned, the world can go to hell, just as long as he gets his tea. Moreover, Notes from the Underground is a political polemic aimed at reforming Russian society, with its endless wavering between Western European ideas and the "Russian soul." The recounted adventures in the second half of the story are symbolic representations of episodes from Russia's dislocated past and present. These recollections reveal that it is not really the underground man who has a problem with true identity: It is Russia itself. By extension, Notes from the Underground is also a renunciation of Dostoevski's own past. The author, through the narrator, derides his previously held optimism and joyful feelings, and he replaces them with pessimism, hopelessness, and despair. Something ugly had arisen in Dostoevski's spirit, and he felt compelled to give it expression, no matter how venomous it might be.

Above all, there seems little doubt that it is a full-blown attack on the particular positivist philosophy of Dostoevski's day, a philosophy holding that human beings are rational and capable of creating a better society for everyone through material progress. The underground man's spiritual isolation is the result of positivism's failure to make any material progress at all, and his self-disgust is an agonized cry of protest against it.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

First published: Prestupleniye i nakazaniye, 1866 (English translation, 1886)

Type of work: Novel

An intensely emotional intellectual, driven by poverty, comes to believe that he lives above common morality and commits a murder, only to find that his punishment is worse than he imagined it could be.

In Crime and Punishment, Dostoevski treats the problem of crime and the criminal mentality. He is not interested in the social aspects of criminal behavior, and there is little said in the novel about the legalities of crime. Dostoevski has an interior view of criminality, a conviction that crime and its inevitable punishment are deeply seated aspects of the human spirit.

Raskolnikov (the novel's hero) is presented from the inside. The reader knows what he did before knowing why he did it, and the story is told as a gradual revelation of the hero's motives. That accounts for the uncanny suspense of the first several chapters: The reader continually searches for the reason that Raskolnikov has murdered the pawnbroker. Intertwined with the reader's suspense is the slowly dawning realization that Raskolnikov himself does not know his motive. This "double suspense" creates a dense texture that gives the novel its complexity, a complexity laid over the relative simplicity of the plot.

As the novel progresses, Raskolnikov's possible motives become ever more bizarre. The consistent notion behind his behavior is revealed in his confession to the innocent prostitute, Sonia, after the crime, when he blurts out that he did it because he only wanted to see if he could go beyond a normal person's revulsion against such an act. This admission seems to suggest that Raskolnikov is an egotist, a self-styled superman who wants to see if he can get away with transgressing the law. The reader comes to find, however, that Raskolnikov's impulses go more deeply than that: Raskolnikov wants to see if he can overstep the limits of evil itself, if he can exert ultimate power over another person. That is what the murder means to him.

Dostoevski's brilliant unfolding of Raskolnikov's deepest motive really begins after the confession to Sonia. Before this point in the novel, the reader is puzzled by a welter of seemingly conflicting evidence about the hero's personality. Raskolnikov says he does not believe in God and that there is no arbiter of absolute good and evil. Yet he is numb with self-doubt. In spite of his logical decision to commit murder, he is troubled and hesitant. His horrible dream of the peasants beating a horse to death causes him to awake trembling at the very thought that he himself might be so cruel. As he later walks along the banks of the Neva, his obsession with committing an evil act alternates with a loathing for the very idea. Then, after the deed has been done, something curious occurs that turns out to be the key to understanding his true motive and the rest of the novel. It becomes clear that Raskolnikov's response to having committed murder is merely puzzlement. In other words, he shows neither remorse nor joy. He realizes that he feels the same way that he has always felt.

Finally, the reader understands that the loathsome criminality of Raskolnikov's motive lies in its amorality. He had decided to murder the old woman pawnbroker on strictly logical grounds, but the unease that he continues to feel is not a guilty conscience stemming from a too-strict logicity. Had he murdered for money or out of anger and then been caught, his punishment would have been easier than that which comes to gnaw at him. Having made a cold-blooded sociopathic decision to assert himself at the expense of another's very identity, he finds his feelings locked into the conventional morality that his intellect so despises. He is thus caught in an emotional vacuum, the most inescapable kind of punishment. Raskolnikov has murdered an old woman, but the inability to have an authentically strong feeling about it has murdered him spiritually. In a dream, he tries to kill her repeatedly, slicing at her skull with an ax, but as he looks closely into her face he can see her laughing horribly. Raskolnikov has really killed himself with the ax of cold-blooded self-assertion. He has no clearly definable motive because he is a sociopathic personality.

In the end of the story, Dostoevski makes clear how problematic such a personality is for society. Once again, the author's meaning is revealed in a dream sequence. Raskolnikov is ill in Siberia and dreams that he and the rest of the world have been devastated by an infestation of highly intelligent germs. The infestation causes insanity. The infected believe themselves to be logical, scientific, progressive, and morally sound; yet they get sick and go mad from the infection. Anarchy results, and human society disintegrates. Dostoevski's point is that sociopathic personalities are like these microbes, able to kill everything that they touch.

The sickness of cold-blooded amorality is shown against a background of conventional, commonsensical standards that define the boundaries of good and evil. The relationship between them is seen in the novel's other characters. Raskolnikov's sister, Dunya, is about to be married to Luzhin, a manipulative businessman, and the morally grotesque Svidrigailov hovers around them, while the prostitute, Sonia, and the policeman, Porfiry, at tempt to maneuver the hero into a confession. Each relationship is flawed by the characters' tendency toward self-serving logicity, none more self-indulgent than that between Svidrigailov and Dunya, caused for the most part by Svidrigailov's profligacy. Years of cold philosophizing have left Svidrigailov with no heartfelt values, not even the common sense to distinguish between the most fundamental kinds of good and evil. In order to escape his emotional wretchedness, he fills his days with a sinister kind of debauchery. When his love for Dunya is rejected, he is able to shoot himself with a cool detachment. Sonia, although kindly and sensitive, is nevertheless a prostitute; like the others, she has murdered herself by becoming a tool of the dissoluteness of other people. She, like the others, has defined herself by coolly deciding on a course of action that indulges others in their weaknesses. It is the ultimate punishment that results from sociopathic attitudes and behaviors: Like the crime, the punishment is cold, wretched, impersonal, and ultimately without any satisfaction.

THE POSSESSED

First published: Besy, 1871-1872 (English translation, 1913)

Type of work: Novel

In the troubled world of mid-nineteenth century Russia, a group of characters find that their interest in nihilism leads to disaster.

The Possessed is the most topical of Dostoevski's novels and stories. During the 1860's, the radical fringe of the Russian intelligentsia attempted to implant the ideology known as "nihilism" into the general revolutionary fervor caused by the recent abolition of serfdom. Nihilism (from the Latin nihil, meaning "nothing") was concerned more with destroying societal forms and traditions than with establishing something positive. The destructive anger of this group had been the topic of several novels already published, the most important of which was Ivan Turgenev's Ottsy i deti (1862; Fathers and Sons, 1867). The Possessed, therefore, is both an attack on nihilism, with sharp caricatures of contemporary revolutionaries, and an attempt to create the great antinihilist novel. Dostoevski's most important innovation to the antinihilist novel is the structural device of having two chief characters. These two, Pyotr Verkhovensky and Nikolai Stavrogin, embody the two sides of Dostoevski's political anger, his hatred of the Russian revolutionary left, and his violent distrust of the Russian aristocracy.

In addition to his key role in this novel, Stavrogin is a foreshadowing of characters to appear in Dostoevski's last novel, The Brothers Karamazov. In The Possessed, this character is obviously another version of Raskolnikov (Crime and Punishment), but whereas Raskolnikov is a weak man without values and direction, Stavrogin has a strong character but is still without values and goals. Through him, Dostoevski pictures the consequences of atheism, especially those destructive consequences particularly suffered by the strong and intelligent. Such persons begin in a vague moral drift, progress to a reliance on individual goals, develop from this a self-centeredness, and eventually come to a cosmic self-indulgence that forever separates the individual from moorings of universal truth, the only kind of truth that would bring meaning and significance to life. In his confession, Stavrogin reveals the obsession with which all amoral individuals are possessed, the need to punish themselves. He had considered shooting himself but decides instead to marry a completely unsuitable woman as a way of making his suffering last longer. Dostoevski's point is that masochism is the inevitable result of atheism, because atheism contains no transcendent value. That, then, means indifference, tedium, and ultimate self-annihilation.

Beyond the embodiment of individual, spiritual masochism, Stavrogin represents the social masochism of nihilism. He joins with the revolutionaries, those possessed with fanatical ideas, a possession compared by Dostoevski to the devils that drive the swine over the cliff in the New Testament. Stavrogin and the revolutionaries disrupt a provincial town with a series of spectacular scandals, but, in the end, Stavrogin finds that he is beyond caring about even the most wildly destructive of the radicals' plans. He has no spiritual center and can in the blink of an eye annihilate in his mind his interest in nihilism. That, then, is the basic flaw in the revolutionaries' doctrine: Its indifference to positive values is the seed of its own destruction. Nihilism cannot believe in anything, especially itself. It can only annihilate everything, including itself.

Pyotr Verkhovensky might be seen as the sadistic complement to Stavrogin's masochism. The son of a faded provincial liberal, Verkhovensky arrives in his family's town with grandiose plans for a revolution. He has a kind of genial charisma, and the radical group (formerly led by his father) quickly follows his lead. Their mean-spiritedness results in ugly incidents, such as the desecration of an icon and the setting of fires. When a member of the group decides to leave as a result of a change of mind, Verkhovensky maneuvers the others into murdering him, after which he flees, leaving the rest to suffer the consequences.

Verkhovensky is modeled on the self-righteous dreamers who had infected Russian politics in Dostoevski's youth and who had been indicted thoroughly in Fathers and Sons. The significance of this portrait is that Verkhovensky is more than an example of Dostoevski's ability to create political satire. Verkhovensky is the culmination of Dostoevski's treatment of the interrelations of politics and religion, an embodiment of the idea that no social or political progress can be made without individual moral and spiritual regeneration. In using the disintegration of Verkhovensky's active participation in his home town to show how the political ideals of the Russian left are bankrupt, Dostoevski indicates that the real problem lies in the spiritual emptiness of the revolutionaries themselves.

Just as there are two main characters in the novel, so there are two stories. One is about the few days in August during which nasty events in a provincial town take place. The other is the past action of all the characters who people the present moment in that provincial town. There is a constant interplay of these stories, and events from one expand the meaning of the other. It is a very unique, complex, and artistically satisfying structural device and, along with the two-main-character strategy, makes The Possessed one of Dostoevski's greatest creations.

THE BROTHERS KARAMAZOV

First published: Bratya Karamazovy, 1879-1880 (English translation, 1912)

Type of work: Novel

The sons of an irresponsible provincial businessman return home and become involved in a complex series of events leading to tragedy and the family's destruction.

Like Crime and Punishment, The Brothers Karamazov revolves around a murder. Fyodor Karamazov, a corrupt provincial landowner and businessman, has fathered four sons: Dmitri, an army officer, by his first wife; Ivan, a teacher and scholar, by his second wife; Alyosha, a monk in training, also by his second wife; and Smerdyakov, an epileptic servant in his household and his illegitimate child by a retarded local girl. Fyodor is murdered by Smerdyakov, but Dmitri's freewheeling anger and violence make him the suspect. After his arrest, a spectacular trial is held. The prosecution builds a solid case, and Dmitri is found guilty and sent to Siberia. Ivan learns that Smerdyakov is the real murderer, but, since nothing can be proved, Dmitri must suffer the consequences of the deed to the end. Ivan has a nervous breakdown, Smerdyakov commits suicide, and Alyosha goes to Siberia to offer what comfort he can to his brother.

The four brothers are symbolic of the basic causes of human spiritual isolation. Dmitri is a deeply sensual person, constantly involved in physical pleasures such as drink, sexual seduction, and material comfort; yet he is aware that his physical excesses are a grave weakness. Ivan is a self-aware intellectual whose arrogance isolates him from meaningful contact with common people. Alyosha has a narrow catechistic faith that imprisons him within the walls of religious naïveté. Smerdyakov represents the distorted drives of the classic passive manipulator. Gross sensuality, proud intellectualism, narrow religiosity, and scapegoating irresponsibility infect the entire series of relationships, not only between the brothers but also between them and the other characters, as well. The weaknesses of the brothers are projected as the fourfold nature of fallen humankind, the representation of spiritual failure and the legacy of Original Sin.

It is in the episode called “The Grand Inquisitor” that Dostoevski’s philosophy of sin and redemption is distilled. Ivan tells the story to Alyosha in order to explain why he is so troubled by his inability to grasp the essence of religion intellectually. Set in sixteenth century Spain, the narrative portrays Christ’s return to earth at a time when faith had been nearly eradicated by the Catholic Inquisition. Christ comforts the enemies of the Church, who are being burned at the stake, gives sight to the blind, weeps with those who mourn, and raises the dead. All who see Him know who He is. The Grand Inquisitor also recognizes Him and has Him arrested for performing acts contrary to the procedures of the Church. One evening, the old Inquisitor visits Christ in His vile prison in order to explain to Him why He must be burned at the stake. Christ must die, the old man insists, because His return would ruin the Church’s centuries-old attempt to save humankind. Christ committed a grave error in rejecting Satan’s three temptations in the wilderness, because those three temptations strike at the core of human weakness: Their eradication through Christ’s power would mean human freedom, something that all of history proves is the root of disaster. Had Christ’s example empowered human beings to happiness through freedom, the Church’s work would be in vain. In any case, there is no evidence that humanity can handle freedom, so the Church, out of love for all people, establishes rules and indices to enslave them. In this way, the problems created by impossible freedom can be avoided. During this explanation, Christ slowly rises to His feet and finally kisses the old man gently. Deeply moved but clinging to his doctrine, the Grand Inquisitor warns Christ never to return and then releases Him.

This episode ties together the entire novel and shows The Brothers Karamazov to be a drama of the irony of the soul’s choice. Mortality is defined by the necessity of choosing good over evil and creating freedom with those choices; yet such freedom is incompatible with human nature. Human beings might choose only the right through authority and spiritual coercion, and these motivations are the opposite of the example of Christ. The problem is that Christ Himself was perfect; that is, He embodied freedom and wanted it for all people. People, however, are not perfect and are not capable of disinterested righteousness, and that is why human beings will never choose freedom. The Grand Inquisitor’s explanation of the world’s future gives a vision of the problem: Human beings will whine and rebel until the age of reason and science brings about so much confusion and disturbance that they will begin to destroy each other. The very weakest will be left, and they will beg the Grand Inquisitor and his institutional religion to make their decisions for them. They will then be “happy” because they will be allowed no moral responsibility. The world will eventually be like a stern parent with many “happy” babies waiting to be coddled.

SUMMARY

The novels and stories of Fyodor Dostoevski are explorations of human nature and the nature of the religious experience. His vision is ambivalent, verging on the cynically pessimistic and burdened with the demons of human weakness. Yet in the conflating design of their characterization and plot structures, the works provide a rich poetic texture of compelling truth about humankind’s personal and religious values. His thought is radical and prophetic, and his art is confrontational. His novels are less an examination of religious ideology than a discernment of spirituality. Dostoevski asserts that life and art are meaningful. The nature of that meaning, however, is troubling, fraught with danger, and necessary to grasp.

Larry H. Peer

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Dvoynik, 1846 (The Double, 1917)

Bednye lyudi, 1846 (Poor Folk, 1887)

Netochka Nezvanova, 1849 (English translation, 1920)

Unizhennye i oskorblyonnye, 1861 (Injury and Insult, 1886; also known as The Insulted and Injured)
Zapiski iz myortvogo doma, 1861-1862 (Buried Alive: Or, Ten Years of Penal Servitude in Siberia, 1881; better known as The House of the Dead)
Zapiski iz podpolya, 1864 (novella; Letters from the Underworld, 1913; better known as Notes from the Underground)
Igrok, 1866 (The Gambler, 1887)
Prestupleniye i nakazaniye, 1866 (Crime and Punishment, 1886)
Idiot, 1868 (The Idiot, 1887)
Vechny muzh, 1870 (The Permanent Husband, 1888; also known as The Eternal Husband)
Besy, 1871-1872 (The Possessed, 1913; also known as The Devils)
Podrostok, 1875 (A Raw Youth, 1916)
Bratya Karamazovy, 1879-1880 (The Brothers Karamazov, 1912)
The Novels, 1912 (12 volumes)

SHORT FICTION:

Sochineniya, 1860 (2 volumes)
Polnoye sobraniye sochineniy, 1865-1870 (4 volumes)
Povesti i rasskazy, 1882
The Gambler, and Other Stories, 1914
A Christmas Tree and a Wedding, and an Honest Thief, 1917
White Nights, and Other Stories, 1918
An Honest Thief, and Other Stories, 1919
The Short Novels of Dostoevsky, 1945

NONFICTION:

"Zimniye zametki o letnikh vpechatleniyakh," 1863 ("Winter Notes on Summer Impressions," 1955)
Dnevnik pisatelya, 1876-1887, 1880-1881 (2 volumes; partial translation Pages from the Journal of an Author, 1916; complete translation The Diary of a Writer, 1949)
Pisma, 1928-1959 (4 volumes)
Iz arkhiva F. M. Dostoyevskogo: "Prestupleniye i nakazaniye," 1931 (The Notebooks for "Crime and Punishment," 1967)
Iz arkhiva F. M. Dostoyevskogo: "Idiot," 1931 (The Notebooks for "The Idiot," 1967)
F. M. Dostoyevsky: Materialy i issledovaniya, 1935 (The Notebooks for "The Brothers Karamazov," 1971)
Zapisnyye tetradi F. M. Dostoyevskogo, 1935 (The Notebooks for "The Possessed," 1968)
Dostoevsky's Occasional Writings, 1963
F. M. Dostoyevsky v rabote nad romanom "Podrostok," 1965 (The Notebooks for "A Raw Youth," 1969)
Neizdannyy Dostoyevsky: Zapisnyye knizhki i tetradi 1860-1881, 1971 (3 volumes; The Unpublished Dostoevsky: Diaries and Notebooks, 1860-1881, 1973-1976)
F. M. Dostoyevsky ob iskusstve, 1973
Selected Letters of Fyodor Dostoevsky, 1987

TRANSLATION:

Yevgeniya Grande, 1844 (of Honoré de Balzac's novel Eugénie Grandet)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Why is it possible to have a better understanding of Fyodor Dostoevski's psychological novels today than could readers of his time?
- Present evidence that Notes from the Underground is a "literary archetype."
- Explain whether or not Dostoevski's literary punishments fit the crimes.
- Does a character like Alyosha in The Brothers Karamazov verify that Dostoevski can demonstrate redeeming features in human nature?
- Is Dostoevski's opposition to atheism as an essential basis for immorality convincing?
- To what extent does Dostoevski show his major characters overcoming criminal temptations?

MISCELLANEOUS:

Polnoe sobranie sochinenii v tridsati tomakh, 1972-1990 (30 volumes)

About the Author

Bloom, Harold, ed. Fyodor Dostoevsky. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2005.

Buzina, Tatyana. Dostoevsky and Social and Metaphysical Freedom. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.

Grossmann, Leonid. Dostoevsky. London: Allen Lane, 1974.

Leatherbarrow, W.J. A Devil's Vaudeville: The Demonic in Dostoevsky's Major Fiction. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2005.

_____. Feodor Dostoevsky. Boston: Twayne, 1981.

_____, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Dostoevskii. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Martinsen, Deborah A. Surprised by Shame: Dostoevsky's Liars and Narrative Exposure. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 2003.

Mochulsky, Konstantin. Dostoevsky: His Life and Work. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1967.

Peace, Richard. Dostoevsky: An Examination of the Major Novels. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1971.

Wellek, René, ed. Dostoevsky: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1962.

Library of Congress

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE

Born: Edinburgh, Scotland
May 22, 1859

Died: Crowborough, East Sussex, England
July 7, 1930

Doyle created one of the first and most popular of fictional detectives—Sherlock Holmes.

BIOGRAPHY

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (doyuhl) was born on May 22, 1859, into an artistic Catholic family living in Edinburgh, Scotland, and he grew up there. His father, Charles, was a public servant and artist who illustrated the first edition of A Study in Scarlet (1887 serial; 1888, book), the first tale of Sherlock Holmes. Charles suffered from mental disease and alcoholism and was institutionalized from 1879 until his death in 1893. Arthur's mother, Mary Foley Doyle, reared seven children, of whom Arthur was the fourth. She oversaw Arthur's education, sending him to Jesuit schools at Stoneyhurst and at Feldkirch, Austria, despite the family's comparative poverty, and encouraging him to study medicine at the University of Edinburgh.

Doyle began his writing career soon after beginning medical study, publishing his first story, "The Mystery of Sasassa Valley," in 1879. At the university, he met two professors who became models for his most famous literary creations. Dr. Joseph Bell was the prototype for Sherlock Holmes; William Rutherford became the model for Professor Challenger of The Lost World (1912).

Before finishing his medical schooling, Doyle sought adventure, serving as ship's surgeon on two voyages. After completing his M.D. in 1885, he married Louise Hawkins. They had two children, Mary Louise and Alleyne Kingsley. A year after his marriage, he finished A Study in Scarlet.

Doyle thought of himself mainly as a historical novelist in the mode of Sir Walter Scott, whom he admired, but the public showed more interest in Sherlock Holmes. At the request of Lippincott's Magazine, Doyle produced The Sign of Four (1890). Relinquishing his medical practice in 1891, he turned to writing for his living. He then wrote a series of Holmes stories for The Strand, beginning with "A Scandal in Bohemia." These were so popular that the editors asked for more. Before he had finished twelve of them, collected in The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1892), he was tired of his characters and told his mother—who thought it a mistake—that he intended to kill Holmes in the last tale. He waited, however, until the next series, collected as The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1894), to have Holmes die, in "The Adventure of the Final Problem." Having taken Louise to Switzerland after discovering her tuberculosis, Doyle was away from London when readers of The Strand were shocked by Holmes's death. Despite the sorrow and anger of Holmes's fans, Doyle published no more Holmes stories until The Hound of the Baskervilles (1901-1902, serial; 1902, book).

Between 1893 and 1901, Doyle continued writing popular stories for The Strand, the best about Étienne Gérard, a comic soldier in Napoleon I's army. He also made a successful reading tour of the United States, sailed up the Nile River with Louise, and visited the Sudan as a war correspondent. Having been convinced that the climate of Surrey was good for tuberculosis patients, Doyle and Louise settled there in 1896. In 1897, he met and fell in love with Jean Leckie, then twenty-four. With typical loyalty and honor, Doyle maintained a platonic relationship with her until after Louise's death. He married Jean in 1907, and they had three children, Denis, Adrian, and Lena Jean.

Before the outbreak of the Boer War in 1899, Doyle published story collections, novels, poetry, and drama. Too old for combat, he served under terrible conditions and without pay as a medical officer. His war experiences led to two books. In the second, The War in South Africa: Its Cause and Conduct (1902), he defended the British role in the war. For this service, he was knighted in 1902.

After running unsuccessfully for Parliament in 1900, Doyle visited Dartmoor. There he heard legends that became the inspiration for The Hound of the Baskervilles. While this novel was appearing in The Strand, William Gillette's play Sherlock Holmes (1899) opened successfully in London, and American and British publishers offered Doyle about $7,500 per story to write more. He revived Holmes in "The Adventure of the Empty House" and continued to produce Holmes stories sporadically for the rest of his life.

Energetic, inquisitive, and ambitious, Doyle sought to influence public opinion in many ways during the last years of his life. He spoke out on political issues, such as Irish home rule, ran again for Parliament, participated in an Anglo-German auto race, traveled widely in Europe and America, and was a war correspondent during World War I. In 1916, he became convinced that he had received a spirit message from the dead and proceeded to become a leader of the spiritualist movement. He wrote several books on spiritualism, including The History of Spiritualism (1926).

His best-remembered accomplishment in the last third of his life is the creation of Professor Challenger, the hero of The Lost World, a passionate scientist eager to explore unknown worlds. Like Holmes, Challenger eventually became a film hero. The Lost World also provided an outline for the classic film King Kong (1933).

Doyle fell ill with heart disease in 1929 and died on July 7, 1930, at his home, Windlesham, in Crowborough, East Sussex, England, where he is buried.

ANALYSIS

Doyle tended to think of his Sherlock Holmes stories as popular fiction, written primarily to maintain his income while he worked on more important works, such as The White Company (1891). Though this historical novel in a medieval setting is thought to be one of his best books, and though his science-fiction novels about Professor Challenger are also well respected, the tales of Sherlock Holmes are still considered Doyle's best and most memorable work.

In Holmes and Dr. John Watson, Doyle created well-rounded, interesting characters. Holmes is the utter rationalist, understanding emotions almost exclusively as factors in the solution of interesting intellectual problems. He solves crimes by using keen observation, by building hypotheses based on established facts, and by testing those hypotheses. He is often amusing and entertaining when he and Watson play their game of inferring a character's habits or recent activities from the observation of details about their first appearance or possessions, such as an accidentally lost cane. Holmes is always superior at finding the correct way to arrange the clues into a meaningful order. Watson, though quite competent, is a more ordinary man, a doctor who eventually marries and lives a prosaic life, except when he is with Holmes on a case. Then his life blossoms into adventure, and his loyalty, medical knowledge, physical strength, and energy serve Holmes well. Holmes is a creative genius, using a "scientific method" in an artistic manner to produce masterpieces of detection. Watson, as Holmes's Boswell, or biographer, turns these masterpieces into what Holmes often describes as trivial romances, more entertaining than instructive.

One factor that contributes to the enduring popularity of these tales is that readers have found the stories instructive as well as entertaining. Within the conventions of the classic detective story, Doyle tells stories that shed light upon interesting complexities of British Victorian society and upon some enduring social themes.

The classic detective story may be defined as taking place in a world where order is normal. In this way, it is distinct from the hard-boiled detective story, where disorder is the norm. The classic detective becomes necessary when criminals introduce disorder, threatening social and familial stability. In The Hound of the Baskervilles, a diabolical murderer attempts to kill the heirs of an estate to legitimize his more distant claim. In the process, he not only creates disorder in his family and among his immediate victims but also violates his own marriage and disrupts the good work in the community of the recently restored Baskerville family wealth. Furthermore, by making use of the old superstition of a vengeful hellhound that pursues the Baskerville heirs, the murderer undercuts the foundation of rationality upon which communal order rests. Critics have pointed out that Stapleton, the murderer, threatens to turn the whole community into an analog of the Grimpen Mire, an important symbolic setting of the novella, where people and animals can be lost and then sucked into the dangerous muddy pools at the slightest misstep.

Holmes's function as a detective of rationality is to foil this villain and thereby protect society from disintegration. In contrast, a hard-boiled detective, such as Raymond Chandler's Philip Marlowe in The Big Sleep (1939), works in a corrupt society to protect the innocent from its dangers, to salvage some order from the dominant chaos. The classic detective relies primarily upon mental work to sort out clues and discover the sources of disorder, while the hard-boiled detective relies more on violence to defend innocent victims. While the most common crime motive in the classic detective story is greed, the more common motive in hard-boiled detective fiction is power. Doyle may come closest to hard-boiled fiction in "The Adventure of the Final Problem" and "The Adventure of the Empty House," where Holmes encounters the organized crime of Professor Moriarty, a criminal for whom power and domination are more important than wealth.

Doyle's themes tend to concern family relations and their extensions into social and political relations. A number of these stories deal with corrupted relations between adults and children or between men and women, in which the physically weaker are endangered and abused because of their disadvantaged social position. Taken together, these tales provide not only exciting and suspenseful reading but also vivid portraits of Victorian life and insightful analyses of human nature and social life.

"A SCANDAL IN BOHEMIA"

First published: 1891 (collected in The Complete Sherlock Holmes, 2003)

Type of work: Short story

Sherlock Holmes attempts to save the king of Bohemia from a scandal that would prevent his projected marriage.

As "A Scandal in Bohemia" begins, it is March, 1888. The recently married Dr. John Watson happens by his old bachelor quarters at 221B Baker Street and finds Sherlock Holmes pacing the floor in the brilliantly lit rooms. Since Watson has married and settled into domestic tranquillity, Holmes, for whom the life of the emotions would be grit in his machinery, has been alternating between cocaine-induced dreams and his fiercely energetic solutions of mysteries abandoned by the official police. On this evening, Holmes takes an unusual assignment, unlike those of the two previously published cases, A Study in Scarlet and The Sign of Four. Indeed, Watson indicates that this is the first case in which Holmes fails, and his defeat comes at the hands of a woman, Irene Adler, an American singer, actress, and adventurer "of dubious and questionable memory," now deceased.

It may be because this is one of the earlier Holmes tales that it deviates so interestingly from the pattern of solution that later came to dominate these stories. This story strikingly resembles its great predecessor, Edgar Allan Poe's "The Purloined Letter," in which Auguste Dupin determines the hiding place of a woman who is apparently of the French royal family and then recovers a letter being used to blackmail her. Like Dupin in "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," Holmes surprises his friend early in the story with an accurate account of Watson's recent activities based on details about the condition of his shoes.

Holmes's task is to locate and recover a photograph that shows Adler and the king of Bohemia together. Adler, a spurned lover, has threatened to deliver the photograph to Princess Clotilde, the king's intended, on the day their engagement is announced. Clotilde and her family would object so strongly to this proof of a previous sexual affair that the marriage would be canceled, disrupting international relations.

Holmes fairly easily determines that Adler, because she is an intelligent woman, would hide the photograph in her own home, but cleverly enough that ordinary burglars—who have already made two attempts—would not find it. In disguise, he observes her home and, by accident, witnesses her wedding to a lawyer. This event in itself might end her threat to the king, but Holmes wishes to make sure. He plots successfully to force her to show him the letter's hiding place. While assisting in this trick, Watson becomes less sure that he and Holmes are right to violate the privacy of the kind and beautiful Adler, even to help the king.

Holmes and Watson have deliberately set out to break the law by stealing the photograph. Only as the story closes do they both realize that they have taken the side of a powerful man who has won Adler's love and then cast her aside for reasons of policy. Adler sees through Holmes's trick, flees with her husband and the photograph, and leaves behind a note for Holmes, saying she will not use the photograph to harm the king unless he threatens her further. She thus earns Holmes and Watson's admiration, and from then on Holmes refers to her as "the woman" and ceases to speak deprecatingly of women's intelligence. At the same time, the king earns their contempt for his failure to rise above the conventional demands of his rank to make such a magnificent woman his queen.

This story proves atypical in the Sherlock Holmes series because the detective is called upon to break the law in order to maintain a questionable idea of order. Holmes's love of mystery and his lack of respect for women help to draw him into this temptation, but his understanding of emotional values, despite his apparent freedom from the softer emotions, leads him to regret what he intended and to admire the woman whom he mistook for a criminal.

"THE ADVENTURE OF THE SPECKLED BAND"

First published: 1892 (collected in The Complete Sherlock Holmes, 2003)

Type of work: Short story

Holmes aids a woman whose twin sister has died mysteriously upon the eve of her marriage and who fears that her stepfather may intend the same fate for her.

"The Adventure of the Speckled Band" is probably the most famous of Sherlock Holmes's cases, not only because of its diabolical plot about a stepfather preventing his twin daughters from marrying and thereby diminishing his income from his deceased wife's estate, but also because it so perfectly realizes the pattern of detection that became Holmes's trademark. Watson opens the story with the information that he has been freed to tell this story by the premature death of the client, Helen Stoner.

Helen comes to Holmes and Watson in April, 1883, terrified that she may meet the same fate as her sister, who died mysteriously two years earlier. Encouraged and reassured by Holmes, she recounts the reasons for her fears. Because of repairs on the house, she has had to move into the bedroom used by her sister when she died and has heard a low whistle in the night, just as her sister did on several nights before her death. Her sister died soon after announcing her engagement to be married, and Helen is now also engaged to marry. Furthermore, the stepfather, Dr. Grimesby Roylott of the Stoke Moran estate in Surrey, is well known as a violent and temperamental giant who brooks no interference with his will. Having married their mother in India, where his medical practice was successful until he murdered his Indian butler, he returned to England, where his wife died in a railway accident. He then retired with his young stepdaughters into virtual seclusion at Stoke Moran, where he gives some of his time to collecting exotic animals, such as a baboon and a cheetah, said to come from India, which he allows to roam free on his grounds. He also associates with bands of gypsies that he allows to camp on his grounds.

Summarized, these details about Roylott's life seem rather silly, but they work fairly effectively to account for Holmes's initial failure to discover how Helen's sister died and, therefore, what threat Helen must fear. This body of detail allows Holmes to develop two theories to explain the death, though he claims to have at least seven. The incorrect theory assumes that Roylott, with his clear motive for preventing his daughters from marrying, employs the gypsies by somehow making it possible for them to enter the woman's room at night and frighten her to death in some way. This theory would explain why there are no signs of violence on her body; why the police have found no way of entering her room once she locked herself in, away from cheetahs and baboons, each night; and why her mysterious last words to Helen were about a speckled band. When Holmes examines the scene, however, he makes several other pertinent discoveries, such as the small opening at the ceiling between the woman's room and Dr. Roylott's room, that the bell rope that hangs down onto the bed is not functional, and that the bed is fastened to the floor and cannot be shifted. These and other details make the case clear to Holmes, but he must, of course, test it.

One of the great scenes in the Holmes stories is the night that Watson and the detective spend in the absolutely dark room, waiting for something to happen. Only when the speckled band appears and reveals itself to be a poisonous snake do the two men fully realize that the evil doctor has trained an Indian swamp adder to descend through the opening, down the bell rope and onto the bed, and return. Holmes, now aware of what was supposed to happen, drives the dangerous snake back upon the doctor, catching the murderer in his own trap.

Though there are many interesting variations, this general pattern is usually recognized as the form of the classic Holmes story. A client gives the detective the unconnected clues that form a mystery. The detective invents structures that make sense of these clues and determines which one is correct. Usually this requires a personal inspection of the crime scene and some other research that uncovers unnoticed clues. The detective reaches a final conclusion by means of reasoning about this information, produces and tests the solution, and reveals the criminal. Though this process usually involves some action and danger, the central activity of the detective is solving the puzzle, and the reader's main pleasure is in attempting to reach the answer before or along with the detective. That is the general form one expects to encounter in the classical detective stories of such masters of the form as Dorothy L. Sayers and Agatha Christie.

This story also deals with Doyle's typical themes. Often, his client turns out to be a young woman who is, in some way, the victim of a powerful male—a relative, an employer, or a former suitor. As is often the case, the motive here is to obtain money and property. All the Holmes stories emphasize the rationality of causes for mysterious events. This story especially, but not uniquely, underlines Holmes's wisdom. Like his famous contemporary, Sigmund Freud, Holmes is willing to listen to the problems of a nervous young woman, when even her future husband responds only with "soothing answers and averted eyes." Helen addresses Holmes as one who "can see deeply into the manifold wickedness of the human heart."

That, however, is not true. Holmes is usually characterized as lacking insight into emotions beyond the common motives for crime. What he really excels at is developing and testing logical connections between seemingly unconnected events. Perhaps this apparent contradiction may be explained by Watson's assertion at the opening of the story that Holmes's rapid deductions were "swift as intuitions," suggesting that his logic is so fine an art that it may look like intuition or may mimic deep insight into the wickedness of the human heart.

“THE ADVENTURE OF THE FINAL PROBLEM”

First published: 1893 (collected in Complete Sherlock Holmes, 2003)

Type of work: Short story

Having trapped the evil master criminal, Professor Moriarty, Holmes tries but fails to evade Moriarty's attempts to kill the detective before being arrested.

In December, 1893, in the British magazine The Strand and the American magazine McClure's, readers were shocked to see Dr. Watson's melancholy account of the death of Holmes, who, according to Watson, was murdered two years earlier by Professor Moriarty, the Napoleon of crime. In writing “The Adventure of the Final Problem” and by introducing a new character of mythic proportions in Moriarty, however, Doyle probably effectively ensured that public pressure for more tales would increase rather than diminish.

“The Adventure of the Final Problem” is a tale not of detection but of rivalry and pursuit. Holmes comes to Watson's home in the night, when by good fortune Mrs. Watson is away on a visit and Watson is free to travel with Holmes to the Continent to escape Moriarty. Moriarty is one of the first great leaders of organized crime in fiction. Doyle presents him as in every way Holmes's equal, except that Moriarty has inherited criminal tendencies that have made him diabolical. Moriarty has organized a crime network that is like a giant spider's web, with the professor as the spider at its center: “He is the organizer of half that is evil and of nearly all that is undetected in this great city.” To counter the professor's web, Holmes has helped the police to construct a net in which those in Moriarty's gang, including the great spider himself, will be caught. He has not, however, been able to carry out this project without Moriarty's knowledge. On the day Holmes visits Watson, Moriarty has come to Holmes's rooms and promised that if Holmes destroys him, the professor will take Holmes with him. Holmes has refused to be intimidated and, as a result, has endured a series of murder attempts during the day.

Holmes requests Watson's company for a trip to Switzerland, the main purpose of which is to evade Moriarty until the arrests occur, which for unexplained reasons requires three days of waiting. Despite their elaborate measures, Moriarty is able to follow them. When his gang is arrested, Moriarty himself is not caught. The professor overtakes Holmes at the Reichenbach Falls in the Swiss Alps. When Watson returns to the scene he has been fooled into leaving, all the remaining evidence indicates that Holmes and Moriarty, locked in a final struggle, fell into the falls, from which their bodies cannot be recovered.

Repeatedly in this story, Holmes reflects to Watson that his career has reached a peak and, therefore, that he is willing to accept even death if this proves to be the only way to rid England of Moriarty. This fatalistic mood proves prophetic when it appears the two have died in an equal and apparently irresolvable struggle of wit and skill.

That Doyle had some reservations about killing his hero seems clear. While having the bodies lost may seem to annihilate Holmes utterly, it leaves quite open the possibility that Doyle later exploited: that Holmes, in fact, did not die but went underground to avoid the dangers of Moriarty's remaining friends. In “The Adventure of the Empty House,” Holmes returns from three years of retreat to apprehend Moriarty's most dangerous remaining agents, among them Colonel Sebastian Moran. Of course, Doyle might have avoided reviving Holmes by “discovering” more of the many cases he solved before his death, as he did when he published The Hound of the Baskervilles. Public pleasure at Holmes's “resurrection” greatly enhanced the detective's popularity and ensured a devoted readership for the many more tales Doyle wrote.

“THE RING OF THOTH”

First published: 1890 (collected in The Captain of Polestar, and Other Tales, 1890)

Type of work: Short story

In this supernatural fantasy, an Egyptologist stumbles upon a four-thousand-year-old man, who tells him the story of how he came to live so long.

While Doyle is best known for his tales of Sherlock Holmes, he wrote a variety of other kinds of fiction, much of which is vigorous and entertaining. In interesting contrast to the Holmes stories, with their insistence upon rational explanation and natural order, are his stories of the supernatural. At the end of “Lot No. 249,” one of his best supernatural tales, the narrator says, “But the wisdom of men is small, and the ways of Nature are strange, and who shall put a bound to the dark things which may be found by those who seek for them?” Doyle’s tales of the supernatural also help to illustrate the wit and humor that, in fact, show up in many of his stories, for in these tales he often maintains an ironic narrative tone.

In “The Ring of Thoth,” irony is directed at the central character, Mr. John Vansittart Smith, a fellow of the Royal Society. Though Smith is a highly talented scientist, he is also represented as a fickle fellow. The narrator opens the story with an extended metaphor of courtship. Smith “flirts” with zoology, chemistry, and Oriental studies, almost “marrying” each, but finally is “caught” by Egyptology. Then the metaphor turns real: “So struck was Mr. Smith that he straightway married an Egyptological young lady who had written upon the sixth dynasty, and having thus secured a sound base of operations he set himself to collect materials for a work which should unite the research of Lepsius and the ingenuity of Champollion.” The humor continues as Smith journeys to Paris to study materials at the Louvre, where the narrator describes him as looking like a comic bird while he studies. When a pair of English tourists make disparaging comments about an attendant’s appearance, Smith believes they are talking about him, making fun of his lack of physical beauty. Discovering his error, Smith notices that the attendant really does look like an authentic ancient Egyptian.

Smith’s curiosity is aroused, but when questioned, the attendant insists he is French. The ridiculous leads to the wondrous when, in the course of studying ancient documents, Smith falls asleep and remains unnoticed behind a door. He awakens in the early morning to discover the mysterious attendant unwrapping the mummy of a beautiful young girl, for whom the attendant expresses great affection. Then, in the course of searching among a collection of rings, the attendant spills some liquid and, in wiping it up, discovers Smith. As a result of this humorous series of accidents, Smith learns the story of Sosra.

Sosra, the attendant, is really an ancient Egyptian who developed an elixir of life. He and his best friend, Parmes, the priest of Thoth, drank it and became immortal. Then they both fell in love with Princess Atma, who loved Sosra; she soon died of a plague, having been hesitant about taking the elixir herself. Parmes then discovered an antidote for the elixir, making it possible for him to die and join Atma in the afterlife, but he hid it from Sosra so that he and Atma would be separated forever. After four thousand years of searching, Sosra has finally found the Ring of Thoth, which contains the antidote. He tells Smith his story and, along the way, makes it clear that Smith knows little of value about ancient Egyptian culture, even though he is one of the best modern Egyptologists. Then he lets Smith out of the Louvre and goes to join his beloved.

This amusing and entertaining tale of the supernatural contrasts the fickle modern scientist with the dedicated ancient scientist, who by sixteen had mastered his craft and who remained loyal to his first love for four millennia. On the other hand, Sosra’s story contains a warning for Smith, who has given way to a passion for ancient knowledge that may lead him along a path parallel to Sosra’s. The tale also casts an ironic light on the modern rationalist’s faith that one can understand the past or master any area of knowledge, thus providing an implicit, though perhaps not very serious, critique of the world view espoused by Sherlock Holmes.

SUMMARY

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle’s biographers agree in describing him as typical of the late Victorian era.

He remained confident throughout his life of the soundness of his own moral vision and in the basic goodness of British morality. As a public personage, he repeatedly took the lead, both in praising British principles and in criticizing particular policies. He is credited with helping to modernize British defense between the Boer War and World War I, especially the defensive gear of common soldiers. He twice played detective himself, investigating cases of people unjustly condemned to prison. One of these, the Edalji case in 1906, contributed to establishing a court of criminal appeal in 1907. Even his support of spiritualism was a public crusade to effect the spiritual transformation of a nation he feared was in decline.

sade to effect the spiritual transformation of a nation he feared was in decline.

While his public services were many, Doyle will continue to be remembered mainly for the Sherlock Holmes stories. Holmes and Watson are indelible fixtures of Western culture, encountered in virtually every popular medium. These stories have influenced every important writer in the detective genre, from traditionalists, such as Agatha Christie, Dorothy L. Sayers, and Ellery Queen, to hard-boiled writers, such as Raymond Chandler, Ross Macdonald, and P. D. James.

Terry Heller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

A Study in Scarlet, 1887 (serial), 1888 (book)
The Mystery of Cloomber, 1888
The Firm of Girdlestone, 1889
Micah Clarke, 1889
The Sign of Four, 1890 (first pb. as The Sign of the Four)
Beyond the City, 1891
The White Company, 1891
The Doings of Raffles Haw, 1891
The Great Shadow, 1892
The Refugees, 1893
The Parasite, 1894
The Surgeon of Gaster Fell, 1895
The Stark Munro Letters, 1895
Rodney Stone, 1896
The Tragedy of the Koroska, 1897 (also as A Desert Drama)
Uncle Bernac, 1897
A Duet, with an Occasional Chorus, 1899 (revised 1910)
The Hound of the Baskervilles, 1901-1902 (serial), 1902 (book)
Sir Nigel, 1905-1906 (serial), 1906 (book)
The Lost World, 1912
The Poison Belt, 1913
The Valley of Fear, 1914-1915 (serial), 1915 (book)
The Land of Mist, 1926

SHORT FICTION:

Mysteries and Adventures, 1889 (also as The Gully of Bluemansdyke, and Other Stories)
The Captain of Polestar, and Other Tales, 1890
The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, 1892

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What evidence suggests that as a writer Sir Arthur Conan Doyle was not obsessed by, or confined to, detective fiction?
- What character traits of Dr. Watson make him an ideal partner for Sherlock Holmes?
- There are a number of similarities between Doyle's detective stories and those of Edgar Allan Poe. What are the most striking dissimilarities?
- What traits of Doyle's detective fiction survive among the more traditional sleuths in modern detective fiction?
- Have changes in the technology and resources of detection curtailed modern readers' capacity to enjoy the Sherlock Holmes stories?

My Friend the Murderer, and Other Mysteries and Adventures, 1893
The Great Keinplatz Experiment, and Other Stories, 1894
The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes, 1894
Round the Red Lamp: Being Fact and Fancies of Medical Life, 1894
The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard, 1896
The Man from Archangel, and Other Stories, 1898
The Green Flag, and Other Stories of War and Sport, 1900
The Adventures of Gerard, 1903
The Return of Sherlock Holmes, 1905
Round the Fire Stories, 1908
The Last Galley: Impressions and Tales, 1911
One Crowded Hour, 1911
His Last Bow, 1917
Danger!, and Other Stories, 1918
Tales of the Ring and Camp, 1922 (also as The Croxley Master, and Other Tales of the Ring and Camp)
Tales of Terror and Mystery, 1922 (also as The Black Doctor, and Other Tales of Terror and Mystery)
Tales of Twilight and the Unseen, 1922 (also as The Great Keinplatz Experiment, and Other Tales of Twilight and the Unseen)
Three of Them, 1923
The Dealings of Captain Sharkey, and Other Tales of Pirates, 1925
Last of the Legions, and Other Tales of Long Ago, 1925
The Case-Book of Sherlock Holmes, 1927
The Maracot Deep, and Other Stories, 1929
The Final Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, 1981 (revised and expanded 2001)
Uncollected Stories: The Unknown Conan Doyle, 1982

POETRY:

Songs of Action, 1898
Songs of the Road, 1911
The Guards Came Through, and Other Poems, 1919
The Poems: Collected Edition, 1922

DRAMA:

Foreign Policy, pr. 1893
Jane Annie: Or, The Good Conduct Prize, pr., pb. 1893 (with J. M. Barrie)
Waterloo, pr. 1894 (also as A Story of Waterloo)
Sherlock Holmes, pr. 1899 (with William Gillette)
Halves, pr. 1899
A Duet, pb. 1903
Brigadier Gerard, pr. 1906
The Fires of Fate, pr. 1909
The House of Temperley, pr. 1909
The Speckled Band, pr. 1910
The Pot of Caviare, pr. 1910
The Crown Diamond, pr. 1921
It's Time Something Happened, pb. 1925
Exile: A Drama of Christmas Eve, pb. 1925

NONFICTION:

The Great Boer War, 1900
The War in South Africa: Its Cause and Conduct, 1902

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle

The Case of Mr. George Edalji, 1907
Through the Magic Door, 1907
The Crime of the Congo, 1909
The Case of Oscar Slater, 1912
To Arms!, 1914
Great Britain and the Next War, 1914
In Quest of Truth, Being a Correspondence Between Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Captain H. Stansbury, 1914
The German War: Some Sidelights and Reflections, 1915
Western Wanderings, 1915
A Visit to Three Fronts, 1916
The Origin and Outbreak of the War, 1916
A Petition to the Prime Minister on Behalf of Roger Casement, 1916(?)
The British Campaign in France and Flanders, 1916-1919 (6 volumes)
The New Revelation, 1918
The Vital Message, 1919
A Debate on Spiritualism, 1920 (with Joseph McCabe)
Our Reply to the Cleric, 1920
Spiritualism and Rationalism, 1920
Fairies Photographed, 1921
The Wanderings of a Spiritualist, 1921
The Evidence for Fairies, 1921
The Coming of the Fairies, 1922
The Case for Spirit Photography, 1922 (with others)
Our American Adventure, 1923
Memories and Adventures, 1924
Our Second American Adventure, 1924
Psychic Experiences, 1925
The Early Christian Church and Modern Spiritualism, 1925
The History of Spiritualism, 1926 (2 volumes)
Pheneas Speaks: Direct Spirit Communications, 1927
A Word of Warning, 1928
What Does Spiritualism Actually Teach and Stand For?, 1928
An Open Letter to Those of My Generation, 1929
Our African Winter, 1929
The Roman Catholic Church: A Rejoinder, 1929
The Edge of the Unknown, 1930
Arthur Conan Doyle on Sherlock Holmes, 1981
Essays on Photography, 1982
Letters to the Press, 1984
Sir Arthur Conan Doyle: A Life in Letters, 2007 (Jon Lellenberg, Daniel Stashower, and Charles Foley, editors)

EDITED TEXTS:

Dreamland and Ghostland, 1886
D. D. Home: His Life and Mission, 1921 (by Mrs. Douglas Home)
The Spiritualist's Reader, 1924

TRANSLATION:

The Mystery of Joan of Arc, 1924 (Léon Denis)

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Sir Arthur Conan Doyle Reader, 2002

About the Author

- Bunson, Matthew. Encyclopedia Sherlockiana: An A-to-Z Guide to the World of the Great Detective. New York: Macmillan, 1994.
- Edwards, Owen Dudley. The Quest for Sherlock Holmes. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1983.
- Frank, Lawrence. Victorian Detective Fiction and the Nature of Evidence: The Scientific Investigations of Poe, Dickens, and Doyle. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
- Hardwick, Michael. The Complete Guide to Sherlock Holmes. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1986.
- Higham, Charles. The Adventures of Conan Doyle. New York: W. W. Norton, 1976.
- Jaffe, Jacqueline. Arthur Conan Doyle. Boston: Twayne, 1987.
- Lycett, Andrew. The Man Who Created Sherlock Holmes: The Life and Times of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. New York: Free Press, 2007.
- Pascal, Janet B. Arthur Conan Doyle: Beyond Baker Street. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- Shreffler, Philip A., ed. The Baker Street Reader. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984.

RODDY DOYLE

Born: Dublin, Ireland
May 8, 1958

Principally in his novels but also in his plays and screenplay adaptations of his novels, Doyle describes the lives and hopes of working-class north-side Dubliners in his dialogue-rich depictions of the fictional Barrytown area.

BIOGRAPHY

Roddy Doyle (doyuhl; in Irish, Ruaidhri O Duill) was born on May 8, 1958, in Kilbarrack, Dublin, Ireland, the third of four children (two daughters and two sons) of Rory Doyle, a printer, and Ita Bolger Doyle, a legal secretary. Kilbarrack is a working-class neighborhood of Dublin, approximately seven miles north of downtown. The vocations of Doyle's parents likely influenced the type and tenor of his own future life's work. As a novelist, he depends directly on the work of printers, and he actually printed and privately published the first run of his first novel, The Commitments (1987), in 1985 when he could not initially find a publisher. In addition, his mother's work for a prestigious south-side Dublin law firm likely provided young Doyle with insights into the widening gulf between the haves and have-nots in contemporary Irish culture, a theme that receives treatment in Doyle's work and life.

Doyle studied at a national school in Raheny from 1963 to 1971 and then at St. Fintan's Christian Brothers School in Sutton from 1971 to 1976. He earned his bachelor's degree in 1979 from University College, Dublin, with a double major in English and geography. He returned to his Kilbarrack neighborhood after graduation and taught at Greendale Community School from 1979 to 1993. Doyle seems to have been a passionate and popular teacher of English and geography. Students recall his complaints about the depictions of certain of their fellow Dubliners in the work of countryman James Joyce; his love of all Irish music, traditional and contemporary; and his leather jacket and jeans, which earned him the endearing name of "Punky Doyle" among some of his students.

In the early 1980's, Doyle began writing short stories and a novel during the evenings and summers in addition to his full-time teaching job. Although Doyle is clearly aware of the impressive corpus of the Irish literary tradition within which he writes, on the few occasions when he has commented on his literary influences, he has referenced mostly American and English novelists, rather than Irish writers, as the source of his ability to believe in his own identity as an author. The plain, colloquial language of novels such as Wise Blood (1952) by Flannery O'Connor, A Proper Marriage (1954) by Doris Lessing, Ragtime (1975) by E. L. Doctorow, and The World According to Garp (1978) by John Irving inspired Doyle to believe that he could render with similarly understated language the north side of Dublin.

Although Doyle seems to have had no grand plan to write a trilogy, his second and third novels continued the saga of three generations of the Rabbitte family, their relatives, and friends in the raw Barrytown neighborhoods, that he started in The Commitments. This setting allows Doyle to contextualize his narratives within all of the social ills that beset Ireland in the latter decades of the twentieth century, including unemployment and underemployment, alcohol and drug abuse, the plight of women, the plight of the family, and the coming-of-age of a new generation of young adults with diminished expectations for the future and sometimes for themselves. In The Snapper (1990), issues of alcohol abuse leading to sexual assault and unplanned pregnancy explain the title of the novel, which is contemporary Irish-English slang for a "wee bairn" of unclear paternal parentage.

The third novel of the Barrytown trilogy, The Van (1991), again shows the indefatigable Barrytown spirit, with two lifelong middle-aged friends engaging in another entrepreneurial foray, a mobile fish-and-chips van, which provides food to neighborhood residents and a livelihood for the two friends and their families. The Van was short-listed for The Man Booker Prize in 1991, the same year that Doyle, with Dick Clement and Ian LaFrenais, adapted The Commitments as a screenplay for what became a critically and commercially successful feature film. Indeed, the success of the film created a temporary cottage industry for the all-Irish cast, who performed as The Commitments in major music venues on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean for several years following the film's release.

With Paddy Clarke, Ha-Ha-Ha (1993), Doyle showed his ability to change his narrative perspective to that of a ten-year-old boy, whose eloquent, epigrammatic narration both knowingly and unknowingly describes the parallel deterioration of his parents' marriage and of the Irish social and political culture of 1968, the year in which the novel is set. Paddy Clarke, Ha-Ha-Ha won the Man Booker Prize in 1993, making Doyle the first Irish writer ever to receive the award. The novel went on to become the most commercially successful Man Booker Prize winner up to that time.

The commercial success of the film version of The Commitments, combined with the receipt of the Man Booker Prize, allowed Doyle to retire from teaching and devote his complete professional focus to writing. Doyle authored the screenplay adaptations for The Snapper (1993) and The Van (1996), both of which enjoyed critical acclaim but not as much commercial success as the film adaptation of The Commitments (1991).

The theme of physical and sexual assault of female characters is depicted through the character of Paula Spencer in The Woman Who Walked into Doors (1996). Spencer's story was continued a decade later in the novel which bears her name, Paula Spencer (2006). Although the poignancy of her plight cannot be denied, Paula, like most of Doyle's protagonists, confronts and eventually overcomes her considerable challenges. Doyle's four-part British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) teleplay, Family (1994), reprised the recurrent themes in his novels. By this time, Doyle was actively campaigning for abortion rights, women's rights, and the legalization of divorce in Ireland.

In 1989, Doyle married Belinda Moller and they had two sons, Rory, born in 1991, and Jack, born in 1992. Although Doyle remains protective of many details of his personal and family life, he has admitted in interviews that since his retirement from teaching in 1993, he generally devotes each weekday until 5 P.M. to writing, at which point he stops in order to make the family dinner with his wife.

ANALYSIS

Some Irish critics have complained that Doyle's literary corpus perpetuates negative stereotypes about Ireland, with his narratives of boozing and sometimes promiscuous and often foolhardy characters. His defenders—and there are many of them, on all continents—justify the characters' profanity and addictive behavior as accurate slices of life in an island country that has experienced periods of industrial and commercial decline. Perhaps one of the best examples of Doyle as not only a masterful novelist but also a social critic comes early in The Commitments, when Jimmy Rabbitte, Jr., is creating a locus of understanding for the wayward young Dubliners whom he is forming into his vision of a Motown-cover band. As the musicians and singers express skepticism about white kids in Dublin in the 1980's covering the music of black kids in Detroit in the 1960's, Rabbitte waxes eloquent:

Your music should be abou' where you're from an' the sort o' people yeh come from. . . .

Say it once, say it loud. I'm black an' I'm proud. . . .
The Irish are the niggers of Europe, lads. . . . An' Dubliners are the niggers of Ireland. . . . An' the northsider Dubliners are the niggers o' Dublin.
Say it loud, I'm black an' I'm proud.

Rabbitte understands a basic concept of social justice, as well as a leveling feature of music: differences of race, culture, religion, and continent fade away as dispossessed peoples understand their similar plight. Once that level of understanding and awareness has occurred, then music that describes the anguish of the human heart in conflict will resonate not only within but across cultures.

Doyle could have remained within the fictional architecture of Barrytown, just as William Faulkner created and articulated his fictional world of Yoknapatawpha County in the majority of his novels. As Doyle approached his third decade as a professional writer, however, he moved beyond Barrytown in one direction to write children's literature and in a radically different direction to write two novels focused on pathologic spousal abuse. Given his talents as a writer and his commitment to social justice in Ireland, it is likely that his future works will continue to be valued in both literary and social circles.

THE COMMITMENTS

First published: 1987

Type of work: Novel

A young Irish music devotee conceives of and manages a Motown-cover band in 1980's Dublin that shows promise but then self-destructs, a casualty of mismanaged egos and libidos.

The picaresque character of James "Jimmy" Rabbitte, Jr., manages both the group The Commitments and the novel The Commitments. Rabbitte is the mastermind of the concept of "Dublin soul" after the first wave of punk rock in the 1980's. He takes out a classified ad in the Hot Press, the alternative newspaper in Dublin, which attracts a truly motley crew of mostly young north-side Dubliners to play honest, straightforward rhythm and blues in the tradition of Motown Records, down to the white shirts and black suits for the men and simple black dinner dresses for the three Commitmentettes.

Doyle exquisitely shows the partially planned, partially haphazard manner in which most local bands form. At the same time, Doyle's descriptions of the characters' situations and their disarmingly unique and poetic Irish-English diction and syntax provide insights into what seems to be an exceptionally authentic rendering of working-class Irish urban culture. Critics have both praised and reviled Doyle for his willingness to use not only the colloquialisms and slang of regional dialect but also a good deal of profanity, including repeated usages of what are generally thought to be the crudest swear words. While Doyle generally declines comment on his work, his defenders usually praise his ability to render the local idiom of Dublin's north side, and the profane diction seems consistent with the young adults who populate his fiction.

Other critics find limitations in this novel's scant character development beyond that of Jimmy Rabbitte, Jr. However, the novel is only 165 pages long, and much of it contains either epigrammatic dialogue or the lyrics of dozens of 1950's and 1960's rhythm and blues hits. Other members of Jimmy's immediate family, relegated perhaps to supporting status in this novel, essentially have their own novels later in the Barrytown trilogy. The Snapper is primarily Sharon Rabbitte's novel and concerns her metamorphosing relationship with her family, especially her father, James Rabbitte, Sr.; The Van is primarily about the relationship of James, Sr., with his best friend, Bimbo.

As The Commitments begins to develop a regional following in the neighborhood, drummer Billy Mooney drops out because he cannot stomach that Declan "Deco" Cuffe, the band's vocalist who never knew his own talent until he had twenty rum and blacks at the Christmas dinner dance and sang to the crowd while he was fully "locked," has become an egotistical nightmare. The band's senior citizen member, Joey "The Lips" Fagan, who purportedly played trumpet for James Brown, Otis Redding, and other great rhythm and blues artists in a long career, has returned to Dublin in his declining years to take care of his "Ma" and to mentor the band. His "mentoring" includes intimate escapades with two of the three Commitmentettes, which only exacerbates the interne-cine battles of ego and art that eventually derail the band just as it seems to be developing a reputation beyond its north-side neighborhood.

THE SNAPPER

First published: 1990

Type of work: Novel

A twenty-year-old woman has a one-night stand with the father of a friend and then spends her pregnancy protecting his identity and redefining her own relationship with the members of her family.

The Snapper easily stands alone as an independent novel, yet it also seamlessly follows from the end of The Commitments. With the group disbanded, Jimmy Rabbitte, Jr., spends most of this novel in an upstairs room of the family apartment, practicing his best disc jockey voice for what he now hopes will be his future career. The novel opens in medias res, just as the essential exposition for the text to follow is occurring. Sharon reveals that she is three months pregnant, expects to carry the baby to full term and raise it as a single mother, and refuses to identify the father. The balance of the novel covers the remaining six months in Sharon's pregnancy, concluding as she delivers a healthy daughter, whom she names Georgina Rabbitte.

Although the dialogue remains "hilarious and haunting" (to quote from the San Francisco Chronicle review), there is less dialogue and more narration and narrative commentary than in The Commitments. Sharon's innocent and isolated worries and opinions about her developing pregnancy and the prospect of motherhood as a single parent are delineated through the rambling interior monologue she undergoes as she makes herself read three pages nightly from texts she has borrowed from the public library.

Although the Barrytown community and Sharon's parents initially obsess over the identity of the baby's father, paternal and grandfatherly love and affection on the part of Jimmy Rabbitte, Sr., combine with a sense of developing awe, as he increasingly appreciates his daughter's imminent motherhood with an understanding that he never achieved in any of his wife's pregnancies for their own five children. Veronica Rabbitte, Sharon's mother, also balances a number of conflicting emotions and opinions as she manifests the characteristic fierce loyalty and independence of the Rabbitte family, especially when confronted by Doris Burgess on her front porch. The troubled Mrs. Burgess, wife of the middle-aged Lothario whom the Rabbittes suspect is the father of Sharon's baby, has walked over to the Rabbitte residence and asked to see Sharon. Veronica states honestly that Sharon is at work and then brooks no further discussion about a relationship that her daughter has not publicly admitted. When Mrs. Burgess tries to force the issue, Veronica responds with a punch to her neighbor's face, reclaiming her front porch and, perhaps in her mind, her daughter's dignity as well.

This novel is suffused with the pain and ramifications of endemic poverty, yet most of the characters approach their impoverished lives with a concerted belief that they will have a rollicking good time today and every day in one way or another. While Sharon's inner thoughts are often remorseful about herself and accusatory toward her family and friends, she eventually comes to terms with her predicament and acknowledges that Barrytown is comfortably tolerant of the sometimes foolish and reckless behavior of its residents.

PADDY CLARKE, HA-HA-HA

First published: 1993

Type of work: Novel

A working-class ten-year-old boy in Doyle's fictional Barrytown region of the north side of Dublin experiences adolescence with his group of picaresque friends, as he and his brother view the deterioration of his parents' marriage.

Both the attention to the depiction of Irish characters and to contemporary Irish colloquialisms and north-side Dublin dialect are suggested in the title of Doyle's Man Booker Prize-winning novel Paddy Clarke, Ha-Ha-Ha. The novel has been justifi-ably and favorably compared to numerous bildungsromans, or coming-of-age novels, including Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), James Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1914-1915, serial; 1916, book), and J. D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye (1951). Paddy Clarke, Ha-Ha-Ha indeed shows some of the struggles of the title character as he tries to have fun as a young boy, even as the circumstances of his family and his neighborhood cause him to grapple with some adult-sized issues and problems. Paddy is proud of his status as an oldest son, and he is characteristically condescending to his younger brother, Sinbad, and his two baby sisters.

As lower-middle-class suburban sprawl moves northward from Dublin, new treeless housing subdivisions under construction provide a dangerous but thrilling landscape for Paddy and his hooligan friends, Aidan, Liam, and Kevin. They terrorize the younger kids in the neighborhood, perform acrobatic feats of boyhood heroism on slag piles of discarded cement, and even create mock-Viking funeral rites for dead rats among the construction rubble. Doyle's narrative voice, channeled through the ten-year-old consciousness of Paddy, is authentic and unsentimental. Given the almost clichéd renderings of Paddy's existence—poverty, crime, deteriorating family situation, and a lack of positive role models—the novel could have become sentimental or trite, but it does not because Paddy never feels sorry for himself but simply exerts his make-do Irish spirit on his situation.

As the novel proceeds and Paddy becomes aware of the demise of his parents' relationship in a way that his younger siblings cannot, he exerts his will in a manner that seems especially suited to a headstrong ten-year-old boy. After he has become disturbingly accustomed to the nightly, lengthy arguments between his parents, which he can hear with clarity even though he is two closed doors away, he decides to stay up all night and to repeat, quietly but insistently, the simple whispered word "stop" in order to quell his parents' arguments and to return the household to some state of repose and assumed peace. Like many of the characters whom Doyle created in the Barrytown trilogy, Paddy Clarke continues in the tradition of the indefatigable picaro, who will seek creative and non-conformist solutions to problems that are likely never to be solved or corrected—which makes young Paddy's attempt all the more gallant yet still believable.

Unlike Huck Finn, who happily set out for the American frontier at the end of his novel, or young Stephen Daedalus, who in A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man chose to leave Ireland for Paris in order to seek his destiny as a writer, Paddy Clarke remains in Barrytown at the end of Doyle's novel. It is his father, not Paddy, who leaves quietly. Paddy knows instinctively that his father will not return, and the other children in the neighborhood taunt him as the language of the novel's title is reprised in anonymous dialogue near the end of the text.

SUMMARY

Roddy Doyle's poetics is certainly grounded in the literary and narrative traditions of Ireland, but it is also significantly affected by his concern about the current social and economic conditions of Ireland, which have moved his perspective and some of his writings quite didactically toward public and literary manifestations of a fervent commitment to social justice. The themes of conflicted love, family dynamics, popular and traditional music, generational poverty, and a fondness for alcohol suffuse Doyle's work, which continues to command a worldwide audience. His ear for language and for the regional dialects of Irish-influenced English constitutes a literary gift to readers.

Richard Sax

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Commitments, 1987

The Snapper, 1990

The Van, 1991

The Barrytown Trilogy, 1992 (includes the previous 3 novels)

Paddy Clarke, Ha-Ha-Ha, 1993

The Woman Who Walked into Doors, 1996

A Star Called Henry, 1999

Oh, Play That Thing, 2004

Paula Spencer, 2006

SHORT FICTION:

The Deportees, and Other Stories, 2008

DRAMA:

Brownbread, pr. 1987

War, pr., pb. 1989

SCREENPLAYS:

The Commitments, 1991 (adaptation of his novel; with Dick Clement and Ian La Frenais)

The Snapper, 1993 (adaptation of his novel)

The Van, 1996 (adaptation of his novel)

TELEPLAY:

Family, 1994

CHILDREN'S/YOUNG ADULT LITERATURE:

The Giggler Treatment, 2000

Rover Saves Christmas, 2001

About the Author

McCarthy, Dermot. Roddy Doyle: Raining on the Parade. Dublin: Liffey Press, 2003.

Paschel, Ulrike. No Mean City? The Image of Dublin in the Novels of Dermot Bolger, Roddy Doyle, and Van Mulken. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Reynolds, Margaret. Roddy Doyle. New York: Vintage, 2004.

Tóibín, Colm, ed. The Penguin Book of Irish Fiction: From Jonathan Swift to Roddy Doyle, Three Hundred Years of Ireland's Greatest Fiction. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin, 2001.

White, Caramine. Reading Roddy Doyle. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2001.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In Roddy Doyle's The Snapper, after Jimmy Rabbitte, Sr., reads the books concerning pregnancy that his daughter, Sharon, has been taking out of the public library, he develops a new understanding of, and appreciation for, the female body in general and his daughter's condition in particular. How does this father-daughter relationship improve in some ways, yet decline in other ways, during the course of Sharon's pregnancy?
- Consider the possible meanings for these colorful adjectives and adverbs that the denizens of Barrytown use: "deadly," "locked," "rapid," and "Mickah stitched Deco a loaf."
- With the popularity of the band U2 and the continuing development of new types of synthesized rock music in the mid- to late 1980's, how believable is Jimmy Rabbitte, Jr.'s choice of the anachronistic simplicity of Motown music and Detroit soul of the 1960's as the musical focus for a band of working-class north-side Dubliners in early adulthood?
- What degree of help can Paddy Clarke expect to obtain from the traditional sources of stability and direction: parental will and control, the Catholic Church, grammar school authorities and rules, and even childhood friends?

© Jerry Bauer

MARGARET DRABBLE

Born: Sheffield, South Yorkshire, England
June 5, 1939

Drabble is a prolific novelist, one of the leading realists of British fiction in the second half of the twentieth century. She is also a noted scholar and critic.

BIOGRAPHY

Margaret Drabble was born on June 5, 1939, in Sheffield, South Yorkshire, England, the daughter of a circuit court judge, John Frederick Drabble, and a teacher of English, Kathleen Bloor Drabble. Her older sister, Antonia Susan, was to achieve a considerable reputation as a novelist under the name of A. S. Byatt; her younger sister, Helen, became an art critic; and a brother became an attorney. Drabble was educated at a Quaker boarding school in York and at Newnham College, Cambridge, where she concentrated in literature but spent much of her time in theater activities and was not involved with the literary set, dominated by the critic F. R. Leavis. After graduation from Cambridge in 1960, she spent a year as an actress with the Royal Shakespeare Company; in June, 1960, she married Clive Swift, an actor. She left acting when she became pregnant; her first three novels were written during her three pregnancies.

Her early novels, based closely on her own experiences as a young woman, were immediate critical successes. The first, A Summer Bird-Cage (1963), focused on choosing between marriage and a career; the second, The Garrick Year (1964), dealt with the apparent necessity for a young woman to choose between an acting career and her family. Drabble's conviction that motherhood and a career are not mutually exclusive led to The Millstone (1965; published in the United States as Thank You All Very Much), whose central figure pursues an academic career undeterred by the birth of her child. Drabble continued to write in a strictly realistic mode, focusing on characters of approximately her own age and, to a large extent, of her own station and condition in life. Jerusalem the Golden (1967) deals with a young woman less concerned with husband and children than with her desire to escape from a provincial town to the excitement of London. Social problems and dislocations as they affect individuals continued to occupy her attention through the novels of her later years: The Needle's Eye (1972), The Realms of Gold (1975), The Ice Age (1977), The Middle Ground (1980), The Radiant Way (1987), and A Natural Curiosity (1989).

While her primary reputation has been as a novelist, Drabble has achieved a considerable reputation as a literary critic. Her thesis at Cambridge was a study of the fiction of Arnold Bennett, which led to a major book, Arnold Bennett: A Biography (1974). She wrote a brief study of a major Romantic poet, Wordsworth: Literature in Perspective (1966), and a broader study of the relationship between poetry and the environment, A Writer's Britain: Landscape in Literature (1979). She edited a collection of essays dealing with one of her favorite novelists, The Genius of Thomas Hardy (1975). She was chosen to edit two revised editions of The Oxford Companion to English Literature, which were published in 1985 and 2000. For many years, she taught a course in literature at Morley College in London.

Drabble has received numerous awards, including the John Llewellyn Rhys Memorial Award in 1966, the James Tait Black Award in 1968, and the American Academy E. M. Forster Award in 1973. She received an honorary degree from Sheffield University in 1976. In 1980, she was named a Commander, Order of the British Empire. Drabble's marriage to Clive Swift ended in divorce in 1975; she married writer Michael Holroyd in 1982 and continued to live in London.

ANALYSIS

Drabble admires the experimental methods of Doris Lessing's The Golden Notebook (1962), and Drabble's own prose occasionally owes something to the stream-of-consciousness methods pioneered by James Joyce and Virginia Woolf, but she has not been known as an experimenter in her own work. She prefers not to use chapter divisions, using spaces to indicate changes of location or action. The nearest thing to unconventional method occurs in the early novel The Waterfall (1969). The novel opens with third-person narration but then switches to first-person narration by the central character; thereafter, the two methods alternate. On the whole, however, Drabble's fiction is in an older tradition. She has been compared to such sturdily realistic novelists as George Eliot, Charles Dickens, Arnold Bennett, and Henry James, among others. She has said that she would like to write the great English novel, a successor to George Eliot's Middlemarch (1871-1872).

Furthermore, she is sometimes seen as a feminist writer, since she is much concerned with the difficulties encountered by her female characters, but she rejects the description. In the past, she argued that feminism proposes oversimplified explanations for complex social and economic problems that affect both sexes, although perhaps not equally. In this regard, she most closely resembles her admired predecessor Eliot.

Drabble's novels are straightforward descriptions of the events in the lives of people who are representative of their time and social position, although they could hardly be called average. She deliberately chooses to focus on characters whose ages and social positions are similar to her own at the time of writing, arguing that these would be the people whom she would know best and about whom she could therefore write with the greatest confidence. Because she herself had to contend with the complications of building a career while rearing several children, she presents a number of characters who must deal with this problem: It plays an important part in The Garrick Year, in The Millstone, in Jerusalem the Golden, and in The Realms of Gold, all written while Drabble was wrestling with the same life choices that face her characters.

In her later novels, beginning with Jerusalem the Golden, Drabble abandons the first-person narrative that she had earlier been using in favor of an omniscient third-person narrator. Her usual method is to focus on a single figure or on two or more central characters and to describe in detail a day or an episode in the life of such characters. In the course of describing an incident, she uses flashbacks to convey whatever information she thinks is important about the childhood or youth of the character, interpolating commentary on specific actions or on more general social or economic activities of the time. Long narrative passages fill the gaps between the extended scenes that Drabble uses to convey critical episodes in the lives of her characters.

She occasionally addresses the reader directly, for example by introducing a character briefly, with a comment to the effect that he or she will appear later in a more important role. Near the end of The Realms of Gold, the narrator observes that all the surviving major characters are reasonably content and well off, and she tells the reader: "So there you are. Invent a more suitable ending if you can." Drabble is also willing, in what might be called an old-fashioned way, to insert comments on her own methods. At the beginning of the final section of The Ice Age, for example, she writes, "It ought now to be necessary to imagine a future for Anthony Keating. There is no need to worry about the other characters." At another point in The Realms of Gold, while commenting about a coincidental meeting between characters, she mentions the coincidence but disarms criticism by saying that there will be less likely coincidences at other points in the book as there are in life.

Perhaps more important still, Drabble is never reluctant to comment on the social and economic situations in which she places her characters. The contemporary style is to ignore such matters or to leave them for the reader to deduce, but Drabble is outspoken in describing what seem to her the ills of society. In The Ice Age, in particular, she describes the laws and regulations that have made it possible for several of her principal characters to make a considerable amount of money and later to be bankrupted or sent to jail. Since many of her major characters are women, she frequently makes pungent observations about the difficulties that women encounter in modern society. Her characters who try to be content with being housewives and mothers are never really satisfied, but those who choose careers along with motherhood encounter their own difficulties. Neither situation is anywhere close to ideal, although she never says anything critical of motherhood.

In other important ways, Drabble's methods run counter to those made popular by such modern novelists as Ernest Hemingway and F. Scott Fitzgerald. There are very few extended stretches of dialogue in Drabble's fiction. Instead, there are long narrative and descriptive sections informing the reader about characters, in the manner of Eliot or James. Dialogue is used only sparingly to highlight special scenes; even when it is used, it is generally employed only as a counterpoint to a description of a conversation. Drabble is more interested in conveying the feelings and reactions of her characters than in trying to make accurate representations of how they speak, and she evidently believes that summaries with commentary are more effective for her purpose.

Furthermore, Drabble does not seem to be concerned that her readers will be bored by novels in which there is not much dramatic action. In some novels, crucial developments are precipitated by a shocking event. The Waterfall is unusual, in that the climactic action, a fatal automobile accident, is described directly; elsewhere, decisive events take place offstage. In The Needle's Eye, a divorced father kidnaps his three children and threatens to take them out of England; in The Ice Age, a young woman is involved in a fatal automobile accident in a Balkan country; in The Realms of Gold, an old woman dies of starvation. Yet none of these events is described directly. Rather, Drabble concentrates on the effects of such episodes on the characters who are at the center of the action.

Since violent action and snappy dialogue are not encountered frequently in Drabble's fiction, she must rely on style and characterization to hold the interest of her readers. Her style is unsensational but consistently interesting and fresh, at least in the long novels of her major period, including The Realms of Gold and The Needle's Eye. Her descriptions are detailed but seldom overly so, conveying a strong sense of what kinds of settings her characters inhabit, and her descriptions of characters are sharp and often witty.

More important, her characters are interesting. It is not Drabble's method to idealize these figures or make them grotesques. Instead, she provides them with a mixture of strengths and weaknesses so that they are recognizably human, generally admirable and entertaining without being boring. Frances Wingate, in The Realms of Gold, for example, is a successful archaeologist and an attractive and forceful woman, but she is also a careless mother, happy that her children no longer demand her attention, and she has foolishly broken off her affair with the man whom she genuinely loves for no reason at all other than that her life had temporarily become less than exciting. Rose Vassiliou, in The Needle's Eye, is a caring mother and a noble character in some ways, but she can also be dependent, annoying, and self-destructively moral.

Drabble's later novels—The Ice Age, The Middle Ground, The Radiant Way, and A Natural Curiosity—all received negative reviews. Critics argued that Drabble was more interested in depicting large social issues and commenting on those issues than in creating interesting and believable characters. Nevertheless, the respect with which her work is treated is a clear indication that she remains one of the major British novelists of the second half of the twentieth century.

THE WATERFALL

First published: 1969

Type of work: Novel

A young married Englishwoman, mother of two, falls in love for the first time and engages in a passionate affair with her cousin's husband.

In The Waterfall, Jane Gray is married to the successful guitarist Malcolm Gray, but she has driven him away with her indifference, her sloppy housekeeping, and her frigidity. When she gives birth to her second child, Bianca, she is looked after by her cousin and best friend, Lucy, and Lucy's husband, James Otford. She and James almost immediately fall in love, and when she has recovered from the aftereffects of childbirth they begin a passionate affair, keeping Lucy, the absent Malcolm, and both Jane and Malcolm's parents in ignorance.

For the first time, Jane is not only in love but also sexually passionate. The affair seems to be proceeding without difficulty until James suggests that they travel to Norway for a vacation with Jane's two children. She is reluctant at first but then agrees. At the beginning of the trip, however, they are involved in a terrible automobile accident. Both James and Jane have expected something like this to happen, since he is a very daring and bad driver, but ironically the accident is not his fault. Another driver is killed. Jane and the children are shaken but not injured, but James is thrown from the car and severely hurt; he remains in a coma for weeks.

Jane, pretending to be Mrs. Otford, remains near James and visits him every day, but Malcolm Gray eventually finds out where she is and tells Lucy. Lucy's reaction is to call and tell Jane that she wishes that both the lovers had been killed in the accident, but she soon relents and comes to join Jane in her hospital vigil. She reveals that her marriage was also going badly, that James was a lousy provider, and he had other affairs before the one with Jane; the news is a severe shock to Jane. Lucy, it develops, is also having an affair, evidently not her first. When James recovers consciousness and begins to regain his strength and abilities, Jane leaves to return to her home. The affair, however, is not over; when James recovers, he and Jane manage to get together for brief trips that are the highlights of Jane's life.

Its narrow focus on the private lives of its characters makes this novel less socially concerned than most of Drabble's fiction. What keeps The Waterfall from being a conventionally tear-jerking romance is the technique that Drabble adopts of alternating chapters of third-person narration describing the romance with Jane's first-person comments, in which she admits lying about many things: her marriage, her blaming her parents for faults they did not have, and her describing the emotions other than passion that affected her during the affair. She feels no guilt, and at the end she has somehow managed to remain friendly with Lucy, but she recognizes that she is responsible for her own failings and her own decisions. Blaming fate, her parents, or others, as she had done in the earlier third-person segments, is no longer possible.

THE NEEDLE'S EYE

First published: 1972

Type of work: Novel

A man and a woman, both unhappy with their lives, form a friendship that never becomes romantic but that sustains both of them.

In The Needle's Eye, Simon Camish is a successful barrister who is profoundly unhappy in his marriage to Julie. Rose Vassiliou is a divorced mother of three children who lives in virtual poverty. The daughter of wealthy parents, she has renounced her family and donated a large inheritance to a charity, rather than accept money that she believes she does not deserve. When Simon and Rose meet, each recognizes in the other qualities that he or she lacks. The two are polar opposites. Simon devotes considerable energy to suppressing the emotions that Rose expresses openly and shamelessly. Simon has struggled all of his life to gain the money and social position that Rose has thrown away. He remains locked in a marriage to a woman who is concerned only with material things and who makes him unhappy, while Rose has divorced Christopher, the husband whom she married against her family's bitter opposition. Although he abused her physically and verbally, she feels guilty for separating Christopher from their children, whom he loves and misses. Ironically, Christopher, because he has become successful in business, is now closer to Rose's parents than she is.

As their friendship grows, Simon and Rose realize, separately, that they could be happy living together, even though there is no real sexual attraction between them. Yet Rose says nothing because she does not believe that she deserves happiness, and Simon cannot bring himself to speak of something so emotionally important to him. Christopher's kidnapping of his three children precipitates a confrontation involving himself, Rose, and Simon, an event that turns out to be quiet and undramatic. In the end, Rose takes Christopher back, Simon remains with Julie, and each continues to value and rely on the other's goodwill. Neither is truly happy, but both are more content than they had been.

The Needle's Eye combines social criticism with acute observations on the emotional difficulties of living in modern British society. Drabble disapproves of a society that values money and material objects highly and that does little to alleviate the conditions under which people without money have to live. Poverty, she observes, is not ennobling. Wealth is not ennobling either, but it makes the strains of life easier. The economic values of this society, however, are less damaging to the individual than are the social norms that require that a tight rein be kept on emotions and that pain and suffering always be denied and minimized by the sufferer. Drabble also pokes holes in romantic ideas; Rose's youthful passion for Christopher brings her years of misery when the passion is spent, and her noble gesture of renouncing her inheritance leaves her miserably poor and puts her children in the same condition.

Drabble does not suggest that society is entirely to blame for what happens to her characters. They make choices, and those choices go a long way toward determining what will happen in their lives. Among the minor characters are a few who have made choices that are better for them: Jeremy Alford, a lawyer, and his pregnant wife are quite happy, as is Miss Lindley, the teacher of one of Rose's children. Less happy are those, like Simon and Rose, whose choices have required them to struggle against their upbringing and early environment.

THE REALMS OF GOLD

First published: 1975

Type of work: Novel

A mature woman, a successful archaeologist, ends a happy relationship with her lover and tries to put her life back together.

The Realms of Gold is Drabble's most optimistic novel and the one in which she seems most relaxed as a writer. Her central figure, Frances Wingate, is about forty years old, a respected professional in the field of archaeology. Years before, she had correctly predicted the location of the ruins of an ancient trading center in the Sahara Desert and had led in its excavation, and consequently she has enjoyed a highly satisfying career. Her marriage to a wealthy man did not turn out well, but her children have become independent, and she is able to leave them for extended periods while she attends professional conferences and other meetings important to her.

The problem in Wingate's life is her broken relationship with Karel Schmidt, a lecturer at a small university, who had been her lover. Separated from him, Frances realizes that she had broken off their relationship for frivolous and foolish reasons. Her life, she believed when she made the break, had become too regular, too contented, and she needed change. The change that she manufactured has separated her from the only man she has loved, and she wants nothing more than to get him back. Very early in the novel, she sends him a postcard from an unnamed Mediterranean city, announcing that she misses him and loves him. She assumes that this will lead to a reconciliation, but when she does not hear from him she swallows her disappointment and determines to go on with her life. Because of a postal strike, the card does not reach Karel for weeks. In those weeks, the action of most of the novel takes place.

Frances travels to Africa for a conference, at which she becomes friendly with a cousin whom she had not known before, David Ollerenshaw. She enjoys flirting with a handsome Italian archaeologist and finds it satisfying to be an important figure among her contemporaries, but she also realizes that Karel is more important to her than this adulation and attention. Karel, having finally received her message, tries to join her in Africa but fails. After some comic errors, they are finally reunited in England.

Frances and Karel are sympathetic characters, but so are many of the others who populate this long book. The exceptions are Frances's parents. Like the parents in most Drabble novels, these characters are somewhat cold and distant; her father is head of a small university, while her mother, a lecturer on birth control and a sexual counselor, does not like sex. Her brother, Hugh, is an alcoholic who is successful in business but needs alcohol to dull his sensibilities. Hugh's son Stephen, a university student, has fathered a daughter and has become obsessed with the dangers that await her as she matures. Stephen's young wife has had a mental collapse and has had to be institutionalized. In the end, to avert the suffering that he believes is in store for her, he kills his daughter and himself. Frances's second cousin, Janet Bird, has no such fears. She tolerates a bad marriage and enjoys the company of Frances when fate brings them together, but she is not fearful for her child. In her quiet courage, she is like David Ollerenshaw, a geologist who the narrator says was intended for a large role but assumes only secondary importance.

Except for Stephen and his daughter, all the major characters in The Realms of Gold survive and, in varying degrees, find happiness. Even Karel's discontented wife finally finds her place in life and permits Karel and Frances to live together. She and Frances, although they do not like each other, learn to get along.

THE ICE AGE

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

Anthony Keating and the people associated with him are frustrated and unhappy during the economic depression in Britain during the 1970's.

After the relative contentment of the ending of The Realms of Gold, The Ice Age is like a cold shower. The later work begins the series of late novels in which Drabble adopts what critics have called a sociological approach in her fiction. These novels are concerned with the economic and social events in England during the years between 1973 and 1990, years in which a depression was followed by a period of recovery in some parts of the economy, fueled by the exploitation of North Sea oil. There is some justice in the critical complaint that Drabble became less interested in her characters than in how she could use the novel to address the current state of British affairs.

The structure of The Ice Age is unusual. As she often does, Drabble dispenses with chapter divisions, but this novel is divided into three parts; the first two move among five major characters and several minor ones. The final section focuses on only one of these characters. At the end, strong religious overtones are introduced, but it is unclear how seriously Drabble intends the religious motif to be taken.

Anthony Keating is at the center of attention and in the final section becomes the only important character. He is one of a group of middle-aged men and women whose lives have been disrupted by financial and social upheavals. Anthony became involved in real estate speculation after finding several other careers boring. For a while, he and his partners were surprisingly successful, but an economic slump has hit them hard. Anthony has had a mild heart attack and is trying to recover, while wondering whether he is about to become bankrupt. His friend Max Friedmann has been killed by a bomb thrown into a London restaurant by the IRA (Irish Republican Army); Max's wife Kitty lost a foot in the incident and is trying to pretend that nothing bad happened. Anthony's lover, Alison Murray, is a onetime star actress who left the stage to look after her second daughter, Molly, born with cerebral palsy and somewhat retarded. Now Alison is desperately unhappy in the Iron Curtain country of Wallacia, where her disaffected daughter Jane is to be tried for vehicular homicide. Anthony looks after Molly. Len Wincobank, a very successful if piratical developer, crossed the legal lines and is in prison. His lover, Maureen Kirby, finds a new employer, who will become her new lover. Giles Peters, who got Anthony into the real estate business, is desperately looking for a way to salvage their investments.

The problems of these characters represent the problems of a sick and depressed society. The malaise is more spiritual than economic, for when better things begin to happen to at least some of the characters, they cannot believe in their good fortune and become even more depressed. When Alison returns to England from the dingy totalitarianism of Wallacia, she is extremely disappointed at what she finds and goes into a deep depression. Anthony's financial fortunes take a turn for the better, and he becomes solvent again, but he knows his good fortune cannot last, and it does not.

At the beginning of the third and final part of

The Ice Age, Drabble dismisses most of the characters in a single paragraph and turns her attention to Anthony. He and Alison enjoy a brief period of contentment before he is called by a man in the British Foreign Office. Jane Murray, Alison's daughter, may be released from prison, he tells Anthony, but someone must go and get her. Anthony goes, somewhat reluctantly carrying secret messages from the Foreign Office. In Wallacia, Jane is released, and Anthony gets her to the airport, but as they are trying to get to their plane an uprising takes place. At Anthony's urging, Jane runs and is able to board the plane, but Anthony is left behind. After several months, his friends in England learn that he has been sent to prison for six years for espionage. The British ambassador in Wallacia realizes that his captors do not believe that Anthony was a spy; if they did, he would have been shot. Yet he will have to serve his term.

In prison, Anthony begins to write a book about the existence of God and the possibility of faith. In part, this is a reversion to his childhood as the son of a churchman, but it is also the only way in which he can try to understand what has happened to him. When he sees a bird that is far from its natural habitat, he takes it as a sign that he has not been forgotten by God. Recognizing that he believes this because he wants to, he cannot resist hope. Drabble, however, does not end on a hopeful note. Alison, living in England with Molly, has no hope, is neither alive nor dead. The doom-filled final sentence of the book is: "England will recover, but not Alison Murray."

SUMMARY

Margaret Drabble belongs to the school of fiction that believes that novels can accurately depict the realities of life. Her intention is to show individuals trying to fashion satisfactory lives in a society that is or seems to be too often hostile. Her vision grows darker after 1977, but it is likely that her later works will be read as accurate guides to what life was like in the last four decades of the twentieth century.

John M. Muste

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- A Summer Bird-Cage*, 1963
- The Garrick Year*, 1964
- The Millstone*, 1965 (published in U.S. as Thank You All Very Much)
- Jerusalem the Golden*, 1967
- The Waterfall*, 1969
- The Needle's Eye*, 1972
- The Realms of Gold*, 1975
- The Ice Age*, 1977
- The Middle Ground*, 1980
- The Radiant Way*, 1987
- A Natural Curiosity*, 1989
- The Gates of Ivory*, 1991
- The Witch of Exmoor*, 1997
- The Peppered Moth*, 2000
- The Seven Sisters*, 2002
- The Red Queen*, 2004
- The Sea Lady: A Late Romance*, 2006

DRAMA:

- Bird of Paradise*, pr. 1969

SCREENPLAYS:

A Touch of Love, 1969 (also known as Thank You All Very Much; adaptation of her novel The Millstone)
Isadora, 1969 (with Melvyn Bragg and Clive Exton)

TELEPLAY:

Laura, 1964

NONFICTION:

Wordsworth: Literature in Perspective, 1966
Arnold Bennett: A Biography, 1974
A Writer's Britain: Landscape in Literature, 1979
The Tradition of Women's Fiction: Lectures in Japan, 1982
Safe as Houses, 1990
Margaret Drabble in Tokyo, 1991 (Fumi Takano, editor)
Angus Wilson: A Biography, 1995

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

For Queen and Country: Britain in the Victorian Age, 1978

EDITED TEXTS:

Lady Susan; The Watsons; Sanditon, 1974 (by Jane Austen)
The Genius of Thomas Hardy, 1975
The Oxford Companion to English Literature: New Edition, 1985 (revised 6th edition 2000)

About the Author

Bokat, Nicole Suzanne. The Novels of Margaret Drabble: This Freudian Family Nexus. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.
 Brownley, Martine Watson. Deferrals of Domain: Contemporary Women Novelists and the State. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
 Creighton, Joanne V. Margaret Drabble. London: Methuen, 1985.
 Finder, Lisa M. Fairy Tales and the Fiction of Iris Murdoch, Margaret Drabble, and A. S. Byatt. New York: Peter Lang, 2004.
 Hannay, John. The Intertextuality of Fate: A Study of Margaret Drabble. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1986.
 Khogeer, Afaf Jamil. The Integration of the Self: Women in the Fiction of Iris Murdoch and Margaret Drabble. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2006.
 Moran, Mary Hurley. Margaret Drabble: Existing Within Structures. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1983.
 Packer, Joan Garrett. Margaret Drabble: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland, 1988.
 Rose, Ellen Cronan, ed. Critical Essays on Margaret Drabble. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985.
 _____. The Novels of Margaret Drabble: Equivocal Figures. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1980.
 Sadler, Lynn Veach. Margaret Drabble. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does Margaret Drabble's choice of Arnold Bennett as a subject and her interpretation of the value of his work suggest about her own theory of fiction?
- Consider the theme of making the best of one's lot in Drabble's fiction.
- Are there ingredients of Drabble's novels that will probably enable them to outlast the circumstances of the time in which they were written?
- What does Drabble's practice of focusing on one day or episode in the life of her characters owe to earlier efforts of the same sort by Virginia Woolf and James Joyce?
- Does Drabble's view of the conflicts and dislocations of professional women change over the course of her writing career?

Library of Congress

JOHN DRYDEN

Born: Aldwinckle, Northamptonshire, England
August 19, 1631

Died: London, England
May 12, 1700

The leading literary figure of his day, Dryden elevated satiric poetry to a high art form and established the heroic couplet as the dominant stanza form for English verse.

BIOGRAPHY

John Dryden (DRI-duhn) was born in the village of Aldwinckle, Northamptonshire, England, on August 19, 1631, the fourteenth child of Erasmus and Mary Pickering Dryden. His family owned land in the area and was identified with the Puritan cause, which Dryden later rejected. Little is known about his childhood, since Dryden was reluctant to record events of his personal life. At about age fifteen, he was enrolled in Westminster School in London, an institution noted for its production of poets and bishops during the seventeenth century. The curriculum stressed not only classical learning but also original poetic composition in Latin and English. Following a thorough grounding in Latin classics under the headmaster, Dr. Richard Busby, he enrolled in Trinity College, Cambridge, completing the B.A. in 1654. After the death of his father brought him a modest income from family lands, he moved to London, where he held a minor clerical position in the government of Oliver Cromwell. Apart from infrequent visits to his native Northamptonshire, London was to be his place of residence for the remainder of his life.

Dryden began his career in literature relatively late, and his initial efforts showed little promise. He produced little poetry of merit before age thirty. An elegy on the death of Oliver Cromwell in 1658 was followed by a congratulatory poem, Astraea redux (1660), on the Restoration of Charles II. Like most Englishmen of his day, Dryden welcomed the return of monarchical rule and fervently hoped that it would put an end to threats of civil disturbance and war that had characterized the Puritan Revolution. Following the Restoration, he determined to devote his life to literature, and in an age when authors had no copyright protection, he turned his attention to drama, which offered the surest rewards for a talented writer. His marriage in 1663 to Lady Elizabeth Howard, sister of the minor dramatist Sir Robert Howard, brought him a generous dowry. Although the marriage was not entirely happy, Dryden was devoted to his three sons.

During the early 1660's, Dryden wrote a variety of plays, most notably heroic tragedies, which trained him to use the heroic couplet in dialogue. Later, he turned to the popular comedies of manners, tragicomedies, and even operas, which more resembled modern musical comedies than the grand operas of the nineteenth century. Following a precedent established by French poets, he became a literary critic by writing explanatory prefaces for his poems and dramas. In numerous occasional poems, he employed the couplet as an instrument for reasoning in verse.

In 1668, he was appointed poet laureate, a position that he held for twenty years. Although he received a generous annual stipend of two hundred pounds, the position identified him with the monarchy during a time of intense political conflict. During the late 1670's, when events surrounding the Popish Plot posed a threat to Charles II, Dryden turned his talent to political satire on behalf of the king. Initially, he succeeded in influencing a large portion of the public to support the king against the Whig Party. Continuing his efforts on behalf of the monarchy, Dryden translated obscure French prose works that held implied analogies to the political scene in England. After the fall of James II in 1688, Dryden suffered the loss of both his political cause and his position as poet laureate. His declaration in 1686 that he had abandoned the Church of England for the Roman Catholic Church increased his alienation. Dryden had seen the development of the two-party system in England and the triumph in 1688 of the parliamentary cause over the monarchy. Basically conservative by temperament, he never wavered in his mistaken belief that the fall of James II spelled ruin for the nation.

During the final decade of his life, Dryden found little success in writing for the theater, but he was able to undertake major translations of Juvenal, Persius, and Vergil, turning their classical Latin verses into popular English heroic couplets. His publisher, Jacob Tonson, was willing to pay generously for polished translations of major classical authors. He continued writing poems of praise (panegyrics) and verse epistles complimenting the work of younger contemporaries such as playwright William Congreve. Though out of favor, Dryden was often surrounded by younger poets who admired his achievements. Ironically, some of his best poetry and prose was written during the final period of his life. He died in London on May 12, 1700, and was interred in the Poets' Corner of Westminster Abbey.

ANALYSIS

Dryden experienced one of the most productive and varied literary careers in all of English literature. Sometimes called the first professional man of letters in England, he was motivated by the desire to re-create the classical excellence of Greece and Rome in vernacular literature. He dominated his age as no writer before or since has done, and indeed, the period 1660 to 1700 in English literature is designated by literary historians as the Age of Dryden. In poetry, translation, drama, and literary criticism, he was the leading author of his time. In addition, he produced biographies and anthologies of poetry. His literary career spanned four decades, one of the longest among English authors, and it is marked by a firm sense of literary genre and a lasting regard for classical principles.

Although his earliest productions were poetry, he established a reputation as a dramatist, beginning with the comedy The Wild Gallant (pr. 1663, pb. 1669). His initial dramatic successes were heroic tragedies, highly artificial dramas featuring spectacular scenery, the love-honor hero, extravagant and bombastic speeches, splendid costuming, and often exotic settings. They were written in heroic couplets, a pair of rhymed verses in iambic pentameter, a medium inspired by French rhymed tragedies. This dramatic genre, which endured into the 1670's, is seen at its best in Dryden's The Indian Emperor: Or, The Conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards (pr. 1665, pb. 1667) and The Conquest of Granada by the Spaniards, Parts I and II (pr. 1670-1671, pb. 1672). By the time Dryden wrote his most famous tragedy, All for Love: Or, The World Well Lost (pr. 1677, pb. 1678), he had abandoned heroic couplets in favor of blank verse, the verse form used in most of his dramas after 1675. Dryden's efforts at comedy were mixed, for he was inclined to stress the licentious elements of the comedy of manners in plays such as The Assignment: Or, Love in a Nunnery (pr. 1672, pb. 1673) and The Kind Keeper: Or, Mr. Limberham (pr. 1678, pb. 1680). Yet one finds the sparkling wit of a comedy such as Marriage à la Mode (pr. 1672, pb. 1673) comparable to that of more gifted contemporaries in the genre, such as Sir George Etherege and William Wycherley.

Despite their musical scores by Henry Purcell, Dryden's operas were not notably successful, yet his tragicomedies have drawn the admiration of critics. Among them, Don Sebastian, King of Portugal (pr. 1689, pb. 1690) is highly regarded for its portrayal of characters and emotion and for its excellent blank verse.

As a literary critic, Dryden stands as one of the most important in English literature. Most of his essays are occasional; that is, they are attached to other works as prefaces or appendices. An important exception is Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay (1668), Dryden's general assessment of the drama. The first systematic critic in English, he is a moderate neoclassicist. As a critic, Dryden attempts to explain the individual work and place it within the proper genre. He is noteworthy for defining important critical terms and genres, and his definitions of terms such as “wit,” “drama,” “satire,” and “biography” are thoughtful and worthy of study. In addition to informing the reader about his own practices, Dryden includes responses to his detractors and opponents. His work is in large measure an outgrowth of the numerous critical controversies in which he engaged. Among these were the controversy with Thomas Shadwell over the nature of comedy, with numerous others over the use of heroic couplets in drama, with Thomas Rymer over the nature of tragedy, and with Jeremy Collier over the dramatist’s ethical responsibility. These controversies helped shape his own critical views, which varied over his career.

In approaching an analysis, Dryden sought to ascertain the proper rules for the production of the type, a standard procedure with a neoclassic critic. Where rules and theories did not exist, he sought to discover and elucidate them. Turning to translation late in his career, Dryden developed his own theory, according the translator three approaches: metaphrase, paraphrase, and imitation. Metaphrase, or literal translation, he considered too limiting if translation is to be considered an art. Paraphrase, which Dryden preferred, permitted the poet to expand or contract the original passages and to modernize the use of names and allusions. The third, imitation, was only a loose rendition of the original, following its theme and organization. Dryden’s ideal demanded that a translator replicate the poetic effects of the original for a modern audience of a different nation.

Since his theoretical approach was often ad hoc, Dryden maintains little consistency in his specific critical opinions; his consistency lies in his broadly neoclassic perspective. He is neither a rigid neoclassicist nor a slavish follower of precedent. For example, he argues that genius sometimes transcends the rules of art and produces superior aesthetic effects by violating the rules; he thus accepts the principle of poetic license. He points out how earlier geniuses such as William Shakespeare violated rules such as the classical unities and yet succeeded in drama, an indication that rules are not absolute.

The most significant passages from Dryden’s critical works are those that record his judgments of other writers, for he possessed a keen appreciation for the merits of others and an unerring ability to discern them. His descriptions of the works of British authors, such as William Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher, Geoffrey Chaucer, and Edmund Spenser, to name a few, are insightful and penetrating, and the list can be extended to include classical writers such as Homer, Ovid, Juvenal, Horace, and Vergil, among others. Some of the most important passages of this kind are to be found in A Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire (1693) and “Preface to Fables Ancient and Modern” (1700). Not only did he identify the great writers of his own nation; he also incorporated within his writings the basic concepts of English literary history, tracing the origin and development of a national literature.

Paradoxically, the most important feature of Dryden’s criticism may be his supple, graceful, and idiomatic prose style. Dryden expressed his critical opinions in an elegant and fluent style that has marked him as a master of English prose.

Today, Dryden is most often remembered for his poetry. He produced more than two hundred poems in English, and for every original verse he wrote two others of translation. A poet of extraordinary versatility, Dryden employs numerous genres: odes, elegies, epigrams, panegyrics, prologues and epilogues, satires, verse epistles, and verse essays. His original poetry is often occasional—directed toward public events and prominent people of his own time—so that it mirrors upper-class English life of the late seventeenth century. In his panegyrics and verse epistles, he complimented important public figures of his time, often in an egregiously flattering tone. His satires and lyrics are rich in topical allusions relating to events of his day. Sometimes called journalistic, Dryden’s poetry is also ratiocinative and argumentative, as if anticipating the Age of Reason. A master of reasoning in verse, he is better known for his epigrammatic wit and humor than for his portrayal of deep human emotions.

In addition to replicating classical poetic genres in English, Dryden established the heroic couplet as the dominant poetic form in England. While he wrote in a variety of meters, the rhymed iambic pentameter couplet is most frequent. Dryden polished the couplet by following grammatical order insofar as possible and by making the couplet a closed form, that is, normally having a full stop to conclude the second line. The heroic couplet proved an effective vehicle for developing reasoned discourse, for pointed epigrammatic wit, and for elegant, emphatic expression of ideas. Its major defects are that its polish seems artificial, notably in dialogue, and the stanza form calls attention to itself, inviting the reader to lose sight of the poem's organization. After dominating English literature for a century, the heroic couplet gave way to less rigid and restrictive verse forms.

OF DRAMATIC POESIE: AN ESSAY

First published: 1668

Type of work: Literary criticism

The rules of classical drama, while sound guides, may be ignored by modern writers if compensatory merits can be achieved.

Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay, Dryden's only major critical essay to be published independently of any other work, is technically a Socratic dialogue introducing four characters, each with a different view of drama. Crites, who allegorically represents Dryden's brother-in-law Sir Robert Howard, defends the rules and practices of classical Greek and Roman dramatists. Lisideius, representing Sir Charles Sedley, defends the French neoclassic dramatists of the seventeenth century as most worthy of emulation. Eugenius, representing Charles Sackville, supports Elizabethan dramatists—William Shakespeare and Ben Jonson—as superior to all others. Neander, representing Dryden himself, suggests that the contemporary Restoration dramatists have in some ways surpassed the achievement of their predecessors. Each speaker in turn examines the qualities of plot, characterization, important themes, style, and diction in dramas of his chosen period. The word “essay” in the title suggests the tentative nature of Dryden's discourse, and throughout the speakers maintain a rational tone.

The discourse introduces the dichotomous approach frequently found in Dryden's poetry and prose, with terms juxtaposed and explored. This device is best demonstrated in Lisideius's definition of a play: “A just and lively image of human nature, representing its passions and humours, and the changes of fortune to which it is subject, for the delight and instruction of mankind.” Contrastive terms such as “passion” (emotion) and “humour” (wit and eccentricity), “delight and instruction,” and “just and lively” are hallmarks of neoclassic criticism. Dryden extends them to include contrastive authors such as Homer and Vergil, Shakespeare and Jonson.

Since Neander is the last to speak, the major emphasis of Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay falls to his portion, and Dryden intends his points of view to prevail. Neander pays eloquent tribute to the genius of Shakespeare and Jonson, praising them as the two English predecessors who bear comparison with the ancient dramatists. Yet he defends contemporary drama by arguing that it depicts better manners than those of Elizabethan drama and that it has the added beauty of rhyme. In a lengthy analysis, Neander explains why rhyme should be considered superior to blank verse. The position on rhyme exposes both the tentative nature of Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay and Dryden's tendency toward inconsistency in his critical opinions, for within less than a decade he reversed this position.

MARRIAGE À LA MODE

First produced: 1672 (first published, 1673)

Type of work: Play

The theme of rightful succession is developed through two plots centering on love—one an idealized version, the other sophisticated and cynical.

Dryden's most successful comedy, Marriage à la Mode, combines within its two distinct plots the conventions of romantic tragicomedy and the Restoration comedy of manners, a genre not fully developed when he produced his play. The tragicomic plot develops the theme of succession to the throne, perhaps Dryden's most important dramatic theme after the love-honor conflict. Having usurped the Sicilian throne, Polydamas discovers two young persons of gentle birth who have been living rustic lives under the care of Hermogenes, a former courtier. Hermogenes assures the usurper that one of them is his son Leonidas, though Leonidas is in reality the son of the king whom he had deposed. When Polydamas orders Leonidas to marry the daughter of his friend, he refuses, protesting his love for Palmyra, his companion under Hermogenes' care. When Polydamas seeks to banish her, Hermogenes identifies her as the king's daughter and claims Leonidas as his own son. Polydamas then seeks to force Palmyra to marry his friend Argaleon and banishes Leonidas under sentence of death. Faced with death, Leonidas wins over the tyrant's supporters, removes him from the throne, and pardons him as the father of his beloved Palmyra.

In the plot, the main elements of tragicomedy are prominent: the remote setting, the tyrannical usurper, the long-lost noble youth, the faithful servant, and idealized romantic love. Dryden's early debt to the tragicomedies of John Fletcher is apparent in his use of stock characters and situations.

In the subplot, the love theme reflects the cynicism of the comedy of manners. Two witty couples—Rhodophil and Doralice, Palamede and Melantha—express sophisticated and detached attitudes toward love and marriage. Before his marriage to Melantha, Palamede hopes to engage in an affair with Doralice, his friend Rhodophil's wife, while Rhodophil, disenchanted with marriage, seeks to make Melantha his mistress. Like characters of the comedy of manners, they satirize the Puritans, country folk, and romantic love. Love is to them merely a game of conquest. Disguises, masked balls, and assignations enliven the plot while witty repartee sparkles throughout the dialogue. The would-be rakes never realize their romantic goals because their plans go awry, and they remain friends at the end.

Though the two plots are loosely connected, both Rhodophil and Palamede support the right of Leonidas to the throne at the conclusion. Also, both plot lines reject the authority of parents to select the spouses of their children. For the most part, however, the two plots exist in separate worlds: the witty, sophisticated, urban milieu of the comedy of manners and the idealistic, sentimental world of the tragicomedy.

ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL

First published: 1681, part 1; 1682, part 2

Type of work: Poem

Political strife jeopardizes rights and long-established precedents, representing a threat to the nation.

Dryden's political satire Absalom and Achitophel reflects upon politics in England during the era of the Popish Plot (1679-1681), when the Whig Party, under the leadership of the earl of Shaftesbury, sought to prevent the legitimate succession of James, duke of York, because of his Catholicism. The Whigs supported a parliamentary bill that would have placed the illegitimate son of Charles II, James, duke of Monmouth, on the throne. Alarmed by efforts to tamper with established monarchical power, Dryden employs the biblical revolt against David by his son Absalom as a parallel narrative to discredit the Whig cause.

The poem represents a mixed, or Varronian, kind of satire, for satiric passages exist alongside straightforward normative portions. The plot is both loose and inconclusive, the satiric elements being confined to the poem's first major section. Dryden narrates the origin and development of the supposed plot, which the Whigs had concocted to discredit the king's position. Each prominent Whig leader is the subject of an extended poetic character, ridiculing him as extremist and undermining his reputation. Though biblical names are used, readers of the time clearly recognized each object of Dryden's satiric thrusts. The efforts of Achitophel to tempt Absalom are partially successful. In the second section, Dryden outlines his theory of government, advocating established rights and powers and rejecting innovation. A second series of characters praises the king's supporters in Parliament, and the poem concludes with a speech by King David (Charles II) upholding his traditional rights, offering conciliation, but also indicating firmness.

In the poetic characters, Dryden's artistic skill is at its best. Using witty aphorisms and the stylistic conventions of the couplet—such as balance, antithesis, and chiasmus—Dryden succeeds in discrediting Whig leaders.

MAC FLECKNOE

First published: 1682

Type of work: Poem

An attack on false literary standards and poor literary achievement serves to advance desirable literary ideals.

Mac Flecknoe: Or, A Satyre upon the True-Blew-Protestant Poet, T. S., employs the mock epic form to assail bad poets and poetry, represented by its victim, the dramatist Thomas Shadwell. Dryden establishes true literary norms through attacking inferior ones. The date of composition and occasion for the satire are uncertain, but it is generally thought that composition followed the death of Richard Flecknoe (c. 1678), an obscure poetaster. After the brief introduction, the satire introduces Flecknoe as a speaker deliberating his choice of a successor to the throne of Nonsense. Through the use of the convention of a mock coronation, Dryden gives the poem a narrative structure, a reflection of his view that satire is rightly a form of heroic (epic) poetry.

The introduction is a masterful passage combining irony and mock solemnity, contrasting the seriousness of succession with a throne epitomizing dullness. Sober aphorisms and allusions to Augustan Rome are deflated by allusions to the realm of Nonsense. Flecknoe selects Shadwell as the most fitting of all of his sons to occupy the throne of Nonsense and uphold dullness. Dryden incorporates numerous references to Shadwell's life and allusions to his dramas, with Flecknoe concluding: "All arguments, but most his plays persuade,/ That for anointed dullness he was made." Flecknoe chooses as the coronation site a run-down section of London near the Barbican, associated with inferior poets. The poem then describes the coronation, complete with procession, satiric description of Shadwell, the paraphernalia of office, and cheers of the assembled throng of hack writers and booksellers. Flecknoe urges his successor to find new ways to be dull, but to avoid boastful comparisons of himself with Ben Jonson and John Fletcher. Suggesting that Shadwell has been unsuccessful in all major literary genres, Flecknoe exhorts him to confine his talents to acrostics, pattern poems, and songs that can be sung to the lute. At the conclusion, as Flecknoe falls through a trap door, his mantle is borne aloft to settle on Shadwell.

The satire enables Dryden to develop at length one of his most congenial concepts, that of regal succession, though it gives an ironic twist to a theme that is usually serious. Monarchical allusions such as those to Augustan Rome, a distant ideal, serve to enhance the withering satire. Shadwell is ironically endowed with the name of a Roman successor, and Flecknoe is compared to Augustus Caesar, ironic elevations of the trivial that are characteristic of high burlesque. In the realm of literary succession, names of great dramatists and poets are used to deflate the pretensions of obscure poetasters, as in a passage describing the coronation site:

Great Fletcher never treads in buskins here,
Nor greater Jonson dares in socks appear;
But gentle Simkin just reception finds
Amidst this monument of vanish'd minds:
Pure clinches the suburban Muse affords,
And Panton waging harmless war with words.

The major genres, such as Jonsonian comedy and the tragicomedies of John Fletcher, give way to punning and inferior wordplay as forms of entertainment. While the poem upholds important neoclassic principles, the overarching framework emerges from its narrative structure and from recurrent patterns of contrast: wit and dullness; sense and nonsense.

What provoked Dryden's mock attack on his literary rival remains unclear. As a poet, Shadwell produced only crude and inferior verses, but critics have found merit in his comedies, modeled after the comedies of humor produced by Jonson. Except for serious students of the period, they are now forgotten, and for most students of literature Shadwell's name survives through Dryden's satiric masterpiece.

“TO MY DEAR FRIEND MR. CONGREVE”

First published: 1694 (collected in John Dryden: The Major Works, 2003)

Type of work: Poem

For his literary achievement at an early age, William Congreve is celebrated as a true successor to the throne of wit.

Although “To My Dear Friend Mr. Congreve” is formally a verse epistle, it is representative also of Dryden’s numerous panegyrics, or poems of praise. Written during his final decade, it demonstrates his inclination to praise younger contemporaries and reflects Dryden’s mastery of the heroic couplet. Readily divided into two sections, the epistle employs two of Dryden’s most important poetic conventions: the conservative metaphor of the temple and the concept of succession, in this poem applied to the kingdom of letters.

In the first part, the poem praises Congreve by placing him within the context of English literary history. While Dryden grants the Elizabethan dramatists transcendent genius, he views their dramas as irregular and crude. The second great period of drama, the early Restoration, brought polish and refinement to the drama, or, in Dryden’s words, better manners, yet this improvement had its price:

Our age was cultivated thus at length,
But what we gain’d in skill we lost in strength.
Our builders were with want of genius cursed;
The second temple was not like the first.

The elegant balance and aphoristic expression of the passage are succeeded by a bold chiasmus and further development of the temple metaphor, celebrating the achievement of a dramatist one generation younger than Dryden:

Till you, the best Vitruvius, come at length;
Our beauties equal, but excel our strength.
Firm Doric pillars found your solid base;
The fair Corinthian crowns the higher space:
Thus all below is strength, and all above is grace.

Dryden endows the younger Congreve with the wit and genius of the Elizabethans and the polish and refinement of the Restoration dramatists. The comparison to the Roman architect Vitruvius is followed by another to the youthful Roman general Scipio Africanus to emphasize Congreve’s early achievement.

Before renewing the panegyric in the poem’s second part, Dryden becomes personal and speaks of his own career. Typically, he writes about himself with restraint; the numerous autobiographical passages in Dryden’s poetry and prose reveal more about his reactions to events and less about the events themselves. In writing of himself, he couches his experience within the mythic context of literary succession; having been poet laureate, he had occupied a throne of letters. Writing of his loss of the laureateship, Dryden asserts that he could have been content had the office gone to Congreve. Instead, it went to his old enemy Thomas Shadwell. Despite this anomaly, he continues, Congreve’s merits will elevate him to a throne in the kingdom of letters. Comparing Congreve with Shakespeare, he predicts a long and illustrious career for the youthful dramatist. Dryden, like a deposed monarch, recognizes that his own career is drawing to its close and asks Congreve to defend his memory against attacks that are certain to follow after his death.

The poem stands as an example of Dryden’s generous praise, couched within a mythic context of his own invention. Ironically, Congreve retired from playwriting in 1700, and while his brilliant comedies remain alive today, his dramatic range was limited to the comedy of manners. He lived to fulfill Dryden’s request, leaving a poignant memoir of the poet as a preface to the 1717 edition of Dryden’s dramas.

ALEXANDER'S FEAST

First published: 1697

Type of work: Poem

Musical performances can so move the emotions, even of heroic individuals, that such individuals are influenced to undertake specific actions.

Alexander's Feast: Or, The Power of Music, an Ode in Honor of St. Cecilia's Day is Dryden's second ode honoring Saint Cecilia, the patron saint of music. The poem's theme, the power of music to move human emotions, is identical with that of "A Song for St. Cecilia's Day," written a decade earlier. Both odes are occasional, having been composed at the invitation of the London Musical Society. The second ode, however, is much more elaborate, for Dryden introduces characters and places them within a dramatic setting. The Greeks are celebrating their victory over the Persian King Darius when the musician at the banquet, Timotheus, is called upon to perform.

With exalted strains, Timotheus creates within Alexander the Great a sense that he has become a deity. An alteration of tone changes his mood to a desire for pleasure, and following this a longing for love of his mistress Thaïs, who sits beside him. Somber strains evoke pity for the fallen Darius, but these are followed by strident tones calling for revenge on behalf of Greek soldiers who have perished. Alexander and his mistress and their company rush out, torches in hand, to burn the Persian city Persepolis. The poem concludes with a grand chorus, stressing the power of music to move emotions and contrasting the legend of Saint Cecilia with the power of Timotheus. Dryden recalls the story that after she had invented the organ, she played such beautiful music that an angel, mistaking the sounds for those of heaven, appeared as she played:

Let old Timotheus yield the prize,
Or both divide the crown:
He rais'd a mortal to the skies;
She drew an angel down.

The intricate form resembles the Pindaric ode in its lengthy and complicated irregular stanzas, yet its linear organization follows the tradition of Horace. Dryden achieves a complex, forceful, and energetic movement, and his use of historical events and characters contributes to a lively, dramatic expression of his theme.

SUMMARY

John Dryden's amazingly varied literary production adapted the classical poetic genres to the England of his day. He sought to enrich the national literature and to serve as an instructor of manners and morals for his society. His appeal is primarily to reason, not to emotion.

His classical sense of polish enabled him to perfect the heroic couplet and make it the dominant verse form in English. His prose remains a model of lucid, idiomatic, and graceful writing.

Stanley Archer

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Heroic Stanzas, 1659

Astraea redux, 1660

"To My Lord Chancellor," 1662

Prologues and Epilogues, 1664-1700

Annus Mirabilis, 1667

Absalom and Achitophel, Part I, 1681

Religio Laici, 1682

John Dryden

Mac Flecknoe: Or, A Satyre upon the True-Blew-Protestant Poet, T. S., 1682
The Medall: A Satyre Against Sedition, 1682
Absalom and Achitophel, Part II, 1682 (with Nahum Tate)
Threnodia Augustalis, 1685
The Hind and the Panther, 1687
“A Song for St. Cecilia’s Day,” 1687
Britannia Rediviva, 1688
Eleonora, 1692
“To My Dear Friend Mr. Congreve,” 1694
Alexander’s Feast: Or, The Power of Music, an Ode in Honor of St. Cecilia’s Day, 1697 “To My Honour’d Kinsman, John Driden,” 1700

DRAMA:

The Wild Gallant, pr. 1663, pb. 1669
The Rival Ladies, pr., pb. 1664
The Indian Queen, pr. 1664, pb. 1665 (with Sir Robert Howard)
The Indian Emperor: Or, The Conquest of Mexico by the Spaniards, pr. 1665, pb. 1667
Sir Martin Mar-All: Or, The Feign’d Innocence, pr. 1667, pb. 1668 (with William Cavendish, duke of Newcastle; adaptation of Molière’s L’étourdi)
Secret Love: Or, The Maiden Queen, pr. 1667, pb. 1668
The Tempest: Or, The Enchanted Island, pr. 1667, pb. 1670 (with Sir William Davenant; adaptation of William Shakespeare’s play)
An Evening’s Love: Or, The Mock Astrologer, pr. 1668, pb. 1671 (adaptation of Thomas Corneille’s Le Feint Astrologue)
Tyrannic Love: Or, The Royal Martyr, pr. 1669, pb. 1670
The Conquest of Granada by the Spaniards, Part I, pr. 1670, pb. 1672
The Conquest of Granada by the Spaniards, Part II, pr. 1671, pb. 1672
The Assignation: Or, Love in a Nunnery, pr. 1672, pb. 1673
Marriage à la Mode, pr. 1672, pb. 1673
Amboyne: Or, The Cruelties of the Dutch to the English Merchants, pr., pb. 1673
Aureng-Zebe, pr. 1675, pb. 1676
The State of Innocence, and Fall of Man, pb. 1677 (libretto; adaptation of John Milton’s Paradise Lost)
All for Love: Or, The World Well Lost, pr. 1677, pb. 1678
Oedipus, pr. 1678, pb. 1679 (with Nathaniel Lee)
The Kind Keeper: Or, Mr. Limberham, pr. 1678, pb. 1680
Troilus and Cressida: Or, Truth Found Too Late, pr., pb. 1679
The Spanish Friar: Or, The Double Discovery, pr. 1680, pb. 1681
The Duke of Guise, pr. 1682, pb. 1683 (with Lee)
Albion and Albanius, pr., pb. 1685 (libretto; music by Louis Grabu)
Don Sebastian, King of Portugal, pr. 1689, pb. 1690
Amphitryon: Or, The Two Socia’s, pr., pb. 1690
King Arthur: Or, The British Worthy, pr., pb. 1691 (libretto; music by Henry Purcell)
Cleomenes, the Spartan Hero, pr., pb. 1692
Love Triumphant: Or, Nature Will Prevail, pr., pb. 1694
The Secular Masque, pr., pb. 1700 (masque)
Dramatick Works, pb. 1717
The Works of John Dryden, pb. 1808 (18 volumes)

NONFICTION:

Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay, 1668

"A Defence of Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay," 1668

"Preface to An Evening's Love: Or, The Mock Astrologer," 1671

"Of Heroic Plays: An Essay," 1672

"The Author's Apology for Heroic Poetry and Poetic License," 1677

"Preface to All for Love," 1678

"The Grounds of Criticism in Tragedy," 1679

"Preface to Sylvae," 1685

"Dedication of Examen Poeticum," 1693

A Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire, 1693

"A Parallel of Poetry and Painting," 1695

"Dedication of the Aeneis," 1697

"Preface to Fables Ancient and Modern," 1700

"Heads of an Answer to Rymer," 1711

TRANSLATIONS:

Ovid's Epistles, 1680

The History of the League, 1684 (of Louis Maimbourg's Histoire de la Ligue)

The Life of St. Francis Xavier, 1688 (of Dominique Bouhours's La Vie de Saint François Xavier)

The Satires of Juvenal and Persius, 1693

The Works of Vergil, 1697

About the Author

Fowles, Anthony. John Dryden: A Critical Study. London: Greenwich Exchange, 2003.

Hammond, Paul, and David Hopkins, eds. John Dryden: Tercentenary Essays. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Hopkins, David. John Dryden. Tavistock, Devon, England: Northcote House, in association with the British Council, 2004.

Hume, Robert D. Dryden's Criticism. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1970.

King, Bruce. Dryden's Heroic Drama. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1965.

Lewis, Jayne, and Maximillian E. Novak, eds. Enchanted Ground: Reimagining John Dryden. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2004.

McFadden, George. Dryden: The Public Writer, 1660-1685. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1978.

Miner, Earl. Dryden's Poetry. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967.

Van Doren, Mark. The Poetry of John Dryden. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1921.

Winn, James A. John Dryden and His World. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1987.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- John Dryden has been accused of being a trimmer—of expediently changing his views on religion, government, and literary standards. What evidence is there to refute this charge?
- Examine the applicability of Dryden's biblical lore in Absalom and Achitophel.
- Was outrage at his nation for honoring the minor poet Thomas Shadwell a sufficient or merely a contributing provocation for Dryden to write Mac Flecknoe?
- Show how Dryden's characterizations of the speakers in Of Dramatic Poesie: An Essay reflect his critical broad-mindedness.
- Discuss Dryden's influence on literary art in the century that followed his death in 1700.
- Trace Dryden's importance as a link between the Jacobean and Restoration drama.

DU FU

Born: Gongxian, China
712

Died: Tanzhou (now Changsha, Hunan province), China 770

Generally regarded as China's finest poet, Du Fu is celebrated for his seriousness of purpose, his mastery of poetic technique, and his innovations in subject matter.

BIOGRAPHY

Du Fu (doo foo; also known as Tu Fu) lived during the century when China's Tang Dynasty (618-907) reached the peak of its political and cultural achievement and began its long decline. The pivotal event in the lives of both the poet and the dynasty was the An-Shi Rebellion, which ended the reign of Xuanzong, "the Brilliant Emperor," and brought the death of many thousands of Chinese people. Its importance is fully reflected in Du Fu's poetry; in fact, the poems that made his reputation were written after the rebellion began, when he was already in his mid-forties.

The poet was born in 712 in Gongxian, China. His father's name was Du Xian. The family had a tradition of many generations of public service, and after some five years traveling in the south of China during his early twenties, Du Fu returned to Ch'ang-an in 736 to attempt the examinations for imperial service. Unexpectedly, he failed, and once again he devoted himself to travel. Du Fu wrote about these experiences many years later in "The Wanderings of My Prime."

In the early 740's, he lived in Luoyang, during which time he met the poet Li Po. Du Fu addressed several poems to Li Po, and the former clearly treasured the friendship for the rest of his life, although the two poets do not appear to have met again after their excursions of 744 and 745.

Du Fu moved to Ch'ang-an in 746 and set about gaining an official position. The next year offered the opportunity of a special examination, but the corrupt first minister saw to it that no one was passed. Five years later, possibly as a result of three poems well received by the emperor himself, Du Fu was again able to take the examination. This time he was put on a list of those awaiting appointments, but he had to wait another three years before being assigned a police commissioner's post. This post he declined, and he was made adjutant in the Office of the Right Commander of the heir apparent's Palace Guard.

During this ten-year waiting period, Du Fu's poetry began to show an increasing sympathy for the ordinary people of China. He had already written about the ravages of war in the famous "Song of the War Wagons," and when severe rains in the autumn of 754 led to food shortages and price rises, "Sighing over the Autumn Rains" movingly tells how a little rice now required the surrender of a person's bedding. The situation was so serious that the poet had moved his family away from the capital, and joy at his new appointment was tempered by the death from hunger of his infant son, an event chronicled in "Five Hundred Words to Express My Feelings When I Went from the Capital to Fengxian." Yet Du Fu's personal unhappiness was soon to be overshadowed by a national disaster, and public and private events would sit side by side in his poetry.

At the beginning of 756-757, An Lu-shan, the governor-general of the northern and northeastern border regions, captured Luoyang and threatened the imperial capital. About ten years earlier, the emperor had taken as concubine the wife of one of his own sons. Yang Guifei soon made herself effective empress, had her older sisters ennobled, and helped one of her cousins, Yang Guozhong, climb to the rank of highest minister of state. The unpopular Yang family was An Lu-shan's declared target, and when the emperor was forced to flee Ch'ang-an, it was the imperial troops who executed the corrupt minister, his son, and two of Lady Yang's sisters, and who finally insisted on the death of the concubine herself. Shortly thereafter, Suzong, the heir apparent, was proclaimed emperor and began the long process of crushing the rebellion.

Du Fu, who had taken his family to Fengxian, eighty miles from Ch'ang-an, now moved them further north to Qiang Village and tried to join the new emperor. The poet seems to have been captured by the rebels and taken to Ch'ang-an, where he stayed for about eight months, until early 757, when he managed to make his way through enemy lines to Suzong's headquarters. Poems such as "Moonlit Night," "Spring Prospect," "P'eng-ya Road," and "The Journey North" reflect these experiences.

Du Fu was now appointed to a junior advisory position. He did not make a great success of this opportunity, and six months after the recovery of Ch'ang-an and Luoyang, the poet was transferred to a minor post in Huazhou, sixty miles from the capital. After little more than a year, he resigned and took his family to Chengdu, where he built his famous thatched hut in the spring of 760. The last decade of his life was a prolific period, and most of Du Fu's surviving poetry comes from these years.

In Chengdu, the poet seems to have depended on the kindness of others, but after a local revolt, which forced him and his family to flee the city for almost two years, he joined the military staff of his friend Yan Wu, the new provincial governor. In early 765, after less than a year, Du Fu resigned and moved to Kui-zhou at the western entrance to the gorges of the Yangtse River. The city prefect was extremely helpful, and Du Fu probably became his unofficial secretary. By 767, the poet had two houses and held fields and orchards, but the next year he left, possibly still thinking of an official post in the capital. Du Fu died in Tanzhou, China, in late 770.

ANALYSIS

The two indigenous religions of China, Confucianism and Daoism, both hinge on the word "Dao," or "Way," meaning the principle by which human beings are to seek harmony. Confucianism tended to emphasize the social elements of the Dao, putting particular value on the virtues of truthfulness, diligence, filial piety, and loyalty to government as likely to generate harmony on earth. Daoism itself, on the other hand, was skeptical about the possibility of illuminating the Dao at all, and it taught that the Way might only be known through an inner awareness and union with the ultimate reality of all things. Du Fu's family history of government service generated in him a Confucian sense of the importance of public responsibility, but as his friendship and admiration for the Daoist poet Li Po suggest, there was a quietist streak to his character, which found expression in frequent praise of rural life and the hermit's role. Du Fu's sympathy with both polarities of the Chinese value system may help to account for his enormous poetic prestige.

Until the 750's, Du Fu did not seem to have been particularly interested in the public world, but then he produced a number of poems on social issues, possibly in response to a deterioration in governance. A poet would not have been regarded as moving out of his proper sphere in writing political commentary; since Confucianism regarded government as of vital concern to the wise man, there was a long tradition of using poetry as a vehicle for social and political criticism. Du Fu's "ballads," however, are unusually direct, and his engagement with political events has gained for him the title of the "poet-historian."

One of the first of these poems was "Song of the War Wagons." The opening lines describe conscripted men going to war behind the baggage wagons, while their wives, parents, and children stumble after them, weeping. A soldier tells how he and his fellows, driven "like dogs or chickens," have given their blood to satisfy the emperor's expansionist ambitions. The poem has been praised for its acute sensitivity to the ordinary person's difficulties. Du Fu also wrote about the evils of conscription in the three "officer" poems (759). The last of these tells of an old man who escapes over the wall right as the recruiting officer arrives. All his sons have gone to the war, and now even his wife and daughter-in-law are taken to cook for the army. At this point, Du Fu can only offer compassion since the people are being taken to defend the empire, not expand it.

The concept of re, of benevolence, charity, or good-heartedness, was the paramount Confucian virtue, and in Du Fu's poems of the rebellion it finds frequent expression. "A Fine Lady" shows his compassion for a well-born woman. Her brothers were killed in the rebellion, and her husband deserted her for a younger woman, so she is now reduced to selling her pearls one by one. With an eye for compelling detail, Du Fu tells how she and her maid ineffectually try to cover the holes in their roof with living creepers.

Very few poets wrote about the An-Shi Rebellion, and while there were ancient precedents for such poems as "Song of the War Wagons," Du Fu was breaking new ground when he wrote about his family's experiences. "P'eng-ya Road" describes them walking through the rain and mud, their clothes wet and cold, his son eating bitter plums, and his daughter biting her father in her hunger. Eventually, they arrive at a friend's house, and the poem becomes a celebration of hospitality. Friendship is one of the traditional subjects of Chinese literature, and the drama of his family's journey and their pitiful condition makes the friend's hospitality glow all the more brightly as a moment of blessed harmony in a disordered world.

A reverence for nature is a continuing theme in Chinese verse, and many of Du Fu's poems express a degree of unity with the natural world. In "Moonlit Night," he finds himself in harmony with his wife and children when he considers that they are looking at the same moon in Fu-zhou that he sees in Ch'ang-an. In "Facing the Snow," however, he evokes tumultuous storm clouds to parallel China in rebellion. "Restless Night" anxiously represents a calm and peaceful nature as being under the same threat of war as humankind, and Du Fu's sympathy now extends to the natural world itself.

Nature was not always bleak. "The River Village," written during the "thatched hut" period of 760 through 762, celebrates a secret beauty that unites all creation: the curve of the river, the swallows on the roof, the gulls in the water, his wife making a chessboard, and his sons bending needles into fish hooks. Du Fu achieves a similar sense of oneness in "A Traveler at Night Writes His Thoughts." The poet is on a boat sailing down the Yangtse River; grasses grow on the bank, the stars are above, and the moon is reflected in the water. Bitterly, Du Fu reflects that his poetry has not made him a name and that his life in government has not been a success. What does he resemble? A sand gull, floating between heaven and earth. This image is not one of power and authority, nor is it one of leaden impotence. The gull, or the poet, is a mediator between earth and heaven, stitching a single garment of universal harmony.

"SPRING PROSPECT"

Written: "Chun wang," 757 (collected in The Selected Poems of Du Fu, 2002)

Type of work: Poem

Feeling aged by the devastation of the civil war, the poet finds comfort in nature.

"Spring Prospect," Du Fu's most famous poem, was written while he was held in Ch'ang-an and is characteristic of his verse, both in form and in subject matter. The poem seems to separate the artificial (the "nation" and the "city") and the natural ("hills and streams"), only to erase this distinction when "grass and trees" are seen flourishing in Ch'ang-an at a time of destruction. The lines "feeling the times,/ flowers draw tears;/ hating separation,/ birds alarm the heart" are willfully ambiguous. Burton Watson, the translator, has given the flavor of the original by using dangling participles. Who is the implied subject of "feeling" or of "hating"? Is it the poet or the flowers and birds? Is nature sympathizing with humanity and the poet? Are the flowers crying over the political situation, or the birds suffering because Du Fu and his family are apart? On the other hand, the lines can be taken to mean that the poet is weeping on the flowers, symbols of beauty and renewal, while the birds' songs stoke his emotional anguish. Thus, the poetry weaves humanity and nature together into one fabric.

The "beacon fires" of line 5, "Beacon fires three months running," were used by the Chinese to maintain contact between garrisons; they would be lit at regular times to indicate that all was well. In the poem, their use for three months shows how long the emergency has lasted. The final two lines focus on the poet, but he refuses to take himself too seriously: He is losing so much hair that soon there will not be enough in the topknot for him to pin on his hat, and it will fall off. This wry, self-deprecating humor is typical of Du Fu.

The poem in Chinese consists of eight lines of five words each, a form called lǔshǐ, or regulated verse. It was one of a group of forms known as “modern style,” which developed after the fifth century C.E. and could be written with either seven or five syllables to the line—Chinese words normally have only one syllable. Du Fu is particularly admired for his mastery of this very strict form. There were precise rules for verbal and tonal parallelism in the second and third pairs of lines, and the translation preserves most of these antitheses, as indicated for example, in lines 3 and 4: “feeling”/“hating”; “the times” (political and personal dislocation)/“separation”; “flowers”/“birds”; “draw”/“alarm”; “tears”/“heart.”

“THE JOURNEY NORTH”

Written: “Bei zheng,” 757 (collected in Crossing the Yellow River: Three Hundred Poems from the Chinese, 2000)

Type of work: Poem

Du Fu describes his journey across a devastated land to visit his impoverished wife and children.

In “The Journey North,” Du Fu has received formal permission from the emperor to make a visit to his wife and children, but the poet wonders how important he should consider his family at a time when “the whole universe is suffering fearsome wounds.” In this state of confusion and anxiety, he begins his phantasmagoric journey through a devastated and depopulated countryside. There is temporary respite when he comes to the mountains—“Here retired pursuits could be enjoyed.” Yet the world calls him back, and he must cross an old battlefield at night, the moonlight illuminating white bones.

The poet’s homecoming is a widely praised passage. He finds his wife and children in patched clothes; his spoiled son is now barefoot and pale, and Du Fu himself falls sick and takes to his bed. At this point, he realizes that he has some cosmetics and silk in his bag, and the children take immediate pleasure in the makeup, playing at being grown-ups. The poet can temporarily forget the trials of life in the pleasure of being with his children.

After these three dozen lines of domestic realism, the poem returns to its initial mode, and Du Fu turns to speculating on the outcome of the rebellion. He says that he believes that the “demonic atmosphere will soon break,” that the empire is, after all, built on firm foundations.

The poem is striking for its mixture of the domestic and the high political. The “shifting style,” with its abrupt changes of mood and topic, is characteristic of Du Fu and sets him apart from his contemporaries. He is quite happy to let the personal stand beside the public and to unify the two in the space of a poem, although his sense of himself as a potentially public figure, and sometimes as a mildly absurd one, constantly draws him back to earth.

SUMMARY

The horrors of the mid-century An-Shi Rebellion elicited in Du Fu the supreme Confucian value of compassion for his fellow human beings. Parallel to his strong awareness of the everyday world and his sense of public responsibility was an urge to experience the unity of humanity and the natural world. Yet the physical destruction and dislocation that he saw around him made it hard for the poet to see nature as harmonious, although occasionally he was able to transcend his own troubles and those of his country.

William Atkinson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Approximately 1,450 poems of varying lengths, collected through the years in frequently revised and reprinted anthologies and collections such as Tang Shi san bai shou, 1763 (The Jade Mountain: A Chinese Anthology, 1929; and Chuan Tang Shi, 1706)

Tu Fu: Selected Poems, 1962 (Zhi Feng, editor; Rewi Alley, translator)

About the Author

Chou, Eva Shan. Reconsidering Tu Fu: Literary Greatness and Cultural Context. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995.

Cooper, Arthur, comp. Li Po and Tu Fu: Poems Selected and Translated with an Introduction and Notes. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin, 1973.

Davis, A. R. Tu Fu. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Dissanayake, Wimal. "Self as Image in the Nature Poetry of Kalidasa and Du Fu." In Self as Image in Asian Theory and Practice, edited by Roger T. Ames, with Thomas P. Kasulis and Wimal Dissanayake. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.

Feng Yüan-chuen. A Short History of Classical Chinese Literature. Translated by Yang Hsien-Yi and Gladys Yang. Hong Kong: Joint Publishing, 1983.

Lin, Shuen-fu, and Stephen Owen, eds. The Vitality of the Lyric Voice: Shih Poetry from the Late Han to the T'ang. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1986.

Owen, Stephen. "Tu Fu." In The Great Age of Chinese Poetry: The High T'ang. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1981.

Watson, Burton. Chinese Lyricism: Shih Poetry from the Second to the Twelfth Century, with Translations. New York: Columbia University Press, 1971.

_____. The Columbia Book of Chinese Poetry: From Early Times to the Thirteenth Century. New York: Columbia University Press, 1984.

_____, ed. The Selected Poems of Du Fu. New York: Columbia University Press, 2002.

Yu, Pauline, et al., eds. Ways with Words: Writing About Reading Texts from Early China. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Examine the concept of re in poems of Du Fu other than "A Fine Lady."
- Show how Du Fu uses observation of the natural world to cast light upon human disorders.
- Comment on tributes to quietness in Du Fu's poems.
- What are the most specific Confucian values in Du Fu's poetry?
- Does any century in Western history reflect social and political problems similar to those described in Du Fu's poetry?

Library of Congress

ALEXANDRE DUMAS, PÈRE

Born: Villers-Cotterêts, France

July 24, 1802

Died: Puys, France

December 5, 1870

Dumas is a major French writer who excelled in four different literary genres in an original, prolific, and flamboyant way.

BIOGRAPHY

The prince of storytellers, Alexandre Dumas, père (dew-MAH pehr), was born on July 24, 1802, in the town of Villers-Cotterêts, northwest of Paris, France. His name was officially altered in 1813 to Alexandre Davy de la Pailleterie Dumas. Dumas was the son of Thomas-Alexandre Dumas Davy de la Pailleterie, a mulatto illegitimate son of a marquis. Thomas-Alexandre enlisted in the Queen's Dragoons as a private in 1786, although he soon rose rapidly in rank. While on leave in Villers-Cotterêts he met and fell in love with Marie-Louise-Elizabeth Labouret, an innkeeper's daughter. They were married on November 28, 1792. By that time Thomas-Alexandre had obtained commissioned rank, and by June, 1793, he had achieved the rank of brigadier general.

After serving with Napoleon I in Egypt, Thomas-Alexandre left for home. He stopped his ship in Naples, unaware that he was in hostile territory. He was arrested and spent two years in prison. When he returned to Villers-Cotterêts, his health was broken. He died when Alexandre Dumas was four years old.

At eighteen, Alexandre knew about hunting and woodcraft but otherwise had little education. Fortunately, he became friends with two experienced young men, Amédée de la Ponce, an army officer, and Adolphe de Leuven, a Swedish aristocrat. Both men helped the younger Dumas find himself and pursue his education. Dumas's reading had been meager. De la Ponce offered to teach him German and Italian. Dumas readily accepted this generous offer. Eventually he became acquainted with the German Sturm und Drang movement of the 1770's and 1780's. The Italian who moved him most was Ugo Foscolo, a novelist and critic.

Adolphe de Leuven spent only his summers in Villers-Cotterêts; in the winter he resided in Paris. His descriptions and stories of Paris fascinated Dumas. De Leuven also liked to write vaudeville sketches and suggested that Dumas collaborate with him. They wrote several sketches together, and some were accepted for performance. De Leuven also introduced Dumas to the historical prose works of Sir Walter Scott.

Dumas moved to Paris in 1823. There he got a job as a copyist in an office. He soon developed a passion for the theater and decided to pursue a literary career. The assistant director of his office took an interest in him and advised him to educate himself further. Dumas read the histories of Jean Froissart, Pierre de Bourdeille, and Blaise de Lasseran Massencôme; the memoirs of Cardinal de Retz and the duc de Saint-Simon; the old classics of Homer, Vergil, and Dante; and the modern classics of Victor Hugo, Alphonse Lamartine, and André-Marie de Chénier.

Dumas greatly enjoyed attending the theater, especially performances of William Shakespeare's plays by touring English actors. He turned to writing plays. He achieved success with the romantic drama Henry III et sa cour (pr., pb. 1829; Catherine of Cleves, 1831, also known as Henry III and His Court, 1904). He continued with more plays, including, in the time following his first success, Christine: Ou, Stockholm, Fontainebleau, et Rome (pr., pb. 1830), Antony (pr., pb. 1831; English translation, 1904), La Tour de Nesle (pr., pb. 1832; The Tower of Nesle, 1890), and Catherine Howard (pr., pb. 1834; English translation, 1859).

Dumas also wrote novels. In writing novels, his aim was to present history in a way that would dispel the commonly held idea that history is no more than a boring accumulation of dates and facts. One of his first efforts, La Comtesse de Salisbury (1839; the countess of Salisbury), was the first novel that he published as a serial in a popular magazine. He became established as a writer of historical fiction and went on to produce such masterpieces as Les Frères corses (1844; The Corsican Brothers, 1880), Les Trois Mousquetaires (1844; The Three Musketeers, 1846), Le Comte de Monte-Cristo (1844-1845; The Count of Monte-Cristo, 1846), and La Reine Margot (1845; Marguerite de Navarre: Or, The Massacre of Saint Bartholomew's Eve, 1845, better known as Marguerite de Valois, 1846).

Dumas was a prodigious worker. His complete works amount to around three hundred volumes. He founded and edited a half-dozen magazines and newspapers. He had a half-dozen mistresses and a wife, whom he divorced. By his mistresses he had a son and two daughters; by his wife he had no child. He traveled widely and wrote numerous accounts of his trips. He was extravagant and always in debt. Late in his career he became a political activist. In June, 1860, he joined the Italian patriot Giuseppe Garibaldi. In July, 1870, Dumas suffered a severe stroke. On December 5, he died at his son's home at Puys; he was buried at his native town of Villers-Cotterêts.

ANALYSIS

Dumas's long novels are sometimes called, misleadingly, romances. They are not, first of all, like what are commonly called romance novels, which deal with a woman falling in love. Moreover, there is an important distinction to be made between a novel and a romance. The distinction has to do with the powers of the protagonist. Novels are about ordinary people and how they fare in their conflicts. The protagonist of a novel is treated realistically and is often given a detailed psychological portrait. On the other hand, the romance presents extraordinary persons whose powers are magical and border on the mythological. The protagonists of romances are not so much individual men and women as archetypes, dream images, or symbols. The romantic protagonist comes from an upper world, and the antagonist has attributes of an underworld. The conflict takes place in a realistic setting, but the laws of nature may be suspended. Shakespeare's play The Tempest (pr. 1611, pb. 1623) is an example of such a romance in English literature, as is the film Star Wars (1977). Dumas's novels are realistic, not romances.

Dumas wrote many historical novels. When reading history, one needs always to remember that what happened is being rendered by the person telling what happened. Even the most factual histories involve interpretation. Dumas's historical novels do not make romances out of history. For example, rather than create a King Arthur, whose powers are those of a hero of a romance, Dumas creates characters who resemble, in their accomplishments, failings, and personalities, people the reader may know in life. Dumas usually succeeds in producing a convincing illusion of historical reality. His novels are often so compelling that many readers never question their historical accuracy.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS

First published: Les Trois Mousquetaires, 1844
(English translation, 1846)

Type of work: Novel

Three of King Louis XIII's musketeers and a cadet serve their king and queen with loyalty, bravery, and honor; their adventures taking place in a context of historical fact.

The Three Musketeers, a historical novel, is arranged in five parts. In the first, the introduction, the reader meets the heroes: the cadet, d'Artagnan, and the king's musketeers Athos, Porthos, and Aramis. They become the Inseparables. In the second part, the reader discovers that there is considerable intrigue going on in the court of Louis XIII. There is rivalry between the king and Cardinal de Richelieu, which is reflected in a rivalry between the king's guards and the cardinal's guards. What is more, scandal follows the king's consort, Queen Anne of Austria, and the duke of Buckingham, who are in a liaison. In the third part, there is a religious war between the Catholics and Protestants of France. There is a siege at La Rochelle (an actual event). In the fourth part, a beautiful femme fatale causes the assassination of the duke of Buckingham, tries without success to poison d'Artagnan, and successfully poisons another character. In the last part, she gets her retribution. Her executioner is the brother of a priest whom she seduced and ruined. D'Artagnan is rewarded with a promotion.

The principal characters have their prototypes in real people. The king, queen, cardinal, and other important members of the court all existed in fact. D'Artagnan is based on a real person.

The king's guards, an elite force whose job was to protect the king, were gentlemen trained from an early age in horsemanship and the use of arms. They were armed with muskets and rapiers. When guarding the king, they rode horseback and used their rapiers, but in war they fought on foot, with their muskets. When Cardinal de Richelieu saw this impressive military unit, he formed his own guard of musketeers. Both corps wore scarlet uniforms. They were distinguished from each other by whether they rode gray or black horses. Not surprisingly, the two corps were rivals.

Dumas tells a simple yet stirring tale. Aside from the dashing swordplay, the novel relies upon, and communicates to the reader, a complex set of social codes. The text supports the institution of absolute monarchy and the aristocratic values of France before 1789. The aristocratic conception of honor, for example, is promulgated in the actions and discussions of the characters.

THE COUNT OF MONTE-CRISTO

First published: Le Comte de Monte-Cristo, 1844-1845 (English translation, 1846)

Type of work: Novel

Evil men cause a young ship captain to spend fourteen years in prison for a crime he did not commit. Once free, the man obtains great wealth, brings about the destruction of the men, reunites two lovers, gives them his wealth, and sails away to parts unknown.

The Count of Monte-Cristo, which may be the best example of Dumas's narrative and imaginative power, is quite unlike The Three Musketeers. It is not historical. The time of its action is not remote, relative to the time of its publication. Its values are not aristocratic but bourgeois. It deals with the power of money, with what currently is called white-collar crime, and with greed. It is about shipping, commerce, banking, bribery, and corruption. Opposing a dishonest group including a lawyer, an accountant, and a banker are an honest shipowner and merchant marine officer.

The novel is also about the bourgeois values of getting demoted and promoted. Dantès, the merchant marine officer, gets promoted, because of his ability, to captain. He is about to marry his sweetheart, Mercédès. He is honest and naïve. He does not think that Danglars wants his captaincy or that Mondego wants his sweetheart. The men falsely accuse him of being a Bonapartist spy. He does not think that the prosecutor Villefort will convict him and send him to prison in order to cover up the wrongdoing of Villefort's father. Dantès, for being too innocent, is demoted.

He learns in prison of a great treasure hidden on the island of Monte-Cristo. He escapes. Retrieving the fortune, he changes his identity, becoming the Count of Monte-Cristo. He is, in a sense, promoted. Now extremely wealthy, he seeks vengeance on those who have wronged him. He is also healthy and handsome, despite his years in prison.

“Monte-Cristo” is Italian for “Christ mount” or “Cristo hill.” Château D’If, the island prison from which the count escapes (by water, necessarily), is French for “house of the evergreen tree.” In a sense, then, a second son of God (healthy, rich, and handsome) is born from the watery grave at the foot of the Christmas tree. The mission of this second son is to drive the crooked money-grubbers from the temple of the new industrial capitalism. The son has fallen, and he has risen again. In the end, he disappears to even greater adventure over the blue horizon.

Dumas got the gist of the plot from the files of the Parisian police. In 1807, a handsome young shoemaker was sent to prison by a falsehood. In prison, he learned of a hidden treasure. Once free and with the treasure, the shoemaker did not behave as the count does. The shoemaker personally murdered all but one of the people responsible for his misfortune. The one he did not murder murdered him. The count, on the other hand, does not murder his wrongdoers but instead creates events in which each wrongdoer destroys himself.

MARGUERITE DE VALOIS

First published: La Reine Margot, 1845
(English translation, 1845)

Type of work: Novel

During the last two years of the reign of Charles IX (1572-1574), a political rivalry develops, with Catherine de Médicis, mother of Charles, on one side, and Henri de Navarre (later King Henri IV) and his wife, Marguerite de Valois, her daughter, on the other.

Marguerite de Valois, written with Auguste Maquet, is the first novel of Dumas’s Valois trilogy, which ranks among the author’s best works. The characters have their counterparts in the actual history of the sixteenth century. The novel is not a romance; no laws of nature are suspended, and the characters are not endowed with any magical powers. They are, however, somewhat larger than life in their actions and passions. This quality is fitting, however, for the powerful, willful royalty that the novel is about.

Dumas allows himself the liberty of compressing and altering the facts of history in order to construct a compelling story. The novel takes place during a time of religious wars that were as much political as they were religious. The rival factions represented by Marguerite and her mother were Catholic on one hand and Protestant on the other. Upon the death of Charles IX, his brother takes over the throne, becoming Henri III. Henri de Navarre flees for his life, to await the time (1589) when he may obtain the throne.

De Navarre is the protagonist of the novel, despite its title. His enemy is Catherine de Médicis, who wants her son (or, failing that, her grandson) to rule France. Dumas paints de Navarre as a brave and level-headed soldier and politician who is shrewd and capable in dealing with his enemies. He is also capable, as he needed to be to survive, of shifting his religious affiliation. This serves to bring a degree of religious toleration to his nation. Catherine de Médicis is portrayed as a monster. In historical fact it is unlikely that she could have been as evil as Dumas portrays her, although in fact she did authorize the assassination of Admiral de Coligny and his Protestant followers. Furthermore, it appears that her actions led to the infamous Saint Bartholomew’s Day Massacre. She uses her daughter as a pawn, which her daughter resents. Catherine marries Marguerite to Henri so that one way or another her male descendants will rule France—either through Marguerite or through Charles IX.

The novel’s many other characters are also compelling and memorable. Charles IX is a bundle of opposites—now friendly, then deadly, now meek, then tyrannical, now cruel, then kind. Comte Hyacinthe Lerac de la Mole is a fop but also a brave and fierce swordsman and a sincere lover of Marguerite. Others include the perfumer, poisoner, and soothsayer René; the assassin Maurevel; and a large assortment of braggarts, killers, and family.

SUMMARY

Alexandre Dumas, père, was, in his amazing productivity, larger than life, like many of his characters. This has blinded many critics to his genius as a literary creator. He is not a stylist or an exquisite craftsman like Edgar Allan Poe or Gustave Flaubert. On the other hand, his novels are impossible to put down; they lead the enchanted reader to the end. He is still read around the world, his stories still are retold in new works, including film. He succeeded in his aim of making history come alive.

Richard P. Benton

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Le Capitaine Paul, 1838 (Captain Paul, 1848)

La Salle d'Armes, 1838 (includes Pauline [English translation, 1844], Pascal Bruno [English translation, 1837], and Murat [English translation, 1896])

Acté, 1838 (English translation, 1904)

La Comtesse de Salisbury, 1839

Le Capitaine Pamphile, 1840 (Captain Pamphile, 1850)

Othon l'Archer, 1840 (Otho the Archer, 1860)

Aventures de Lyderic, 1842 (Lyderic, Count of Flanders, 1903)

Ascanio, 1843 (with Paul Meurice; English translation, 1849)

Georges, 1843 (George, 1846)

Le Chevalier d'Harmental, 1843 (with Auguste Maquet; The Chevalier d'Harmental, 1856)

Une Fille du Régent, 1844 (with Maquet; The Regent's Daughter, 1845)

Amaury, 1844 (English translation, 1854)

Sylvandire, 1844 (The Disputed Inheritance, 1847; also as Sylvandire, 1897)

Gabriel Lambert, 1844 (The Galley Slave, 1849; also as Gabriel Lambert, 1904)

Les Frères corses, 1844 (The Corsican Brothers, 1880)

Les Trois Mousquetaires, 1844 (The Three Musketeers, 1846)

Le Comte de Monte-Cristo, 1844-1845 (The Count of Monte-Cristo, 1846)

Vingt Ans après, 1845 (with Maquet; Twenty Years After, 1846)

La Reine Margot, 1845 (with Maquet; Marguerite de Navarre: Or, The Massacre of Saint Bartholomew's Eve, 1845; better known as Marguerite de Valois, 1846)

La Guerre des femmes, 1845-1846 (Nanon, 1847; also as The War of Women, 1895)

La Dame de Monsoreau, 1846 (Chicot the Jester, 1857)

Le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, 1846 (with Maquet; Marie Antoinette: Or, The Chevalier of the Red House, 1846; also as The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, 1893)

Le Bâtard de Mauléon, 1846 (The Bastard of Mauléon, 1848)

Les Deux Diane, 1846 (with Meurice; The Two Dianas, 1857)

Mémoires d'un médecin, 1846-1848 (with Maquet; also known as Joseph Balsamo; Memoirs of a Physician, 1846)

Les Quarante-cinq, 1848 (with Maquet; The Forty-five Guardsmen, 1847)

Le Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1848-1850 (with Maquet; The Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1857; also as 3 volumes: The Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1893; Louise de la Vallière, 1893; and The Man in the Iron Mask, 1893)

La Véloce, 1848-1851

Le Collier de la reine, 1849-1850 (with Maquet; The Queen's Necklace, 1855)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Investigate the complex social codes in Alexandre Dumas, père's The Three Musketeers.
- Show how The Count of Monte-Cristo both fulfills and defies the writer's devotion to historical reality as a basis for fiction.
- Compare the attitude to history reflected in the novels of Sir Walter Scott and Dumas.
- By what techniques does Dumas make convincing larger-than-life characters?
- Discuss the more memorable aspects of Paris found in Dumas's novels.

Alexandre Dumas, père

La Tulipe noire, 1850 (with Maquet and Paul Lacroix; The Black Tulip, 1851)
Ange Pitou, 1851 (Six Years Later, 1851; also as Ange Pitou, 1859)
Conscience l'Innocent, 1852 (Conscience, 1905)
Olympe de Clèves, 1852 (English translation, 1894)
Isaac Laquedem, 1852-1853
La Comtesse de Charny, 1853-1855 (The Countess de Charny, 1858)
Le Page du Duc de Savoie, 1854 (Emmanuel Philibert, 1854; also as The Page of the Duke of Savoy, 1861)
El Saltéador, 1854 (The Brigand, 1897)
Catherine Blum, 1854 (The Foresters, 1854; also as Catherine Blum, 1861)
Ingénue, 1854 (English translation, 1855)
Les Mohicans de Paris, 1854-1855 and Salvator, 1855-1859 (The Mohicans of Paris, 1875; abridged version)
Les Meneurs de loups, 1857 (The Wolf Leader, 1904)
Charles le Téméraire, 1857 (Charles the Bold, 1860)
Les Compagnons de Jéhu, 1857 (Roland de Montrevel, 1860; also as The Companions of Jéhu, 1895)
Ainsi-soit-il!, 1858 (also as Madame de Chamblay, 1862; Madame de Chamblay, 1869)
Le Capitaine Richard, 1858 (The Twin Captains, 1861)
L'Horoscope, 1858 (The Horoscope, 1897)
Le Chasseur de Sauvagine, 1859 (The Wild Duck Shooter, 1906)
Le Médecin de Java, 1859 (also as L'île de Feu, 1870; Doctor Basilius, 1860)
Histoire d'un cabanon et d'un chalet, 1859 (The Convict's Son, 1905)
Les Louves de Machecoul, 1859 (The Last Vendée, 1894; also as The She Wolves of Machecoul, 1895)
Le Père la Ruine, 1860 (Père la Ruine, 1905)
La Maison de Glace, 1860 (The Russian Gipsy, 1860)
La San-Felice, 1864-1865 (The Lovely Lady Hamilton, 1903)
Le Comte de Moret, 1866 (The Count of Moret, 1868)
La Terreur prussienne, 1867 (The Prussian Terror, 1915)
Les Blancs et les bleus, 1867-1868 (The Whites and the Blues, 1895)
Le Chevalier de Sainte-Hermine, 1869, serial; 2005, book; (The Last Cavalier: Being the Adventures of Count Sainte Hermine in the Age of Napoleon, 2007)
The Romances of Alexandre Dumas, 1893-1897 (60 volumes)
The Novels of Alexandre Dumas, 1903-1911 (56 volumes)

DRAMA:

La Chasse et l'amour, pr., pb. 1825 (with Adolphe de Leuven and P.-J. Rousseau)
La Noce et l'enterrement, pr., pb. 1826
Henri III et sa cour, pr., pb. 1829 (Catherine of Cleves, 1831; also known as Henry III and His Court, 1904)
Christine: Ou, Stockholm, Fontainebleau, et Rome, pr., pb. 1830
Antony, pr., pb. 1831 (English translation, 1904)
Charles VII chez ses grands vassaux, pr., pb. 1831
Napoléon Bonaparte: Ou, Trente Ans dans l'histoire de France, pr., pb. 1831
Richard Darlington, pr. 1831, pb. 1832
Teresa, pr., pb. 1832 (based on a draft by Auguste Anicet-Bourgeois)
Le Mari de la veuve, pr., pb. 1832
La Tour de Nesle, pr., pb. 1832 (redrafted from a manuscript by Frédéric Gaillardet; The Tower of Nesle, 1890)
Le Fils de l'émigré: Ou, Le Peuple, pr. 1832, selections pb. 1902
Angèle, pr. 1833, pb. 1834
La Vénitienne, pr., pb. 1834
Catherine Howard, pr., pb. 1834 (English translation, 1859)
Cromwell et Charles I, pr., pb. 1835 (with E.-C.-H. Cordellier-Delanoue)
Don Juan de Marana: Ou, La Chute d'un ange, pr., pb. 1836

- Kean: Ou, Désordre et génie*, pr., pb. 1836 (with Théaulon de Lambert and Frédéric de Courcy; Edmund Kean: Or, The Genius and the Libertine, 1847)
- Piquillo*, pr., pb. 1837 (with Gérard de Nerval; libretto)
- Caligula*, pr. 1837, pb. 1838
- Le Bourgeois de Gand: Ou, Le Secrétaire du duc d'Albe*, pr., pb. 1838 (with Hippolyte Romand)
- Paul Jones*, pr., pb. 1838
- Bathilde*, pr., pb. 1839 (with Auguste Maquet)
- Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle*, pr., pb. 1839 (English translation, 1855)
- L'Alchimiste*, pr., pb. 1839 (with Nerval)
- Léo Burckart*, pr., pb. 1839 (with Nerval)
- Jarvis l'honnête homme: Ou, Le Marchand de Londres*, pr., pb. 1840 (originally credited to Charles Lafont)
- Un Mariage sous Louis XV*, pr., pb. 1841 (A Marriage of Convenience, 1899)
- Jeannic le Breton: Ou, Le Gérant responsable*, pr. 1841, pb. 1842 (with Eugène Bourgeois)
- Le Séducteur et le mari*, pr., pb. 1842 (with Lafont)
- Lorenzino*, pr., pb. 1842
- Halifax*, pr. 1842, pb. 1843 (with Adolphe D'Ennery?)
- Le Mariage au tambour*, pr., pb. 1843 (with Leuven and Léon Lhérie)
- Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr*, pr., pb. 1843 (The Ladies of Saint-Cyr, 1870)
- Louise Bernard*, pr., pb. 1843 (with Leuven and Lhérie)
- L'École des princes*, pr. 1843, pb. 1844 (with Louis Lefèvre)
- Les Mousquetaires*, pr., pb. 1845 (with Maquet; adaptation of Dumas's novel Vingt ans après)
- Le Garde forestier*, pr., pb. 1845 (with Leuven and Lhérie)
- Sylvandire*, pr., pb. 1845 (with Leuven and Louis-Émile Vanderburch)
- Un Conte des fées*, pr., pb. 1845 (with Leuven and Lhérie)
- Une Fille du Régent*, pr., pb. 1846
- Échec et mat*, pr., pb. 1846 (with Octave Feuillet and Paul Bocage)
- La Reine Margot*, pr., pb. 1847 (with Maquet; adaptation of Dumas's novel)
- Intrigue et amour*, pr., pb. 1847 (adaptation of Friedrich Schiller's play Kabale und Liebe)
- Le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge*, pr., pb. 1847 (with Maquet; The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, 1859)
- Hamlet, prince de Danemark*, pr. 1847, pb. 1848 (with Paul Meurice; adaptation of William Shakespeare's play)
- Monte-Cristo*, parts 1 and 2, pr., pb. 1848 (with Maquet; Monte-Cristo, part 1, 1850)
- Catilina*, pr., pb. 1848 (with Maquet)
- Le Connétable de Bourbon: Ou, L'Italie au seizième siècle*, pr., pb. 1849 (with Eugène Grangé and Xavier de Montépin)
- La Jeunesse des mousquetaires*, pr., pb. 1849 (with Maquet; based on Dumas's novel Les Trois Mousquetaires; The Musketeers, 1850)
- Le Cachemire vert*, pr., pb. 1849 (with Eugène Nus)
- Le Comte Hermann*, pr., pb. 1849
- Le Testament de César*, pr., pb. 1849 (with Jules Lacroix)
- La Guerre des femmes*, pr., pb. 1849 (with Maquet; based on Dumas's novel)
- Le Chevalier d'Harmental*, pr., pb. 1849 (with Maquet; based on Dumas's novel)
- Le Vingt-quatre février*, pr., pb. 1850 (adapted from Zacharias Werner's play Der 24 Februar)
- Urbain Grandier*, pr., pb. 1850 (with Maquet)
- Les Chevaliers du Lansquenet*, pr., pb. 1850 (with Grangé and Montépin)
- La Chasse au chastre*, pr., pb. 1850 (with Maquet?; based on Dumas's story La Chasse au chastre)
- Pauline*, pr., pb. 1850 (with Grangé and Montépin; based on Dumas's novel Pauline)
- Villefort*, pr., pb. 1851 (with Maquet; part 4 of Monte-Cristo)
- Le Comte de Morcerf*, pr., pb. 1851 (with Maquet; part 3 of Monte-Cristo)
- Romulus*, pr., pb. 1854
- L'Orestie*, pr., pb. 1856

Alexandre Dumas, père

L'Invitation à la valse, pr., pb. 1857 (adapted in English as Childhood Dreams, 1881)
L'Envers d'une conspiration, pr., pb. 1860
Le Roman d'Elvire, pr., pb. 1860 (with Leuven)
La Veillée allemande, pr. 1863, pb. 1864 (with Bernard Lopez)
Madame de Chamblay, pr. 1868, pb. 1869
Les Blancs et les bleus, pr., pb. 1869 (adaptation of part of his novel Les Blancs et les bleus)
Théâtre complet, pb. 1873-1876 (25 volumes)
The Great Lover, and Other Plays, pb. 1979

NONFICTION:

Gaule et France, 1833 (The Progress of Democracy, 1841)
La Vendée et Madame, 1833 (The Duchess of Berri in La Vendée, 1833)
Impressions de voyage, 1833, 1838, 1841, 1843 (Travels in Switzerland, 1958)
Napoléon, 1836 (English translation, 1874)
Isabel de Bavière, 1836 (Isabel of Bavaria, 1846)
Guelfes et Gibelins, 1836
Quinze Jours au Sinai, 1838 (Impressions of Travel in Egypt and Arabia Petraea, 1839)
Crimes célèbres, 1838-1840 (Celebrated Crimes, 1896)
Le Midi de la France, 1841 (Pictures of Travel in the South of France, 1852)
Excursions sur les bords du Rhin, 1841 (with Gérard de Nerval)
Jehanne la Pucelle, 1429-1431, 1842 (Joan the Heroic Maiden, 1847)
Chroniques du roi Pépin, 1842 (Pepin, 1906)
Le Spéronare, 1842
Le Corricolo, 1843
Mes mémoires, 1852, 1853, 1854-1855 (My Memoirs, 1907-1909)
Souvenirs de 1830 à 1842, 1854-1855
Causeries, 1860
Les Garibaldiens, 1861 (The Garibaldians in Sicily, 1861)
Histoires de mes bêtes, 1868 (My Pets, 1909)
Souvenirs dramatiques, 1868
Grand Dictionnaire de cuisine, 1873 (with Anatole France)
On Board the Emma, 1929
The Road to Monte-Cristo, 1956

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Histoire d'un casse-noisette, 1845 (Story of a Nutcracker, 1846)
La Bouillie de la Comtesse Berthe, 1845 (Good Lady Bertha's Honey Broth, 1846)
Le Roi de Bohème, 1853 (also as La Jeunesse de Pierrot, 1854; When Pierrot Was Young, 1924)
Le Sifflet enchanté, 1859 (The Enchanted Whistle, 1894)

TRANSLATION:

Mémoires de Garibaldi, 1860 (of Giuseppe Garibaldi's Memorie autobiografiche)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Œuvres complètes, 1846-1877 (301 volumes)
Œuvres d'Alexandre Dumas, 1962-1967 (38 volumes)

About the Author

Bell, David F. Real Time: Accelerating Narrative from Balzac to Zola. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.

Hemmings, F. W. J. Alexandre Dumas: The King of Romance. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1979.

Macdonald, Roger. "The Man in the Iron Mask." History Today 55, no. 11 (November, 2005): 30.

- Marinetti, Amelita. "Death, Resurrection, and Fall in Dumas' Le Comte de Monte-Cristo." The French Review 50, no. 2 (December, 1976): 260-269.
- Maund, Kari, and Phil Nanson. The Four Musketeers: The True Story of D'Artagnan, Porthos, Aramis, and Athos. Stroud, Gloucestershire, England: Tempus, 2005.
- Maurois, André. The Titans: A Three-Generation Biography of the Dumas. Translated by Gerard Hopkins. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1971.
- Ross, Michael. Alexandre Dumas. North Pomfret, Vt.: David & Charles, 1981.
- Schopp, Claude. Alexandre Dumas: Genius of Life. Translated by A. J. Koch. New York: Franklin Watts, 1988.
- Stowe, Richard S. Alexandre Dumas (père). Boston: Twayne, 1976.

Popperfoto/Archive Photos

DAPHNE DU MAURIER

Born: London, England
May 13, 1907

Died: Par, Cornwall, England
April 19, 1989

One of the most celebrated popular fiction writers of her time, du Maurier inspired the revival of the gothic romance.

BIOGRAPHY

Daphne du Maurier (dew MOR-ee-ay) was born in London, England, on May 13, 1907, the second daughter of Gerald and Muriel (Beaumont) du Maurier. Her father, Sir Gerald du Maurier, was a leading actor of his day, and her grandfather was George du Maurier, author of Trilby (1894), the story of a young girl mesmerized by a sinister Hungarian musician named Svengali. Du Maurier enjoyed a privileged childhood, surrounded by celebrities and protected from life's harshness. She was instructed by a governess and at private schools until she was sixteen, when she was sent to a finishing school near Paris.

Soon after she returned to England, she developed a crush on an older cousin and then fell in love with film director Carol Reed, experiences that led to the writing of three novels that were moderately successful. Her breakthrough came with the publication of Jamaica Inn (1936), a thoroughly romantic historical novel inspired by her discovery of Cornwall, a rugged, windswept peninsula of southwestern England that was to be the setting for her most popular works. Her marriage in 1932, to Major Frederick A. M. Browning, and her subsequently becoming the mother of three children created a conflict between her duties as wife and mother and her passion for writing. It was a conflict she resolved by spending as much time as she could on her own in Cornwall.

Du Maurier moved to Cornwall permanently in 1943 when she leased Menabilly, a crumbling old mansion on the coast that she had already used as the setting for Rebecca (1938), her best and most famous novel. No sooner had she moved in than she set to work writing a series of historical best-sellers, beginning with Hungry Hill (1943), a family chronicle set in Ireland, Frenchman's Creek (1941), a novel that takes place near Menabilly, and The King's General (1946), a novel based on the actual history of the original owners of Menabilly. Although the house was cold, drafty, and rat-ridden, she loved it, and her children bravely put up with it while du Maurier continued to write successful novels, plays, and short stories.

She became the first lady of gothic romance fiction, a label she resented because she also wrote history, biography, and stage plays. When she did try something not gothic, like The Parasites (1949), an incisive analysis of the modern bohemian temperament as revealed in the lives of three talented but spoiled young artists, it was largely ignored. She won back her fans with My Cousin Rachel (1951), a tale of mystery and intrigue set on the Cornish coast. She also published a biography of her grandfather (she had already published a biography of her father in 1934) and the novel Mary Anne (1954), a fictionalized account of a colorful ancestor. She also began writing short stories, the best known of which are "The Birds" (in The Apple Tree: A Short Novel and Some Stories, 1952), the inspiration for the Alfred Hitchcock film, and "Don't Look Now" (in Not After Midnight, and Other Stories, 1971), a haunting tale of intrigue, deception, and murder set in Venice that was masterfully filmed by Nicholas Roeg.

Du Maurier's final novels, The Scapegoat (1957), The Glass-Blowers (1963), The Flight of the Falcon (1965), The House on the Strand (1969), and Rule Britannia (1972), reveal her growing interest in psychology and the question of identity. The best of these is The House on the Strand, a novel in which du Maurier renders the brittle landscape of drug-induced hallucination with stunning clarity. In 1969, du Maurier was named a Dame of the British Empire. It was also the year she moved from Menabilly to Kilmarth, the house which had been the setting for The House on the Strand. Rule Britannia, her last novel, with its shrill anti-Americanism, is merely an embarrassment.

In her later years, her health failing, she became bitter and depressed, a virtual recluse. She died in her sleep on April 19, 1989, at the age of eighty-one, and her ashes were taken to Kilmarth and buried on the grounds.

ANALYSIS

Daphne du Maurier was a storyteller who had good stories to tell and knew how to tell them. It is this union of good plot and good style that accounts for her enormous success as a writer of popular fiction. Her stories are products of a fertile imagination fueled by her love of history and her sense of place. She also brought to her writing the keen psychological insights necessary to develop believable characters and to explore human conflicts, especially those between the sexes. Such tension helps build suspense, but the element of mystery in a du Maurier story depends even more on her fascination with the deceptiveness of appearances. In most of her works, things are never quite what they seem, and no one is above suspicion.

Du Maurier's ability to tell a story is evident in the technique she uses to set the mood in the beginning lines. In deceptively simple language she moves quickly into the story, not only establishing atmosphere but also creating suspense. Often she achieves this effect by using a first-person narrator to give the story greater credibility. In The House on the Strand, Dick Kilmarth is transported back to medieval times by a drug he has found in the basement of the family's ancestral home on the coast of Cornwall. "The first thing I noticed," he says, "was the clarity of the air, and then the sharp green color of the land." He then remarks on the lack of softness in the landscape and the way the hills do not blend with the sky but stand out "like rocks, so close that I could almost touch them." It seems that all his senses have been "in some way sharpened" except for the sense of touch. "I could not feel the ground beneath my feet," he says, adding, "Magnus had warned me of this." It is an ominous remark that raises a number of questions. Just where is Dick Kilmarth, and how did he get wherever he is? Why is his sense of touch dulled? Who is Magnus? As du Maurier proceeds to answer these questions, she raises even more, until Dick's experiences seem to be taking place even as she writes. This technique of mixing answers with new questions is one she uses throughout to keep readers turning the pages.

The opening lines of Rebecca establish the atmosphere so palpably that when Hitchcock made the film, he felt compelled to use a voice-over to achieve the same effect. "Last night I dreamt I went to Manderley again," the narrator says. "It seemed to me I stood by the iron gate leading to the drive, and for a while I could not enter for the way was barred to me. . . . Then, like all dreamers, I was possessed of a sudden with supernatural powers and passed like a spirit through the barrier before me." Du Maurier was actually describing the first time she stumbled upon Menabilly, the neglected, old country house in Cornwall that inspired Rebecca and in which du Maurier later lived for many years. So intense was her feeling for Cornwall that she charmed language into making that feeling almost tangible.

"The Birds," another story filmed by Hitchcock, opens with a line that, though innocent enough, sounds a chilling note: "On December the third the wind changed overnight and it was winter." This is followed by a brief glimpse of the mellow autumn that had just ended and then a hint of something troubling ahead: "The birds had been more restless than ever this fall of the year, the agitation more marked because the days were still . . . [and] there were many more [birds] than usual." Bit by bit du Maurier builds the suspense until there is no escaping the horrible realization of just how threatening the birds really are.

The theme of the deceptiveness of appearances haunts the pages of My Cousin Rachel, in which Philip Ashley is never sure whether his seductive cousin is a murderess or simply a charming flirt. In Rebecca, the young, new wife suffers throughout the novel because she misreads her husband's moods and motives. No one seems to know Rebecca, not even Mrs. Danvers, who is obsessed with her. In "Don't Look Now," the bereaved parents, visiting Venice to forget the death of their daughter, are enmeshed in a web of deception to a point where they can no longer trust their own senses. In The House on the Strand, Dick Kilmarth reaches the point at which hallucination becomes more real than reality. Like him, many of du Maurier's characters are as deceived about themselves as they are about others.

Du Maurier's interest in the tension between the sexes stemmed from turbulent and confused feelings that characterized her own relationships. Her writings on this conflict also mirrored many of the concerns of women of her day, especially women who had achieved independence without feeling quite comfortable with it. Her heroines frequently want to assert themselves but are afraid to take the risk. They defer to men whom they then resent.

The narrator of Rebecca is an example. Her lack of self-esteem is reflected in the fact that throughout the book she is known only as Mrs. de Winter, a name she shares with the first Mrs. de Winter, the legendary Rebecca. The second Mrs. de Winter is half her husband's age and thoroughly uncomfortable in his world. He is the wealthy, dashing lord of the manor while she is the shy, penniless orphan afraid of her own shadow. Here du Maurier is exploring the turmoil within a young girl who longs to feel liberated and equal but who cannot escape feeling trapped and inferior.

Other characteristics that account for du Maurier's enormous popularity are those commonly associated with the gothic novel, a term used to describe a type of novel that reached its peak in the novels of the Brontë sisters, especially Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847). The common ingredients include a remote country house, a poor innocent young girl (usually a governess), a brooding and mysterious older man, and a sinister presence of some sort or other lurking in a remote part of the house. Although only Rebecca fits this mold, du Maurier makes use of the gothic atmosphere in so many of her other novels (Jamaica Inn, Frenchman's Creek, The King's General, My Cousin Rachel) that the impression remains that she was mainly a writer of gothic romances. As such she inspired a whole generation of modern writers to do the same, and her influence continues to be felt in such writers as Mary Stewart, Mary Higgins Clark, and Ruth Rendell.

REBECCA

First published: 1938

Type of work: Novel

A wealthy widower marries a penniless girl and takes her to Manderley, where she is intimidated by the housekeeper and the mystery of Rebecca.

Rebecca is the novel that made Daphne du Maurier famous and that remains her best-known work. Rebecca has been called a modern Jane Eyre, and there are certainly striking similarities between the two novels. In each there is a shy, poor, and rather plain heroine who takes up residence in a grand country house. Once there she is terrorized by strange goings-on, falls in love with the master of the house (an older man), and lives to see the house burned to the ground by a deranged woman. The differences are few but important. Du Maurier's heroine is not a governess but the second wife of a man whose tempestuous first wife died under questionable circumstances. The new wife's shyness is made more painful when she compares herself with the exotic Rebecca.

In Jane Eyre, Mr. Rochester's first wife is alive but mad and stands in the way of his marrying Jane. In the du Maurier story, Rebecca is dead but her spirit haunts the halls of Manderley and puts a strain on the marriage between Maxim and his new wife. Throughout the novel the new wife is convinced that her husband is brooding over the death of Rebecca. This misconception is reinforced by Mrs. Danvers, the sinister housekeeper who keeps Rebecca's boudoir exactly as it used to be. She does her best to poison the heroine's mind, even to the point of encouraging her to jump from a high window.

Maxim is distraught because the truth is that he killed Rebecca in a fit of rage, put her body in a boat, and scuttled the boat. The reader finds out later that Rebecca had deliberately goaded Maxim into killing her because she had just learned she had a terminal illness. The tension between Maxim and his young wife eases once this cloud of secrecy is lifted. Meanwhile, Mrs. Danvers, sensing defeat but unwilling to surrender, sets fire to Manderley and perishes in the conflagration, just as the mad wife does near the end of Jane Eyre.

Du Maurier said that not giving her heroine a name became a challenge to her in writing the novel. For readers it has remained the perfect way to suggest the heroine's low self-esteem, especially since the story is told through her eyes. Above all, however, is du Maurier's superb sense of atmosphere that, once established in the haunting opening lines, continues unflawed until the last chilling lines when the de Winters realize that the crimson glow in the sky is not the sunrise but Manderley in flames. Du Maurier's obsession with Cornwall can be felt in every line, and it is this total sense of place that gives Rebecca its magic. Du Maurier began writing the novel when she was in Egypt with her husband while he was stationed there. In an effort to shut out the stifling heat, the harsh light, and the teeming masses, she returned in her mind to Cornwall's chill mists and stormy seas, its craggy promontories, and its windswept beaches. The result was a modern but ageless love story—with a twist.

THE HOUSE ON THE STRAND

First published: 1969

Type of work: Novel

An unhappy husband uses drugs to escape, through time travel, to the fourteenth century and back.

In The House on the Strand, Dick Kilmarth experiments with a hallucinogenic drug that transports him back to fourteenth century Cornwall, just before the onset of the Black Death. His initial encounter is so overwhelming that he knows he must repeat it, even though he suffers horrible aftereffects. The more he finds modern life unsatisfying, the more he is compelled to return to a time when people and events seemed bigger than life. Du Maurier cleverly manipulates the parallels between Dick's real and imaginary worlds so as to enlist sympathy for Dick's rejection of the real world. Dick, who is married to a shrewish woman named Vita, who has two loutish sons from a previous marriage, is thoroughly disenchanted with the emptiness and boredom of modern life in general.

In contrast, the life of the fourteenth century is given all the sweep and pageantry of a medieval melodrama. Du Maurier, with her flair for historical romance and her devotion to Cornwall, is able to bring that distant drama to life and give it such immediacy that it makes Dick's preference for those times quite understandable. Near the end of the story Dick chooses to return to the fourteenth century even though he knows that he will be returning to a time when England was about to be ravaged by plague. During his rational periods he is aware that his life in the fourteenth century is all a fantasy and that he is killing himself pursuing it, but he would rather live vicariously in the glorious past, even if it is a dream, than die of boredom in what is called reality. In the end, the choice is no longer his to make.

As in Rebecca, the psychological realism of the novel gives credence to its extraordinary events. The novel develops some of du Maurier's favorite themes: the tension between the sexes, the power of the past over the present, and the deceptiveness of appearances. Added to this is du Maurier's boldness in writing such a controversial novel. In daring to write of mind-altering drugs, she could have expected to alienate her followers, offend the moralists, and be laughed at by the youth of the 1960's, who might have accused her of invading their turf. All these things happened, but the book sold well anyway.

DAPHNE DU MAURIER

"THE BIRDS"

First published: 1952 (collected in The Apple Tree: A Short Novel and Some Stories, 1952)

Type of work: Short story

A farmer and his family in Cornwall are terrorized by hordes of killer birds that mount a deadly attack on their isolated farmhouse.

"The Birds," one of Daphne du Maurier's most chilling short stories, is in the collection The Apple Tree. The shock lies in the idea of birds as destroyers. People usually associate birds with things like freedom and beauty and music. However, in this story, du Maurier drew on her own experience with vicious seagulls. She imagines once-innocent creatures suddenly mutated into merciless killers bent on destroying humanity.

The story focuses on the heroic efforts of disabled farmer Nat Hocken to protect his family from the hordes of birds that relentlessly try to invade the family's cottage. Nat does odd jobs around the neighborhood, and on his way home one evening in early December, he notices that there are more birds around than usual and that they have become strangely aggressive. When he arrives home, he hears on the radio that all over England something has happened to the birds. "The flocks of birds have caused dislocation in all areas," says the broadcaster, and there is something sinister in the word "dislocation," for it suggests that the order of nature has been broken and humanity has lost its dominion over the birds and beasts. When the government and the military admit that there is nothing they can do, Nat is forced to rely on himself to survive. It is survival of the fittest, and he knows who will win.

Birds peck at Nat's eyes one day, and he is viciously attacked by gulls the next. One day when the birds calm down a bit, Nat goes to check on his neighbors, only to find their mutilated bodies next to the telephone. That night, as the birds mount an attack, Nat works ceaselessly to plug up every access to the cottage as thousands of birds descend upon the house, breaking the windows and screaming down the chimney.

Finally, unable to resist any longer, Nat settles back and listens as even the tiniest of birds join in the final assault. As the end approaches, he wonders "how many millions of years were stored in those little brains, behind the stabbing beaks, the piercing eyes, now giving them this instinct to destroy mankind with all the deft precision of machines."

In addition to the gradual layering of horrifying detail, du Maurier also heightens the effect of the story by focusing only on Nat Hocken and his family. Defenseless, alone, doomed, they seem to be the last people on earth—and perhaps they are.

SUMMARY

In her fiction, Daphne du Maurier presents a world in which appearances are deceiving, events defy explanation, and essential mysteries go unresolved. Her superb storytelling skills have blinded critics to the fact that the truly frightening element in her fiction is not the superficial mystery but the menace just below the surface. Deception, illusion, and uncertainty are the furies that torment her characters. There is a rebel beneath du Maurier's romanticism.

Thomas Whissen

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Loving Spirit, 1931
I'll Never Be Young Again, 1932
The Progress of Julius, 1933
Jamaica Inn, 1936
Rebecca, 1938
Frenchman's Creek, 1941
Hungry Hill, 1943
The King's General, 1946
The Parasites, 1949
My Cousin Rachel, 1951
Mary Anne, 1954
The Scapegoat, 1957
Castle Dor, 1962 (with Arthur Quiller-Couch)
The Glass-Blowers, 1963
The Flight of the Falcon, 1965
The House on the Strand, 1969
Rule Britannia, 1972

SHORT FICTION:

Come Wind, Come Weather, 1940
Happy Christmas, 1940
The Apple Tree: A Short Novel and Some Stories, 1952 (also known as The Birds, and Other Stories and as Kiss Me Again, Stranger: A Collection of Eight Stories)
Early Stories, 1955
The Breaking Point, 1959 (also known as The Blue Lenses, and Other Stories)
The Treasury of du Maurier Short Stories, 1960
Not After Midnight, and Other Stories, 1971 (also known as Don't Look Now)
Echoes from the Macabre, 1976
The Rendezvous, and Other Stories, 1980
Classics of the Macabre, 1987

DRAMA:

Rebecca: A Play in Three Acts, pr. 1940, pb. 1943 (adaptation of her novel)
The Years Between, pr. 1944, pb. 1945
September Tide, pr. 1948, pb. 1949

NONFICTION:

Gerald: A Portrait, 1934
The du Mauriers, 1937
The Infernal World of Branwell Brontë, 1960
Vanishing Cornwall, 1967
Golden Lads: Sir Francis Bacon, Anthony Bacon, and Their Friends, 1975
The Winding Stair: Francis Bacon, His Rise and Fall, 1976
Growing Pains: The Shaping of a Writer, 1977 (pb. in U.S. as Myself When Young: The Shaping of a Writer, 1977)
The Rebecca Notebook, and Other Memories, 1980
Letters from Menabilly: Portrait of a Friendship, 1994 (Oriol Mallet, editor)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What restrictions did Daphne du Maurier's early literary reputation impose on her later writing career?
- What did du Maurier gain by her custom of having her narrators ask so many questions?
- In Rebecca, was du Maurier doing more than exploiting the well-known turns in the plot of Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847)?
- To what extent was du Maurier's "The Birds" not just a provocation but a guide to the film directed by Alfred Hitchcock?
- Explain the "menace just below the surface" in du Maurier's fiction.

Daphne du Maurier

EDITED TEXTS:

The Young George du Maurier: A Selection of His Letters 1860-1867, 1951

Best Stories of Phyllis Bottome, 1963

About the Author

Auerbach, Nina. Daphne du Maurier: Haunted Heiress. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2000.

Forster, Margaret. Daphne du Maurier: The Secret Life of the Renowned Storyteller. New York: Doubleday, 1993.

Horner, Avril, and Sue Zlosnik. Writing, Identity, and the Gothic Imagination. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Kelly, Richard Michael. Daphne du Maurier. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Shallcross, Martyn. The Private World of Daphne du Maurier. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.

Taylor, Helen, ed. The Daphne du Maurier Companion. London: Virago, 2007.

DUONG THU HUONG

Born: Thai Binh, Vietnam
1947

Internationally acclaimed by both the popular press and academic audiences, Duong is the most widely read literary figure from Vietnam since the Communist takeover of that country in 1975.

BIOGRAPHY

Born in central Vietnam in 1947, when that country was still a French colony, Duong Thu Huong (zhung tew huong) started her life with modest beginnings as the daughter of a school-teacher mother and a father who was a tailor and guerilla fighter for Vietnamese leader Ho Chi Minh. As a teenager in the mid-1960's, she joined the Communist Party, serving as the leader of a Communist youth brigade that, in part, provided entertainment for Communist troops during the Vietnam War. She was one of only three persons in the brigade of forty to survive the experience. Forever committed to and involved with politics, she also voluntarily joined the Vietnamese army in its brief war against China in 1979; she was the first woman to serve in combat on the front lines of the conflict. She also was a war correspondent and wrote news releases about the war. After the war, she wrote and spoke on behalf of the government and the Communist cause. During this time she supported herself primarily by writing fiction and screenplays.

In the early 1980's, there was a major shift in her temperament and beliefs about the role of Communism in her country. She began to speak openly against corruption, bribery, chicanery, repression, and bureaucracy at public political events, as well as in her writings. During the decade she wrote three novels. The first two, Hành trình ngày thơ ấu (1985; journey in childhood) and Bên kia bờ ảo vọng: Tiểu thuyết (1988; Beyond Illusions, 2002), were not problematic for the government. In fact, at this time the government in Hanoi had called for writers in the country to comment about the nation's social, economic, and political problems.

However, when she published Nhung thiên duong

mù: Tiểu thuyết (1988; Paradise of the Blind, 1993), she ran into trouble with government censors and mainline Communists. While no one thought the work to be overtly anti-Communist or antigovernment propaganda, it was too revealing of problems in its nuances and undertones. The two major objections from the government seem to have been the subtle comments about the role of women, both in Vietnamese society and in a Communist-controlled country, and about the government's policy of land reform—the collective rather than private ownership of businesses and property. The work was extremely popular in Vietnam, where some forty thousand copies were sold before the novel was withdrawn and the government forbid it to be circulated. Ownership of the novel was declared illegal and punishable by imprisonment.

In addition, during the controversy about the novel, Duong committed a sin unpardonable by the Communist hierarchy, when she spoke openly for “pluralism,” meaning the recognition and legitimate involvement of political parties other than the Communist Party in the affairs of the nation. She also advocated for human rights in a manner that was unacceptable to the government. She was expelled from the Communist Party in 1989, and in April, 1991, she was arrested on fabricated charges and imprisoned without trial. Government officials accused her of having unsanctioned contacts with agents of foreign governments and of smuggling illegal documents out of the country. There was no substance to the charges, as Duong's activities had always been open and public. During her seven months in prison, Duong was recognized by Amnesty International and other organizations as a political prisoner. In addition, she was fired from her job as a screenwriter for the government-sanctioned Vietnam Film Company. Previously, she had been awarded prizes for her work with the organization.

Upon her release from prison in 1991, she found herself the subject of international attention and curiosity. Paradise of the Blind had been critically acclaimed, but the government then banned all of her works in Vietnam. However, her work was recognized and honored by other countries. In 1992 and 1996, two of her novels were short-listed for a French literary prize, the Prix Femina; in France, Paradise of the Blind was so well received that she was also given the title Chevalier of the Ordre des Arts et des Lettres by the French government. In 1992, she received a grant from the United States-based Hammet-Hellman Foundation. In 1995, she sent another novel, Tiểu thuyết vô đề (1991), to publishers in France and England; an English translation, Novel Without a Name, was published in 1995.

Duong's passport was revoked and other recriminations followed, primarily to prevent her from having contact with the outside world. Nevertheless, she was further honored with the International Dublin IMPAC Award in 1997, the Prince Claus Foundation Award in 1999, and the Grinzane Cavour Literary Award in 2005. In the spring of 2006, the Vietnamese government gave her permission to travel abroad, and she was interviewed by American novelist Robert Stone in New York City. That same year, she received the PEN-Novib Freedom of Expression Award.

In the early twenty-first century, Duong continued to write while in semiretirement in Hanoi, where she lived with her two children on a meager monthly pension from the government and the royalties from her work.

ANALYSIS

Since Duong Thu Huong's novels were first translated into French, English, and other languages in the late 1980's, she has been by far the most widely read and acclaimed writer from her native Vietnam. The success of her works lies in her ability to successfully intertwine themes that are both personal and political. It is hard to escape the omnipresent historical and biographical elements of her books; yet it would be misleading to interpret her novels by giving too much attention to these matters. She has lived her life amid the backdrop of the Vietnamese War; hence, this war is her subject matter. Similarly, the biographical elements of her life sometimes find their way into her fiction in heavy-handed ways. Nevertheless, the impetus of her efforts is neither historical nor biographical.

Of more importance are the political elements in her work, which are never far from the background of her plots and the lives of her characters. Originally, she used and developed her talents as a writer to promote the Communist cause in press releases from the front lines during the short Sino-Vietnamese War of 1979. Her writings during the early 1980's were primarily her work for the Vietnam Film Company, a government organization.

However, by the time she wrote her first novel, Hành trình ngày thơ ấu, she had begun to expose weaknesses and failures of the Communist government after its takeover of Vietnam in 1975. She realized that the government, primarily because of its corruption and violations of human rights, was systematically making life worse for all citizens. In this first book, which is a novel of initiation, a twelve-year-old girl travels across the country to find her father, who is fighting in the war, to seek his help for a social problem—the abuse of one of her friends. The girl comes to see that justice cannot be found because of the war and the policies of the government, which are alluded to but not overtly condemned. Duong more forthrightly tackles this conflict between loyalty to government and loyalty to justice in her second work, Beyond Illusions, in which a young married couple is divided in the course of action for its life. Linh, the wife and Duong persona, is committed to doing what is right, despite the consequences. Her husband, Nguyen, on the other hand, betrays justice and human rights in order to secure favors for himself and to protect his family. Both novels were extremely popular in Vietnam during the 1980's, and hundreds of thousands of copies were sold.

With the publication of Paradise of the Blind in 1988, however, Duong came into serious trouble with the government. While she followed her usual method of criticizing the government by criticizing individual members of the government, her exposé of the weaknesses of land reform was not visibly directed at the corruption of individual Communist Party members so much as at the established policy of the entire government. Accordingly, the work was banned in Vietnam, while becoming an international best-seller in Europe and North America. Readers will note that the comments about land reform in the novel are few in number and of little substance; nevertheless, the Communist government would not permit the novel's circulation.

In Novel Without a Name, Duong again increased the scope and magnanimity of her attack on the government by writing what is basically an antiwar novel, but of course the war is the American war in Vietnam. She came to question the purpose of removing the capitalists and democrats from South Vietnam when the result was increased economic disaster and the loss of human rights for all citizens, whether in North or South Vietnam. The novel is told from the point of view of a young soldier in the army who is fighting for North Vietnam and comes to understand the futility of his efforts, even after his country's victory. Duong creates another novel with a similar theme in Luu Ly (1997; Memories of a Pure Spring, 2000), which is the most biographical of her works and recalls many of her own experiences in Vietnam's wars against the United States and China.

Ostensibly, she left war and politics behind in Chon vang (1999; No Man's Land, 2005) by turning to the personal and internal conflicts of women. The main character, Mien, is happily married and living on a farm with her husband, when a previous husband whom she thought dead returns after an absence of fourteen years. Politics have not been completely omitted, however, as the returning husband represents the life that Mien could have had, in contrast to her current husband, who embodies the life she is living. In something of a national, disparate allegory, questioning what might have happened if South Vietnam had won the war, Duong suggests that things would be horrid, no matter which country won.

The bleakness and pessimism of the repeated themes of her work are abetted by the style of her prose. Many of her characters survive the atrocities of the war and its aftermath, but few are able to conquer or come even close to making peace with them. At times, she writes of Vietnam when life was war free and carefree, before the Communists and Americans wreaked havoc on the nation, and readers can find sentimentality in these depictions of a time when life was good. However, she becomes less sentimental in depicting life during and after the war. While wartime is never good and people are victimized to the point of no return, many people do go on and find stability in their lives and in society. Duong's characters, however, are never able to do this.

Typically, her novels unfold in the same way. In straightforward prose, she records a series of episodic events punctuated and advanced by dialogue. Food, both its preparation and consumption, is discussed in great detail in her work, which shows the importance of food in Vietnamese society. Events are recorded from the points of view of two or three main characters, each of whom has a personal agenda that represents some political truth, policy, or ideology. Evil triumphs, though the good survive to suffer.

PARADISE OF THE BLIND

First published: Nhung thiên duong mù: Tiểu thuyết, 1988 (English translation, 1993)

Type of work: Novel

Growing up in Vietnam in the 1980's, Hang is reared without any men, and her life is torn between two forceful and strong-willed women: her mother Que, who represents the failure of the Communists after the Vietnam War, and her Aunt Tam, who embodies the government that could and should have been.

Even the title of Duong's third novel, Paradise of the Blind, is itself an attack on the Communist government which took over Vietnam after the country's war with the United States ended in 1975. The novel has no "paradise" but exists only as a dystopia, and not one of the characters is blind. The title refers to Communist leaders, who publicly spoke of and pretended to create what they called a "peasants' paradise" or a "workers' paradise," but were clearly failing in Vietnam, as they were in other Communist countries. There is no paradise; there are only blind people promoting a paradise based on a flawed political theory, which can never succeed.

Duong constructs this novel as a political allegory around the three main characters. Hang, the young girl who is experiencing a coming-of-age, represents postwar Vietnam, and the two women who control her represent the political struggle occurring in Vietnam after the Vietnam War. Hang's mother, Que, is the traditional Vietnamese who has "lost" after acquiescing to the circumstances of the war by giving herself over to the will of the Communists. She does this literally in the plot when she sends her husband off into hiding. The other woman, Aunt Tam, the sister of Hang's exiled father, represents capitalism and democracy, but she also cannot succeed; she can only maneuver and buy into the corruption and bribery of the political and economic system in various ways as the plot unfolds.

At the end of the novel, Que loses her leg in a freak accident that is not her fault, and is left handicapped forever. Tam simply dies from hard work and her inability to make peace and survive within the Communist system. Both women spend their lives hating each other and maneuvering for the love and attention of Hang, and in so doing they destroy any chance Hang has for a successful, happy, and peaceful future. Such is the state of Vietnam.

Similarly, the two main male characters in the novel are also allegorical figures. Hang's father, Ton, is an honorable, French-educated, intelligent, handsome, and resourceful schoolteacher. He is the French-American male power figure who would change the country's government into a democracy with freedom, human rights, and capitalism. In contrast with him, his brother-in-law, Que's brother Chinh, is a Communist who espouses a great ideology but behaves with little morality. He fails to take care of his family, and he ruins Que's chance for happiness by forcing her to drive her own husband, Ton, into exile in the north. Here, Ton takes refuge among the Hmong, a traditional Vietnamese tribal minority, who take him in and provide shelter and safety. Ton eventually kills himself after a failed attempt to take care of his wife and daughter. His death represents the passing possibility of Vietnam's political identity and success as a Western-style democracy.

Uncle Chinh, the Communist character, turns into the villain of the novel, with little or no goodness to his credit. Living in Russia, he survives there as something of a lackey and servant to foreign students at a university. After Hang completes her college education, paid for entirely by Aunt Tam, she, too, visits Russia as a "guest worker," where she is summoned to see her uncle. Here he betrays her and leaves her in a room with a group of Russian men, who presumably rape her after he exits, though the narrative does not explicitly record this. Though absent from most of Hang's daily life, Chinh is always somewhere in the background, causing trouble, and he surfaces only when he needs something from Tam, which usually turns out to be the money that she has earned, penny by penny, as a street vendor. Duong's meaning is entirely clear: Uncle Chinh represents the greed and corruption of the Communist government.

Duong does not provide a chronological narrative of all of these events. Rather, the novel begins late in the action, when Hang is living in Russia and is summoned to visit Uncle Chinh. Hang visits him out of obedience to the traditional Vietnamese values of families, but she does so to her own detriment. Again, the political commentary shows how following the ways of the past will damn Vietnam as effectively as trying to make Communism work or resurrecting the ideals of the French and Americans. As Hang travels within Russia to find her uncle, Duong provides numerous flashbacks of Hang's childhood in order to reveal the political intrigue surrounding the main character.

Vietnamese government censors objected to this novel, but their concern was probably not with its underlying political allegory. In her first two novels, Duong had written of the problems in the country, and her Communist characters did not fare well, but she was not subjected to censorship. However, in the first chapters of Paradise of the Blind, she explicitly focuses on one particular aspect of Communist ideology: land reform. Duong reveals several important ways in which everyone was victimized by this so-called reform and how no one benefited from it. It is noteworthy that the government itself gave up on land reform about the same time that the novel appeared. The Communists were evidently willing to change a misguided policy, but they were not willing for their policy to be publicly criticized in Duong's novel.

SUMMARY

Since the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, Duong Thu Huong has been the most successful novelist to come from Vietnam, attracting readers both at home and abroad. As one who initially promoted Communism and fought it in two wars herself, she is uniquely qualified to expose the weaknesses of the failed system, which manifested themselves after the Vietnam War. All of her work is political, though she seldom directly attacks her country's government as she does in Paradise of the Blind. The international attention her novels have received, as well as the numerous awards bestowed on them, proves her ability to write books that are not only political but also literary.

Carl Singleton

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Hành trình ngày thơ ấu, 1985

Bên kia bờ ảo vọng: Tiên thuyết, 1988 (Beyond Illusions, 2002)

Nhung thiên dương mù: Tiên thuyết, 1988 (Paradise of the Blind, 1993)

Quãng đời đánh mất: Tiên thuyết, 1989

Tiên thuyết vô đề, 1991 (Novel Without a Name, 1995)

Lưu Ly, 1997 (Memories of a Pure Spring, 2000)

Chon vang, 1999 (No Man's Land, 2005)

SHORT FICTION:

Chân cùng người hàng xóm: Truyện ngắn, 1985

Các vị nhân tình lệ: Tập truyện, 1988

About the Author

Blodgett, Harriet. "The Feminist Artistry of Paradise of the Blind." World Literature Today 75, nos. 3/4 (Summer/Autumn, 2001): 31-39.

Charle, Suzanne. "Good Morning, Vietnam: Novels by Duong Thu Huong." Harper's Bazaar (May, 1993): 60.

Eads, Brian. "She Dares to Live Free." Reader's Digest 153, no. 918 (October, 1998): 158-164.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- The Communist government of Vietnam banned Duong Thu Huong's book Paradise of the Blind shortly after its publication. Find specific instances in the text which would have been objectionable to the Communist censors.
- The women in Paradise of the Blind are all subservient to the wishes and commands of the men in their families. Show how this is true for the three main characters—Hang, Tam, and Que.
- Find several instances in the novel where capitalism and free enterprise are in contrast to the principles of Communism as a political theory.
- Look closely at chapter 6 in Paradise of the Blind, in which the families celebrate the most important holiday on the Vietnamese calendar, Tet. What are the particular traditions, such as food, that are part of the celebration?
- The novel has three main settings: Hanoi, the countryside village, and Russia. How do the respective settings abet meaning and character development?
- Food is central to life and culture in Vietnam. Find episodes where the preparation and consumption of food reveal this centrality.
- The author uses flashbacks throughout the narrative not only to recall events from Hang's childhood but also to explain events before her birth. Locate instances of this and speculate about why Duong did not provide a straightforward, chronological narrative.
- At the end of the novel, translators have provided "A Glossary of Vietnamese Food and Cultural Terms" in the English translation. Tie specific entries in the glossary to occurrences in the plot.

"Enemy of the State: Novelist Duong Thu Hong Rails Against Her Country's Communist Rulers." People Weekly 53, no. 17 (May 1, 2000): 99.

Karolides, Nicholas J. Literature Suppressed on Political Grounds. New York: Facts On File, 2006.

Saur, Pamela S. "Huong's Paradise of the Blind." The Explicator 60, no. 4 (Summer, 2002): 239-241.

Shenon, Philip. "In This Author's Book, Villains Are Vietnamese: Novelist Duong Thu Huong." The New York Times, April 12, 1994, p. A4.

The New Press

MARGUERITE DURAS

Born: Gia Dinh, French Indochina (now in Vietnam)
April 4, 1914

Died: Paris, France
March 3, 1996

Duras, recognized early in her career for experimenting successfully with form and image, contributed largely to the discussion of point of view in fiction as well as film.

BIOGRAPHY

Marguerite Duras (dew-RAH) was born Marguerite Donnadiou on April 4, 1914, in Gia Dinh, near Saigon, French Indochina (now Vietnam), the youngest of three children. Her two brothers, Pierre and Paulo, shared much of the deprivation and adventure of her childhood. The family's fortunes changed radically after the death of their father, Henri Donnadiou, a professor of mathematics, in 1918. After her father's death, her mother, Marie LeGrand, kept the family in French Indochina, moving in 1924 to Sadeck and then to Vinhlong, where she taught at a school for Asian children. That same year she bought property on the Mekong River, hoping to run a profitable farm, but the land flooded after every planting season, wiping out all of the family's work.

These childhood years in French Indochina contributed to themes and characters that recur in Duras's works. The rain forests, for example, take on symbolic, terrifying, and seductive power in Détruire, dit-elle (1969; Destroy, She Said, 1970). As a child, Duras ran and played in the rain forests, hunting for birds and small game to bring back to her family to eat. Her freedom in the forest is consistently linked to the fear of the creatures in it as well as the necessity to return to the farm. The flooding of the farm apparently had a significant effect on Duras because floods and engulfings recur in her works.

Duras's brothers also appear in her novels, most notably in L'Amant (1984; The Lover, 1985). Her novels recall how her brother Pierre, her mother's favored child, tormented her and her other brother, Paulo. Duras's close relationship with Paulo, the younger of the brothers, appears overtly in The Lover. Despite being the youngest child in the family, Duras tried to protect the slightly retarded Paulo from Pierre. Another experience reflected in her works is her mental breakdown at the age of twelve, which led to her fascination with insanity. The breakdown of the female protagonist in her screenplay Hiroshima mon amour (1959) reflects this integration of mental stability with the character's development. Duras's own assessment of life and work appears in a letter: "True writers have no life at all. . . . My books are truer than myself."

Duras credits her becoming a writer to the appearance of Elizabeth Striedter, an administrator's wife, in her family's small town in 1922, when Duras was eight years old. Striedter was accompanied to town by rumors that her young lover had killed himself when she left him. In interviews, Duras has acknowledged her fascination with Striedter's dark power.

When Duras was seventeen or eighteen (Duras provides conflicting information and other sources do not agree), she and her family returned to France. She studied law and political science in Paris while her family returned to Indochina. In 1939, she married Robert Antelme; they were both active in the French Resistance during World War II.

The war years shaped Duras's later life and work. She lost a child at birth, as do several of her fictional characters. Her brother Paulo died in Saigon; a brother's death is a part of the narrator's crisis in The Lover. Duras also met Dionys Mascolo, her second husband and the father of her son, Jean, during her work with the French Resistance. In 1943, her first novel, Les Impudents (the immodest ones), was published, at which time she took the name Duras. In 1944, the same year her second novel, La Vie tranquille (the quiet life), was published, Antelme was arrested by the Germans and deported to Dachau, a German concentration camp. After the liberation, Mascolo and François Mitterrand (later the French prime minister) secured the release of Antelme, who was skeletal and desperately ill. His experience and Duras's role in nursing him back to health indelibly imprinted human cruelty and human hope in the face of such barbarism on her psyche.

From her first publication until she worked on Moderato cantabile (1958; English translation, 1960), Duras described her writing process as similar to "the way people go to the office, every day, peacefully. . . . With Moderato, it wasn't as calm. And then after May, 1968, with Détruire, it wasn't like that at all anymore." Duras wrote Destroy, She Said in a matter of days, making her "really frightened for the first time." Duras often noted her feeling of being out of control within the writing process itself.

Duras became a controversial figure in France in the 1960's. She welcomed controversy with such acts as dropping her membership in the Communist Party and speaking about a woman who murdered her child. Duras often was interviewed on French television programs and wrote frequently for French magazines, contributing to the debate on social issues and literature. Suffering from asthma and the effects of alcoholism, Duras was hospitalized three times between 1980 and 1985. The longest and most serious of her hospital stays occurred in 1988, when she was being treated for asthma and went into a coma for five months. After she regained consciousness, she remained in the hospital for an additional three months. She received a tracheotomy, which involved placing a permanent breathing passage in her throat.

Duras identified three main fixtures around which she organized her life: love, alcohol, and writing. Her productiveness as a writer and filmmaker accompanied a life that was often filled with excessive desire and drink. She died of throat cancer at the age of eighty-one and was buried in Cimetière du Montparnasse in Paris under a tombstone marked only "M.D."

ANALYSIS

Duras's artistic output includes novels, screenplays, and stage plays. Her third published novel, Un Barrage contre le Pacifique (1950; The Sea Wall, 1952, also A Sea of Troubles, 1953), provides evidence of her habit of using a central scene, variations on which are repeated throughout the work. The Sea Wall tells the story of a widowed mother who buys a piece of land that is regularly flooded by the Pacific Ocean. The image of the deluge dominates the novel and the lives of the widow and her two children.

A short story, "Le Boa" (1954; "The Boa," 1984), also centers on vividly described scenes, in this instance juxtaposing one of a boa constrictor at the zoo devouring a chicken with another of the body of Mademoiselle Barbet, a seventy-five-year-old woman who manages a boarding school. The unnamed female narrator observes both scenes and provides a perspective for the reader. Both the flooding image of The Sea Wall and the narrative eye of "The Boa" suggest the passive nature of woman, of body, at the mercy of natural forces of flood, menarche, imagination, and desire.

Duras's works are often studied for their portrayals of women. Her best-known work, The Lover, explores the narrator's relationship with her mother and with her Chinese lover. The novel often portrays women as passive objects, showing the teenaged narrator carried along with the current of the events of her life, as symbolized by the objects she watches float down the Mekong River. The women in Destroy, She Said and La Pluie d'été (1990; Summer Rain, 1992) operate outside conventional morality and expectations. Alissa in Destroy, She Said introduces two men she is with, separately at different times, as her husband. The mother in Summer Rain tells her children a story of a love affair on a train.

Duras's fiction often recounts lives on the margins of a culture. Summer Rain, for instance, focuses on a couple who settle in Vitry, France, and then have seven children, rearing them on money provided by the government, entering the life of the town only to drink with others. Isolation in this novel includes not only the family and the townspeople but also the children's separation from their parents. The children often stay in a shanty on the back of the property rather than in the house. The parents often keep the children out of the house during the day, leaving the older children to care for the younger ones. The patterns of separation lead a reader to see the novel as allegory, suggesting a pattern of colonizers keeping the indigenous population dependent but not nurturing that population. A teacher mediates between family and culture when he notes the incipient genius of Ernesto, the eldest child.

Other patterns in her work suggest the influence of Ernest Hemingway, most notably in her dialogue. Destroy, She Said consists almost entirely of dialogue, and the novel explores the developing relationship among four people at a resort. As is the case in Hemingway's dialogue, silence and allusive exchanges elucidate the conflicts between characters. As in other works, in Destroy, She Said Duras explores the female as object, in this case Elisabeth Alion, whom two men watch through a window every morning and afternoon.

The visual nature of Duras's writing lent itself to her becoming a filmmaker and to the frequent adaption of her novels as films or plays. Duras began writing plays in an antiplay tradition, placing bits of her characters' lives directly before the audience in situations that often contain little plot structure and no clear beginning, middle, or end. Duras's stage personages, despite their frequent loneliness, boredom, and depression, inevitably find some hope in their lives, some triumph.

One of Duras's first plays, Les Viaducs de la Seine-et-Oise (pr., pb. 1960; The Viaducts of Seine-et-Oise, 1967), tells a story based on a true incident that was reported in the press. An elderly couple murdered and then dismembered a crippled cousin who had lived with them for twenty-seven years. Accounts of this crime attracted great public attention, and the public was intrigued by the lack of animosity and conflict within the home before the murder occurred. Duras's two-act play suggests that the couple killed the cousin to verify their own bland lives. The old couple had been public servants, working for the state-owned railway company, with only retirement to anticipate. Within the play they have only moments of understanding that they are alive, communicating briefly with others. The stultifying effects of industrialized life are at the heart of Duras's exploration of the case. This play reveals human motivation in ways that challenge conventional morality.

Duras also explores what it means to be alive in her screenplay for Hiroshima mon amour. The film gained an admiring audience, receiving the International Critics Prize at the Cannes Film Festival in 1959 and the New York Film Critics Award in 1960. The film increased her profile internationally and enhanced her reputation as an artist. Hiroshima mon amour explores a relationship between an unnamed French actress and an unnamed Japanese architect, opening with the lovers' embracing bodies filling the screen. The bodies' texture changes from smooth to sandlike, suggesting mutability even before the shift to scenes of Hiroshima after the atomic bomb was dropped. As a backdrop to the juxtaposed scenes of the lovers and the destroyed city, the lovers converse. The woman's voice repeats, "I saw them" as she identifies places (the hospital, the museum, the streets); the man continually replies that the woman "saw nothing at Hiroshima." Further contrasts between the lovers are represented within the pastoral scenes of Nevers, France, where the young woman had an affair with a German soldier who was killed by Resistance fighters just before the liberation. The trees, grass, and streams of Nevers provoke the viewer to contrast these pastoral images with the rubble and burned victims of Hiroshima. The lovers each represent cities: she, Nevers; he, Hiroshima.

Her juxtaposition of Hiroshima's victims with the lovers' intense relationship allows Duras to explore the moral questions of their lives. The couple flouts convention; both are married to others. The war stories of each one become their link.

Duras's novels, screenplays, and stage plays often reflect her politics. Her experience with the horrors of war is evident in Hiroshima mon amour. Duras is not, however, simply a political writer; her contribution to the novel places her within the New Novelist group. New Novels explored the free flow of time in narration and the use of silence. Other practitioners of the New Novel include Nathalie Sarraute, Claude Simon, and Alain Robbe-Grillet. Duras contributed to the novel and to film, often exploring a single scene or image from a variety of perspectives and meanings.

THE LOVER

First published: L'Amant 1984 (English translation, 1985)

Type of work: Novel

A Frenchwoman remembers her awakening to desire in a relationship forbidden by class and racial prejudices.

In her short and powerful novel, which won the Prix Goncourt in France in 1984, Duras recounts the largely autobiographical story of her family's struggles in Southeast Asia. The major characters of the book are the narrator, whose obsessive remembrances of her days as a high school student in Saigon center the novel; the Chinese lover, whose father prevents him from marrying the narrator; the narrator's mother, whose favoritism for her older son and alternating encouragement and abuse of the narrator undermine the family; the older brother, who terrorizes his younger brother and sister while never finishing the school courses his mother arranges for him; and the younger brother, whose death spurs the narrator to attempt suicide.

Central themes of the book include memory and separation. Memory provides the frame for the novel, which is the recollection of a middle-aged Frenchwoman. One image that combines these themes is the photograph. The narrator describes how the mother has the family go to the photographer, always having pictures of the family group but not taking pictures of "Vinh Long . . . of the garden, the river, the straight tamarind-lined avenues of the French conquest, not of the house, nor of our institutional white-washed bedrooms with the big black-and-gilt iron beds, lit up like classrooms by the red streetlights, the green metal lampshades."

The narrator separates herself from her mother by describing what the mother does not consider worthy of recording; the narrator recounts a scene more vivid than the posed family portraits for which she sat. The mother, however, continues to show the family photographs to her cousins in France long after the children have stopped corresponding with the cousins. The narrator sees grace in her mother's practice of showing the photographs: "She sees everything through to the bitter end without ever dreaming she might give up. . . . It's in this valor, human, absurd, that I see true grace." The narrator sees valor in what can also be perceived as a fruitless or pointless action and loves her mother as a separate self with true grace.

The obsessive remembrance in The Lover centers on the scene of the teenage narrator riding the ferry as she crosses the Mekong River. The scene is described in fragments and explanations of those fragments throughout the novel: "I'm fifteen and a half. Crossing the river. Going back to Saigon I feel I'm going on a journey." Her explanations then address her clothes, her hat, her shoes, her expression, and the black limousine in which the lover awaited her. Crossing the river leads her to view herself as an object in a remembered scene, as one in a photograph.

Her point of view shifts from first to third person, exemplifying the narrator's feeling of separation and disjunction. She often objectifies herself, referring to her body as a perceived quantity, not as a living self: "Suddenly I see myself as another, as another would be seen, outside myself, available to all, available to all eyes, in circulation for cities, journeys, desire."

Publication of The Lover marked a resurgence of interest in Duras's work. A film version was released in 1992, achieving on the screen much of the tone of the novel and making good use of the image of the young narrator on the ferry, crossing the Mekong, as a unifying device. Both the novel and the film generate consideration on issues such as identity and perspective.

THE WAR: A MEMOIR

First published: Le Douleur, 1985 (English translation, 1986)

Type of work: Memoir

Duras documents waiting for and then caring for her husband, Robert Antelme, upon his return from Dachau.

In her introductory notes for The War: A Memoir, Duras informs the reader that she found the memoir in her cupboards and has no recollection of having written it; she simply recognizes her own handwriting. The memoir is a powerful statement of the pain of waiting, loving, and enduring.

During the war years, Duras struggled between conflicting passions for her husband and for her soon-to-be lover, Dionys Mascolo. Both of these men were working within the French Resistance, and she documents the tension she felt as she met with a German representative who was her source of information about her husband's fate. The complete memoir of the exchanges between Duras and the German official is a separate section of The War.

The War tells of the ways in which Duras survived as she waited. One strategy she used to keep her sanity was to dedicate all of her energy to her work. She documented refugees and deportees as they came through Paris, all the time seeking news of her husband. She tormented herself with visions of her husband shot and decaying in a ditch, a vision she knew was altogether possible, in fact probable.

One powerful and important message within the memoir is the insight offered into human nature. The French after liberation were not, to paraphrase Duras, satiated with violence; many sought satisfaction through making the "enemy" suffer. At a center in which she worked she saw

A prisoner who's a priest [bringing] a German orphan back to the center. He held him by the hand, was proud of him, showed him off, explained how he'd found him and that it wasn't the poor child's fault. The women looked askance at him. He was abrogating to himself the right to forgive, to absolve, already . . . without any knowledge of the hatred that filled everyone, a hatred terrible yet pleasant, consoling, like a belief in God.

The group of Frenchwomen at this place ignored the child and spat on the priest, who, Duras judges, "was right, but in a language the women didn't understand." The memoir documents a people's response to war and hatred. The experience itself, as Duras often notes, defies language.

As in other remembrances of concentration camp victims, the extent of illness and the astounding capacity for survival mark the reader indelibly. The descriptions of hands transparent in the light and bony legs that look like crutches make the camps real. Duras's unintentional cruelty in having a dessert in the house when Robert first returns haunts the reader. Robert had to wait for weeks to eat real food because his internal organs were not supported well enough to hold it. Duras notes that the survivor was once more being forbidden to eat, just as he was in the concentration camp.

Duras said that she does not remember having written the memoir; readers will be unable to forget it.

"THE CRUSHED NETTLE"

First published: "L'Ortie brisée," 1985
(collected in The War: A Memoir, 1986)

Type of work: Short story

In newly liberated Paris, a factory worker offers understanding to a stranger.

"The Crushed Nettle" recounts a confrontation between a factory worker, Lucien, who is having his lunch, and a stranger who wears a light-colored suit and smokes English cigarettes. The story centers on two important symbols: the nettles and a hole. This story contains not only a symbol system typical of Duras's work but also an important treatment of silence and the inherent tensions of conversation.

In the beginning of the story, the nettles are described as growing in the spaces between the paving stones and “against the fences around the wooden houses: an invasion.” The nettles claimed the spaces between the paving stones that had been brought there in years past, the city government apparently having abandoned the idea of paving the road. The nettles are also providing a feeding spot for the flies in the heavy and warm summer air. This backdrop frames Lucien, the stranger, the ten-year-old boy, and his baby brother, around noon, near a dump.

The road that is not completely paved leads to a hole “overgrown with a tangle of old iron and nettles.” The juxtaposition of nature and civilization is brought to the reader’s attention with the explanation, “The city ends where the weeds and old iron begin. The war has left it behind.”

Duras suggests that the stranger in the light-colored suit is like the city that has been left behind. The stranger is separate from the world of pain—of nettles—that is familiar to Lucien and the children. Duras repeats her description of the background sounds: “From the shacks there comes the sound of crockery, voices, the squalling of children, mothers shouting, no words.” The background noise of no words matches the difficulty in communicating experienced by the stranger and Lucien. The moment of crisis in the story occurs after Lucien explains that he lost part of his finger; the stranger (after an interruption in the conversation by the ten-year-old boy) expresses sympathy with Lucien and says, “And you went back to the same job.” The attempt to understand the life of Lucien leads the stranger into “speaking mechanically, of being silent, instead of dying. He has something shut up inside himself that he can’t say, can’t reveal. Because he doesn’t know what it is. He doesn’t know how one speaks about death. He is confronted with himself just as the man and the little boy are.”

The stranger has been drawn to this road leading to a hole and has struggled to make a connection with Lucien. Duras’s commentary on the connection consists of describing the stranger’s grasping a nettle and crushing it in his hand, painful for him, but having very little impact on the whole clump of nettles.

HIROSHIMA MON AMOUR

First produced: 1959 (first published, 1960; English translation, 1961)

Type of work: Screenplay

In postwar Japan, an unnamed couple meet and share a brief affair against the nuclear fallout of Hiroshima and other war memories.

Several years after the nuclear attack on Hiroshima at the end of World War II, Duras presents the story of a French woman and a Japanese man engaged in a twenty-four-hour love affair in Hiroshima, mon amour. Duras was specifically chosen by French New Wave cinema director Alain Resnais to write a screenplay for a story of people affected by war. He had originally been asked to produce a documentary on the nuclear destruction in this city, but he was concerned he would produce another Holocaust piece similar to his film Nuit et brouillard (1955; Night and Fog). In response to his request, Duras worked with him to create a film that won major prizes at the Cannes and New York film festivals.

In a five-part saga of the couple’s physical and psychological intimacy, Duras creates a poignant story of love and loss with unnamed protagonists set against the reconstruction of Hiroshima in the 1950’s and the horrors of the 1945 attack. She brings added dimensions to the concepts of human interaction and communication by using a flashback technique (amplified by Resnais’s cinematography) to recount the woman’s affair as a teenager with a young German soldier in Vichy France and her subsequent ostracism and mental breakdown. The reality of life in postwar Japan, where cultures continue to clash, is juxtaposed against the romanticism of war-torn lovers, or any couple whose dreams are never destined to be fulfilled.

The couple meet when the woman comes to Japan to act in a film about peace. This meeting takes place before the story opens, as they are already intimately involved in the opening shots. The camera scans their bodies as the texture of their skin turns from smoothness to an ashlike quality. With this technique, Resnais and Duras set the scene for two personal stories affected by larger issues. Duras draws on her personal experiences and hardships in the French Resistance during World War II and when her husband almost died at Dachau.

The story continues in several venues, including the hotel room, a café, a railroad station, and the memorial park dedicated to those lost in the bombing. In each location the couple comes together either mentally or physically and then is pulled apart by memories, described in a stream-of-consciousness narration through dialogue and visual images. The dialogue is brief and often truncated with flashbacks substituting for verbal description. Eventually the lovers must part and live their lives in separate places. They identify each other only by their respective locations, Hiroshima and Nevers, France.

The screenplay (and film) is more meditative than linear in its storytelling. The settings of a modern Japanese city and a rural town in France serve as symbols for the characters—an architect, who is representative of the new Japan, and an actress, who is still reconstructing her life after her wartime trauma. This story is about the impact of memory on individuals and was one of the first French New Wave films to make innovative use of flashbacks. Duras uses her war experiences in a creative way to convey the far-reaching effects of conflict.

SUMMARY

Marguerite Duras, a highly acclaimed writer in various genres, put French Indochina on the map of modern world literature. Her understanding of the sensual, the corrupt, the futile, and the amoral is transmitted through her writings in a series of vivid images. These images raise the particular—a girl on a ferry or a flooded field, for example—toward the symbolic. Such images, often originating in Duras's personal experience, may serve as metaphors for the larger historical and societal events that form the context and the backdrop to the lives of her characters.

Janet T. Palmer; updated by Dolores A. D'Angelo

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Les Impudents, 1943

La Vie tranquille, 1944

Un Barrage contre le Pacifique, 1950 (The Sea Wall, 1952; also known as A Sea of Troubles, 1953)

Le Marin de Gibraltar, 1952 (The Sailor from Gibraltar, 1966)

Les Petits Chevaux de Tarquinia, 1953 (The Little Horses of Tarquinia, 1960)

Le Square, 1955 (The Square, 1959)

Moderato cantabile, 1958 (English translation, 1960)

Dix heures et demie du soir en été, 1960 (Ten-Thirty on a Summer Night, 1962)

L'Après-midi de Monsieur Andesmas, 1962 (The Afternoon of Monsieur Andesmas, 1964)

Le Ravissement de Lol V. Stein, 1964 (The Ravishing of Lol Stein, 1966)

Le Vice-consul, 1966 (The Vice-Consul, 1968)

L'Amante anglaise, 1967 (English translation, 1968)

Détruire, dit-elle, 1969 (Destroy, She Said, 1970)

Abahn Sabana David, 1970

L'Amour, 1971

India Song: Texte-théâtre-film, 1973 (English translation, 1976)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does Marguerite Duras incorporate her experiences in World War II into her characterizations?
- How does memory and recall function in Duras's plot development?
- How does the theme of loss affect the actions of the characters in Duras's novels?
- The impact of outside events is important in many of Duras's works. Describe two events, natural or human-made, which affect the events of the plot in her novels or plays.
- Describe how the complexities of love are used as a force of change in Duras's works.

Marguerite Duras

La Maladie de la morte, 1982 (The Malady of Death, 1986)
L'Amant, 1984 (The Lover, 1985)
Les Yeux bleus, cheveux noirs, 1987 (Blue Eyes, Black Hair, 1987)
Emily L., 1987 (English translation, 1989)
La Pluie d'été, 1990 (Summer Rain, 1992)
L'Amant de la Chine du Nord, 1991 (The North China Lover, 1992)
Yann Andrea Steiner, 1992 (Yann Andrea Steiner: A Memoir, 1993)

SHORT FICTION:

Des journées entières dans les arbres, 1954 (Days in the Trees, 1967)
L'Homme assis dans le couloir, 1980 (The Man Sitting in the Corridor, 1991)
L'Homme atlantique, 1982 (The Atlantic Man, 1993)
La Pute de la côte Normande, 1986 (The Slut of the Normandy Coast, 1993)
Two by Duras, 1993 (includes The Slut of the Normandy Coast and The Atlantic Man)

DRAMA:

Le Square, pr. 1957, pb. 1965 (The Square, 1967)
Les Viaducs de la Seine-et-Oise, pr., pb. 1960 (The Viaducts of Seine-et-Oise, 1967)
Les Papiers d'Aspern, pr. 1961, pb. 1970 (with Robert Antelme; adaptation of Michael Redgrave's adaptation of Henry James's novella The Aspern Papers)
Miracle en Alabama, pr. 1962, pb. 1963 (with Gérard Jarlot; adaptation of William Gibson's play The Miracle Worker)
La Bête dans la jungle, pr. 1962, pb. 1984 (with James Lord; adaptation of Henry James's story "The Beast in the Jungle")
Les Eaux et forêts, pr., pb. 1965 (The Rivers and Forests, 1965)
La Musica, pr., pb. 1965 (The Music, 1967)
Des journées entières dans les arbres, pr. 1965, pb. 1966 (Days in the Trees, 1967)
Théâtre, pb. 1965-1999 (4 volumes; volume 1 includes Les Eaux et forêts, Le Square, and La Musica; volume 2 includes Suzanna Andler [English translation, 1973], Des journées entières dans les arbres, Yes, peut-être, Le Shaga, and Un Homme est venu me voir; volume 3 includes La Bête dans la jungle, Les Papiers d'Aspern, and La Danse de mort; volume 4 includes Véra Baxter, L'Éden cinéma, L'Amante anglaise, Home, and La Mouette)
Three Plays, pb. 1967 (includes The Square, Days in the Trees, and The Viaducts of Seine-et-Oise)
L'Amante anglaise, pr., pb. 1968 (A Place Without Doors, 1970)
Un Homme est venu me voir, pr., pb. 1968
La Danse de mort, pr. 1970, pb. 1984 (adaptation of August Strindberg's play Dösdansen, andra delen)
Home, pb. 1973 (adaptation of David Storey's play)
India Song: Texte-théâtre-film, pb. 1973 (English translation, 1976)
L'Éden Cinéma, pr., pb. 1977 (The Eden Cinema, 1986)
Agatha, pb. 1981, pr. 1984 (English translation, 1992)
Savannah Bay, pr., pb. 1982 (English translation, 1992)
La Mouette, pb. 1985 (adaptation of Anton Chekhov's play The Seagull)
La Musica, deuxième, pr., pb. 1985
Four Plays, pb. 1992 (includes La Musica, Eden Cinema, Savannah Bay, and India Song)

SCREENPLAYS:

Hiroshima mon amour, pr. 1959 (Hiroshima mon amour: Text by Marguerite Duras for the Film by Alain Resnais, 1961)
Une Aussi longue absence, 1961 (with Gérard Jarlot; English translation, 1966)
La Musica, 1966 (with Paul Seban)
Détruire, dit-elle, 1969
Nathalie Granger, 1972
India Song: Texte-théâtre-film, 1973

La Femme du Gange, 1973
Des journées entières dans les arbres, 1976
Baxter, Véra Baxter, 1976
Son nom de Venise dans Calcutta désert, 1976
Le Camion, 1977
Le Navire "Night," 1978
Aurélia Steiner, 1979
Cesarée, 1979
Les Mains négatives, 1979
L'Homme atlantique, 1982
Agatha: Ou, Les Lectures illisibles, 1982

NONFICTION:

Les Parleuses, 1974 (Woman to Woman, 1987)
Les Lieux de Marguerite Duras, 1977
Outside: Papiers d'un jour, 1981 (Outside: Selected Writings, 1986)
La Douleur, 1985 (The War: A Memoir, 1986)
Les Yeux verts, 1987 (Green Eyes, 1990)
La Vie matérielle, 1987 (Practicalities: Marguerite Duras Speaks to Jérôme Beaujour, 1990)
Outside II: Le Monde extérieur, 1993
Ecrire, 1993 (Writing, 1998)
C'est tout, 1995 (No More, 1998)
Wartime Writings, 1943-1949, 2008

About the Author

Adler, Laure. Marguerite Duras: A Life. Translated by Anne-Marie Glasheen. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.
Cohen, Susan. Women and Discourse in the Fiction of Marguerite Duras: Love, Legends, Language. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1993.
Crowley, Martin. Duras, Writing, and the Ethical: Making the Broken Whole. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
Duras, Marguerite, and Xaviere Gauthier. Woman to Woman. Translated and with an afterword by Katherine A. Jensen. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1987.
Glassman, Deborah. Marguerite Duras: Fascinating Vision and Narrative Cure. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1991.
Günther, Renate. Marguerite Duras. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2002.
Hill, Leslie. Marguerite Duras: Apocalyptic Desires. London: Routledge, 1993.
Hofmann, Carol. Forgetting and Marguerite Duras. Boulder: University Press of Colorado, 1993.
Schuster, Marilyn R. Marguerite Duras Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1993.
Selous, Trista. The Other Woman: Feminism and Femininity in the Work of Marguerite Duras. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1988.
Winston, Jane Bradley. Postcolonial Duras: Cultural Memory in Postwar France. New York: Palgrave, 2001.

© Rosemarie Clausen

LAWRENCE DURRELL

Born: Julundur, India
February 27, 1912

Died: Sommières, France
November 7, 1990

Durrell was a major experimental British novelist who sought to fuse Western notions of time and space with Eastern metaphysics.

BIOGRAPHY

Lawrence George Durrell (DUR-uhl) was born on February 27, 1912, in Julundur in northern India, near Pakistan and Tibet. His Irish father, Lawrence Samuel Durrell, and his English mother, Louisa Florence Dixie, had also been born in India. This mix of nationalities marked Durrell's creative imagination. He would claim in later years that he had "a Tibetan mentality."

Durrell's "nursery-rhyme happiness" came to an end when he was shipped to England at age eleven to be formally educated. The immediate discomfort he felt in England he attributed to its lifestyle, which he termed "the English death." He explained: "English life is really like an autopsy. It is so, so dreary." Deeply alienated, he refused to adjust himself to England and resisted the regimentation of school life, eventually refusing to pass university exams.

Instead, he resolved to be a writer. At first he had difficulty finding his voice in words, either in verse or in fiction. Eventually, he invented a pseudonym, Charles Norden, and produced two novels, Pied Piper of Lovers (1935) and Panic Spring (1937), for the mass market.

Two fortunate events occurred in 1935 that changed the course of his career. First, he persuaded his mother, siblings, and wife, Nancy Myers, to move to Corfu, Greece, to live more economically and to escape the English winter. Life in Greece was a revelation; Durrell felt it reconnected him to India. While in Greece, he began working on what may be his greatest accomplishment as a writer, The Alexandria Quartet (1957-1960; 1962). Second, Durrell chanced upon Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer (1934) and wrote Miller a fan letter. Thus began a forty-five-year friendship and correspondence based on their love of literature, their fascination with the Far East, and their comradeship in the face of personal and artistic setbacks. In their early letters, Miller praised Durrell and urged him not to compromise his artistic standards and give into his publisher's demands to change portions of The Black Book (1938), the work on which Durrell was then focused. Durrell followed Miller's advice and stood firm.

After six idyllic years in Corfu and Athens, Durrell and his wife were forced to flee Greece in 1941, just ahead of the advancing Nazi army. They settled in Alexandria, Egypt. Durrell got a job as a press attaché in the British Information Office. Ostensibly working, Durrell was in reality closely observing the assortment of sights, sensations, and people that wartime Alexandria, a crossroads of the East and West, had to offer.

In 1945, divorced from his wife and "liberated from . . . [his] Egyptian prison," Durrell was "free at last to return to Greece." He spent two years in Rhodes as director of public relations for the Dodocanese Islands and met the woman who was to become his second wife, Eve Cohen.

Durrell returned to the Mediterranean in 1952, hoping to find the serenity in which to write. He bought a stone house in Cyprus and earned a living teaching English to Cypriots. During that time period, peace proved elusive. War broke out among the Cypriot Greeks who desired union with Greece, the British (who were still attempting to control Cyprus as a crown colony), and the Turkish Cypriots (who favored partition). Durrell, by this time, had left teaching and was working as the British public relations officer in Nicosia. He found himself caught between the warring factions and even became a target for terrorists. Bitter Lemons (1957) is Durrell's account of these troubled years.

While in Cyprus, Durrell resumed writing The Alexandria Quartet, finally completing the four volumes in England. The series was published between 1957 and 1960 and was a critical and commercial success. Durrell received recognition as an author of international stature.

After being forced out of his beloved Greece, Durrell finally settled in Sommières, in the south of France. He bought an old mansion and for the next thirty-five years produced two more cycles of novels: The Revolt of Aphrodite, comprising Tunc (1968) and Nunquam (1970), and The Avignon Quintet (1974-1985; 1992). Neither of these cycles achieved the critical and popular success of The Alexandria Quartet. Durrell continued writing poetry, and his Collected Poems, 1931-1974 appeared in 1980.

Durrell married two more times. He wed his third wife, Claude-Marie Vincendon, in 1961. He was devastated when she died of cancer in 1967. His fourth marriage, to Ghislaine de Boysson, began in 1973. His later years were darkened by the suicide of his daughter, Sappho-Jane, in 1985. Durrell died on November 7, 1990.

ANALYSIS

Lawrence Durrell's goal in writing is to "sum up in a sort of metaphor the cosmology of a particular moment in which we are living." He is a metaphysical writer who, through his characters, asks philosophical questions such as, What is the nature of reality? How does the artist describe it in words? What is the right way to live as an artist and as a human being?

When Durrell's perspective on reality is considered, the reader must first take into account his origins in India. Throughout his life, Durrell recalled his "childhood dream of Tibet" with great nostalgia:

If you live in a Buddhist country, it is so extraordinary. You wake up without being afraid of your neighbor, as you do in the countries we inhabit. The whole of nature seems permeated by a sense of harmless good will, and it opens a field for self-development which is not accessible in a country where you have very rigid, theologically oriented people with a national ethos that's repressive or restrictive in any way.

Drawing on these childhood memories and his readings in contemporary physics, Durrell claims that the cosmology of the mid-twentieth century can be found in a blend of Western physics with Eastern metaphysics, which he says "are coming to a point of confluence." These notions are explained in A Key to Modern British Poetry, which Durrell published in 1952.

In A Key to Modern British Poetry, Durrell begins by looking at Albert Einstein and Sigmund Freud, whom he calls the two major architects of modern Western consciousness. Einstein is significant because he "torpedoed the old Victorian material universe" and Freud because he "torpedoed the idea of the stable ego." The discoveries of Einstein and Freud, occurring in nearly the same time period, unlocked the secrets of the "universe outside man, and the universe inside." Einstein, and the physicists who followed him, in exploring the universe outside humankind, discarded the notion that the smallest unit of matter is the particle. They proved, instead, that "particles" sometimes are better thought of as waves. Durrell translates this discovery into human terms: At times people are conscious of themselves as individuals, but if they accept the fact of the continuum that exists in the melding of time and space, then people "may perhaps form ingredients of a single continuous stream of life."

In Durrell's view, Freud's discovery of the universe inside humankind parallels Einstein's investigations into the world outside. Studying hysterics in the 1890's, Freud noticed how under hypnosis they were able to recall painful experiences of which their waking, conscious minds were unaware. Freud hypothesized that there was an area of the mind beyond consciousness; he called it the unconscious, and, according to Durrell, that is "how the idea of the splitting of the psyche first started." Durrell, like D. H. Lawrence before him, rejected “the old stable ego of character” in favor of characterization that is more amorphous and ambiguous. As Balthazar in The Alexandria Quartet says: “Each psyche is really an ant-hill of opposing predispositions. Personality as something with fixed attributes is an illusion.”

If space and time are relative and the human personality is not fixed, the cosmology of the age needs to reflect these uncertainties. The closest equivalent philosophical system, in Durrell’s view, can be found in Eastern philosophies. According to Buddhism, once the ego stops its selfish cravings, it enters a state of oneness with the universe. Durrell calls this state a “field,” which is the spiritual equivalent of the field concept in physics. Durrell believes that the unity and interrelatedness of matter in the physical world can be applied to the spiritual realm as well: “Phenomena may be individuals carrying on separate existences in space and time, but in the deeper reality beyond space and time we may be all members of one body.” Durrell has a name for this deeper reality; he calls it the Heraldic Reality.

Durrell’s entire literary output—his poetry, novels, and travel writings—can be seen as a quest to enter this exalted realm. Many of Durrell’s major characters, such as Darley, Pursewarden, and Clea in The Alexandria Quartet, Constance and Blanford in The Avignon Quintet, and the narrative voice of Prospero’s Cell (1945), are heroes and heroines on a quest to transform their lives. As they proceed in their quest, they face obstacles. They sometimes realize that they have set off in the wrong direction. As the narrator of The Black Book says: “There is only trial and error on a journey like this, and no signposts.”

The people that Durrell’s modern hero encounters are no help, either. They also have no recognizable signposts to their personalities. When Justine in The Alexandria Quartet looks at her multifaceted reflections in a dressmaker’s mirror, she asks: “Why should not people show more than one profile at a time?”

The quests on which Durrell’s characters embark do not exactly follow the traditional pattern of the Western hero. Instead, these journeys more closely correspond to the movement of the soul in reincarnation. Even when Durrell began his writing career in the 1930’s, he had this pattern in mind. The first draft of Justine (1957) was entitled

The Book of the Dead. The Avignon Quintet also deals with death. In an interview, Durrell noted the importance of this subject: “The basic trauma, the basic neurosis” in human life is death. If one can get “on top of it” by facing its reality and also by subduing the “recalcitrant ego,” then one can achieve “celestial amnesia, which is antiegoism.” One then ends up “swimming in the continuum,” another word for the Heraldic Reality.

PROSPERO’S CELL

First published: 1945

Type of work: Memoir

Durrell moves to Corfu with his family in the 1930’s and comes of age as a writer.

Prospero’s Cell is a fine example of Durrell’s metaphysical speculations and a precursor to The Alexandria Quartet. Durrell, believing that “we are the children of our landscape,” tries to capture the essence of Greece in this book of his travels. Written in the 1930’s, when Durrell was just starting out as a writer, the book is more like a portrait of the artist as a young man than a conventional travel guide. He records the learning process that he has to undergo in order to become a writer, rather than listing the typical tourist attractions.

The process begins when, like a child, Durrell examines the building blocks of reality: “rock, air, sky—and all the elementals . . . white house, white rock, friends, and a narrow style of living.” Greece, at this stage of his creative development, provides the raw materials for his inspiration; he tries to manipulate its images into art. His challenge is to capture in words the multifaceted nature of reality.

In Prospero’s Cell, he finds that Corfu’s reality, which to him is always changing and receding, still seems touched by the wand of William Shakespeare’s magician, Prospero. The book, written in the form of a journal, mixes history and metaphysical speculations about life, geology, biography, folk customs, and peasant remedies, reflecting the narrator’s difficulty in capturing the island’s spirit. The primary quality of Durrell’s Corfu is transformation, as he views the island undergoing a sea change before his eyes. Traveling through the Greek waters, one leaves behind “the certainties” of the “real” world: “You enter Greece as one might enter a dark crystal; the form of things becomes irregular, refracted. Mirages suddenly swallow islands, and wherever you look the trembling curtain of the atmosphere deceives.”

The narrative voice receives artistic advice from Count D., a Prospero-like wealthy recluse who resides on the island. The Count tells him that the best one can do is create “a portrait inexact in detail, containing bright splinters of landscape.” The count’s advice gives the narrator confidence that his fragmented images will come as close to the truth of Corfu as anything he could write.

The inexactness, the mutable natural world, the characters’ various visions, and the slippery nature of time and language are depicted for a reason. Durrell is testing out his notions of the Heraldic Universe. He contrasts the world of phenomena or striving (which he calls the “minus side”) to the world of repose or the Heraldic Universe (the “plus side”). The “plus” and “minus sides,” as he describes them, can be connected to Eastern philosophies. Knowledge of these two angles of vision allows him “to see Greece with the inner eyes—not as a collection of battered vestiges left over from cultures long since abandoned—but as something ever-present and ever-renewed.” In other words, Greece is the rich background on which Durrell constructs his own image of the country, a place where “sunlight and inner light meet.”

THE ALEXANDRIA QUARTET

First published: Justine, 1957; Balthazar, 1958; Mountolive, 1958; Clea, 1960; published collectively as The Alexandria Quartet, 1962

Type of work: Novels

The Alexandria Quartet is Durrell’s investigation of modern love, as told through the experiences of the character Darley, who is a young Englishman living in Alexandria.

The Alexandria Quartet is the story of the life and loves of a young British man, Darley, who lives in Egypt during World War II. Darley has love affairs with three women: Justine, the sensuous Jewish wife of a rich Egyptian banker, Nessim; Melissa, a dancer in a cabaret who develops tuberculosis and dies; and Clea, a beautiful artist who eventually becomes Darley’s soulmate.

The central topic of the The Alexandria Quartet is “an investigation of modern love.” Durrell believed in the idea, whose origin is in Platonism, that by studying and experiencing the varieties of love, one can ascend from raw physical contact to higher forms of spiritual connection. In an interview, Durrell describes the role of love:

The sexual act becomes identified with all knowledge, all knowing; and the act . . . seems a sort of biological contraption whose object is not only the race’s survival, but also the awakening of the psychic forces latent in the human being.

Thus Eros is the “motive force in man,” a “vibration” that is meant “to wake some of the engines of understanding” in men and women. Each of the major characters in The Alexandria Quartet embodies one or more aspects of Western love. Justine represents the power of sexual passion, and Melissa, charitable affection. In keeping with Durrell’s view that Western love is bankrupt, the characters seek but fail to find passionate love relationships that will somehow transform their lives. Trapped in Alexandria’s great “winepress of love,” they cannot escape their egos’ obsessive delusions; they all are “deeply wounded in their sex.” Only Clea, who pulls Darley along with her, transforms her life and art—the two are inextricably mixed in Durrell’s view.

Clea’s transformation occurs on a boat trip when Darley accidentally releases a harpoon that pins Clea’s painting hand to an underwater wreck. To save her life, Darley is forced to cut off her hand. The anguish, physical pain, and empathy that the two characters experience dissolve the petty, selfish concerns that their egos had previously placed at the center of the relationship. They experience a transforming vision that gives them a sense of their belonging.

Durrell also investigates Western relativity. The Alexandria Quartet is structured to correspond to Einstein's theory of relativity: "Three sides of space and one of time constitute the soup-mix recipe of a continuum. The four novels follow this pattern." The first three volumes explore differing perspectives on the novel's events; Clea moves the story along in time.

The Alexandria Quartet ends with Clea's recovery and with both Darley and Clea feeling reborn as artists. They decide to separate after the end of World War II, as they both make plans to go to Europe. In an interview in 1986, Durrell assumed that they would eventually reunite. He claimed that "they're preparing to make a child." They are ready to give birth as artists and as human beings.

THE AVIGNON QUINTET

First published: Monsieur: Or, The Prince of Darkness, 1974; Livia: Or, Buried Alive, 1978; Constance: Or, Solitary Practices, 1981; Sebastian: Or, Ruling Passions, 1983; Quinx: Or, The Ripper's Tale, 1985; published collectively as The Avignon Quintet, 1992

Type of work: Novels

Several groups of young people, searching for the meaning of life during World War II, fall under the spell of a gnostic cult.

The Avignon Quintet is a vast, multidimensional novel of five parts. Durrell calls the arrangement a quincunx, which is an arrangement of five objects with four located at the corners of a square and the fifth at the center (the pattern for the fives in a deck of cards). A person, with four limbs and the kundalini, corresponds to this arrangement. The kundalini is coiled energy lying at the base of the spine.

In The Avignon Quintet, Durrell is attempting, by means of the novel form, to construct a cosmology for the modern age. The story is set in Avignon, the seat of the Roman Catholic popes from 1309 to 1377. The novel's focus, though, is not on organized religion but on its antithesis: heresy. Several of the major characters belong to a heretical gnostic cult based in Egypt and led by a wealthy Egyptian, Akkad. This wealthy cult preaches that the world is corrupt, because it is composed of evil matter that is alien to the human spirit and the true God. This world cannot be attributed to a God that is good; instead, it is the creation of a demiurge. Durrell calls him Monsieur or the Prince of Darkness: "The Prince of Usury, the spirit of gain, the enigmatic power of capital value embodied in the poetry of gold, or specie, or scrip."

Some extreme gnostics believe that there is a way out of the corrupt world; they can refuse to accept its terms by committing suicide. In Akkad's cult, the member who is to die is chosen randomly and the deed is done by someone else. The Avignon Quintet begins with such an execution. Bruce Drexel is arriving in Avignon to attend the funeral of his best friend, lover, and brother-in-law, Piers de Nogaret. Bruce tries to make sense of Piers's death by recalling their visit to Egypt, during which they viewed one of Akkad's gnostic rituals. Piers had embraced the cult's beliefs and become a convert.

In the meantime, other characters and situations are introduced. Names and details blend into one another so that it becomes hard to distinguish them. The initial trio of characters has much in common with the next trio, Hilary, Livia, and Constance, who appear in Livia. In addition, characters who are first presented as real later turn out to be imaginary. The novelist Rob Sutcliffe, who has apparently married Bruce's sister Pia, is not real at all; he is a fabrication of another novelist, Aubrey Blanford. Both men, of course, are fabrications of yet a third novelist, Lawrence Durrell.

Durrell, master trickster, has a serious purpose at hand. Through his spokesmen—Akkad and his clone, Affad—Durrell articulates a dark view of life, that "death sets in with conception." Yet, if one accepts the reality of human life—that one must die—then one can improvise a new mode of existence that breaks the deadening bonds of conventionality. As Akkad explains, one can become "truthful in a way that you never thought you could be."

SUMMARY

Lawrence Durrell spent more than fifty years writing novels, plays, poetry, letters, and essays that “interrogate human values” and experiment with language. In his first serious novel, The Black Book, he states his belief that “art must no longer exist to depict man, but to invoke God.” He dedicated his life’s work to this problem. His two greatest works of art, The Alexandria Quartet and The Avignon Quintet, offer “an honest representation of the human passions” and explore the depth of spirituality possible in a chaotic age of relativity and skepticism.

Anna Lillios

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Pied Piper of Lovers, 1935 (as Charles Norden)

Panic Spring, 1937 (as Norden)

The Black Book, 1938

Cefalú, 1947 (republished as The Dark Labyrinth, 1958)

Justine, 1957

Balthazar, 1958

Mountolive, 1958

Clea, 1960

The Alexandria Quartet, 1962 (includes Justine, Balthazar, Mountolive, and Clea)

Tunc, 1968

Nunquam, 1970

Monsieur: Or, The Prince of Darkness, 1974

Livia: Or, Buried Alive, 1978

Constance: Or, Solitary Practices, 1981

Sebastian: Or, Ruling Passions, 1983

Quinx: Or, The Ripper’s Tale, 1985

The Avignon Quintet, 1992 (includes Monsieur: Or, The Prince of Darkness, Livia: Or, Buried Alive; Constance: Or, Solitary Practices; Sebastian: Or, Ruling Passions; and Quinx: Or, The Ripper’s Tale)

SHORT FICTION:

Esprit de Corps: Sketches from Diplomatic Life, 1957

Stiff Upper Lip: Life Among the Diplomats, 1958

Sauve Qui Peut, 1966

The Best of Antrobus, 1974

Antrobus Complete, 1985

POETRY:

Quaint Fragment: Poems Written Between the Ages of Sixteen and Nineteen, 1931

Ten Poems, 1932

Bromo Bombastes, 1933

Transition: Poems, 1934

Proems: An Anthology of Poems, 1938 (with others)

A Private Country, 1943

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Does Lawrence Durrell’s intrinsic restlessness pervade his novels?
- How did Durrell’s understanding of Albert Einstein influence his theory of characterization?
- What in Greece, apart from its “battered vestiges,” is most interesting to Durrell?
- In what ways did Durrell’s experiences between 1952 and 1957 prepare him for The Alexandria Quartet?
- Contrast Plato and Durrell’s methods of examining the varieties of love.
- Characterize Durrell’s lyrical response to the Mediterranean world in his poetry.

Lawrence Durrell

Six Poems from the Greek of Sekilianos and Seferis, 1946 (translation)
Cities, Plains, and People, 1946
On Seeming to Presume, 1948
The King of Asine, and Other Poems, 1948 (translation of George Seferis)
Deus Loci, 1950
The Tree of Idleness, and Other Poems, 1955
Private Drafts, 1955
Selected Poems, 1956
Collected Poems, 1960
Penguin Modern Poets One, 1962 (with Elizabeth Jennings and R. S. Thomas)
Beccafico = Le Becfigue, 1963 (English; includes French translation by F. J. Temple)
Selected Poems, 1935-1963, 1964
The Ikons, and Other Poems, 1966
The Red Limbo Lingo: A Poetry Notebook for 1968-1970, 1971
On the Suchness of the Old Boy, 1972
Vega, and Other Poems, 1973
Collected Poems, 1931-1974, 1980
Too Far to Hear the Singing: Poems, 2005 (Francoise Hestman Durrell, editor)

DRAMA:

Sappho, pr. 1950
An Irish Faustus, pb. 1963
Acte, pr. 1964

NONFICTION:

Prospero's Cell, 1945
A Landmark Gone, 1949
A Key to Modern British Poetry, 1952
Reflections on a Marine Venus, 1953
The Curious History of Pope Joan, 1954 (translation; revised as Pope Joan: A Personal Biography, 1960)
Bitter Lemons, 1957
Art and Outrage, 1959
Lawrence Durrell and Henry Miller: A Private Correspondence, 1963 (George Wickes, editor)
Spirit of Place: Letters and Essays on Travel, 1969 (Alan G. Thomas, editor)
The Big Supposer: Dialogues with Marc Alyn/Lawrence Durrell, 1973
Sicilian Carousel, 1977
The Greek Islands, 1978
Literary Lifelines: The Richard Aldington-Lawrence Durrell Correspondence, 1981
The Durrell-Miller Letters, 1935-1980, 1988
Caesar's Vast Ghost: A Portrait of Provence, 1990
Lawrence Durrell: Conversations, 1998 (Earl G. Ingersoll, editor)
The Lawrence Durrell Travel Reader, 2004 (Clint Willis, editor)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

White Eagles over Serbia, 1957

About the Author

Begnal, Michael H., ed. On Miracle Ground: Essays on the Fiction of Lawrence Durrell. Cranbury, N.J.: Bucknell University Press, 1990.

Bowker, Gordon. Through the Dark Labyrinth: A Biography of Lawrence Durrell. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1997.

Friedman, Alan Warren, ed. Critical Essays on Lawrence Durrell. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987.

Kaczvinsky, Donald P. Lawrence Durrell's Major Novels: Or, The Kingdom of the Imagination. Selinsgrove, Pa.: Susquehanna University Press, 1997.

Kersnowski, Frank, ed. Into the Labyrinth: Essays on the Art of Lawrence Durrell. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1989.

MacNiven, Ian S. Lawrence Durrell: A Biography. London: Faber & Faber, 1998.

Morrisson, Ray. A Smile in His Mind's Eye: A Study of the Early Works of Lawrence Durrell. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2005.

Pine, Richard. Lawrence Durrell: The Mindscape. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.

Weigel, John A. Lawrence Durrell. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

AP/Wide World Photos

UMBERTO ECO

Born: Alessandria, Italy
January 5, 1932

A multitalented scholar who specializes in the study of semiotics, Eco is also a novelist of note; both his fiction and his nonfiction writings ultimately focus on the signs that cultures use to communicate.

BIOGRAPHY

Umberto Eco (EHK-oh), son of Giulio and Giovanna Bisio Eco, spent his childhood in Alessandria, Italy, roughly equidistant from Milan and Turin. He left Alessandria to attend the nearby University of Turin, which awarded him a doctorate in 1954. His doctoral research in medieval studies exposed him to much of the material that he later used in his scholarly books and in his novels Il nome della rosa (1980; The Name of the Rose, 1983) and Il pendolo di Foucault (1989; Foucault's Pendulum, 1989). Eco's lifelong intellectual passion has been semiotics, the study of the signs cultures use to communicate, particularly as they relate to the interpretation of literature and meaning.

Following his doctoral studies, Eco spent five years, from 1954 to 1959, with Italian Radio-Television as editor for cultural programming, dealing with those aspects of semiotics that were concerned with mass communication. Midway through his years at the broadcasting company, Eco was appointed assistant lecturer in aesthetics at the University of Turin, remaining there until 1964. In 1962, he married a teacher, Renate Ränge, the mother of their two children, Stefano and Carlotta.

Eco's appointment to his first university post coincided with the publication of his first book, Il problema estetico in San Tommaso (1956; The Aesthetics of Thomas Aquinas, 1988), an outgrowth of his doctoral dissertation. The second edition, retitled Il problema estetico in Tommaso d'Aquino, followed in 1970. Eco moved to the University of Milan as a lecturer in architecture for the 1964-1965 academic year, leaving Milan to relocate at the University of Florence as a professor of visual communications, where he served from 1966 until 1969.

During this time, Eco established an international reputation, becoming a major figure in semiotics, a field that encompasses aesthetics, logic, graphic art, communications, psychology, and literature. He was appointed professor of semiotics at Milan Polytechnic in 1969, remaining there until 1971, when he became associate professor of semiotics at the University of Bologna. At Bologna, he directed the doctoral program in semiotics that he was instrumental in establishing in 1986. In 1993, he was appointed chair of the Corso di Laurea in Scienze della Comunicazione.

As his reputation grew, Eco regularly held prestigious visiting professorships in the United States at such institutions as New York University (1969 and 1976), Northwestern University (1972), the University of California at San Diego (1975), Yale University (1977, 1980, and 1981), and Columbia University (1978). He also held visiting appointments at European and British universities and at Murdoch University in Australia.

Eco served as secretary-general of the International Association for Semiotic Studies from 1972 to 1979 and as vice president of that organization following his term as secretary-general. He is an honorary trustee of the James Joyce Foundation and has received more than a dozen honorary doctoral degrees.

The publication of The Name of the Rose brought Eco a flood of awards, among them Italy's Premio Strega (1981) and Premio Anghiari (1981), France's Prix Medicis for the best foreign novel (1982), and the best fiction book award of Logos Bookstores (1983). He also received the McLuhan Teleglobe Canada Award from the United Nations' Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization's (UNESCO) Canadian Commission in 1985 for his achievements in communications.

As growing numbers of scholars recognized Eco as a giant in his field, his writing attracted considerable attention from broader audiences. His Opera aperta: Forma e indeterminazione nelle poetiche contemporanee (1962) was published as The Open Work (1989) by the Harvard University Press. He coedited several successful books, including Storia figurata delle invenzioni: Dalla selce scheggiata al volo spaziali (1961; The Picture History of Inventions from Plough to Polaris, 1963) and I fumetti di Mao (1971; The People's Comic Book: Red Women's Detachment, Hot on the Trail, and Other Chinese Comics, 1973).

These successes, however, paled in comparison to the reception accorded his first novel, The Name of the Rose. The book had been published in Italy in 1980, and three years later, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich published the English translation, which became an immediate best seller. Harcourt Brace paid Eco four thousand dollars for the U.S. publication rights to the book. So great was its popularity that when Eco produced his next novel, Foucault's Pendulum, the same publisher paid more than a million dollars for the publication rights and did an initial press run of 225,000 copies. The Literary Guild paid $100,000 to include the book as its main book club selection; bidding for the paperback rights began at $925,000.

ANALYSIS

Umberto Eco is among the most cerebral contemporary authors. His store of factual information from the broad range of fields in his specialty, semiotics, is all-encompassing. In his university days, he focused his semiotic studies on the medieval period, and he has made creative use of this period in his subsequent writing.

A strenuous academic focus in his life and writing preceded the publication of his first novel, The Name of the Rose. The broad scope of his scholarship led him deeply into the history and psychology of art and architecture, as well as into music, aesthetics, logic, communication theory, and many areas of history. His explorations reached beyond Western culture. He delved into Eastern cultures as well, seeking always to understand the signs by which cultures communicate.

Eco's close reading and profound understanding of the works of James Joyce left indelible marks on his writing. Just as Joyce grappled with the question of how to deal with time within his work, so Eco has dealt with similar questions. Time is a vast continuum devoid of beginning and end. In The Name of the Rose, Eco uses an intricately structured temporal framework, with definite beginnings and definite ends, to provide a recognizable pattern—that is, impose meaning—on time's fluid continuum.

Eco's handling of time in his fiction is crucial and provides one of the many conceptual levels at which his two mystery novels, The Name of the Rose and Foucault's Pendulum, function. In Ulysses (1922), Joyce confines his action to a twenty-four-hour day; Eco, in his first novel, situates the action in a seven-day period in which days are divided into rigidly structured segments. In Foucault's Pendulum, however, Eco deals with time differently, not using much of the sequential structure of his first novel. In this work time is not dealt with in the linear way in which Western cultures view it.

The structure of time is one of the most significant conceptual frameworks for human communication. The ways in which people segment this infinite, unsegmented continuum fascinates Eco. Each dot on the continuum—each life, each thing—has virtually no intrinsic meaning, yet each one exists within a context that imposes meaning. The way one understands time, Eco might argue, is the way one interprets one's experience.

In Interpretation and Overinterpretation (1992), a book drawn from the Tanner Lectures, delivered at Cambridge University in the preceding year, Eco discusses with Richard Rorty, Jonathan Culler, and Christine Brooke-Rose the limits of interpretation. Rorty defends readers' rights to use texts for their own purposes and to interpret them in the light of these purposes. Eco, however, limits the extent to which texts can be interpreted and allows authors the right to rule out some interpretations, thereby allowing writers the luxury of being interpreted within the framework of their own creative intent.

Postmodern critic Culler defends overinterpretation (interpretation beyond the framework of the author's intent), which presumably would include interpretations of old works based upon subsequent scientific findings. For example, Culler might defend interpreting Sophocles' or William Shakespeare's work in the light of Freudian or Jungian psychology. Although Eco accepts interpretations based on scientific findings that come after a piece of literature has been published, he balks at many of the interpretive schools that have grown out of movements with political agendas.

Brooke-Rose is close to Eco in her interpretive theory, believing that literary texts, in and of themselves, are interpretations that continually retest mythic paradigms. She, like Eco, considers the writer a reader of "the world, the book, and the world as book."

Eco's life, as demonstrated clearly in such seminal scholarly works in English as A Theory of Semiotics (1976), The Role of the Reader: Explorations in the Semiotics of Texts (1979), and Semiotica e filosofia del linguaggio (1984; Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language, 1984), has focused intently on attempts to understand the order that cultures impose upon an amorphous environment. In all of his work, scholarly and creative, Eco is fundamentally concerned with moving toward an understanding of the meaning of meaning.

Eco's two early novels, wearing the mantle of popular mystery novels, are intricately layered works that, to be understood at any but a superficial level, must be read in the light of their many levels of meaning. The Joycean technique of intricately layering meaning is apparent on every page of Eco's elaborately structured novels.

Eco contends that if signs do not reveal things themselves—that is, if meaning is not inherent within signs—communities produce a shared idea of what the thing is. This extension of Plato's theory of innate ideas and of Immanuel Kant's theory of Dinge an sich (things in themselves) leads toward the key to understanding the meaning that Eco seeks.

THE NAME OF THE ROSE

First published: Il nome della rosa, 1980
(English translation, 1983)

Type of work: Novel

Set in a fourteenth century monastery, The Name of the Rose is a multilayered, philosophical treatise successfully masquerading as a mystery thriller.

In his first novel, Eco, already widely published in semiotics, sets up a story reminiscent of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes mysteries. Eco, however, uses his mystery story to convey to his readers an incredible wealth of information about the medieval period, semiotics, aesthetics, and logic. Eco's intention obviously was not merely to write a thriller. Indeed, much of The Name of the Rose, which launches frequently into serious philosophical discourse, is far from thrilling.

The novel treats dissension within the Franciscan order that reaches the boiling point in 1327. One group within the order, the Spiritualists, favors ecclesiastical poverty. Louis IV, the emperor, sides with this group. In the opposing camp are a corrupt pope, John XXII, and a group of monks who fear that ecclesiastical poverty will diminish the church's power and influence. A meeting of the opposing forces is arranged on the neutral ground of a Benedictine abbey.

Representing the spiritualists is William of Baskerville, a British Franciscan, who represents Louis IV. He is accompanied by his young scribe, Adso. William, a consummate logician, is much like Eco himself and bears striking similarities to Sherlock Holmes. Adso, a convincing Watson, is the narrator and fictive author of the book. He writes the story fifty years after the events it relates.

Before the first session of the meeting convenes, a dead monk is discovered at the bottom of a cliff. William, assisted by Adso, sets out to explain the murder and find the murderer. Before long, however, other murders occur, presumably in keeping with an apocalyptic prophecy, and the two clerics face a significant problem. The other monks press for a solution, showing their willingness to let blind faith, not reason, dictate their reaction to the crimes.

In order to understand what is happening, they examine the scriptures closely and debate them heatedly. A major portion of the first half of the book concerns these theological debates. The two investigators attempt to decode messages and understand arcane symbols in books housed in the monastery's large library. In essence, William and Adso engage in semiotic investigation.

The library, an intricately constructed labyrinth, is a repository for all manner of manuscripts that deal with pagan rituals, witchcraft, and magic. William knows that the murders are related directly to one secret book, forbidden to the monks, that has great powers. He suspects that some of the monks have become so intent on protecting this secret book that they are driven to murder to keep others from it.

After excursions down many blind alleys, William discovers the forbidden book and identifies the murderer. The book, ironically, is the second volume of Aristotle's Poetics (c. 334-323 B.C.E.), no copy of which exists in fact. In this second volume, comedy is set forth as a positive force, something counter to much of the church's teaching of the period, which is why the book was hidden. A fire destroys the library; the second volume of Poetics and other precious books are lost to posterity.

TRAVELS IN HYPER REALITY

First published: 1986

Type of work: Essays

Eco comments on how Americans keep touch with their pasts by creating replications or miniaturizations of their artifacts.

It is doubtful that this collection of Eco's essays about America would have been published had the publisher not wished to capitalize on Eco's celebrity following the unprecedented (and unanticipated) success of The Name of the Rose, a best seller. It is fortunate that these essays have been collected because they shed considerable light upon Eco's philosophical concerns.

The title essay, "Travels in Hyper Reality," is particularly enlightening. It delves into America's small places that are untouched by big-city sophistication and remote from the floods of information that assail people in urban areas. Eco contends that Americans insist on creating icons that are perfect replications of the realities they are meant to depict. He tells of stumbling upon seven three-dimensional replications in wax of Leonardo da Vinci's The Last Supper on the four-hundred-mile trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles alone. He muses on the Lyndon B. Johnson Memorial in Texas, with its inch-by-inch replication of the Oval Office.

Throughout Travels in Hyper Reality, Eco pursues the question that has engrossed philosophers in the millennia since pre-Socratic materialism was eclipsed by Platonic idealism: What is real? He grapples also with the question of how societies depict what is called the great chain of being. For Americans, the answer seems to be to create and enshrine hyperrealities, often garish ones, that either replicate or miniaturize enough elements of the past to preserve it and lend it reality.

FOUCAULT'S PENDULUM

First published: Il pendolo di Foucault, 1989
(English translation, 1989)

Type of work: Novel

This mystery thriller that ranges across time and cultures is partly a philosophical discourse and partly an intricately elaborated joke.

Foucault's Pendulum is 641 pages long. The story extends quite aimlessly for nearly the first quarter of the book, after which it gains focus and momentum. This is not a failing on Eco's part; his writing is calculated even if his pace may frustrate some readers.

Readers who had difficulty with Eco's frequent inclusion of Latin passages in The Name of the Rose face a nine-line quotation in Hebrew at the beginning of this novel. Eco regularly lapses into foreign languages in his novels, much as James Joyce did in his. When readers complain to him about this, he dismisses their complaints by saying that they do not have to translate the passages: Had he wanted readers to know what they mean, he would have provided translations.

Foucault's pendulum was invented in 1851 by Jean-Bernard-Léon Foucault to demonstrate the axial rotation of the earth. Foucault suspended a weight from a wire attached to a fixed point. Unlike a pendulum in a clock, the Foucault pendulum is able to swing in any plane. Such a pendulum will continue to swing in the same plane even as the earth turns beneath it. To an observer, it appears that the pendulum is turning in a circle as it swings back and forth; the truth is that the observer, not the pendulum, turns in a circle. Eco uses the pendulum as a metaphor for his narrative approach.

Casaubon, a doctoral student in philology, well versed in the Knights Templar legend, narrates the story. Count Aglie, also expert in this field, is Grand Master of the secrets of the Knights Templar, which makes him potentially master of the universe. Colonel Ardeni is also caught up in the legend, although he is a lesser light than either Casaubon or Aglie, and clearly an opportunist. As Casaubon's narrative proceeds, it becomes not only a story of intrigue about the secrets of the Knights Templar but also a running commentary on the signs and structure of the story itself. The ultimate aim of the story, ostensibly a mystery thriller, is semiotic. Although the central action occurs in Milan during the 1980's, the story, through flashbacks and reflections, moves to Brazil and Paris and extends back to times long distant.

Each of the book's 120 chapters (the number has significance in the Knights Templar legend) springs from a separate source. These sources range from Geronimo Cardan's Somniorum syonesiorum (1562) and Sir Francis Bacon's New Atlantis (1627) to Woody Allen's Getting Even (1971) and Karl Raimund Popper's Conjectures and Refutations (1962).

Eco's mystery involves Ardeni, who appears and ingratiates himself to Casaubon and his friend, Belbo, an editor. Ardeni claims to possess coded messages, found in a document he has stolen, that predicts a second coming of the Knights Templar. Belbo is skeptical and dismisses Ardeni as a crank. Ardeni disappears, perhaps having been murdered. Belbo, whom Aglie is convinced possesses the Templar's secret, then dies under mysterious circumstances.

Casaubon escapes through the sewers of Paris, surfacing finally at the Eiffel Tower, which Eco calls a virtually useless, empty sign. Casaubon is thought to be mad. In a subplot—one of several—he is in love with Lia, who bears his child, a small comfort for him, as he now is convinced that he will be the next victim. He finds Belbo's last text but discovers it cannot be read, but must be reconstructed.

THE MYSTERIOUS FLAME OF QUEEN LOANA

First published: La misteriosa fiamma della regina Loana, 2004 (English translation, 2005)

Type of work: Novel

Using his protagonist's loss of the memory of his own past as a pretext, Eco deals in depth with the question of identity.

Eco's protagonist, called Yambo although his full name is Giamattista Bodoni (for the eighteenth century Italian printer who designed a popular style of type), is an antiquarian book dealer who suffers an accident, not fully detailed by the author, that leaves him able to remember everything he has ever read but unable to remember anything about his own existence during the past sixty years. Seeking to regain his lost identity, Yambo, at the urging of Paola, his psychologist wife, returns to his ancestral home, Solara, where he seeks clues to his identity through the thousands of papers, books, and photographs he finds there. The Eco novel is richly illustrated with much of this material.

Although he has a vivid recollection of the elements of his past, Yambo has lost the “self” of his past and is searching to regain it. Eco uses fog metaphorically throughout much of this novel to mirror Yambo’s confused condition, which reminds one of the Capgras Syndrome that Richard Powers employed in his novel The Echo Maker (2006), published shortly after Eco’s book.

As in his earlier works, Eco deals here with the time continuum. Paola says that people live in three time contexts—expectation, attention, and memory—and much of Eco’s novel illustrates the truth of her statement. This novel can be classified as a bildungsroman, or developmental, coming-of-age novel, despite the protagonist’s age.

SUMMARY

Umberto Eco has successfully merged the specialized and barely accessible writing of semiotics with forms ranging from popular essays to novels to children’s books. He has demonstrated how to convey complex philosophical theories to broad audiences. He succeeds by writing enticing mysteries or, in the case of one of his children’s books, La bomba e il generale (1989; The Bomb and the General, 1989), by writing a pacifist dialogue that, although appropriate for young children, is concerned fundamentally with signs.

Eco’s scholarly work has become standard fare in college-level communications courses. His popular work has drawn a large, if sometimes bewildered, readership. Perhaps this author’s special magic is his way of revealing an incredible mind actively at work. While he is spinning his tales, he is simultaneously divulging how he translates experience into literature.

R. Baird Shuman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Il nome della rosa, 1980 (The Name of the Rose, 1983)

Il pendolo di Foucault, 1988 (Foucault’s Pendulum, 1989)

L’isola del giorno prima, 1994 (The Island of the Day Before, 1995)

Baudolino, 2000 (English translation, 2002)

La misteriosa fiamma della regina Loana: Romanzo illustrato, 2004 (The Mysterious Flame of Queen Loana: An Illustrated Novel, 2005)

NONFICTION:

Il problema estetico in San Tommaso, 1956; also known as Il problema estetico in Tommaso d’Aquino, 1970 (The Aesthetics of Thomas Aquinas, 1988)

Sviluppo dell’estetico medievale, 1959 (Art and Beauty in the Middle Ages, 1986)

Opera aperta: Forma e indeterminazione nelle poetiche contemporanee, 1962 (The Open Work, 1989)

Apocalittici e integrati, 1964, revised 1977 (Apocalypse Postponed, 1994)

Le poetiche di Joyce: Dalla “Summa” al “Finnegans Wake,” 1966 (The Aesthetic of Chaosmos: The Middle Ages of James Joyce, 1982)

La struttura assente, 1968

Opera aperta, la definizione dell’arte, 1968

Le forme del contenuto, 1971

A Theory of Semiotics, 1976

The Role of the Reader: Explorations in the Semiotics of Texts, 1979

Sette anni di desiderio: Chronache 1977-1983, 1983

Postille a “Il nome della rosa,” 1983 (Postscript to “The Name of the Rose,” 1984)

Semiotica e filosofia del linguaggio, 1984 (Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language, 1984)

Faith in Fakes, 1986

Travels in Hyper Reality: Essays, 1986

Diario minimo, 1988 (Misreadings, 1993)

The Limits of Interpretation, 1990

Interpretation and Overinterpretation, 1992 (with Richard Rorty, Jonathan Culler, and Christine Brooke-Rose)

Il secondo diario minimo, 1992 (How to Travel with a Salmon, and Other Essays, 1994)

La ricerca della lingua perfetta nella cultura europea, 1993 (The Search for the Perfect Language, 1995)

Six Walks in the Fictional Woods, 1994

In cosa crede chi non crede?, 1996 (with Carlo Maria Martini; Belief or Nonbelief? A Confrontation, 2000)

Cinque scritti morali, 1997 (Five Moral Pieces, 2001)

Serendipities: Language and Lunacy, 1998

Kant e l'ornitorinco, 1999 (Kant and the Platypus: Essays on Language and Cognition, 1999)

Conversations About the End of Time, 1999

La bustina di Minerva, 1999

Experiences in Translation, 2001

Sulla letteratura, 2002 (On Literature, 2004)

Dire quasi la stessa cosa: Esperienze di traduzione, 2003

Mouse or Rat? Translation as Negotiation, 2003

On Ugliness, 2007

A passo di gambero: Guerre calde e populismo mediatico, 2006 (Turning Back the Clock: Hot Wars and Media Populism, 2007)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

I tre cosmonauti, 1988 (The Three Astronauts, 1995)

La bomba e il generale (1989; The Bomb and the General, 1989)

EDITED TEXTS:

Storia figurata delle invenzioni: Dalla selce scheggiata al volo spaziali, 1961 (with G. Zorzoli; The Picture History of Inventions from Plough to Polaris, 1963)

Il caso Bond, 1965 (with Oreste del Buono; The Bond Affair, 1966)

Ifumetti di Mao, 1971 (with J. Chesneaux and G. Nebiolo; The People's Comic Book: Red Women's Detachment, Hot on the Trail, and Other Chinese Comics, 1973)

A Semiotic Landscape, 1979 (with Seymour Chatman and Jean-Marie Klinkenberg)

The Sign of the Three: Dupin, Holmes, Peirce, 1984 (with Thomas A. Sebeok)

Meaning and Mental Representations, 1988 (with Marco Santambrogio and Patrizia Violi)

Povero Pinocchio, 1995

Storia della bellezza, 2004 (History of Beauty, 2004; On Beauty, 2004)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In Umberto Eco's view, how does time impose an order on the universe?
- How does Eco use his knowledge of medieval history in his writing?
- What does Eco mean by contending that context gives meaning to time?
- What role does psychology play in the works by Eco that you have read?
- What is Eco's attitude toward using scientific advances in the interpretation of ancient texts?

About the Author

- Bouchard, Norma, and Veronica Pravadelli, eds. Umberto Eco's Alternative: The Politics of Culture and the Ambiguities of Interpretation. New York: P. Lang, 1998.
- Caesar, Michael, and Peter Hainsworth, eds. Writers and Society in Contemporary Italy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.
- Caws, Mary Ann, ed. City Images: Perspectives from Literature, Philosophy, and Film. New York: Gordon and Breach, 1991.
- Coletti, Theresa. Naming the Rose: Eco, Medieval Signs, and Modern Theory. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1988.
- Farronato, Cristina. Eco's Chaomos: From the Middle Ages to Postmodernity. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.
- Francese, Joseph. Socially Symbolic Acts: The Historicizing Fictions of Umberto Eco, Vincenzo Consolo, and Antonio Tabucchi. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2006.
- Heer, Jeet, and Kent Worcester, eds. Arguing Comics: Literary Masters on a Popular Medium. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2004.
- Inge, M. Thomas, ed. Naming the Rose: Essays on Eco's "The Name of the Rose". Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1988.
- Park, Sangjin. The Theory of Openness: A Reevaluation of Umberto Eco's Concept of "Openness". Pusan, Korea: PUS Press, 2001.
- Sebeok, Thomas A. The Sign and Its Masters. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1989.
- Taleb, Nassim. The Black Swan: The Impact of the Highly Improbable. New York: Random House, 2007.

Library of Congress

GEORGE ELIOT

Born: Chilvers Coton, Warwickshire, England
November 22, 1819

Died: London, England
December 22, 1880

As an author who wrote in many different genres, Eliot is remembered primarily for her novels of social and psychological realism.

BIOGRAPHY

Mary Ann Evans was born on November 22, 1819, in Chilvers Coton, Warwickshire, England. (She changed her name in 1857 to George Eliot.) During her infancy, the family moved to Griff House, also on the seven-thousand-acre Arbury Estate near Coventry, which Robert Evans, Mary Ann's father, managed for the Newdigate family. Her mother's name was Christina Pearson. It was in this large, old farmhouse, with its wide lawns and mature trees, surrounded by fields, farmhouses, canals, and coach roads, that Evans lived until she was twenty, gathering impressions that form much of the landscape of her fiction. She roamed the meadows with her brother Isaac and toured the estate with her father, waiting in farmhouse kitchens or the housekeeper's quarters of Arbury Hall or Astley Castle while her father conducted his business, and developing that sensitivity toward all social classes that informs her work. Persons, images, and events from these early years color her mature writing, notably Scenes of Clerical Life (1858), Adam Bede (1859), The Mill on the Floss (1860), Silas Marner (1861), Middlemarch (1871-1872), and the "Brother and Sister" sonnets (1874).

Besides her father and brother, a major influence on young Evans was Maria Lewis, a teacher at a boarding school Evans attended during her ninth to thirteenth years. Miss Lewis's ardent evangelicalism appealed to her after the Evans family's attendance at "high and dry" Anglican services, unmarked by "enthusiastic" fervor or nineteenth century doctrinal questioning. (Long after she ceased to regard biblical writing as literally true, George Eliot created fictional contrasts between the less personal, old-fashioned religion of her father and the moral energy that she had experienced with evangelicalism.) At thirteen, she transferred to a Coventry school, where she learned drawing, painting, history, arithmetic, and etiquette; she cultivated English speech and excelled in French, music, and English composition. Her letters to Miss Lewis indicate a religious austerity, and critic Gordon Haight finds evidence of a religious conversion within the evangelical party of the Church of England when she was fifteen.

After her mother's death in 1836, Evans became her father's housekeeper. Robert Evans left Griff House to Isaac and moved with Mary Ann to Bird Grove, a house just outside Coventry, where the intellectual leaders welcomed his mentally cultivated daughter. She became close friends with Charles and Cara Bray, sister of Charles Hennell, whose An Inquiry Concerning the Origin of Christianity (1838) had just appeared in a second edition. Evans's scientific reading had already weakened her earlier convictions; the emotional support of her new "free-thinking" friends influenced her to complete the break with Scripture-based Christianity and to undertake her first serious publication, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1846), a three-volume translation of David Friedrich Strauss's Das Leben Jesu (1835-1836). The fifteen hundred pages of German, with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew quotations, posed a two-year translation task. Published in 1846 without the translator's name, it was a major influence on the nineteenth century "crisis of faith" and identified Evans, for those who inquired, with the Higher Criticism, the scholarly examination of Scripture for its historical credibility.

Preoccupied with nursing her father until his death in 1849, Evans continued her reading, finding Jean-Jacques Rousseau and George Sand her favorite authors, and began translating Baruch Spinoza's Tractatus theologico-politicus (1670), which she never published. After Robert Evans died, the Brays took her to France and Italy, leaving her to spend the fall and winter in Geneva, Switzerland, among political refugees from continental revolutions. She lived with the family of an artist, François D'Albert Durade, who painted her portrait, later translated some of her fiction, and became her lifelong friend. She enjoyed music, theater, mixing with celebrities, and making notes for fiction to come.

Returning to Coventry in 1850, Evans was asked to write for and help edit John Chapman's Westminster Review, the leading progressive quarterly in London. She was its de facto editor from 1851 to 1854, although Chapman received public acknowledgment. Through him, she continued to meet leading intellectual figures, among them Herbert Spencer and George Henry Lewes. Attracted at first to Spencer, she found Lewes to be the more enduring friend. Because Lewes had condoned the adultery of his wife, Agnes, he was not permitted under English law to divorce her, but the marriage had clearly failed. He and Evans committed themselves to each other and lived together openly until his death in 1878, the royalties from her books continuing to support Agnes and her children.

In 1854, Chapman published Evans's translation of Ludwig Feuerbach's Das Wesen des Christentums (1841) as The Essence of Christianity, and she left with Lewes for Germany to help with his biography of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. On their return, he used his standing as essayist and reviewer to submit her early fiction without identifying her to the publisher John Blackwood. By the time that her identity was revealed, after Adam Bede's publication, readers who objected to Evans's unconventional life could not take back their praise for George Eliot's fiction.

Virginia Woolf's view that the union with Lewes freed Eliot's creativity is supported by the record. With his encouragement and protection of her sensitivity to public criticism, she wrote her way past scandal and social ostracism into the hearts of her readers until many of the socially great, including royalty, sought her company. When Lewes died after twenty-four years of devotion to her, Eliot isolated herself for three months, despite pleas from friends, and completed the book he had begun.

In May, 1880, Eliot married John Walter Cross, twenty years her junior but a loving friend she and Lewes had known for several years. The marriage, though brief, was happy. She died in London on December 22, 1880, and is buried in Highgate Cemetery, London, near Lewes, the corners of the plots touching at one point.

ANALYSIS

In a series of 1856 essays for the Westminster Review, George Eliot (the name she sent to Blackwood in 1857) formulates the theories of literary art that would shape the fiction she began writing in September of that year. Revealing the influence of Honoré de Balzac and French criticism, she explains "realism," a relatively new aesthetic concept to her English audience. The context is her praise for John Ruskin's Modern Painters (1843-1860); it teaches "the truth of infinite value," or "realism—the doctrine that all truth and beauty" lie in art that represents "definite, substantial reality," not "vague forms, bred by imagination on the mists of feeling." She was to write instead of the "truth of feeling, as the only universal bond of union" between people. Although her contemporaries and later readers have been awed by her manifest intellectual depth and breadth, she considered what was "essentially human" far more important than cerebral analysis: "If Art does not enlarge men's sympathies, it does nothing morally."

Because Eliot believed that strife among people derived from lack of understanding of "what is apart from themselves," she defined the "sacred" task of the artist as awakening in self-enclosed people a knowledgeable, sympathetic understanding of "the perennial joys and struggles, the toil, the tragedy, and the humour" in the lives of others, particularly the laborers and artisans being misrepresented by writers who had not lived among them. For Eliot, all people of whatever social class were “struggling erring human creatures.” Her purpose was not to argue the causes that made nineteenth century intellectual life controversial but to inform and cultivate her readers’ moral imaginations away from self-centeredness and toward sympathy for others.

In an essay panning the falseness of those who would promote evangelical spirituality yet retain a fascination with the wealthy aristocracy, Eliot declared that the “real drama of Evangelicalism” lay “among the middle and lower classes,” among those such as the farmers she had known on the Arbury Estate and the congregation she had met when attending chapel with Maria Lewis. She returned to the rural scenes and experiences of her youth for her first three books.

The three stories that constitute Scenes of Clerical Life—“The Sad Fortunes of the Reverend Amos Baron,” “Mr. Gilfil’s Love-Story,” and “Janet’s Repentance”—were published serially in Blackwood’s Magazine in 1857, then as a two-volume book in 1858. Stories of clerics, or churchmen, were popular at the time, but many were poor examples of literary art because the authors idealized their characters into unreal, romantic heroes and made them spokespersons for partisan views in the doctrinal controversies of the mid-nineteenth century. Eliot’s stories are about three quite different country parsons, fictional elaborations of actual people she had known. Her purpose is not to expound doctrine, however, but to show the relative effectiveness of each parson, according to his capacity for interpersonal sympathy. A subtler purpose, unrecognized by many readers in an age that accepted the subjection of women as natural and right, is to win sympathy for the sufferings of women, which have been caused by an insensitive and judgmental community, a too-rigid social caste system, the lack of economic opportunity, or a negligent—even brutal—husband.

Wanting to portray sympathetic characters with psychological realism despite her publisher’s wish for heroes and heroines that were models of morally acceptable behavior, Eliot turned to the expanded form of the novel for her next book, Adam Bede, which became a best seller before the year was over. She continued her success with The Mill on the Floss, the last of her early works based in the rural Midlands and the most autobiographical. The Tulliver children, judgmental Tom and hoyden Maggie, are fictional variations of Isaac and Mary Ann Evans; the Dodson family’s allegiance to custom-bound respectability reflects attitudes of the Pearsons, Eliot’s mother’s family. Maggie is Eliot’s first major heroine, of several, who grows from an unconscious egoism to an awareness of another. She is also a tragic heroine developed by the classical formula: “a character essentially noble but liable to great error—error that is anguish to its own nobleness.”

Romola (1862-1863), which Eliot interrupted to write Silas Marner, is among the least read of Eliot’s books, but it was well received by the leading minds among her contemporaries, Henry James proclaiming it the “finest thing she wrote.” Set in fifteenth century Florence, it develops the heroine from dependency and subjection to moral and spiritual autonomy and shows the author’s increasing skill with mythic narrative techniques.

Felix Holt, the Radical (1866) repeats Eliot’s theme of past influencing present but presents the heroine, Esther Lyon, with a choice between entrapment in the tyranny of the past and the moral freedom of continuing to choose her commitments, a theme with added variations in Middlemarch and Daniel Deronda (1876). Her “political novel” is Eliot’s first fully developed treatment of relatively contemporary England, but her imagery of entrapment is drawn from Dante’s description of hell. Set at the time of the first Reform Bill (1832), the novel’s political part concerns issues current with the Reform Bill of 1867. Eliot favors a slow, organic cultural development, similar to Matthew Arnold’s ideas, over political solutions attempted by legislation. The importance of sexual awareness, honesty, energy, and their intelligent commitment—always a theme in Eliot’s work—receives more detailed treatment than in the first five books. Consequences of ill-considered sexual choices are seen not primarily as social disapprobation but as the fugitive self-enclosure of Mrs. Transome, another tragic heroine as classically defined.

In the novel’s more complex treatment of its milieu, the organic inclusion of the past in the present, and Esther’s choice between creative or destructive acceptance of that past, Felix Holt, the Radical reveals the confidence of an established writer and anticipates the fuller treatment of similar ideas in Middlemarch and Daniel Deronda.

ADAM BEDE

First published: 1859

Type of work: Novel

As self-deception brings tragic consequences for Arthur, a young squire, and Hetty, a dairy maid, Adam, through suffering, learns tolerance for weakness.

In Adam Bede, Eliot again represents the humor and wit of the lower classes through their rural dialect and idiom, a skill that had captivated readers of “Amos Barton” and helped to establish her as a writer of humor, pathos, and social realism. Where the earlier work had divided such wit between a few characters and the narrator, however, Adam Bede concentrates it in Mrs. Poyser, master of the colorful maxim, and leaves the narrator more distant than in the earlier story. Eliot interrupts the narrative, nevertheless, to instruct the reader in the aesthetic rules of realism. The well-known chapter 17 is often quoted as Eliot’s artistic creed, favoring truthfulness over idealism, exhorting the reader to find beauty in “old women scraping carrots with their work-worn hands” as well as in “a face paled by the celestial light,” and urging the reader to “tolerate, pity, and love” his “more or less ugly, stupid, inconsistent” fellow mortals.

For the germ of her story, Eliot recalled an episode recounted during her youth by her Methodist Aunt Samuel, who had visited in prison a young woman condemned to execution for the murder of her child, and who had wrought from her a penitential confession after the failure of others to do so. The novel goes far beyond the historical event, however, rendering it as art by the detailed fictional creation of Hetty Sorrel as childish and unconsciously self-engrossed, hardly capable of any moral awareness that her acts could bring significant consequences, hardly able to distinguish fantasy from reality.

In a design of paired opposites found also in her other fiction, Eliot sharpens the delineation of Hetty’s character by contrasting her with the selfless Dinah Morris, the young Methodist open-air preacher. Similarly, Eliot contrasts the title character, a village carpenter, to Arthur Donnithorne, heir to the estate and future landlord of the Hayslope community. They are compared primarily by their respective ways of expressing their love for Hetty, who is expected to marry Adam but whose aspirations to luxury and fashionable adornments make her susceptible to Arthur’s admiring eye, as her fantasies enable him to seduce her, although he knows quite well that a young man of his class cannot marry a working girl.

Hetty’s recognition of her limitations and errors is so slim that she can hardly be called a tragic character. Adam is the primary sufferer, since his love for Hetty has been genuine, if blind. Narrow and inflexible in his rectitude, he learns through his suffering to be more tolerant of weakness and, with his new “power of loving,” to give and receive sympathy in the shared condition of fallibility. His moral growth is slow, in keeping with Eliot’s psychological realism, but he softens in his judgment of others and awakens to the realization that Dinah, though not at all kittenish like Hetty, has her form of appeal too. In turn, Dinah reconsiders her resolution to follow an ascetic life, rechannels her ministering love in interpersonal directions, and comes to return Adam’s love for her.

The misogynistic Bartle Massey claims his place in the community as he brings food and wine to the suffering Adam in an “upper room,” one of the story’s Christian images. Mr. Irwine, in his failure to sense Arthur’s need for confession, is one of Eliot’s recurrent churchmen who appear benevolent but prove ineffective.

Arthur, whose expected responsible leadership has represented hope to the community, can only leave Hayslope in shame. His departure signals the end of that older world, as the narrator regrets the loss of “Fine Old Leisure,” but the novel ends optimistically, centered on Adam, Dinah, and their children.

SILAS MARNER

First published: 1861

Type of work: Novel

In a village of fairy-tale remoteness, a wronged and therefore bitter miser is redeemed, reborn, and restored to human fellowship through unselfish love.

In Silas Marner, George Eliot achieved some of her most successful symbolic narrative, a method that has been compared to Nathaniel Hawthorne's definition of "romance" with reference to this story. In this novel, Eliot's pervasive theme of spiritual renewal through the influence of human love and communal fellowship is embodied, as elsewhere, in realistic events, drama, and dialogue, with currents of symbolic meanings that suggest a mythic structure of concrete universals. Eliot called the story a "legendary tale" with a "realistic treatment."

The theme of spiritual rebirth is announced in chapter 1 by reference to Marner as "a dead man come to life again" and to his "inward life" as a "metamorphosis." The resolution is foreshadowed in the description of his catalepsy as "a mysterious rigidity and suspension of consciousness" that his former religious community has "mistaken for death." The rigidity of despair has driven him from his former home in a northern industrial city, the dimly lit Lantern Yard, where members of his "narrow religious sect" have believed him guilty of stealing church funds in the keeping of a dying man. Marner has been so stunned at being framed by the man he thought was his best friend, at being renounced by his fiancé, who soon married the guilty man, and at being believed guilty by his community, that he could only flee. Because he had believed that God would defend his innocence, he has felt utterly abandoned in his faith and has declared "there is no just God."

He chances among strangers in the isolated village of Raveloe and for fifteen years remains an alien at its fringes, immersed in his work as a linen weaver like "a spinning insect," loving only the gold he earns and hoards, with ties to neither past nor present. When his gold is stolen as the Christmas season begins, Marner announces his loss at the Rainbow (promise of hope) Tavern and, like Job, begins to receive "comforters," an interaction that slowly renews human feeling and consciousness of dependency. On New Year's Eve, as Marner longs for the return of his gold, he finds on his hearth instead a sleeping, golden-haired toddler, a baby girl who has wandered in while Marner held his door open during one of his cataleptic trances, leaving her laudanum-stupefied mother unconscious in the snow-filled lane. Marner can only think that "the gold had turned into the child," but then seeks the mother, goes for the authorities, and learns that the woman is dead.

Marner clings urgently to the child as his own and names her Eppie for his mother and sister, renewing his ties to his past. His conscientious fatherhood, under the good Dolly Winthrop's tutelage, brings him firmly into the community, including its church, making the ways of Raveloe no longer alien to him. As in Adam Bede, Eliot contrasts the Church of England as a vehicle of tradition with evangelicalism as awakening more fervent, personal religious feelings for some. She is not an advocate of either set of beliefs, however, but approves a religious sense that cultivates "a loving nature" with a Wordsworthian piety expressed in charitable acts and fortified by a non-doctrinal awareness of "Unseen Love." As Dinah the Methodist awakened this sense in Hetty, Dolly the Anglican awakens it in Marner, enabling him to ravel (weave or involve) himself into the "O"—to join the circle of fellowship. He is rewarded by Eppie's filial loyalty when her blood father offers to adopt her into his home of luxury and rank.

MIDDLEMARCH

First published: 1871-1872

Type of work: Novel

Personal destinies and vocational fulfillments are limited by chance, contingency, the social fabric, and inherited ideas, as well as flaws in the individual moral will.

Considered Eliot's masterpiece, Middlemarch develops a complex web of relationships in a provincial community shortly before the 1832 Reform Bill. The author's perspective from 1871 suggests that the hoped-for results from that legislation have not been achieved, just as the youthful hopes of her characters are not fully realized, perhaps for similar reasons lying with human limitations beyond correction by legislation.

Dorothea Brooke, a young heiress, is compared to Saint Theresa of Avila, whose "passionate, ideal nature demanded an epic life" and found it in reforming a religious order. For Dorothea, however, a "later-born" Theresa, philanthropic aspirations are "helped by no coherent social faith and order which could perform the function of knowledge for the ardently willing soul." Limited by narrow experience and Calvinistic education, with generous but vague impulses to do something grand, she marries Edward Casaubon, rector of Lowick, a sterile and impotent pedant more than twice her age who needs a copyist to spare his eyes. Unable to see through his pretensions to scholarship or to suspect his poverty of soul, Dorothea believes she will grow by participating in his exalted research. Her ensuing joyless life, circumscribed by his fear that she will discover his fraudulent pose, as his young cousin Will Ladislaw has, is presented through imagery of entrapment in the Minotaur's labyrinth. Eliot satirizes property-based attitudes that find the marriage "a good match."

Tertius Lydgate, a young doctor aspiring to reform medical practice, is Dorothea's visionary counterpart. He has selected Middlemarch as a place to practice up-to-date medicine and pursue his research into "minute processes which prepare human misery and joy," but his intellectual ambition is weakened by irresolution and lack of self-knowledge. One of his weaknesses is his judgment concerning women, which brings him, after resolving to defer marriage, to propose to Rosamond Vincy, convinced that her "polished" and "docile" charm will be an adornment to his life. Once married, he does learn much of "human misery," as her egoistic vanity and drive for social status beyond Middlemarch force him to abandon his aspirations for a practice among the wealthy. Whereas Dorothea escapes her Minotaur by his death, Lydgate dies young himself, having compared Rosamond to a basil plant that "flourished wonderfully on a murdered man's brains."

Totally successful in achieving her goals, Rosamond is opposed dramatically to Dorothea, whose moral ardor (opposed to Rosamond's "neutrality") is noble but ineffective for choosing a husband, because she shortsightedly mistakes Casaubon's arid pedantry for spiritual breadth. As a product of Mrs. Lemon's school, Rosamond has learned to win admiration for her appearance, her parlor music, her sketches, and other typical "feminine achievements," such as getting out of a carriage gracefully. Eliot satirizes what passed for education to many Victorian ladies, leaving them with no higher aims than to marry well and please themselves in the stylish world. Rosamond is awakened to her own humanity and that of others only once, in response to Dorothea's selfless act in her behalf when her indiscretion threatens her marriage.

Equally significant as obstacles to reform are the forces embodied in Casaubon and Nicholas Bulstrode, each representing a "religious" voice in England and each exposed as a pious fraud. Bulstrode's hypocritical evangelical pretensions oppress others and salve his own conscience for his shady appropriation, years earlier, of another's money. Eliot implies that the powerful use religion to maintain power and to thwart reforming efforts. Part of her artistic creed was to represent fully the medium in which her characters act. Therefore, voices of reform are frequently checked by a community afraid to set aside inherited customs and ideas. This point is most clearly made in the reference to Casaubon's will, which limits Dorothea's choices after his death as the "Dead Hand." The phrase alludes to Edmund Burke's claim that England would be saved from revolution by a mortmain, or dead hand, carrying a weight of tradition that innovation could not displace.

A contrast with overreaching ambition is Caleb Garth, a man of integrity who concentrates on excellent performance of his work as land agent. His daughter Mary, with neither Dorothea's nor Rosamond's form of egoism, is solidly grounded in domestic and interpersonal values and will marry Fred Vincy only if he renounces his family's plan to place him in the Church, a step up in rank. Farebrother, a holdover from the older Low Church, demonstrates the religion of humanity that Eliot approves.

Will Ladislaw, who has sustained Dorothea as her respect for her husband turned to pity, brings light to the dark world of Lowick and a fresh, critical mind, educated on the Continent, to the stale parochialism of Middlemarch. His personal vitality restores Dorothea's energy as his aesthetic sensitivity awakens her undeveloped sense for beauty, and their marriage, though frowned upon in class-conscious and xenophobic Middlemarch, brings her a long-awaited proper channel for her reforming spirit as a helpmate to Will, who becomes a member of Parliament on the reforming side.

DANIEL DERONDA

First published: 1876

Type of work: Novel

Egoistic cruelty and the will to power threaten far-reaching destruction, but compassion and a noble vocation energize conscience and the will to live worthily.

Daniel Deronda reaches beyond Eliot's other work in both form and ideas. The plot develops in two separate lines, one concerning the English upper classes and the other portraying a Jewish family living in the humbler part of East London. These lines converge in the title character, who has matured as the ward (and believes he is the illegitimate son) of Sir Hugo Mallinger, but discovers that he has a distinguished Jewish mother and grandfather. His discovery resolves dilemmas of identity and vocation, favorite themes of Eliot.

Deronda's alertness, compassion, and moral seriousness lead him to rescue two quite different maidens. One is Mirah, a despairing Jewess who tries to drown herself because she cannot find the mother and brother from whom she has become separated. As he aids her search, Deronda meets Mordecai, a visionary Jew who sees in Daniel one who will complete his dream of perpetuating the Jewish cultural past in a coherent national future. The theme of inherited vision thus counterpoints the theme of inherited wealth.

The other maiden Deronda rescues is Gwendolen Harleth, a talented but ego-driven dilettante of limited experience and education. Deronda restores to her a necklace she has pawned to replace gambling losses; more significant, he awakens her conscience by disapproving of her reckless behavior. Later, after she has married Henleigh Grandcourt for money and power and is racked by guilt for having knowingly taken him from the woman who has borne his illegitimate children, she becomes dependent on the sympathetic, insightful Daniel to be her moral guide.

Eliot counterpoints the purposeless, property-absorbed, and morally vacuous daily trivia of the wealthy English, suggested in the name Mallinger, with the significant vocations of Mordecai and another Jew, Klesmer, a Continental musician of excellent artistry. When Gwendolen suffers financial reverses and hopes to escape the humiliating oppression of a governess's life by successful acting and singing, Klesmer points out that in her world she has "not been called upon to be anything but a charming young lady, whom it is an impoliteness to find fault with." Lacking self-criticism or self-discipline, she is unprepared, he tells her, for "a life of arduous, unceasing work," suitable only to "natures framed to love perfection and to labour for it" and dreams only of "donning [an artist's] life as a livery," whereas its "honour comes from the inward vocation and the hard-won achievement." Klesmer's words dimly veil Eliot's judgment of the unproductive leisure class.

Again in this novel Eliot portrays marriage as bondage, but the unaware egoism of Rosamond and self-serving rationalizing of Casaubon, however deadly their effects, seem almost everyday evils compared with Grandcourt's calculated will to mastery. Accustomed to deference and regard as her due, Gwendolen has been favorably impressed by Grandcourt's polite but uninspired behavior and has found his lack of ardor pleasingly untroublesome. She marries him for money and power, driven by her own will to mastery and lacking the moral imagination to envision her life subjected to his unloving will. The torturous chemistry between them contrasts with the sympathetic meeting of souls in the marriages of Daniel and Mirah and of Klesmer and Catherine Arrowpoint. Eliot's repeated satire against marriage as an arrangement for the suitable inheritance of property is nowhere so stinging as in the Reverend Mr. Gascoigne's advice to Gwendolen that it is her "duty" to elevate her family by marrying rank, and in Mr. and Mrs. Arrowpoint's insistence to Catherine that her "duty" as an heiress lies in marrying the proper manager of their estate. The author's treatment of marital intimacy observes customary Victorian restraint but reveals evils of imposed brutality unusual in contemporary fiction. Her sensibility is represented in Klesmer's plea to Catherine: "don't give yourself for a meal to a minotaur."

This novel develops Eliot's most complex psychological explorations and moral implications of interpersonal action.

SUMMARY

In its concern with human motives, especially unconscious ones, George Eliot's fiction is a major stage in the development of the psychological novel. Her treatment of sexual identity and relationships influenced the fiction of Henry James, D. H. Lawrence, and James Joyce. Depicting marriage as an inescapable trap, she treats both male and female characters with sympathy but is particularly concerned to expose and reform the suffering of subjugated women. Her analyses of Self and Other are often explained as deriving from the work of Ludwig Feuerbach, but there seems little doubt that Eliot's remarkable insight grew primarily from her own experience and imagination.

Carolyn F. Dickinson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Adam Bede, 1859

The Mill on the Floss, 1860

Silas Marner, 1861

Romola, 1862-1863

Felix Holt, the Radical, 1866

Middlemarch, 1871-1872

Daniel Deronda, 1876

SHORT FICTION:

Scenes of Clerical Life, 1858

POETRY:

The Spanish Gypsy, 1868

The Legend of Jubal, and Other Poems, 1874

NONFICTION:

The Impressions of Theophrastus Such, 1879

Essays of George Eliot, 1963 (Thomas Pinney, editor)

The Journals of George Eliot, 1998 (Margaret Harris and Judith Johnston, editors)

TRANSLATIONS:

The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, 1846 (with Mrs. Charles Hennell; of D. F. Strauss's Das Leben Jesu)

The Essence of Christianity, 1854 (of Ludwig Feuerbach's Das Wesen des Christentums)

About the Author

Beer, Gillian. George Eliot. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1986.

Dolin, Tim. George Eliot. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.

Edwards, Mike. George Eliot: The Novels. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.

Haight, Gordon, ed. A Century of George Eliot Criticism. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1965.

Hardy, Barbara. George Eliot: A Critic's Biography. London: Continuum, 2006.

_____. The Novels of George Eliot: A Study in Form. London: Athlone Press, 1959.

_____, ed. Critical Essays on George Eliot. Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1970.

Hertz, Neil. George Eliot's Pulse. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 2003.

Hughes, Kathryn. George Eliot: The Last Victorian. London: Fourth Estate, 1998.

Kreeger, George R., ed. George Eliot: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970.

Levine, George, ed. The Cambridge Companion to George Eliot. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Uglow, Jennifer. George Eliot. New York: Random House-Pantheon, 1987.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What characteristics of Dorothea Brooke in Middlemarch are also traits of George Eliot?
- Investigate the subject of education for girls as displayed in Eliot's novels.
- Why has Middlemarch been a favorite novel of many writers but has seldom been a favorite of other readers?
- What defects render Eliot's churchmen ineffectual?
- Does Eliot ever create a female character whose role is something other than a frequently frustrated companion of a man?
- Is Eliot's rigorous moral imagination a barrier to modern readers?
- Had Eliot been born in the middle of the twentieth century, what occupation might you have expected her to pursue?

© The Nobel Foundation

T. S. ELIOT

Born: St. Louis, Missouri
September 26, 1888

Died: London, England
January 4, 1965

Accepted by most scholars as the most influential poet of the twentieth century, Eliot stood at the vanguard of a movement that reshaped the way poetry is written and written about.

BIOGRAPHY

Thomas Stearns Eliot was born in St. Louis, Missouri, on September 26, 1888, the youngest child of a family with four daughters and a son. Eliot's grandfather, the Reverend William Greenleaf Eliot, arrived in St. Louis from Boston in 1834 and quickly rose to prominence. The Reverend Eliot made his mark not only as a Unitarian minister and abolitionist but also as an educator, becoming chancellor of Washington University in 1872. As a boy, Eliot was much influenced by his grandfather and by his family's New England heritage. His summers were usually spent in Gloucester, Massachusetts, where his father had built a vacation home. His mother, Charlotte Champe Stearns, herself a poet, also reinforced in Eliot a sense of his family's essentially New England outlook. As he matured, his sympathies shifted still farther east, to Great Britain. In his twenties, Eliot established permanent residence in England, eventually becoming a British citizen. The pull of these three very different places—the Midwest, New England, and Great Britain—is crucial to understanding Eliot both as a man and as a writer. His last great work, Four Quartets (1943), is in a sense an extended meditation on the way that history and geographical place had formed him.

Although his father, Henry Ware Eliot, was a business executive (president of the Hydraulic-Press Brick Company), Eliot was encouraged by his mother to pursue literary and scholarly interests. In fact, his early education was begun under her supervision, and her love of poetry very likely sparked his own. In 1898, Eliot began attending Smith Academy in St. Louis, and in 1906, he spent a year at Milton Academy in Massachusetts before entering Harvard. He received his B.A. in philosophy in 1909.

During this period, Harvard's department of philosophy was rich in stimulating and original thinkers, and Eliot studied under two important twentieth century philosophers, George Santayana and Irving Babbitt. He began work on his master's at Harvard in the fall of 1909. He spent the following academic year, 1910-1911, studying in France, where he attended the lectures of another major modern philosopher, Henri Bergson. At the same time, however, Eliot became acquainted with the poetry of the nineteenth century French Symbolist poets, particularly Charles Baudelaire, Stéphane Mallarmé, and Jules Laforgue. Although he had written poetry throughout his adolescence and later at Harvard, the work of the Symbolists transformed him as a writer. His verse began to change radically, culminating four years later in the publication of "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (1915).

The year that Eliot spent in France, his biographers agree, altered him psychologically as well. He returned to Harvard deepened by his year abroad and less content with the narrow confines of scholarship. Nevertheless, he pursued graduate work until 1914, reading Indian philosophy and studying the work of F. H. Bradley, the subject of his dissertation.

By 1915, Eliot was living in London and becoming known in literary circles there: He had met another rising American poet, Ezra Pound, who was instrumental in seeing to it that “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” was published by Harriet Monroe in Poetry magazine (June, 1915). Pound also pushed forward the publication of Eliot’s first book, Prufrock, and Other Observations (1917).

Practical life in London was difficult for Eliot at first. He taught a variety of subjects at High Wycombe Grammar School and then at Highgate School. In 1917, he began work for Lloyds Bank as a clerk in the colonial and foreign department. At the same time, he was steadily publishing reviews and criticism in a number of well-known English journals, thus strengthening his literary reputation. In 1919, Poems was published, and in 1920 a collection of essays, The Sacred Wood, assured his stature as a critic. Then in 1922 The Waste Land appeared. Thereafter, Eliot’s position as one of the twentieth century’s leading poets was no longer in doubt.

This was also a period of severe personal stress for Eliot. He had married Vivien Haigh-Wood in 1915, and the marriage had been plagued with difficulties nearly from the outset. Both husband and wife were often ill with a variety of psychological and physical ailments, and she was eventually institutionalized. In the fall and winter of 1921-1922, Eliot was on the verge of a nervous breakdown, and doctors prescribed travel and rest. It was during this period of recuperation that The Waste Land was composed.

Financial pressures also continued to weigh on Eliot, but these were relieved when, in 1922, he was given the editorship of The Criterion, a literary quarterly that Eliot managed until 1939. This position led in turn to his becoming a director of the publishing firm of Faber & Faber. He stayed with the firm until his retirement.

Throughout, his friend Pound continued to help him both in his personal life and in his literary career. The Waste Land had originally run to almost eight hundred lines, but Pound had cut the original nearly in half, tightening and focusing the work. Pound had also been a key figure in persuading Lady Rothermere, The Criterion’s financial backer, to hire Eliot as a fully salaried editor in chief. After World War II, when Pound’s reputation was badly clouded, Eliot was quick to recognize his debt to “Uncle Ez.” (It was Pound who gave Eliot his famous nickname “Possum.”)

Eliot became an Anglo-Catholic in 1927. Throughout the remainder of his life, he was to explore the meaning of Christianity in his poetry, his essays, and his drama. In fact, his first substantial dramatic work, The Rock: A Pageant Play (pr., pb. 1934), was intended to be staged within the church. Subsequent poetic dramas—especially Murder in the Cathedral (pr., pb. 1935)—were animated by religious themes.

By 1940, Eliot was one of the most notable British literary figures, a key arbiter of taste and a keen critic of modern culture. Four Quartets, his last major nondramatic work, brought together the several threads of his life—personal, historic, and religious—and capped his reputation as the foremost poet of his time. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1948.

The Nobel was only the chief distinction among dozens of awards and honors Eliot received during the last years of his life. He had become the English-speaking world’s most distinguished man of letters, a role that he seemed to adopt easily. However, like many of the earlier roles that he had played, that of the Great Man seemed to conceal the private Eliot, a true self that he rarely revealed to anyone. The one exception here may perhaps have been his second wife, Valerie Fletcher, whom he married in 1957. His last years with her, according to Eliot himself, may have been his happiest. He died in London on January 4, 1965.

ANALYSIS

Writing about the poetry of Eliot is difficult for a number of reasons. One major difficulty is that Eliot himself helped dictate the rules for how critics interpret poetry. He did this through his many influential essays on poetry, beginning with those in The Sacred Wood, and through the way he transformed the style of modern poetry. Every young poet writing in English after Eliot has had either to imitate or to reject him (often both).

Eliot as a thinker was profoundly interested in the role of literary tradition—the impact of earlier great writers on later ones. However, he himself in a sense started from scratch. When Pound first read “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” he was astonished. Eliot, Pound wrote, “has actually trained himself and modernized himself on his own.”

Sometime in the period from 1908 through 1910, Eliot managed to create a new poetic style in English. During this time, he had been reading the French Symbolist poets, who had flourished in the last half of the nineteenth century. Eliot was especially drawn to Laforgue, whose dramatic monologues contained a mixture of highly sophisticated irony and an original, difficult style. “The form in which I began to write,” Eliot later commented, “was directly drawn from the study of Laforgue. . . . The kind of poetry that I needed, to teach me the use of my own voice, did not exist in English at all; it was only found in French.”

The immediate result of this new style was “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,” the first major modernist poem. Modernism was an artistic movement that lasted, in American and English literature, from about 1900 to 1940, although most literature since that time continues to be heavily influenced by modernist techniques. These techniques, first developed largely by Pound and Eliot, involved the use of free verse (poetry without regular meter and rhyme), multiple speakers (or personae) within one poem, and a disjointed, nonlinear style.

Another clear influence of French Symbolist poetry on “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” was Eliot’s use of intensely urban imagery: Prufrock is a citizen of the modern city, an acute observer of its confusion, grime, and poignancy. The poem’s opening lines are reminiscent of images that French readers had found in the work of Baudelaire. For English readers, however, the stark pictures of Eliot’s poem were startling: “Let us go then, you and I,/ When the evening is spread out against the sky/ Like a patient etherized upon a table.” When Prufrock, and Other Observations appeared in 1917, readers knew that a new and powerful poetic movement was beginning to make itself felt. Eliot and Pound knew that they were creating a literary revolution: Both poets actively furthered the revolution through their essays, articles, and reviews. Two years later, in 1919, Poems was published. The volume included “Gerontion,” a monologue spoken by an old man and cast in blank verse. Once again, the setting was bleakly urban and the sensibility of the speaker was distinctly modern, which meant that the speaker’s viewpoint was ironic, detached, and resigned.

The Sacred Wood, a collection of essays, appeared soon after the publication of Poems. Scholars still debate the impact on subsequent literature of these relatively short prose articles, most of which were written for literary magazines or newspapers. Students of modern English literature agree, however, that these essays, like the poems that preceded them, permanently altered the way readers assessed poetry. Eliot not only shaped readers’ perceptions of modern poetry but also reevaluated the poetry of the past, the “tradition,” as Eliot termed it.

Two essays from the collection are particularly important: “Tradition and the Individual Talent” and “Hamlet and His Problems.” In the first, Eliot sets out two key critical ideas: the nature of the tradition and the “impersonal theory of poetry.” For Eliot, the tradition of literature comprised a living body of works that both influenced contemporary writers and, at the same time, were somehow changed by the light cast on them by modern works. According to Eliot, the masterful poet, fully conscious of working within the tradition, is very much an instrument of the tradition; that is, he or she is in a way an impersonal medium for the common literary heritage. In “Hamlet and His Problems,” Eliot introduced the theory of the “objective correlative,” the idea that the words of literature should correspond exactly with things and with emotions.

One last key critical idea of this period, introduced in “The Metaphysical Poets” and “Andrew Marvell,” was the “dissociation of sensibility.” A practical effect of Eliot’s emphasis on literary tradition was to give new importance to literary periods that had been neglected; one of these, in Eliot’s view, was the era of the Metaphysical poets at the beginning of the seventeenth century. He believed that English poetry had declined in the period following the Metaphysical poets, such as John Donne and Andrew Marvell, and that the cause of this decline lay in a “dissociation of sensibility.” In other words, thought and feeling in poems (sensibility) began to be severed (the dissociation). Poets were no longer able to join the intellect and the emotions to produce true masterworks.

These three ideas—the impersonal theory of poetry, the objective correlative, and the dissociation of sensibility—certainly changed the way American and British scholars studied poetry: Innovative critical schools, such as the American New Criticism of the late 1920's and 1930's, were the result, and university training in literature was also changed by these principles.

Easily as important, however, is the fact that Eliot's theories go a long way toward explaining what he was trying to do in his poetry. In his next major poem, and his most famous, these ideas were given full play. The Waste Land is unquestionably one of the most important poems of the twentieth century. Its importance lies in its literary excellence—its insight and originality—and in its influence on other poets. Although Eliot said that he always wrote with his mind firmly on tradition, The Waste Land broke with the look, the sound, and the subject of most poetry written since the early nineteenth century. In the poem, allusions to myth, religion, Western and Eastern literature, and popular culture are almost constant; in fact, many stretches of the poem are direct, and unacknowledged, quotations from other sources. Because no one narrator appears to be speaking the poem, the work seems as impersonal as a crowded London street. The five sections of The Waste Land also constitute Eliot's "objective correlative," a chain of events that sparks a particular emotional mood. The mood is one of despair, loneliness, and confusion—the central feelings, Eliot believed, of modern city dwellers.

During the early and mid-1920's, Eliot struggled to emerge from his own private wasteland. Many of the poems of this period, such as "The Hollow Men," reflect his desperation. At the same time, he was deeply immersed in the study of the great medieval poet Dante, whose poetry and prose seemed to illuminate a way that a poet could approach religion and achieve serenity of spirit. Accordingly, at the end of the decade Eliot joined the Church of England; from then until the end of his life, he was a faithful to it. Ash Wednesday (1930) accurately describes the stage in Eliot's life that hovered between intellectual, nonbelieving despair and instinctive religious faith. In the poem, the speaker is far less impersonal than in earlier works: There is no reason to suppose, in fact, that the narrator is not Eliot himself, a man desperately seeking his God.

By 1930, Eliot was firmly established as an influential man of letters. As his literary star continued to rise, however, his personal life became more difficult. By then, he had separated from Vivien, and in 1933, with the cooperation of her family, he had his wife committed to a mental institution. Thereafter, Eliot lived the life of a secular monk. He actually roomed in the households of celibate clergy throughout much of the 1930's.

Eliot had also become an even more prolific writer of reviews and essays. In fact, although he published a considerable amount of important criticism during the 1930's (including The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism: Studies in the Relation of Criticism to Poetry in England, 1933, and After Strange Gods: A Primer of Modern Heresy, 1934), his output of poetry had slowed to a trickle.

Not so his dramatic writing. Evidently, Eliot's creative drive had rechanneled itself toward the writing of plays, especially ones with strongly religious themes. His first full effort was The Rock, which was a modernized version of the traditional pageant play staged in a large church. The peak of his dramatic career, however, came with Murder in the Cathedral. In this play set in the Middle Ages, Eliot retells the story of the murder of Thomas à Becket by his former friend King Henry II. The work enjoyed much popular success in London and New York, and it has been repeatedly broadcast as a radio play. The widespread acceptance of Murder in the Cathedral led Eliot to believe that the time was ripe for a revival of poetic drama, although, as it turned out, he remained the only masterly practitioner of the form.

Eliot's last great poetic achievement came during the early 1940's, with the publication of Four Quartets. Written as Britain faced the threat of Adolf Hitler's armies, this long poem is strongly affirmative—a real departure, in many ways, from Eliot's previous work. Many critics argue, in fact, that this, and not The Waste Land, is his greatest poem. The Four Quartets consist of "Burnt Norton," "East Coker," "The Dry Salvages," and "Little Gidding" (three of which were published individually). In this sequence, Eliot has moved quite far from his earlier impersonality: The poem is nearly autobiographical, although much of it explores the relation of human beings generally to God. Each of the places named in the quartets had a deeply personal meaning to Eliot. East Coker, for example, is the town from which the Eliot family came to the New World, and the Dry Salvages are a group of small, rocky islands off the New England coast, where Eliot vacationed as a boy.

From World War II on, Eliot seemed increasingly to find the serenity for which he was searching. He continued to write plays, and these became more approachable, more popular, even more humorous.

Eliot definitely had his comic, whimsical side. Nowhere is this better displayed than in Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1939), the series of poems about extraordinary felines that went into the making of Cats (1981), the successful Broadway hit musical. It seems reasonable to suppose that Eliot would have appreciated his success on Broadway. One of the twentieth century's most difficult poets had at last found easy popular acclaim.

"THE LOVE SONG OF J. ALFRED PRUFROCK"

First published: 1915 (collected in Prufrock, and Other Observations, 1917)

Type of work: Poem

A genteel, middle-aged speaker describes the emptiness and anxiety of a life lived in a grim twentieth century city.

"The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" marks the beginning of the modernist movement in Anglo-American poetry. It is the first English-language poem in the twentieth century to employ free verse, startling juxtapositions of allusion and situation, an intensely self-conscious speaker (or "persona"), and a truly urban setting. The initial quotation is from Dante's La divina commedia (c. 1320; The Divine Comedy, 1802), the great fourteenth century epic describing the author's descent into the Inferno and eventual ascent into Paradise. The lines (in Italian) are spoken by one of the damned souls to Dante as he journeys through Hell. Like souls in the Inferno, Prufrock exists in a kind of living death.

In the poem's opening lines, Prufrock invites the reader to accompany him as he walks through a modern city making his social rounds. Perhaps he assumes that they share his comfortable wealth and socially active lifestyle. As his proper, even prissy, name implies, Prufrock is neurotic, fearful, sensitive, and bored. His upper-class friends—the women who "come and go"—apparently lead arid and pointless lives. At any rate, what is evident right from the outset of the poem is that Prufrock is unhappy with his life. His unhappiness, he suspects, has something to do with the society in which he lives: There is, for example, the jarring clash between the grim cityscape through which he walks and the mindless tea-party conversation of his friends.

One important way in which this poem is different from the poetry of the century before it is the way in which the speaker describes nature. In the nineteenth century, poets described the natural world as the real home of God, as the fountain at which weary human beings could refresh themselves. A nineteenth century poet, such as William Wordsworth, might have described the coming of evening as being "gentle, like a nun." In contrast, Prufrock's evening is like a very sick person awaiting an operation; the dusk over the city is anesthetized and spread-eagled on an operating table. The urban images that follow this one are just as grim: Prufrock's city, which is perhaps Eliot's London, is a town of cheap hotels and bad restaurants. The streets appear sinister; they seem to threaten the people walking in them, bullying them with pointed questions. The urban landscape is made even more ominous by a "yellow fog" that, catlike, "rubs" against windows and "licks" the "corners of the evening."

As night falls and the fog settles in, Prufrock describes another landscape—this time, a temporal one where time stretches to infinity. He knows, however, that he will not be able to use this time to advantage; as usual, he will be indecisive. "There will be time" enough, he says, but only for "a hundred indecisions."

Like the limitless streets outside his window, infinite time also threatens Prufrock. The more life he has left to live, the more he is left to wonder and to question. Wondering and questioning frighten him because the answers that they provoke might challenge the perfect, unchanging regularity of his tidy existence. He knows that time is dangerous, that "In a minute there is time/ For decisions and revisions which a minute will reverse." Nothing, in other words, is as settled as it seems. Nothing that has happened to Prufrock in his life is particularly comforting: He would like his life to change, but at the same time he fears change and the unexpected events that change might bring. He feels as though he already knows everything that is bound to happen to him. He especially knows the kinds of people whom he is likely to continue meeting—socialites who pin him down with their critical scrutiny.

Yet something besides these general, abstract worries bothers Prufrock. His chronic indecision blocks him from some important action. The reader never learns specifically what this thwarted act might be, but Prufrock seems to address a woman, perhaps one he loves. Their friends appear to gossip about them “among the porcelain” teacups. Prufrock implies, however, that the woman would reject him if he could ever gather his courage and tell her how he feels. He pictures her sitting in her genteel drawing room, explaining that she had not meant to encourage him: “That is not what I meant at all,” she tells him.

Prufrock knows, in any case, that he cannot be the hero of anyone’s story; he cannot be Hamlet (despite Hamlet’s similar bouts of indecision)—instead, he is only a bit player, even a Fool. He imagines himself growing old, unchanged, worrying about his health and the “risks” of eating a peach. Still, he faintly hears the mermaids of romance singing in his imagination, even though they are not singing to him. In a final imagined vision, he sees these nymphs of the sea, free and beautiful, calling him. Reality, however, intrudes in the form of “human voices,” perhaps those of the art-chattering women, and he is “drowned” in his empty life.

“TRADITION AND THE INDIVIDUAL TALENT”

First published: 1920 (collected in The Sacred Wood, 1920)

Type of work: Essay

The writing of a poem is a living dynamic wherein the contemporary poet is shaped by literary tradition, while, at the same time, tradition is altered by the poet.

Only rarely in the history of English literature has a critical essay, such as “Tradition and the Individual Talent,” so changed the way people understand poetry. Anyone who has any real interest in modern poetry—reader, critic, or poet—has had to confront this essay and decide for himself or herself its strengths and weaknesses.

One of the important ways that the essay has altered literary criticism has to do with the meaning of the title’s key words, “tradition” and “individual talent.” In the very first paragraph, Eliot indicates that, by “tradition,” he does not mean what people usually mean in talking about literature; ordinarily, a “traditional” writer is perhaps an old-fashioned writer, one who uses tried-and-true plots and a steady, understandable style. Rather, Eliot uses “tradition” in a more objective and historical sense: His definition of tradition is paradoxical because he says that the historical sense of tradition is a keen understanding of both what is timeless and what is not. A true poet understands “not only the pastness of the past, but . . . its presence.”

This is less confusing than it appears: Eliot simply means that for a poet writing in the tradition—a poet who understands his or her heritage—all the great poetry of the past is alive. When the poet writes a poem, great poems of the past help to enliven the modern work. This dynamic relationship is not finished when the poem is written, however, because the new poem casts a new light on the poems that came before. In the same way that the tradition of great poetry helped shape a new, modern poem, the contemporary poem changes the way one looks at the poems that shaped it.

Another apparent contradiction lies in Eliot’s use of “individual” in “individual talent.” He says that a poet’s true individuality lies in the ways he or she embodies the immortality of poetic “ancestors.” In a sense, poets who know what they are doing “plug into” tradition; electrified by the greatness of the past, they achieve a sharper profile, a greater individuality.

It is important to stress that Eliot is not saying that good poets should simply copy the poetry of the past. In fact, he argues just the opposite: Good poets bring something new into the world—“novelty,” he writes, “is better than repetition”—that makes an important advance on what has come before. To do this, the poet has to know what is truly new and different; a poet can do this only by having a thorough knowledge of the classic and traditional. To have this kind of knowledge means, in turn, that the poet needs to know not only about the poetry of his or her own language but also about the poetry of other nations and cultures.

In a crucial metaphor about midway in the essay, Eliot compares the poet to a catalyst in chemistry. He describes what happens when two gases are combined in the presence of a piece of platinum: A new compound is formed, but the platinum is unaffected. The platinum is the poet’s mind, which uses tradition and personal experience (the two gases) to create a poem. In this kind of literary combustion, the poet remains “impersonal.” That is, he or she manages to separate individual facts of life from the work of art that is being created. As Eliot says, “the poet has, not a ‘personality’ to express, but a particular medium,” which is the medium of poetry.

In a third, concluding section of the essay, Eliot draws an important conclusion, one that has been crucial to the way poetry has been studied since the 1920’s. The essay shifts the study of a poem from an emphasis on the poet as a person, to the study of the poem isolated from the poet. After reading this essay, critics would increasingly concentrate on the internal structure of poetry—the tropes, figures, and themes of the work. At the same time, critics would banish the life of the writer from the study of his or her writings; the poet’s personality, as Eliot seemed to imply, was irrelevant to the artwork produced. The peak of this theory was reached with the New Critics and their successors in Britain and the United States from about 1930 through the 1950’s. Later years, however, have seen a waning of the impersonal theory of poetry and a return of the poet to his or her work.

THE WASTE LAND

First published: 1922

Type of work: Poem

A complex tapestry of voices, cultures, and historical periods, the poem weaves a portrait of modern society in decay.

In order to understand The Waste Land—one of the most difficult poems in a difficult literary period—the reader might do well to envision the work as a much-spliced film or videotape, a montage of images and sounds. This imaginary film is, in a sense, a real-life documentary: There are no heroes or heroines, and there is no narrator telling readers what to think or how to feel. Instead, Eliot allows multiple voices to tell their individual stories. Many of the stories are contemporary and portray a sordid society without values; other stories are drawn from world culture and include, among other motifs, Elizabethan England, ancient Greek mythology, and Buddhist scriptures.

The poem is divided into five sections. In the first, “The Burial of the Dead,” the speaker is an old Austro-Hungarian noblewoman reminiscing about the golden days of her youth before the disasters of World War I. The second section, “A Game of Chess,” is set in the boudoir of a fashionable contemporary Englishwoman. The third, “The Fire Sermon,” mixes images of Elizabeth’s England, the Thames and Rhine rivers, and the legend of the Greek seer Tiresias. The fourth, “Death by Water,” is a brief portrait of a drowned Phoenician sea-trader. The fifth, “What the Thunder Said,” combines the above themes with that of religious peace. These parts combine in the poem’s overall montage to create a meaning that encompasses all of them. Because the poem is so complex, that meaning must be left to the individual reader; however, many students of the poem have suggested that, generally, Eliot shows his readers the collapse of Western culture in the aftermath of the war.

Part 1 is a natural beginning for Eliot’s overall panorama because the speaker, Marie, describes her memories of a key period in modern history. Clearly, her life has been materially and culturally rich. Now in old age, thoughts of the past seem to embitter her, and she spends much of her time reading. The following stanzas describe the visions of the Sibyl, a prophetess in Greek mythology, and compare these to the bogus fortune-telling of a modern Sibyl, Madame Sosostiris. The section's final stanza imagines a fog-shrouded London Bridge as a pathway in the Underworld, where souls fleetingly recognize one another.

In part 2, a narrator describes the sensual surroundings of a wealthy woman's bedroom—the ornate chair in which the woman sits, the room's marble floor and carved fireplace, her glittering jewels and heavy perfumes. She is bickering with a man, her husband or her lover, and complains that her “nerves are bad to-night.” Then a contrasting setting appears: a London pub. Two women are gossiping in Cockney English about a friend's marriage gone bad.

A description of the River Thames begins part 3. The narrator juxtaposes the pretty stream that Renaissance poets saw with the garbage-filled canal of the twentieth century. Most of the section tells the story of an uninspired seduction. The speaker, ironically, is the Greek sage Tiresias, who, in legend, was changed from a man into a woman. In this androgynous mode, Tiresias can reflect on both the male and the female aspects of the modern-day affair between a seedy clerk and a tired typist. This section ends with snippets of past songs about the Thames and the Rhine.

The brief stanzas in part 4 picture Phlebas, a Middle Eastern merchant from the late classical period. The tone is elegiac: The speaker imagines the bones of the young trader washed by the seas and advises the reader to consider the brevity of life.

The final section, part 5, is set in a barren landscape, perhaps the Waste Land itself, where heat lays its heavy hand on a group of anonymous speakers. They seem to be apostles of some sacrificed god, perhaps Christ himself. The opening stanza's description of confused “torchlight on sweaty faces” in a garden and an “agony in stony places” tends to suggest this Christian interpretation. Hope, however, has fled the holy man's followers, who wander through the desert listening to thunder that is never followed by rain. Nevertheless, the thunder holds some small promise. The poem shifts setting again. Now the thunder crashes over an Indian jungle while the speaker listens and “translates” the thunderclaps. The thunder speaks three words in Sanskrit, an ancient Indian language, which is also the language of Buddhist and Hindu scriptures. The first word is “Datta” (“given”), the second is “Dayadhvam” (“compassion”), and the third is “Damyata” (“control”). In this three-part message from the natural world, which tells of God's gifts of compassion and self-control, the speaker finally finds cause for “peace”—the “shantih” of the closing line.

FOUR QUARTETS

First published: 1943

Type of work: Poem

The speaker meditates on his own life, the passing of time, and his own relation to God and to other human beings, living and dead.

Perhaps the best way to approach the Four Quartets is to view it as Eliot's spiritual autobiography. This long work is by far the poet's most personal poem. In it, he drops the many masks of his earlier verse—Prufrock or the multiple speakers of The Waste Land—and meditates on the meaning of life and God. The poem is divided into four sections, the “quartets” of the title: “Burnt Norton,” the name of an English country house with a memorable garden; “East Coker,” the village from which Eliot's English ancestors left for the New World; “The Dry Salvages,” a group of small islands off the New England coast, to which Eliot would sail as a young man; and “Little Gidding,” the name of a religious community led by Nicholas Ferrar, a seventeenth-century Christian mystic.

Much of the language in this poem is undramatic, abstract, and philosophical. In fact, it is important to remember that Eliot was trained as a philosopher, so that when he uses common words such as “time” or “future,” he has thought carefully about a very particular definition. As the poem makes clear, for Eliot “time” was not at all a vague concept.

“Burnt Norton” opens, as did The Waste Land, with a memory of childhood, although this time the memory is Eliot's own. He recalls a garden where children played hide-and-seek. The surroundings are calm, quiet, and lovely—like the memories themselves. The following parts of this first section approach the passage of time in different ways: the change of seasons as it is charted by the movement of constellations, the “still point” of religious illumination and its contrast with the “internal darkness” of worldly life, and the struggle to capture time and eternity in words (Eliot’s own struggle as a poet).

Eliot imagines an older kind of time in “East Coker,” the poem’s second section. This is rural time, the cycle of the seasons in planting and harvest. Because the farming village of East Coker is also in Eliot’s own past, as the place of his forebears, it represents historical time as well. In the section’s third stanza, he pictures what an old country festival might have been like before the Eliots departed for America. When he looks at what his ancestors have bequeathed him, however, he feels deceived. He had hoped that their heritage would teach him how to grow old gracefully, but as he looks forward into old age, he sees only death—his own and that of others, no matter how powerful or famous. Thus he struggles to come to terms with the darkness. Words, he knows, cannot encompass death. He counsels himself to have patience, neither to hope nor to strive. Most of all, he realizes that he needs to put himself under the care of the “wounded surgeon,” a figure for Christ. Dying repentant, Eliot believes, is the only true life.

“The Dry Salvages,” the third section, comprises two memories of Eliot’s youth: the rhythm of the Mississippi River in his St. Louis boyhood and the sounds of the Atlantic Ocean near his family’s summerhouse. The river and the sea are “gods,” living beings that modern people have ignored—perhaps to their peril. His thoughts turn to New England fishermen, constantly fighting the elements, waiting to return to land. He draws a parallel between these men, cast on the harsh rhythms of the ocean, and his readers. They, too, are set on a voyage whose end cannot be known. They are not the same people who left port, for every moment they are changing. Like the sea, everything around the reader is unstable and flowing. Just as individuals are incessantly losing their past selves, so they are unable to see through the mists of the future. Memory remains their only reality, unless they attain the timelessness of the saint.

“Little Gidding,” the last section, hints at an answer to Eliot’s perplexity with the many kinds of time—human, natural, and divine. As he sits in a old English chapel, he hears a “Calling.” Through Love, human beings are redeemed, and through death, they are mysteriously born again.

SUMMARY

Many readers of modern poetry know the twentieth century as “The Age of Eliot.” Be that as it may, T. S. Eliot’s stature ranks him among the two or three great English-language poets of the last hundred years (the others being, perhaps, Ezra Pound and William Butler Yeats).

This is so for three reasons. First, as Pound pointed out, Eliot was the century’s poetic forerunner: “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” stands at the threshold of the twentieth century’s modernist tradition. Second, certain of Eliot’s poems—especially The Waste Land—seem to convey the anonymity, confusion, and urbanity of the time better than those of any other poet. Third, Eliot was perhaps the last “Man of Letters” in the old English literary tradition; his views on literature and the canon held ultimate authority for many years and still have an astonishing influence throughout the English-speaking world.

John Steven Childs

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

"The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," 1915
Prufrock, and Other Observations, 1917
Poems, 1919
Ara Vos Prec, 1920
The Waste Land, 1922
Poems, 1909-1925, 1925
Ash Wednesday, 1930
Triumphal March, 1931
Sweeney Agonistes, 1932
Words for Music, 1934
Collected Poems, 1909-1935, 1936
Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats, 1939
Four Quartets, 1943
The Cultivation of Christmas Trees, 1954
Collected Poems, 1909-1962, 1963
Poems Written in Early Youth, 1967
The Complete Poems and Plays, 1969

DRAMA:

Sweeney Agonistes, pb. 1932, pr. 1933 (fragment)
The Rock: A Pageant Play, pr., pb. 1934
Murder in the Cathedral, pr., pb. 1935
The Family Reunion, pr., pb. 1939
The Cocktail Party, pr. 1949, pb. 1950
The Confidential Clerk, pr. 1953, pb. 1954
The Elder Statesman, pr. 1958, pb. 1959
Collected Plays, pb. 1962

NONFICTION:

Ezra Pound: His Metric and Poetry, 1917
The Sacred Wood, 1920
Homage to John Dryden, 1924
Shakespeare and the Stoicism of Seneca, 1927
For Lancelot Andrewes, 1928
Dante, 1929
Thoughts After Lambeth, 1931
Charles Whibley: A Memoir, 1931
John Dryden: The Poet, the Dramatist, the Critic, 1932
Selected Essays, 1932, 1950
The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism: Studies in the Relation of Criticism to Poetry in England, 1933
Elizabethan Essays, 1934
After Strange Gods: A Primer of Modern Heresy, 1934
Essays Ancient and Modern, 1936
The Idea of a Christian Society, 1939
The Music of Poetry, 1942
The Classics and the Man of Letters, 1942

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Explain how T. S. Eliot's reading habits as a young man helped shape his literary career.
- What aspects of Eliot's depiction of J. Alfred Prufrock are totally missing in the dramatic monologues of Robert Browning and those of other earlier poets?
- Explain how Eliot's understanding of the key words in "Tradition and the Individual Talent" govern the thesis of the essay.
- What must a person coming to Eliot with a reading background of poetry written before World War I learn for a minimally successful understanding of a work such as The Waste Land?
- Does The Waste Land ever become, or come dangerously close to becoming, a waste land of Eliot's scholarship?
- After poems like "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" and The Waste Land, why does Eliot's Four Quartets disappoint some readers?
- What is most compelling, for a reader disinclined to share Eliot's religious convictions, in his later religious poetry?

Notes Toward the Definition of Culture, 1948
Poetry and Drama, 1951
The Three Voices of Poetry, 1953
Religious Drama: Medieval and Modern, 1954
The Literature of Politics, 1955
The Frontiers of Criticism, 1956
On Poetry and Poets, 1957
Knowledge and Experience in the Philosophy of F. H. Bradley, 1964
To Criticize the Critic, 1965
The Letters of T. S. Eliot: Volume I, 1898-1922, 1988

About the Author

Ackroyd, Peter. T. S. Eliot: A Life. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.
Cooper, John Xiro. The Cambridge Introduction to T. S. Eliot. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
Frye, Northrop. T. S. Eliot. Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1963.
Gordon, Lyndall. T. S. Eliot: An Imperfect Life. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999.
Litz, A. Walton, comp. Eliot in His Time. Princeton; N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1973.
Menard, Louis. Discovering Modernism: T. S. Eliot and His Context. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007.
Newton-de Molina, David, ed. The Literary Criticism of T. S. Eliot: New Essays. London: Athlone Press, 1977.
Raine, Craig. T. S. Eliot. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
Sherry, Vincent. The Great War and the Language of Modernism. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
Tate, Allen, ed. T. S. Eliot: The Man and His Work. New York: Delacorte Press, 1966.

BUCHI EMECHETA

Born: Yaba, Lagos, Nigeria
July 21, 1944

As one of the most prominent and prolific African female writers, Emecheta examines and critiques the roles and customs of African women and men in present-day Nigeria and London. She is one of the first writers who contributed to the development of an African female literary tradition.

BIOGRAPHY

Florence Onye Buchi Emecheta (eh-mee-CHEH-tah) was born on July 21, 1944, in Yaba, Lagos, Nigeria, to Egbo parents, Jeremy Nwaudike and Alice Ogbanje Okwuekwu Emecheta. Wanting their two children to maintain connections with their cultural traditions, the parents would travel back and forth to their native village, Ibuza. There Emecheta was exposed to storytellers—an influence that is evident in her work, for her writing style is one of storytelling. She credits listening to storytellers, particularly her father's sister “Big Mother,” as the factor that shaped her literary imagination.

Emecheta's father died when she was nine years old, and the family was separated. Emecheta went to live with her mother's cousin in Lagos, her mother was inherited by her husband's brother, and her younger brother went to live with her father's brother. Although Emecheta relates that she was treated like a servant, she was able to continue her education by winning a scholarship to Methodist Girls' High School, and consequently she was able to fulfill one of her childhood dreams—to receive an education.

When her dream of attending the University of Ibadan was thwarted, she married Sylvester Onwordi in 1960, to whom she had been promised since the age of eleven. She worked for the American embassy in Lagos for two years supporting the family of four and then followed her husband, a student, to London. There she continued to support the growing family, which then consisted of five children—Chiedu (Florence), Ikechukwu (Sylvester), Chukwuemeka (Jake), Obiajulu (Christy), and Chiago (Alice)—by working as a librarian at the British Museum. Surrounded by books and having had the dream of being a writer since childhood, Emecheta began to write in her spare time. She completed her first manuscript; however, it was burned by her husband, an action that led to their separation.

Deciding that the one thing she could do was write and needing to support her family, Emecheta began writing a column for the New Statesman. Articles submitted to the magazine formed the basis of her first novel, In the Ditch (1972). A second novel, Second-Class Citizen, followed in 1974. These two highly autobiographical novels (published together in 1983 as Adah's Story) relate the protagonist's experience of immigrating to and living in London. In 1970, she entered London University and received a degree in sociology, with honors, in 1974, thereby fulfilling yet another dream.

While working as a youth worker and sociologist, Emecheta continued writing. In 1976, she wrote two plays for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC)—A Kind of Marriage, adapted as a novel in 1986, and The Ju Ju Landlord—and also reconstructed her first manuscript, which was published as The Bride Price (1976). These were followed by The Slave Girl (1977), which received the Jock Campbell Award for Commonwealth Writers, and The Joys of Motherhood (1979), which addresses the issue of a woman's worth as it relates to her fertility. Unlike Emecheta's first two novels, these are set in Nigeria.

In late 1970's and early 1980's, Emecheta traveled abroad, serving as a visiting professor at universities in the United States and at the University of Calabar in Nigeria; in 1982, she returned to England as a lecturer and then a fellow at London University. Emecheta also began to write books for children and young adults, including Titch the Cat (1979), Nowhere to Play (1980), The Wrestling Match (1980), The Moonlight Bride (1980), and Naira Power (1982), while continuing to write for adults. Both Destination Biafra, which addresses civil war in Nigeria, and Double Yoke, which is set on a university campus in Nigeria, appeared in 1982, the same year that Emecheta and her son, Sylvester, established the Ogwugwu Afor Publishing Company. The Rape of Shavi, an allegorical work about the relationship between Africa and Europe, followed in 1983, the year that Emecheta was named among the Best of Young British Writers by the Book Marketing Council.

Before returning to fiction writing, Emecheta published her autobiography, Head Above Water, in 1986. She has since produced the novels Gwendolen (1989; pb. in the United States as The Family, 1990), which relates the story of a West Indian-born woman who immigrates to London; Kehinde (1994), the tale of a middle-aged woman who gives up her profession and returns to Nigeria, only to learn that her husband has taken a second wife; and The New Tribe (2000), the story of Chester, a black Nigerian child adopted by a white family in England who searches for his identity. With its male protagonist and focus on transracial adoption, The New Tribe is the greatest departure from the themes of her previous novels.

In 1990, Emecheta became a member of the PEN Club, and in 1992, she received an honorary doctorate of literature degree from Fairleigh Dickinson University in Madison, New Jersey. In 2008, Emecheta was living in both London, where she was a member of the Arts Council of Great Britain, and in Ibuza, Nigeria. By realizing her childhood dreams of receiving an education and becoming a writer, Emecheta, a storyteller, essayist, novelist, playwright, autobiographer, and poet, is recognized as the most prolific African female writer to date.

ANALYSIS

In the essay "Feminism with a Small 'f'" and in her autobiography, Emecheta states that it was through growing up listening to storytellers that she decided that she wanted to become a storyteller herself. This explains her writing style, which is much like that of storytelling. Although her work does not only tell stories about the subjugation of women or advance an African view of feminism, as is often asserted by critics, it is writing that focuses primarily on the experiences of women. Running throughout Emecheta's fiction are the themes of women desiring education, defying tradition, and making choices about their own lives.

The desire for education is present in almost all of Emecheta's novels, from a young girl who decides to attend school, even when her parents do not allow it, to a young woman enduring humiliation and harassment while pursuing higher education. Choosing a husband of one's own choice, rather than being controlled by the bride price, is also a prevalent theme. A number of Emecheta's women choose men who cannot afford the bride price; other women run to the men, likewise keeping them from having to pay the bride price. Women also choose to have or abort children, to leave abusive husbands, and to reject polygamous relationships.

While Emecheta does reveal a number of African practices and traditions that may be repressive for women, she also writes about practices that empower them. Thus, while women suffer because of problems with fertility or because of incest and polygamy, there are those who experience financial independence as traders and businesswomen, as well as those who achieve emotional and psychological independence.

Emecheta also tells stories about family. She focuses on issues such as orphans (both female and male), women bonding, and mother-daughter as well as father-daughter relationships. Because feminist readings of the novels often become the focus of her work, the fact that the father-daughter bond is stronger than that of the mother-daughter relationship in a number of her novels is usually ignored.

Emecheta is aware that her work serves not only to reveal African practices and traditions, and their contradictions, but also to introduce readers to African culture and traditions—mythic histories before the era of colonization, proverbs and sayings, songs, foods, cultural artifacts, and language, both African (such as the words "dibia" and "lappa") and Africanized English (such as "dokita" for "doctor, or "felenza" for "influenza"). The setting for many of her novels is the early half of the twentieth century, where traditional cultures are affected not only by the end of colonialism but also by modernism. As a result, her work presents such themes as the clashing and blending of cultures—African and European, traditional religions versus Christianity, and the generational differences between elders and the young. Whatever the themes, almost all of Emecheta's work is tinged with irony, which she asserts is a feature of storytelling, and all of her stories contain philosophical lessons.

SECOND-CLASS CITIZEN

First published: 1974

Type of work: Novel

Adah immigrates with her husband to London, where she is treated as a second-class citizen, not in society but in her own home.

Second Class-Citizen, which tells the story of Adah Ofili from her childhood to her early years in London, begins with a discussion of dreams. The eight-year-old Adah, who was born in Lagos during World War II, can only dream of going to school, since she was not allowed to attend because she was not a boy. One day when her mother is distracted, Adah goes to the Methodist School where a neighbor teaches, and he allows her to remain for the day. When she returns home, the police are there. Her mother is punished for child neglect, yet Adah is allowed to continue attending school.

A few months later, Adah's father goes to the hospital but does not return. Her mother is inherited by her father's brother, her brother goes to live with one of her father's cousins, and Adah is sent to live with one of her mother's brothers. Only because she could bring a higher bride price if educated, she is allowed to remain in school. Suitors come; however, she is not interested in any of them. Instead, fascinated with the possibility of winning a scholarship to secondary school, Adah steals the money for the sitting fee, passes the examination, and wins the scholarship. She attends the Methodist Girls' School and completes the four-year course.

Wanting to continue her education at the university, Adah knows that she will not be allowed to live on her own. Therefore, she marries a student, Francis Obi, who is too poor to pay the bride price, with the hope of being able to attend school and study at her own pace. Instead, she gives birth to a daughter and begins working for the American consulate library. Having had the dream of going to the United Kingdom, she shares it with her husband. They decide to go, but his family, who depend upon her income, approves of his leaving but insists that Adah remain in Lagos. She agrees for a time but eventually persuades her in-laws to allow her also to travel to England.

Adah's dream comes true as she sails for London with two young children; however, the narrator makes it clear that all dreamers know that there are setbacks to dreams. For Adah, there are complications when she gives birth to her third child. She is in the hospital for a few weeks but is ignored by her husband. Rather than being concerned about her welfare or the child's, he is more interested in using the money she receives from work for his personal advancement. Adah then comes to accept that she did not marry the man of her dreams.

Francis informs Adah that in England she is a second-class citizen. Noting Adah's disappointment at their living conditions among a lower class than they would have associated with in Lagos, he tells her she cannot discriminate against her own people, for they are all second-class now. In spite of Francis's conciliation, Adah rejects the notion of being a second-class citizen: She has what is considered a first-class citizen's job and insists upon taking care of her own children, a trait linked in England only to white women. When her son, Victor, becomes seriously ill and she believes it is because of the conditions at the home where he is staying while she works, Adah approaches her children's social worker and insists that they be moved from that sitter. Because of Adah's fierce persistence, her children are placed in a nursery. Thus, she learns that what Francis has been telling her is not true: Second-class citizens can fight for their rights.

Francis's idea is further undermined when Victor again becomes ill, this time on Christmas Day. Francis calls their doctor, but the doctor refuses to make a house visit. Francis summons two policemen, who come to see the child and agree that a doctor is needed. Although the family doctor, an Indian, does not come, a Chinese one does. Adah is keenly aware of that which Francis mostly likely does not see: England equally provides some services for both its first- and second-class citizens.

When it is clear that she will not accept the second-class citizenship that Francis seeks to impose at home, and when she realizes that he does not respect her and her dreams, scoffing at her desire to be a writer and destroying her first manuscript, Adah takes her five children and leaves.

THE BRIDE PRICE

First published: 1976

Type of work: Novel

Aku-nna's life changes upon her father's death. She leaves Lagos for the town of Ibuza and comes into conflict with her ancestral home's customs and traditions.

The Bride Price, set in Lagos in the early 1950s, opens with the thirteen-year-old Aku-nna (whose name means “a father’s wealth”) and her eleven-year-old brother, Nna-nndo (“father is the shelter”) walking into their apartment and seeing their father, Ezekiel Odia, home from work. He explains that he is going to the hospital for medical attention for a foot wound he had received while fighting in World War II, but he promises to be back by the evening meal. When he does not return, two uncles, Uche and Joseph, come to assist, for the children’s mother, Ma Blackie (so named because of her black skin) is in Ibuza, visiting the river goddess because of fertility problems. Three weeks later, the father does return—to be buried. The children realize that they are orphans and that their lives will no longer be the same.

Once Ma Blackie returns to Lagos, the family learns its fate: They are to move to Ibuza, as Ma Blackie is to live with her husband’s older brother, Okonkwo. Ezekiel has made financial provisions for his family; consequently, they can remain together. Ma Blackie is able to invest in and trade palm oil, and Nna-nndo, as well as Aku-nna, who will be forced to marry so the bride price can be used to ensure her brother’s education, are able to remain in school. Ma Blackie soon becomes Okonkwo’s fourth wife.

Aku-nna quickly captures the attention of her twenty-four-year-old schoolteacher, Chike Ofolue, because she is quiet yet intelligent. Nevertheless, she is informed by her cousin that the Ibuza women are not allowed to associate with him as he is the son of former slaves, those who had been kidnapped to be sold to the Europeans. (According to a story that his mother told Chike, his princess grandmother was not sold because she was so beautiful. She was allowed to have children, and when the slave trade became illegal, her sons were given to the missionaries. As a result, they were educated and became teachers; their children became lawyers and doctors.) Aku-nna responds to Chike’s attentions, as he is the only one who takes an interest in her thoughts as well as her growing womanhood.

The love interest might have been a passing fancy for Chike and Aku-nna had it not been for the resistance from the community. Instead their love grows, and Chike, who affectionately calls Aku-nna “akum” or “my wealth,” is prepared to follow the village custom. His parents will ask her parents for Aku-nna and also pay the bride price. Insulted because an oshu, or slave, would dare think of marrying Aku-nna, another suitor, Okoboshi, kidnaps her as his bride. Deciding to fight back, Aku-nna tells Okoboshi that she has already given herself to Chike and, with Chike’s help, escapes. They travel to a town in midwest Nigeria and marry.

Since Okoboshi states that he has taken a lock of Aku-nna’s hair, and therefore is her husband, retaliation takes place in Ibuza: Okonkwo publicly divorces Ma Blackie and refuses to accept the bride price, the cocoa plants on the Ofolue plantation are destroyed, and the Ofolues, in turn, sue—and win. Although their actions cause much dissension in Ibuza, Aku-nna and Chike are happy. He is a manager for an oil company, she teaches school, and they soon are expecting their first child. In the midst of their happiness, Aku-nna takes ill, and even though she receives proper medical treatment, she dies in childbirth. Her last request to Chike is to name their daughter “Joy.”

The novel concludes with a paragraph that explains how Aku-nna and Chike fulfill the superstition that if a woman is to live to see her children's children, the bride price must be paid. With this paragraph, it becomes apparent that the novel is a story, told by an omniscient narrator, that contains a philosophical lesson.

THE SLAVE GIRL

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

The orphaned Ojebeta is sold by her brother; after twenty-eight years, she returns to Ibuza and marries, and her bride price is finally paid.

That The Slave Girl is narrated by a storyteller is apparent through its structure: Its prologue is one of mythical beginnings that relates the founding of Ibuza by a young prince, Umejei. The stage is set for the story, which takes place in the early twentieth century, of Okweukwu and Umeadi Oda, their two sons, Owezim and Okolie, and their daughter, Ojebeta.

Although “only a daughter,” Ojebeta is beloved because she is the only girl child who survives after so many have not. Her specialness is demonstrated through her ogbanje charms, which her father has to travel miles through dangerous territory to obtain, and her intricate facial tattoos, both of which are to ensure that she will not be sold into slavery. However, when Ojebeta's parents die of “felenza,” the seven-year-old is sold to a relative by her brother, Okolie, for eight pounds, money that he uses to pay for his coming-of-age dance. Ojebeta becomes one of five slave girls and two boys owned by Ma Palagada, a successful market trader.

In Onitsha, Ojebeta lives the life of a slave girl; however, because of Ma Palagada's wealth and eventual conversion to Christianity, she is allowed to attend school, to learn to sew, and—once Ma Palagada's son, Clifford, informs his mother of his desire to marry Ojebeta—to receive special, more sophisticated refinement training. When Ma Palagada dies, Clifford becomes preoccupied with taking over the business, and one of Ma's daughters intends to take Ojebeta as a maid for her children. Remembering her past life in Ibuza and having had dreams of running away, Ojebeta decides to return to her homeland rather than be bought a second time.

The more refined Ojebeta does return home, begins to sell palm oil, and becomes rich based upon the village standards. That the enslaved Ojebeta has fared better than those who have never been enslaved is suggested with her prosperous return. This notion is also reiterated through the fate of some of the other slaves. The oldest slave girl, Chiago, marries Pa Palagada, becomes head of the household, and bears him four sons; Amanna, who encouraged Ojebeta to return home, is a successful business owner; and Jienuaka, one of the male slaves, marries another one of the slave girls, Nwayinuzo, and becomes a successful businessman.

When Ojebeta learns that a relative wishes to sell her for the bride price, she shaves her hair to prevent a lock from being taken. She instead chooses to marry Jacob Okonji, a man from Ibuza who was educated and lived in Lagos. Wanting to adhere to tradition, Ojebeta and Jacob seek approval from her brothers, and Okolie admits that he had sold Ojebeta. The two marry and have two children. When Ojebeta later begins to miscarry, Jacob fears it is a result of the bride price not being paid, for Ojebeta still legally belongs to the Palagadas.

When Ojebeta's husband and brothers learn that Clifford Palagada is coming to Lagos, they know he is there to collect the bride price. Jacob welcomes him into their home and pays the bride price. The storyteller-narrator concludes that years after having been sold into slavery and years after Britain had outlawed slavery, Ojebeta was once again changing masters.

SUMMARY

Buchi Emecheta's work is identified with African feminism, for it is viewed as addressing the experience of women in a male-dominated society. Her works indeed reveal a number of repressive African practices and traditions but also include their contradictions. Nonetheless, most of her female characters possess an independent, resilient spirit that allows them to survive, despite their suffering.

Emecheta's work also serves a second function. Through her literary technique of storytelling, her fiction continues the African oral tradition of stories that provide philosophical lessons. Emecheta best explains the purpose of her work, saying it is to "write about Africa for the whole world."

Paula C. Barnes

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

In the Ditch, 1972

Second-Class Citizen, 1974

The Bride Price, 1976

The Slave Girl, 1977

The Joys of Motherhood, 1979

Destination Biafra, 1982

Double Yoke, 1982

Adah's Story, 1983 (includes In the Ditch and Second-Class Citizen)

The Rape of Shavi, 1983

A Kind of Marriage, 1986 (adaptation of her teleplay)

Gwendolen, 1989 (pb. in U.S. as The Family, 1990)

Kehinde, 1994

The New Tribe, 2000

TELEPLAYS:

The Ju Ju Landlord, 1976

A Kind of Marriage, 1976

Family Bargain, 1987

NONFICTION:

Head Above Water, 1986

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Titch the Cat, 1979

Nowhere to Play, 1980

The Moonlight Bride, 1980

The Wrestling Match, 1980

Naira Power, 1982

About the Author

Emecheta, Buchi. "Feminism with a Small 'f'!" In Criticism and Ideology: Second African Writers' Conference, edited by Kirsten Holst Petersen. Uppsala, Sweden: Scandinavian Institute of African Studies, 1988.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What are the differences in the roles and expectations for Buchi Emecheta's female protagonists and for their mothers or other female characters?
- Naming is important in African culture and in Emecheta's novels. Discuss the importance of the characters' names as well as the significance of her novels' titles.
- The practice of polygamy is seen in the works of Emecheta, yet none of the protagonists' fathers in Second-Class Citizen, The Bride Price, and The Slave Girl has more than one wife. Speculate upon the reasons for this break with tradition in Emecheta's works.
- What similarities can be seen in Emecheta's Second-Class Citizen, The Bride Price, and The Slave Girl?
- What philosophical lessons can be derived from The Bride Price and The Slave Girl?

- Fishburn, Katherine. Reading Buchi Emecheta: Cross-Cultural Conversations. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995.
- Petersen, Kirsten Holst. "Buchi Emecheta." In Twentieth-Century Caribbean and Black African Writers, First Series, edited by Bernth Lindfors and Reinhard Sander. Vol. 117 in Dictionary of Literary Biography. Detroit: Gale, 1992.
- Umeh, Marie. "Buchi Emecheta." In Postcolonial African Writers: A Bio-Bibliographical Critical Sourcebook, edited by Pushpa Naidu Parekh and Siga Fatima Jagne. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1998:
- _____, ed. Emerging Perspectives on Buchi Emecheta. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 1996.

SHŪSAKU ENDŌ

Born: Tokyo, Japan
March 27, 1923

Died: Tokyo, Japan
September 29, 1996

Considered one of the finest Japanese novelists of the twentieth century, Endō, a Christian writer, explored relationships between the East and the West, striving to reconcile Western Christianity, with its emphasis on God's justice, with the Eastern concept of compassion.

BIOGRAPHY

The second son of Endō Tsunehisa and Iku, Shūsaku Endō (ehn-doh) was born in Tokyo, Japan, on March 27, 1923. He was taken to Dalian in Japanese-occupied Chinese Manchuria when he was three. When his parents divorced in 1933, he returned with his mother to Kobe, Japan. Endō Iku converted to Catholicism, and at the age of eleven, under family pressure, Shūsaku joined the Catholic Church and took the Christian name Paul; he was taunted by schoolmates because he was a Christian. In 1943, Endō entered Keio University but left shortly to work for the war effort. Returning to the university in 1945, he studied French literature and graduated in 1948. While there, he published several articles, including “Kamigami to kami to” (the gods and God) and “Katorikku sakka no mondai” (the problems confronting the Catholic author).

In 1950, Endō was among the first Japanese to study abroad following World War II. In France, he studied the work of various French Catholic writers, first at the University of Lyons and then in Paris, but in February, 1953, illness forced him to return to Japan.

Endō published two novellas, Shiroi hito (1954; white man), which won the thirty-third Akutagawa Prize, and Kiroi hito (1955; yellow man). In 1956, he taught at Jochi (Sophia) University, a private Catholic school. Umi to dokuyaku (The Sea and Poison, 1972) for which he received the Shinchosha Prize and the Mainichi Culture Prize, followed in 1957. In 1959, Endō published the novel Obakasan (Wonderful Fool, 1974) before returning to France to gather materials for a study of the Marquis de Sade. Again, tuberculosis forced his return to Japan, where he was hospitalized for almost three years. During that time, however, he published Kazan (1959; Volcano, 1978). Endō then published the novels Watashi ga suteta onna (1963; The Girl I Left Behind, 1994), Ryugaku (1965; Foreign Studies, 1989), and Chinmoku (1966; Silence, 1969), and a dramatic version of that novel, Ogon no kuni (pr. 1966, pb. 1969; The Golden Country, 1970). In 1967, he was a lecturer at Seijō University before becoming chief editor of the journal Mita bungaku and publishing some short stories. In 1973, the nonfiction books Iesu no shōgai (A Life of Jesus, 1978) and Shikai no hotori (beside the dead sea) were published, followed by his novel Kuchibue o fuku toki (When I Whistle, 1979), in 1974.

In 1977, Endō published Kirisuto no tanjō (the birth of Christ), which received the Yomiuri Literary Award, and he garnered the International Dag Hammarskjöld Prize for A Life of Jesus in 1978. He also received the Artistic Academy Award for services to literature. His novel Samurai (1980; The Samurai, 1982) was awarded the Noma Literary Prize. In 1985, Endō was elected president of the Japan PEN Club, and the next year he published Sukyandaru (Scandal, 1988), which won the Silver Bear Award for Literature at the 1986 Berlin Festival. In subsequent years he received honorary doctorates from Georgetown University, John Carroll University, and Fujen University in Taipei, as well as being selected as a Bunka Kōrōsha (Person of Cultural Merit), one of Japan's highest honors. His novel Fukai kawa (1993; Deep River, 1994) earned him the Mainichi Cultural Arts Award. In 1995 he was awarded the Bunka Kunsho (Order of Cultural Merit) by the emperor of Japan. Endō was short-listed for the Nobel Prize in Literature several times.

Plagued by ill health most of his life, Shūsaku Endō succumbed to his final illness on September 29, 1996. He is buried in the Fuchū Catholic Cemetery in Tokyo, Japan.

ANALYSIS

The work of Shūsaku Endō is often described as a literature of reconciliation. As a Japanese but also a Christian, Endō dealt throughout his career with the problem of writing for an audience who did not identify readily with Christian ideas. The Japanese seem to have a sense of religion, at least in the subconscious, but that sense of what Endō called the “cosmic life” is not articulated as firm dogma as it is in Christianity. Endō sought to reconcile Western Christianity, with its emphasis on God’s justice, with the Eastern mind that is much more open to a concept of compassion. His books address such themes as the religious indifference of the East; Japanese numbness to sin and guilt; a widening gap in understanding between Eastern and Western cultures; and the struggle between martyrdom and apostasy, acceptance and alienation, and courage and cowardice.

In his early 1947 essay “Kamigami to kami to” (the gods and God), Endō sees an unfathomable gulf between the Eastern pantheistic world, in which everything is part of a whole, and the monotheistic West, where there is a clear distinction between God and man. In Shiroi hito, Endō develops a theme to which he will return throughout his career: the individual reacting to unconscious impulses that are incomprehensible. Closely related to this theme is another major motif in his work: the idea that all human beings leave indelible marks on those whose lives they touch, however briefly. Shiroi hito uses the Nazi atrocities in France during World War II to symbolize man’s inhumanity to man. Using the technique of paradoxical inversion, the protagonist comes to view the Nazis’ behavior as exhibiting basic human instincts rather than extreme callousness and of civilization pulling off a mask to expose the real nature of humankind. Later, when Jacques, a young seminarian, catches the protagonist stealing, he continues to send him Christian tracts; the protagonist is dispasionate and hates what he sees as the hypocrisy of people like Jacques, who are willing to die for what they believe, since he feels that they are as prone to evil as anyone else. The protagonist struggles with the question of Original Sin and the fact that human beings are powerless to overcome it.

Prior to a lengthy hospitalization for treatment of tuberculosis, Endō published The Sea and Poison, a novel which may have been his best effort to delve into the realm of the unconscious. He uses vivisection by the Japanese on American prisoners of war to probe the extremes of human behavior and to seek a satisfactory distinction between sin and evil, as differentiated by a psychologist who influenced Endō. He views sin as having limits, even as necessary for establishing one’s personal identity. Unlike absolute evil, however, one may be redeemed from sin, whereas there is no potential salvation from evil. In the novel, some of the characters become aware of the concept of sin but are unable to handle it. The protagonist, Dr. Suguru, cannot understand why he so readily agreed to participate in the vivisection; he finds himself responding to the urging of his unconscious and is troubled when he discovers aspects of himself that he never before acknowledged.

With Wonderful Fool, Endō moves toward emphasizing humankind’s potential for salvation rather than its sin and weakness. He uses the technique of the fusion of opposites, whereby qualities that are traditionally viewed in one way come to be seen as their very opposite. Gaston, the French protagonist who comes to Japan to visit his pen pal, is a simpleminded, weak individual who loves unconditionally, even though that love is not returned and is even abused. Gaston is a Christ figure, and it is significant that he is a foreigner, for at that time love and Christianity are considered incongruities between Easterners and Westerners. The idea of a person being inspired wholly by love is alien to the Japanese mind. When Gaston is abducted by a criminal who thinks this simpleton might be useful to him in avoiding a police dragnet, Gaston is beaten for removing the bullets from the gun that the criminal planned to use to kill again. Even after the criminal’s release from prison, Gaston seeks the man out, determined to save him from the consequences of his sin, and, by extension, to save Japanese society from the elements in it that would prevent Christianity from taking root. In order to learn how to love, the criminal must be loved.

In the same year Wonderful Fool appeared, Volcano, a novel about an apostate Catholic priest and a weather station director in provincial Japan, who has expert knowledge about a volcano, also was published. The Samurai, set in the seventeenth century, is a historical novel that recounts the diplomatic mission of Hasekura Tsunenaga to Mexico and Europe. It marks the peak of Endō's struggle with his dual Christian and Japanese heritage. In 1993, three years before Endō's death, Deep River, a novel about a variety of moral and spiritual dilemmas that plague a group of tourists traveling in India, was published.

Endō's achievement in the short-story genre may equal that of his novels, but because many of his short stories have not been translated into English, they are less well known outside Japan. These stories examine the same themes that are in his novels: the cultural incompatibility of East and West, the struggle to understand Christian faith and belief, and the situation of the Japanese Christian. Perhaps his best-known short-story collection is Juichi no irogarasu (1979; Stained-Glass Elegies, 1984).

FOREIGN STUDIES

First published: Ryugaku, 1965 (English translation, 1989)

Type of work: Short fiction and a novella

Two Japanese students in France and one in Rome make a strong statement about the chasm that separates the Japanese mind from the Western mind.

Foreign Studies consists of two short stories and a novella that make up what Endō considered to be a novel. The first story, "A Summer in Rouen," draws on Endō's own often painful experiences when he was a student in France. The protagonist, the Japanese student Kudo, goes to France to study soon after the end of World War II. The middle-class Catholic family with whom he lives immediately gives Kudo the name Paul (Endō's own Christian name) and makes it clear that they consider him a replacement for their deceased son, Paul, who had planned to go to Japan as a missionary. Almost from the outset, Kudo realizes that the family has little knowledge of the Japanese and that he does not fit into his new environment either. This theme of alienation and disparity between the East and the West is repeated throughout Endō's early work.

The second story, "Araki Thomas," concerns the title character, a Japanese Christian who studies in Rome during the seventeenth century. Christianity was spreading throughout Japan until 1587, when the nation's ruler, Toyotomi Hideyoshi, suddenly reversed his tolerant stance and issued an anti-Christian edict ordering all priests and missionaries out of the country. Araki, a seminarian, goes to Macao and then on to Rome around 1600. There, he is treated with great kindness, but like Kudo, he grows weary of having to put on a forced smile to suit other people's expectations. Before leaving Rome, Araki learns that twenty-six Japanese have been martyred; the Christians in Rome praise him, as if he were one of the martyrs, because they assume that when he returns to Japan he, too, will remain faithful and become one as well. Araki is asked to return to Japan and work, even if in hiding, to keep Christianity alive there.

Upon his return in 1617, he finds the persecution of Christians to be more prevalent than he had expected, and when he is arrested and tortured, he apostatizes, blackening his reputation as a priest. It would seem that his experience with the West has weakened him, highlighting the theme of the Japanese inability to survive in the Christian West. The tone of "Araki Thomas" is that of someone recounting historical fact in a matter-of-fact way.

The book ends with a novella, "And You, Too." It is about Tanaka, who, like Endō himself, is a university professor in Japan who has come to France to study the Marquis de Sade. Tanaka hopes to take in all of European culture, but gradually, amid the bleak winter setting in Paris, Tanaka, like Kudo and Araki, feels more and more isolated, both from the French people around him and from a group of Japanese who claim they are having no difficulty in assimilating into Western life. He meets Sakisaka, another Japanese academic who also has trouble reconciling the values of the East with those of the West, and who becomes ill with tuberculosis and returns to Japan feeling that he has failed.

Tanaka determines to climb up to the Marquis de Sade's castle near Avignon, where he sees a red stain, which, in his imagination, Sade left to provide a link between himself and Tanaka. On his way back, he coughs up blood and realizes that he, too, must return, defeated, to Japan.

Endō has Sakisaka express his own sentiment when he says that he tried to assimilate in two years the culture that the French had taken two thousand years to develop, but in so doing, his illness is proof of his having lost his fight to understand the alien culture. The character voices Endō's own wish not to be like so many other Japanese people, who only drink in the culture superficially and never apprehend the essential nature of the people. Tanaka feels out of touch with his unconscious, a struggle with which Endō also had to come to terms.

Endō's point of view changes during the final twenty years of his writing, mainly because of his reflection on the unconscious in his work. He came to believe that, after all, meaningful communication between East and West was possible at the unconscious level.

SILENCE

First published: Chimmoku, 1966 (English translation, 1969)

Type of work: Novel

A Portuguese missionary apostatizes as a formality; his faith actually deepens as he rejects an earlier perception that God was silent in times of need.

By the time Endō wrote Silence, he had become interested in studying the history of Christian missions in Japan, particularly during the period between the mid-sixteenth and mid-seventeenth centuries, when missionaries tried fervently to establish Christianity, only to be repelled by Japanese rulers. As Endō studied accounts of persecution and martyrdom, he noticed that little was said about those who were tortured and eventually succumbed to apostasy by the act of efumi, stepping on an image of the crucifix. Endō empathized most with these so-called weaklings who would live out their days suffering from guilt and loneliness. He was further fascinated by the Kakure (hidden)

Christians, who ostensibly apostatized, but then persisted sacrificially in trying to keep their faith alive. Questions about how he would have reacted in the same circumstance led him to conclude that he, too, would have been among the weak.

This theological debate with himself gave birth to Silence. Endō concluded that all mention in the archives of the Christian missionary Christovao Ferreira ended when he apostatized; hence, it is not unreasonable for the protagonist of the novel, the Portuguese missionary Rodrigues, to do the same. However, many critics and Japanese pastors viewed Endō's decision as heresy and questioned his claim to be a Christian. They questioned how a novel focusing on the silence of God when the faithful were facing torture and death could be justified. Endō was not surprised, seeing the criticism as evidence that the church was as yet unwilling to address his perceived tension between literature and religion, as well as evidence that readers viewed the apostasy scenes of the novel as its decisive point. However, in the final chapters of the book and the diary extracts that follow, it becomes clear that Rodrigues's apparent renunciation is just that, and in fact, his inward faith is deeper and more real than it had ever been.

Viewed as Endō intended, Silence is an attempt to get to the heart of Rodrigues's inner self and his self-discovery. There has been a genuine change: The Rodrigues who came to Japan in 1640 was totally self-assured in his mission; gradually, uncertainty creeps in, and although he puts on an optimistic facade for the sake of those who are suffering, his doubt increases. When he observes the agonizing deaths of two of the converts, he succumbs to a perception of God as silent and indifferent to their suffering. He even asks himself whether he is losing his faith, and after months of psychological confusion, he can no longer reason logically.

When Ferrerira suggests that Christ himself would have apostatized to save others, Rodrigues can only say, "No, no," but it is at this darkest moment, when he is about to step on the fumie (image of the crucifix), that his inner light begins to glow. He now sees the face of Christ as that of a man who wants to share humankind's pain. Rodrigues's outward renunciation frees him physically, and he is helped by the very people who had pressured him into apostasy. Rodrigues is able now to conclude that, even though his fellow priests would condemn him, he has not betrayed God; rather, he has loved Him differently.

The final section of the novel moves forward twenty years and features diary excerpts of the final years of Rodrigues, now living as Okada San'emon. He has decided to hire Kichijiro, the man who betrayed him by alerting the rulers to his whereabouts, as his servant. A union between the two develops as each embarks on a journey of self-discovery. Rodrigues (Okada) now looks upon Christ as one who stands not in judgment but as a companion who shares in his pain.

Thus, Silence marks a major turning point in Endō's work. Endō confessed that the distance he had sensed between Christianity and himself had been buried, and he now viewed Christianity as a maternalistic religion, in which Christ shared in a child's pain, rather than as a judgmental, paternalistic religion. Rodrigues provides the model for Endō's acknowledging the possibility of a reconciliation of seemingly disparate views.

SUMMARY

Throughout his career as a Japanese Christian writer, Shūsaku Endō sought to resolve and reconcile several conflicts: the conflict between his adopted religion and his profession; the conflict between his Christian responsibility to look for the potential for salvation in humankind and his belief that, as a writer, he must treat his observations of human nature honestly; the conflict between working in a culture not conducive to writing about the relationship between God and humankind and being true to exploring that relationship as a writer; the conflict between humankind's surface manifestations and its inner self; and the conflict between East and West.

Victoria Price

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Shiroi hito, 1954

Kiroi hito, 1955

Umi to dokuyaku, 1957 (The Sea and Poison, 1972)

Kazan, 1959 (Volcano, 1978)

Obakasan, 1959 (Wonderful Fool, 1974)

Watashi ga suteta onna, 1963 (The Girl I Left Behind, 1994)

Ryugaku, 1965 (Foreign Studies, 1989)

Chinmoku, 1966 (Silence, 1969)

Taihen da, 1969

Kuchibue o fuku toki, 1974 (When I Whistle, 1979)

Samurai, 1980 (The Samurai, 1982)

Sukyandaru, 1986 (Scandal, 1988)

Hangyaku, 1989 (2 volumes)

Kessen no tiki, 1991

Otoko no issho, 1991

Yojo no gotoku, 1991

Aio chiisana budo, 1993

Fukai kawa, 1993 (Deep River, 1994)

Shukuteki, 1995

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How can one justify Shūsaku Endō being called a novelist of reconciliation?
- At what point in Endō's work does he begin to believe that it may be possible for Christianity to take root in Japan?
- How does the technique of transposition work in Wonderful Fool and The Girl I Left Behind?
- Why does Endō think that the Japanese are more likely to accept a Jesus who is a mother figure rather than a father figure?
- In addition to that of East and West, what are some other contrasts that are thematically important in Endō's work?

Shūsaku Endō

SHORT FICTION:

Aden made, 1954
Endō Shūsaku shū, 1960
Aika, 1965
Endō Shūsaku yūmoa shōsetsu shū, 1969-1973 (2 volumes)
Gekkō no domina, 1972
Endō Shūsaku misuteri Shōsetu shū, 1975
Juichi no irogarasu, 1979 (Stained-Glass Elegies, 1984)
The Final Martyrs, 1993
Five by Endo: Stories, 2000

DRAMA:

Ogon no kuni, pr. 1966, pb. 1969 (The Golden Country, 1970)

NONFICTION:

Furansu no Daigakusei, 1953
Gūtara seikatsu nyūmon, 1967
Iesu no shōgai, 1973 (A Life of Jesus, 1978)
Shikai no hotori, 1973
Seisho no naka no joseitachi, 1975
Tetsu no kubikase, 1976
Watakushi no lesu, 1976
Kirisuto no tanjō, 1977
Ningan no naka no X, 1978
Jū to jūjika, 1979
Watakushi no ai shita shōsetsu, 1985
Haru wa basha ni notte, 1989 (essays)
Honto no watakushi o motomete, 1990
Iesu ni atta onnatachi, 1990
Ihojin no tachiba kara, 1990 (essays)
Kirishitan jidai: Junkyo to kikyō, 1992
Kokoro no sunadokei, 1992 (essays)

MISCELLANEOUS:

To Friends from Other Lands: A Shūsaku Endō Miscellany, 1992

About the Author

Gessel, Van. "Salvation of the Weak: Endō Shūsaku." In The Sting of Life: Four Contemporary Japanese Novelists. New York: Columbia University Press, 1989.

_____, ed. "Endō Shūsaku." In Japanese Fiction Writers, 1868-1945. Vol. 180 in Dictionary of Literary Biography. Detroit: Gale Cengage, 1997.

Lewell, John. Modern Japanese Novelists: A Biographical Dictionary. Tokyo: Kodansha, 1993.

Mathy, Francis. "Shūsaku Endō: Japanese Catholic Novelist." Thought 42, no. 167 (1967): 587-614.

Uyttendaele, Francis. "Shūsaku, Endō." Japanese Christian Quarterly 38 (1972): 199-205.

Williams, Mark B. Endō Shūsaku: A Literature of Reconciliation. New York: Routledge, 1999.

AP/Wide World Photos

LAURA ESQUIVEL

Born: Mexico City, Mexico
September 30, 1950

Esquivel's novels are highly imaginative, with each hinging on a particular conceit, such as magical recipes, time travel, reincarnation, the use of Morse code to communicate with a dying man, or the imagined life of one of Mexico's most important, yet least known, historical figures, Malinche.

BIOGRAPHY

Laura Alicia Palomares Esquivel (ehs-kee-VEHL) was born in Mexico City on September 30, 1950, to Josephina, a homemaker, and Julio Caesar Esquivel, a telegraph operator diagnosed with Parkinson's disease. She was the third of four children, three daughters and one son. Her parents later divorced, and her father's illness and death in 1999 served as the inspiration for Tan veloz como el deseo (2001; Swift as Desire, 2001), Esquivel's third novel.

Esquivel grew up in a pleasant neighborhood of Mexico City, near the Escuela Normal de Maestros, the national college for the preparation of teachers. She attended the college and trained as an elementary school teacher. For eight years she taught elementary-age children and then founded a children's theater workshop, Taller de Teatro y Literatura, with the collaboration of some friends. In the late 1970's and early 1980's, Esquivel also produced dramatic pieces for children's theater and wrote for children's public television.

She met and married the actor Alfonso Arau, and their daughter Sandra was born in 1976. Arau later became a director and producer. In 1985, Esquivel and Arau collaborated on the film production of her screenplay for children, Chido One, also known as Tacos de oro (gold tacos). The Mexican Academy of Motion Pictures nominated Esqui-vel's script for best screenplay. Esquivel also wrote the screenplay for another children's film, Estrellita marinera (1994; Little Ocean Star, 1994).

In 1989, Esquivel published the novel for which she remains most famous, Como agua para chocolate: Novela de entregas mensuales con recetas, amores, y remedios caseros (1989; Like Water for Chocolate: A Novel in Monthly Installments, with Recipes, Romances, and Home Remedies, 1992). The book quickly became a hugely successful novel in Mexico and abroad and was translated into many languages. Esquivel received the ABBY (American Booksellers' Book of the Year) Award in 1994 for the novel. She had originally conceived of the project as a screenplay, but the difficulty of financing a film led her to tell the story as a novel. Esquivel and Arau collaborated on the film adaption of the novel, with Esquivel as screenwriter and Arau as director. Like the novel, the film was enormously popular. It won ten Ariel Awards (the Mexican equivalent of the Academy Awards), including honors for best direction and best screenplay, and was nominated for a Golden Globe for best foreign film. Esquivel followed this novel with La ley del amor (The Law of Love, 1996) in 1995 and then published Swift as Desire six years later. Malinche (English translation, 2006), Esquivel's fourth novel, appeared in 2006.

Esquivel has often commented on her family's influence on her writing, particularly her grandmother's kitchen, where she learned much of the culinary magic developed as Magical Realism in Like Water for Chocolate. Esquivel's interest in food and cooking is also evident in her other publications. She published a book about cooking and philosophy, Íntimas suculencias: Tratado filosófico de cocina (1998; Between the Fires: Intimate Writings on Life, Love, Food, and Flavor, 2000). In addition, she has written prefaces to three cookbooks: An Appetite for Passion (1995), The Secrets of Jesuit Bread-making: Recipes and Traditions from Jesuit Bakers Around the World (1995), and La cocina del chile (2003; cooking with chiles). She has continued to write works for children, publishing Estrellita marinera: Una fábula de nuestra tiempo (little sea star: a fable of our time) in 1999. Esquivel is also the author of a self-help book, El libro de las emociones: Son de la razón sin corazón (2000), a guide for recognizing and learning how to express emotions adequately.

Esquivel divorced Alfonso Arau after the release of the film Like Water for Chocolate. She married a dentist, Javier Valdez, and the couple settled in Mexico City, dividing their time between Mexico and New York.

ANALYSIS

The hybrid form of the novel Like Water for Chocolate, mixing the history of the Mexican Revolution, relations between the United States and Mexico, and the Magical Realism of the almost incantatory, and certainly passionate, recipes of the heroine, Tita de la Garza, resulted in a novel of enduring popularity that continues to be taught in high school and college literature classes in Spanish or in translation.

Esquivel considered her second novel, The Law of Love, the first multimedia novel. The setting is simultaneously the sixteenth century Mexico of Hernán Cortés's conquest of the Aztecs and the twenty-third century future in the same location. The media include color comic book panels that illustrate the text and a compact disc of musical recordings with instructions for listening to them at specific points in the narrative. The protagonist is an astroanalyst, Azucena Martínez, in the future Mexico City, looking for her soul mate, Rodrigo Sánchez. In ancient Aztec times, Rodrigo killed an innocent child and now must pay penance for his crime through several centuries. Azucena has no such karmic debts. Her love saves Rodrigo and restores the karmic balance of the universe. The novel combines romance with Mexican and Mesoamerican culture and science fiction, more magic than Magical Realism. Though the story and structure are highly imaginative, the complicated plot may try the reader's patience and credulity.

Esquivel's third novel, Swift as Desire, takes a magical approach to the telegraph. The protagonist, who is of Mayan Indian heritage, has an uncanny ability to understand other people's unexpressed feelings. As he lies dying, he is unable to speak, so his daughter uses a telegraph and Morse code to communicate with her father. The novel is both a testament to Esquivel's father and a panegyric to a technology that was as revolutionary in its day as the Internet was in the late twentieth century.

The novel Malinche was produced at the suggestion of Santillana, a Mexican publishing company. Malinche, also known as Malintzin or Doña Marina, was Aztec booty given as a gift to Hernán Cortés to be his slave. She served as his interpreter for his dealings with the Aztecs, and thus was an indispensable component of the Spanish conquest of Mexico. Malinche is considered the mother of the Mexican race because of the son she produced as a result of her liaison with Cortés, but she is also considered a traitor to the nation's indigenous people because of her liaison with the enemy and her assistance in the domination of native tribes. Few facts are known about Malinche's life, and Esquivel spent two years researching the historical context of her title character's life.

LIKE WATER FOR CHOCOLATE

First published: Como agua para chocolate, 1989 (English translation, 1992)

Type of work: Novel

Enslaved to a family tradition that prevents the youngest daughter from marrying while her mother lives, a young woman expresses her love through the language of food.

Like Water for Chocolate: A Novel in Monthly Installments, with Recipes, Romances, and Home Remedies, as its full title suggests, is a hybrid work, combining the elements of a historical novel set during the turbulent times of the Mexican Revolution, the mystical and healing art of food that Esquivel learned in her grandmother's kitchen, and a highly romantic love story. The story unfolds through the twelve divisions of the novel, one chapter for each month of the year, beginning with January and ending with December, with one recipe per chapter, each recipe in some way relevant to the events that will occur in that chapter. After the list of ingredients, the narrative begins with instructions for the preparation of that month's recipe. The cookbook-style organization of the text blends with a romantic story that many critics consider a clever parody of the typical romance novel.

The heroine of the novel, Tita de la Garza, is born in the kitchen and raised there by the Indian family servant, Nacha. As the youngest of three daughters of the domineering matriarch, Mamá Elena, Tita is required to take care of her mother until her mother's death, forsaking any life of her own. Tita falls in love with Pedro. Pedro courts Tita in hopes of marrying her, but the tradition of caretaking (a tradition invented by Esquivel for her purposes in the novel) prevents their marriage. Frustrated but determined, Pedro marries Tita's sister, Rosaura, in order to be close to Tita, but Tita envies Pedro's intimacy with Rosaura and bemoans his lack of intimacy with her. Though Mamá Elena is aware of Tita's feelings for Pedro, she forces Tita to prepare the cake that will be served at her sister's wedding. Tita's tears season the batter with sorrow and longing and transfer her emotions to the wedding guests, who suffer uncontrollable melancholy and sobbing before forcefully vomiting their meal.

Tita's most provocative recipe is "Quail in Rose Petal Sauce," which causes all those who eat it to become consumed with the same passionate desire with which Tita crushes the rose petals. In an attempt to put an end to Pedro and Tita's love, Mamá Elena sends Rosaura and Pedro, with their son, to the United States to separate the would-be lovers. Away from his beloved Aunt Tita, the child dies, and Tita, who (magically) had nursed him despite having never been pregnant, suffers a nervous breakdown. She spends some time in Texas under the treatment of a kindly but very boring American doctor, John Brown. Dr. Brown asks Tita to marry him, though he senses she has no passion for him. After her mother's death, Tita accepts his proposal, not out of love but rather as a repayment for his kindness to her.

However, Pedro is profoundly jealous and begs Tita not to marry the good Dr. Brown. The two desperate lovers begin an affair. Rosaura gives birth to a daughter, Esperanza (Hope), and vows to make her daughter follow the same stifling family tradition that has made Tita so unhappy. Tita makes a vow to save her niece. Rosaura becomes mysteriously obese and flatulent, eventually dying of digestive problems, and thus releasing her daughter from the family fate. Now Tita and Pedro can finally be truly together. She and Pedro spend a single glorious night in an embrace so passionate that it spontaneously causes fireworks that ignite a fire, destroying the two lovers and the entire ranch.

In several interviews, Esquivel has commented about the importance of the kitchen in her life, whether it be the kitchen of her childhood, cooking with her mother and grandmother from the age of seven, or her own kitchen. Esquivel believes in the power of food and the power of the emotions with which people create the magic, the alchemy, of the kitchen. In this novel, the so-called feminine arts of healing, caretaking, and cooking assume nearly mythical proportions, as Tita's culinary creations cause magical reactions. Culinary magic is just one aspect of the Magical Realism in this novel. In addition to elements of Magical Realism already mentioned, Tita's tears are equally magical. Even before birth, she cries in the womb when onions are cut. At her birth, her dried tears are swept up to be used for salt. While recovering in Texas, her sorrow is so great that her tears run down the stairs of Dr. Brown's house like a river.

The novel is dominated by female characters. The matriarch of the family, Mamá Elena, runs the family hacienda with an iron will, and though she is a woman, she embodies and perpetuates the traditions of a deeply masculine, patriarchal society. Her three daughters are three completely different types of women. Rosaura is the most traditional, conforming to convention and the role expected of her, and, perhaps literally, repressing her own feelings so much that she becomes inflated with her own repression and dies by poisoning herself. Gertrudis is the most flamboyant of the three. She impetuously runs off with a soldier of the revolution, jumping behind him on his horse and galloping away. She then essentially takes on a male role, becoming a soldier herself, rising to the rank of general, participating actively in the revolution rather than being one of the women who make camp for their men. Tita creates a revolution of a kind as well, refusing to forgo her passion for Pedro, resisting her mother's will while Mamá Elena lives, and chasing off the ghost of her dead mother when Mamá Elena tries to control her daughter from beyond the grave. By her example and through her stubborn refusal to allow Rosaura to dictate her daughter's future, Tita most certainly helps to liberate Esperanza from the twin curse of duty and tradition.

The female characters in Like Water for Chocolate are much more powerful than the male characters. Pedro is handsome but weak-willed; Dr. Brown is kind but boring. The women in this novel defy the gender roles of their time. Though Tita is condemned to the kitchen and the traditional role of caretaker, she revolts against those roles, using the ingredients at hand to express her endless love for Pedro.

SUMMARY

Laura Esquivel's novel Like Water for Chocolate portrays what finally becomes a literally all-consuming love. Pedro and Tita manage to circumvent the conventions and traditions that have bound them. Esquivel skillfully blends elements from fantasy, Magical Realism, cookbooks, and romance novels, seasoned with a dash of the historical novel, to create a compelling story of frustrated and finally consummated love. The immense success of her novel has been credited with contributing to the boom in Spanish-language publishing in the United States for the Latino market. The enduring popularity of both the novel and the film make them common texts for classroom use in Spanish or English. Esquivel's subsequent work, though equally innovative, has not met with the same success.

Linda Ledford-Miller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Como agua para chocolate: Novela de entregas mensuales con recetas, amores, y remedios caseros, 1989 (Like Water for Chocolate: A Novel in Monthly Installments, with Recipes, Romances, and Home Remedies, 1992)

La ley del amor, 1995 (The Law of Love, 1996)

Tan veloz como el deseo, 2001 (Swift as Desire, 2001)

Malinche, 2006 (English translation, 2006)

SCREENPLAYS:

Chido One, 1985

Like Water for Chocolate, 1993 (adaptation of her novel)

Estrellita marinera, 1994 (Little Ocean Star, 1994)

NONFICTION:

Íntimas suculencias: Tratado filosófico de cocina, 1998 (Between Two Fires: Intimate Writings on Life, Love, Food and Flavor, 2000)

El libro de las emociones: Son de la razón sin corazón, 2000

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Estrellita marinera: Una fábula de nuestra tiempo, 1999

About the Author

- Halevi-Wise, Yael. "Storytelling in Laura Esquivel's Como agua para chocolate." In The Other Mirror: Women's Narrative in Mexico, 1980-1995, edited by Kristine Ibsen. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.
- Jaffe, Janice. "Hispanic American Women's Recipes and Laura Esquivel's Como agua para chocolate." Women's Studies 22 (1993): 217-230.
- Moss, Joyce, and George Wilson. "Like Water for Chocolate by Laura Esquivel." In Literature and Its Times: Profiles of Three Hundred Notable Literary Works and the Historical Events That Influenced Them. Detroit: Gale, 1997.
- Price, Helen. "Unsavory Representations in Laura Esquivel's Like Water for Chocolate." In A Companion to Magic Realism, edited by Stephen M. Hart and Wen-Chin Ouyang. Rochester, N.Y.: Tamesis, 2005.
- Valdés, María Elena de. "Like Water for Chocolate: A Celebration of the Mexican Pre-Aesthetic." In The Shattered Mirror: Representations of Women in Mexican Literature. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998.
- _____. "Verbal and Visual Representation of Women: Like Water for Chocolate." World Literature Today 69, no. 1 (Winter, 1995): 78-82.
- Zubiaurre, Maite. "Culinary Eros in Contemporary Hispanic Female Fiction: From Kitchen Tales to Table Narratives." College Literature 33, no. 3 (Summer, 2006): 29-51.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In Laura Esquivel's Like Water for Chocolate, how do duty and responsibility conflict with desire?
- Compare the three sisters Rosaura, Gertrudis, and Tita. They have very different personalities and lead very different lives. Do they break with convention, or are they representative of female stereotypes?
- Mamá Elena has been keeping a secret for many years. How does that secret relate to the rigid traditional roles she maintains herself and tries to force on others?
- Each of the chapters of the novel contains elements or examples of Magical Realism. Give three specific examples of Magical Realism in Like Water for Chocolate and discuss the significance of the example to the chapter or the novel as a whole.
- Is Tita a feminist character? What evidence in the text supports your answer?
- At one point, Tita must choose between Dr. John Brown and Pedro. Why does she choose Pedro, and who is the better choice?
- Why are the male characters in Like Water for Chocolate less developed than the female characters?
- How does the historical background of the Mexican Revolution contribute to the novel?

Library of Congress

EURIPIDES

Born: Phlya, Greece
c. 485 B.C.E.

Died: Macedonia, Greece
406 B.C.E.

The youngest of the three great tragedians of Athens, Euripides reinterpreted the traditional myths of ancient Greece in light of the philosophy and psychological insights of his day.

BIOGRAPHY

Almost nothing is known for certain about the life of Euripides (yew-RIHP-uh-deez). While a number of ancient authors claim to supply information about his life or to comment upon his character, much of what these authors say has been based upon legends. At their worst, tales about Euripides have been corrupted by how the poet was depicted in ancient comedy and satire. Even at their best, these stories are often merely anecdotes misremembered or invented by the author's admirers long after his death.

Not even Euripides' birthplace is known for sure. Most ancient sources suggest that Euripides was born on Salamis, an island off the coast of Athens. Yet this tradition seems to be part of an ancient legend connecting each of the three major tragedians with the Battle of Salamis in 480 B.C.E. According to this legend, Aeschylus fought against the Persians in this battle, Sophocles sang in the chorus of youths that celebrated the Athenian victory, and Euripides was born on the island on the very day of the battle itself. The coincidence seems too incredible to be true.

Another tradition, which relates that Euripides was born at Phlya in central Attica, Greece, sometime in 485 B.C.E., may well be more accurate. His father's name was Mnesarchos, and his mother's name was Cleito.

The town of Phlya was famous for its temples, a detail that accords well with another story told about Euripides' youth. As a child, Euripides is said to have been a torchbearer and to have poured wine at festivals honoring the god Apollo. This privilege would probably have been reserved for the nobility, and it suggests that the family of Euripides was wealthy. Indeed, some ancient sources state that Euripides' mother, Cleito, was descended from a family of high social standing. A variant tradition stating that Euripides' mother was reduced to selling vegetables for a living appears to have been the invention of the comic poet Aristophanes.

Early in his life, Euripides moved with his family to Athens. There he received an education typical of many young Athenians of the fifth century B.C.E. He studied literature, art (especially painting), music, gymnastics, and philosophy. At that time, Greek philosophy was becoming a more important part of Athenian education than it had been for the poet's older contemporaries, Aeschylus and Sophocles. As a result, Euripides would always be the most philosophical of the ancient tragedians. He was interested in evaluating new ideas and frequently assigned to his characters opinions attributable to philosophers alive at the time.

The Peloponnesian War, waged between Sparta and Athens, began in the year 431 B.C.E. and continued even after Euripides' death. This long struggle had a profound impact upon him. Initially a supporter of the war, Euripides presented the Athenians as glorious defenders of justice in Hērakleidai (c. 430 B.C.E.; The Children of Herakles, 1781). Nevertheless, after the Athenians committed atrocities on the island of Melos in 416 B.C.E., Euripides turned against the war and produced Trōiades (415 B.C.E.; The Trojan Women, 1782), a play that provided a critical commentary on war's cruelty against the innocent.

The comic poet Aristophanes, who included Euripides as a character in several of his plays, depicted the poet as a brooding intellectual who hated other people, especially women. Later authors took this depiction at face value and described Euripides as a hermit who lived in a cave on the island of Salamis. It is more likely, however, that Aristophanes' view of Euripides was intended to be satirical rather than realistic. Indeed, Euripides' reputation as a misogynist seems to be derived from his depictions of Medea, Phaedra, and Hecuba (as well as the belief that his own two marriages were unhappy) rather than from any attitude of the poet himself. While Euripides did, at times, include portraits of violent or threatening women in his plays, he also depicted women such as Alcestis, Iphigeneia, and Macaria in a more positive and sympathetic light.

Toward the end of Euripides' life, the poet retired from Athens and moved to the court of King Archelaus in Macedon. There he composed the Bakchai (405 B.C.E.; The Bacchae, 1781), a tragedy that was not performed until after his death. Stories abound concerning the death of Euripides. It is said that Euripides was attacked and killed by hunting dogs, perhaps intentionally released by the rival poets Arridaeus and Crateuas. This story of a violent death is too similar to that told about the death of Pentheus, the central character in The Bacchae, to be taken at face value. According to tradition, Euripides died in 406 B.C.E. in Macedonia, Greece.

ANALYSIS

In De poetica (c. 334 B.C.E.-323 B.C.E.; Poetics, 1705), Aristotle quotes Sophocles as saying that he (Sophocles) presented individuals as they should be while Euripides presented them as they are. This concern for a realistic depiction of human character and motivation is one of the hallmarks of Euripidean tragedy. Rather than presenting action as the result of sweeping historical or religious forces, as did Aeschylus, or of noble and heroic individual choices, as did Sophocles, Euripides attributes actions in his plays to ordinary, and easily understandable, human emotions.

While the forces motivating the characters in Euripidean tragedy are frequently less edifying than those that Aeschylus or Sophocles attributed to their characters, this pessimism was central to Euripides' outlook upon the world. The horrors of the Peloponnesian War seem to have affected Euripides more deeply than his contemporaries, and he sought to depict those horrors upon the stage. Seeing few genuine heroes in his own society, Euripides was hesitant to assume that such heroes had existed in the remote past. His characters tend to be motivated by base emotions such as anger, greed, and lust rather than by the lofty piety and constancy that inspire such characters as Sophocles' Antigone.

Euripides was interested in the psychology of the characters who populate traditional Greek myths. He turns a skeptical eye toward the platitudes with which they justify their own actions and seeks to reveal a less flattering source of motivation. What was shocking to his contemporaries was that Euripides extended this psychological analysis even to the gods. He saw deities such as Aphrodite, Artemis, and Dionysus as symbols of emotions—lust, restraint, irrationality, for example—rather than as the anthropomorphic images worshiped in the temples.

Perhaps for this reason, Euripides was, in his lifetime, the least popular of the three Athenian tragedians. He won first prize in the annual poetic competition only four times and was awarded this prize one additional time after his death. Nevertheless, the ideas advanced by him became increasingly popular in the following centuries, and, for this reason, more of his works have survived than have the works of Aeschylus and Sophocles combined.

A Euripidean play will usually begin with an extended prologue that provides the audience with crucial information. The play will end with the appearance of a god who resolves the central conflict of the drama. The individual who delivers the prologue, known as the protatic character, may not even reappear in the rest of the drama. Nevertheless, protatic characters play an important role in determining how the audience views the action of the play. The god who appeared at the end of the drama was frequently lowered to the stage by means of a hoist, a turn of events called the deus ex machina.

This general structure of a Euripidean tragedy frequently gives the audience the impression that the action depicted on stage is predestined and thus inescapable. Yet it is important to remember that the determining factor in Euripidean drama is more frequently human emotion (and base emotion, at that) than divine will. Thus, Euripides' characters usually have little control over their actions; they are victims of their own emotions, not pawns of some impersonal or cosmic Fate.

Euripides' view that emotions provoke much of human activity caused him to adopt a different focus in his tragedies from that of Aeschylus or Sophocles. Rather than depicting a world inhabited primarily by kings and the nobility, Euripides presents a more democratic universe. Not only do common people appear on stage more frequently in Euripidean tragedy than in the works of his predecessors, but they are also more central to the drama and tend to be more memorable. In Euripides' view of the world, human tragedy affects everyone; it is not merely the province of the aristocracy.

Euripides also was less constrained by traditional myths than were Aeschylus or Sophocles. He was free to change details of the plot, add characters, or incorporate elements from another story. This freedom often gives the Euripidean version of a myth a sense of greater realism. It also allows the author to criticize details of a myth that he regards as foolish or inconsistent.

MEDEA

First produced: Mēdeia, 431 B.C.E. (English translation, 1781)

Type of work: Play

A witch whose husband is about to leave her for another woman takes vengeance against him by killing his children.

The Medea illustrates many characteristic features of Euripidean tragedy. The play begins with a prologue in which the central conflict of the tragedy is revealed to the audience. This prologue is not delivered by a god or by any member of the nobility, but by a nurse, a character of relatively humble status. Yet the story that the nurse relates contains many fantastic elements and supernatural details: For example, she speaks of the Symplegades (the Clashing Rocks that destroyed ships attempting to sail through them), the Golden Fleece, and Jason's legendary ship, the Argo. Nevertheless, these mythological details will not be Euripides' central concern in this play. The poet will devote far more attention to human psychology and ordinary emotions (jealousy, anger, and pride) than to the marvels of legend. Euripides' answer to the central question of this tragedy—What could lead a mother to kill her own children?—will not be the Golden Fleece or even a tragic curse, but a combination of spurned love, the desperate plight of women and exiles, and the individual nature of this particular mother.

Euripides quickly shifts attention away from the wonders of the prologue to the troubles that exist in Medea's marriage.

For Medea, the predicament of a husband who intends to leave her is compounded by the low status of women in Greek society generally and by her further isolation as an exile. Medea speaks at length about the difficulties of women in ancient Greece (lines 231-251) and about the ill treatment accorded to foreigners (lines 252-258, 511-515). The audience observes that Medea has relatively few choices available to her. If Jason abandons her, Medea's life will be little better than that of a slave.

Furthermore, in Medea's debate with Jason (lines 465-519), the audience is reminded that Medea has used violence before when doing what she felt to be necessary. She had killed her brother, Apsyrtus, in order that Jason might escape from her father, Aeëtes. She had killed Jason's uncle, Pelias, in order that Jason's father might regain his throne. Thus, the audience begins to understand that Medea is a person who kills whenever she believes that she has no other choice. Because she is a woman and an exile in a world that is hostile to both, Medea's choices gradually diminish as the play continues.

In this way, Euripides has rewritten a traditional Greek fairy tale as a psychological study. He has brought his mythic characters down to the level of ordinary human beings and has shown that what motivated them were emotions that the audience could readily understand. By so doing, Euripides is able to make Medea seem a sympathetic character, despite her violent actions and the elements of fantasy traditionally found in her story.

HIPPOLYTUS

First produced: Hippolytos, 428 B.C.E.
(revised version of an earlier play;
English translation, 1781)

Type of work: Play

*Phaedra, rejected by her son-in-law,
Hippolytus, accuses him of rape.*

The Hippolytus was part of only five trilogies for which Euripides was awarded first prize. One of the reasons for the success of this play may be that the Hippolytus is far more traditional in structure than many other Euripidean tragedies. For example, both Theseus and Hippolytus himself follow the pattern of the tragic hero described by Aristotle in Poetics: They are neither perfectly good nor purely evil but, while generally virtuous, suffer because of a flaw in character or by committing some mistake. Moreover, the play's emphasis upon the need for restraint in all human endeavor echoes the sentiment of the widely quoted Greek proverb, "Nothing too much." Theseus and Hippolytus are thus guilty of hubris (usually defined as excessive pride, insolence, and self-righteousness), which would have been regarded, even by the most conservative of Euripides' critics, as a fatal flaw of character.

Nevertheless, Euripides has made several important innovations in this work. First, his view of the gods is not at all the same as that found in traditional Greek religion. Aphrodite and Artemis, although they appear on stage in human form, are largely personifications of lust and chastity. It is the conflict between these competing forces that brings about the tragedy of Phaedra and Hippolytus; the inability of these characters to find a balance between the desires represented by Aphrodite and the goals represented by Artemis destroys them.

This image of the gods is not at all flattering. Aphrodite uses Phaedra as a pawn to achieve the vengeance that she desires against Hippolytus. Humankind is seen to be the plaything of the gods, subject to their whims and unable to escape the destiny that they have imposed. Yet since the gods are presented as human emotions in this drama, Euripides is not being fatalistic in the traditional sense. Rather, the poet is implying, even as the philosophers of his day had suggested, that humanity is the victim of its own passions and conflicting desires. In the end, it is human emotion, not destiny, which brings about suffering in the Hippolytus.

Phaedra's act of vengeance against Hippolytus, coupled with Medea's act of vengeance against Jason, helps to explain why Euripides so often was seen in antiquity as a hater of women. Yet Euripides added little to the depictions of these characters that could not be found elsewhere in their stories. Moreover, his depiction of men such as Jason and even, to a certain extent, Theseus is similarly unflattering, and he casts other women, such as Alcestis and Iphigenia, in a more positive light. For this reason, the violent acts of revenge committed by Phaedra and Medea result not from the author's misogyny but from his interpretation of their individual characters.

THE TROJAN WOMEN

First produced: Trōiades, 415 B.C.E. (English translation, 1782)

Type of work: Play

Shortly after the fall of Troy, Hecuba learns the fate of her children and grandchildren.

In 416 B.C.E., the Athenian empire, at war against Sparta, captured the neutral island of Melos in the Aegean Sea. Punishing the Melians for their resistance, the Athenians killed all the men who remained on the island and reduced the women and children to slavery. This act of unprovoked aggression turned Euripides against the Athenian cause in the Peloponnesian War, a cause that he had earlier supported. For example, his negative depiction of the Corinthians in the Medea, written during the first year of the war, may be traced in large part to the alliance that existed between Corinth and Sparta. Fifteen years later, however, Euripides has shifted from seeing the Spartans and their allies as the enemy to seeing war itself as the enemy.

The structure of The Trojan Women is episodic. That is to say, it does not so much tell a continuous story as depict a series of individual and discrete scenes. The sum total of the episodes is not a plot, as in standard narrative tragedy, but an impression. The impression that Euripides sought to convey in The Trojan Women is that war is unspeakably horrible. The author attempted in the various scenes of this tragedy to depict the suffering that war causes even for those innocents who do not fight in it, innocents such as women, children, and the elderly.

Unity is provided in the drama by the continual presence of Hecuba. In her person are represented all wives who have lost their husbands in war and all mothers who have lost their children. Each successive episode brings word of new sorrows to Hecuba. When she first appears to the audience, she is aware that she has lost her city, her position, and most members of her family. That seems tragic enough, but Euripides wanted to illustrate that war spares nothing for the innocent, not even their hopes. Hecuba must also endure seeing her daughter Cassandra apparently afflicted with madness. (The audience, however, which knew that the curse of Cassandra was to prophesy the truth but never to be believed, would have realized that her “madness” was really an accurate prediction of the future.) In the following episode, Hecuba learns that another daughter, Polyxena, had been sacrificed on the tomb of Achilles. Finally, Hecuba must endure the slaughter of Andromache’s infant son, Astyanax, who is flung from the walls of Troy. Hecuba concludes (lines 1280-1283) that it is futile even to call upon the gods for help; the prayers of the innocent go unanswered.

The only consolation available to Hecuba is that her sufferings, and those of the other Trojans, were so severe that they will always be remembered (lines 1240-1250). Hecuba knows that, if it were not for their many sorrows, the Trojans would not become the subject of songs for generations yet unborn. This realization is cold comfort, indeed, but it is the only consolation that Euripides was willing to admit in this play. His goal was to see that later ages never forgot what the Trojans, like the Meians, had endured.

THE BACCHAE

First produced: Bakchai, 405 B.C.E. (English translation, 1781)

Type of work: Play

A king of Thebes is punished for resisting the cult of the god Dionysus.

In about 408 B.C.E., Euripides left Athens to accept the invitation of King Archelaus to write works for his court in Macedon. There Euripides died in 406 B.C.E. His final trilogy of plays, including both The Bacchae and Iphigeneia ē en Taurois (c. 414 B.C.E.; Iphigenia in Tauris, 1782), was produced in Athens by his son. Posthumously, he was awarded first prize for this trilogy, the fifth time that the poet had been so honored.

One of the reasons why The Bacchae may have been popular with its original audience was that it reflects a far more traditional view of humankind and the gods than do many of Euripides’ plays. Dionysus in The Bacchae is still seen as a psychological force or as a state of mind (in this case, irrationality), like Aphrodite and Artemis in the Hippolytus. In this play, however, it is Pentheus, the “modern man” who uses reason to challenge the authority of the gods, who suffers most. At the end of the tragedy, Cadmus cites the fate of Pentheus as proof that the gods exist and that they punish those who resist them (lines 1325-1326).

The final words of The Bacchae are a restatement of the traditional Greek view that the gods act in ways that humankind does not expect and that human knowledge is therefore limited (lines 1388-1392). It is a conclusion that would be appropriate for nearly any Greek tragedy, and, indeed, it strongly resembles the endings of both Sophocles' Antigonē (441 B.C.E.; Antigone, 1729) and Oidipous epi Kolōnōi (401 B.C.E.; Oedipus at Colonus, 1729). This traditional Greek belief that moderation is best because humankind's knowledge is limited is central to the entire structure of The Bacchae. While Pentheus is punished for his stubborn resistance to the god Dionysus, his mother, Agave, who accepted the god, also suffers. For modern readers, this development is one of the most troubling aspects of the work; at the end of the play, Dionysus seems to be punishing both his enemies and his own followers. Yet it must be remembered that, for Euripides, Dionysus symbolizes irrationality. Those who exclude irrationality totally from their lives become stolid, unimaginative, and dull; when their carefully reasoned worlds collapse, they may be "torn apart" by irrationality, as literally happens to Pentheus in this play. Yet those who succumb to irrationality entirely are playing with madness, and they may eventually destroy what is most dear to them. With irrationality, as with everything, Euripides is saying, the middle way is best.

In dramatic terms, Euripides accomplishes a difficult task in The Bacchae. He manages to change the audience's opinion about both Dionysus and Pentheus as the drama unfolds. When Dionysus first appears, he wins the audience's favor: They are told that Pentheus is resisting the god unjustly and that Dionysus has come to Thebes in person to reward the just and to punish the guilty. By the end of the drama, however, Dionysus seems a fearful figure whose penalties are extreme and whose power destroys even those who embrace his cult. Pentheus, on the other hand, first appears as a brash, skeptical, and thoroughly unlikable individual. Yet by the end of the drama, the audience is likely to pity him because of the degree to which he has been punished. This ability to change an audience's perspective in such a short time is one of Euripides' finest accomplishments in this play.

SUMMARY

In the works of Euripides, the traditional stories of Greek tragedy were reinterpreted in light of the philosophical theories current in the late fifth century B.C.E. Gods in Euripides' works usually personify human emotions and resemble only in outward form the highly anthropomorphic deities of Homer and Sophocles. Kings and nobles from the remote past speak in the language of the Athenian law courts. Ordinary people are also frequently introduced into Euripidean tragedy and are central to the plot.

Throughout the eighteen surviving plays of Euripides, it is possible to trace his evolution as an artist. Early works such as the Medea and the Hippolytus contain, despite their many innovations, the conventional view that the Athenians are a great and just people. This view declines in such works as The Trojan Women. Moreover, though Euripides' sense of disillusionment with the Athenian empire may have caused him to leave Athens in 408 B.C.E., his last works illustrate a return to a more traditional view of humanity and the gods.

Jeffrey L. Buller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

Of the 66 tragedies and 22 satyr plays Euripides wrote, the following survive:

Alkēstis, 438 B.C.E. (Alcestis, 1781)

Mēdeia, 431 B.C.E. (Medea, 1781)

Hērakleidai, c. 430 B.C.E. (The Children of Herakles, 1781)

Hippolytos, 428 B.C.E. (revised version of an earlier play; Hippolytus, 1781)

Andromachē, c. 426 B.C.E. (Andromache, 1782)

Hekabē, 425 B.C.E. (Hecuba, 1782)

Hiketides, c. 423 B.C.E. (The Suppliants, 1781)

Kyklōps, c. 421 B.C.E. (Cyclops, 1782)

Hērakles, c. 420 B.C.E. (Heracles, 1781)

Trōiades, 415 B.C.E. (The Trojan Women, 1782)
Iphigeneia ē en Taurois, c. 414 B.C.E. (Iphigenia in Tauris, 1782)
Ēlektra, 413 B.C.E. (Electra, 1782)
Helenē, 412 B.C.E. (Helen, 1782)
Iōn, c. 411 B.C.E. (Ion, 1781)
Phoinissai, 409 B.C.E. (The Phoenician Women, 1781)
Orestēs, 408 B.C.E. (Orestes, 1782)
Bakchai, 405 B.C.E. (The Bacchae, 1781)
Iphigeneia ē en Aulidi, 405 B.C.E. (Iphigenia in Aulis, 1782)

About the Author

Barlow, Shirley A. The Imagery of Euripides. London: Methuen, 1971.

Bates, William Nickerson. Euripides: A Student of Human Nature. New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 1961.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Euripides: Comprehensive Research and Study Guide. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.

Conacher, D. J. Euripidean Drama: Myth, Theme and Structure. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1967.

Goward, Barbara. Telling Tragedy: Narrative Technique in Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides. London: Duckworth, 2004.

Meltzer, Gary S. Euripides and the Poetics of Nostalgia. New York: Columbia University Press, 2006.

Michellini, Ann Norris. Euripides and the Tragic Tradition. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1987.

Mossman, Judith, ed. Euripides. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Murray, Gilbert. Euripides and His Age. New York: Henry Holt, 1913.

Vellacott, Philip. Ironic Drama: A Study of Euripides' Method and Meaning. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1975.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Investigate Euripides' originality in depicting Greek mythical tradition.
- In what ways does Aristotle's theory of tragedy apply less aptly to Euripides' plays than to those of Aeschylus and Sophocles?
- Do enthusiasts of classical drama today better understand Euripides' tragic outlook than that of Aeschylus and Sophocles?
- Is Medea more a victim of external circumstances or of her own emotional responses to them?
- Did Euripides court disaster in his time by his uncompromising realism?
- Which modern playwrights are most Euripidean?

AP/Wide World Photos

HELEN FIELDING

Born: Morley, West Yorkshire, England
February 19, 1958

Female readers around the world found themselves identifying with the comic adventures of Fielding's "singleton" heroine, Bridget Jones, who keeps a diary of her tumultuous relationships with food, cigarettes, men, and anything else she can think to worry about.

BIOGRAPHY

The daughter of a mill manager and a home-maker, Helen Fielding was born in Morley, West Yorkshire, England, on February 19, 1958. She attended a local girls' school and then studied at Oxford, reading English at St. Anne's College and receiving her B.A. in that field of study. After graduating from Oxford in 1979, Fielding spent the next ten years working as a producer for British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) Television in London.

During her time at the BBC, Fielding worked with former Oxford classmate and friend Richard Curtis (a screenwriter for the 1994 film Four Weddings and a Funeral, among others) on Comic Relief, a televised appeal for African famine relief, which, in addition to providing aid to Africa also gave Fielding the raw material for her first published novel, Cause Celeb (1994). This novel is about a woman who flees to Africa and becomes an administrator for a famine relief organization in order to escape the effects of a soured romance in Britain. The success of Cause Celeb prompted an intriguing invitation from the Independent newspaper in 1995: Would she like to write a weekly column in the voice of a character of her own creation? Fielding's acceptance of the offer was the birth of Bridget Jones.

Drawing on a feature of her own diaries from college years past, Fielding began each of the columns with Bridget's current weight and the number of alcohol units, cigarettes, and calories she consumed that day. This ticker-tape device, with the parenthetical commentary that always accompanied it, served as a barometer of the kind of day Bridget was experiencing, and Fielding used it to greatly humorous effects. The adventures of Bridget Jones became wildly popular with the Independent's readers, and Fielding was soon approached about making them into a novel.

A longtime admirer of Jane Austen's work, Fielding used the plot of Pride and Prejudice (1813) to give structure to the naturally episodic nature of her work. As in the Austen novel, Fielding's heroine is at first repulsed by a seemingly haughty and cold-hearted man, but she gradually learns to love him as she discovers his true qualities. Bridget Jones's Diary, published in 1996, rose to the top of the best-seller list.

In 1998, Fielding moved her column to the Telegraph. In 1999, a sequel, Bridget Jones: The Edge of Reason, this time modeled on Austen's Persuasion (1818), was published and immediately moved to the top of the best-seller list. Both books have been made into major motion pictures, with Renée Zellweger as Bridget Jones, Hugh Grant as the irresistible cad Daniel Cleaver, and Colin Firth as the heroic lover Mark Darcy. In 2007, Fielding was working on a third Bridget Jones novel, and the rights to the film version of that book had already been bought by a film production company.

After the two Bridget Jones novels, Fielding wrote two other playful works, the first a supplement to the Jones books, Bridget Jones's Guide to Life (2001), itself a spoof of the self-help books Bridget reads compulsively, and the second, Olivia Joules and the Overactive Imagination (2003), which tells the story of a young and beautiful British journalist turned spy who tracks down an international terrorist.

ANALYSIS

Like her literary forebear Jane Austen, Fielding's literary genius lies in the realm of the comedy of manners, and, like Austen, Fielding's primary subject is the relationship between men and women. While Austen's writing gave birth to the modern romance novel and Fielding's to "chick lit," it would be fair to say that neither writer is really an innovator in plot and structure but rather both shine in their representation of character: Austen, for heroes who pulse with carefully restrained emotions, and Fielding, for a protagonist who alternately wallows and exults in the same emotions Austen's characters so carefully control. It is the modern woman's ability to appreciate Fielding's roller coaster of emotion that has made Bridget Jones so popular.

Unlike the readers of Austen, who may find themselves identifying with a variety of characters, Fielding's readers are left with only one imaginatively satisfying option, Bridget herself, and in reading her diary, the reader temporarily takes on the limitations of Bridget's own vision.

The first of these limitations is the business of the weight/alcohol-unit/calorie catalog at the beginning of each diary entry. Never merely scientific data, these statistics always tell a story themselves, offering hints of what has happened during the day and giving the reader the pleasure of guessing what that happening was. Rarely has fiction given readers such systematic information on the connection between a character's mind and her body. Though there is a comprehensive summary of consumption at the end of the book, because the novel is written as a diary, and truly for an audience of one, there is no equally comprehensive physical detail regarding the people and places in Bridget's world because she obviously already knows quite well what they look like. This lack of physical detail—aside from the persistent presence of consumer products, like Silk Cuts, Salon Selectives, and Milk Tray—is another significant limitation on the reader's vision, and it serves to accentuate and make more palpable the range of emotions Bridget experiences. The decisive limitation, however, is Bridget herself, who, in addition to being generally ignorant of the affairs of the world around her (she does not know the geographical location of Germany or the basic details of the television stories she herself is covering), also spends the bulk of her time thinking and worrying about two topics: her circle of friends and the men that are romantically interested in her. Granting these limitations to be necessary to the form Fielding uses, readers must ask themselves a question: What is the significance of this diary of Bridget Jones?

Having already written a score of newspaper columns in the voice of Bridget and now being asked to make these columns into a novel, Fielding found herself asking this very question. How could she give meaning to the disparate experiences of Bridget's life? She did so by using the plots from Austen's novels, first Pride and Prejudice and then Persuasion. By choosing these two novels to serve as the basis for her own plots, Fielding was, in essence, deciding the fate of Bridget Jones's life. Despite the fact that the novels celebrate Bridget's off-the-wall single antics, the events and people in Bridget's life reveal that her happiness comes through sharing love with one man, Mark Darcy. While Fielding, unlike Austen, does not insist on marriage as a symbol or sacrament of this love, she does, like Austen, give first place to the theme of romantic love.

Fielding has taken heavy criticism from writers who maintain that this vision of romance is falsely conceived and not true to the experience of the modern woman. In addition, some argue that this representation of romance—and of Bridget's almost-permanent emotional angst regarding it—perpetuates the stereotype that single women are single because there is something wrong with them, not because they desire that way of life.

There are no easy answers to these and other related criticisms arising from Fielding's reenvisioning of Austen, but it is helpful for the first-time reader of the Bridget Jones books to remember that, above all, Bridget Jones is a comic figure. Whatever the cultural effects of Bridget's adventures, it is important to remember her original reason for being, as Fielding has said in interviews, was to make people laugh at her in order that they might then be able to laugh at themselves. If this principle of comedy is remembered, Fielding's books, in addition to being enjoyable, may also give readers the added benefit of wisdom.

BRIDGET JONES'S DIARY

First published: 1996

Type of work: Novel

Bridget falls for the wrong man but then learns to love the right one.

Bridget Jones's diary starts the new year the way many diaries do—with a bundle of resolutions, which in order to be followed would necessitate either the joining of a religious community or the complete obliteration of the personality of the diarist in question. As neither of these are options for Bridget, she does one of the very things she vowed not to do in her resolutions: fall for a man who is completely commitment-phobic, her boss at the publishing house, Daniel Cleaver.

This romance, the main event of the first half of the novel (a novel that covers each month of the calendar year), is constantly framed by Bridget's interactions with her friends. No action of Daniel is too small to be analyzed by Bridget's loyal trio of pals: the explosively opinionated Shazzer, the delicate Jude, and appearance-obsessed Tom, a homosexual. At least once a week the four get together, and the meetings, in addition to being a forum for discussing Bridget's problems, also involve Shazzer proclaiming stridently her vision of feminism; Jude complaining and worrying about her own commitment-phobic boyfriend, Vile Richard; and Tom alternately offering advice to all and wondering aloud about his own tenuous relationship with Pretentious Jerome. (The epithets "vile" and "pretentious" are Bridget's own, and are, in the diary, inseparable from the actual names.)

The other significant characters in the novel are Bridget's parents. From the outset, they are having problems. After more than thirty years of marriage, Bridget's mother decides to separate from her husband and pursue a career as a television presenter. Although she denies it to Bridget, she also becomes romantically involved with a person of questionable character, a Portuguese man named Julio.

Bridget's father, crushed by these developments, becomes a shell of his former self, so Bridget finds herself besieged by embarrassingly personal phone calls from him and from her mother.

Meanwhile, Bridget and Daniel have been going together for a few months, and though there have been a few hitches in their relationship, Bridget finds she is very much in love with him. However, her earlier misgivings about Daniel are confirmed when he ducks out, at the last minute, from participating in a family costume party the two had been invited to attend. The "tarts and vicars" costume theme is abandoned by the host, but that message is never delivered to Bridget, so she is forced to endure catty jokes and horrid small talk while wearing a come-hither street-woman outfit, complete with a bunny tail on the back. Utterly embarrassed, she stops by Daniel's apartment after the party for a comforting word, only to find that he has not been working as he claimed he would be but has in fact been with another woman. Furious, Bridget quits her job at the publishing house, and, with the help of her mother's newfound connections, finds work as a reporter for a local television station.

It is at this point that Mark Darcy becomes a character of interest to Bridget. A childhood playmate of Bridget's, the now divorced Mark is introduced to the reader at the beginning of the novel at a Christmas party with Bridget's family; in fact, Bridget's mother is trying to set the two of them up. Bridget's first impression of Mark as a cold and harsh person is reinforced later in the novel at the costume party, when he openly criticizes Daniel to Bridget. Events in the second half of the novel, however, will make Bridget reexamine her initial feelings.

Bridget is assigned to cover a front-page human rights lawsuit, but she misses the interview time because she is making a run for cigarettes and believes she will certainly be fired. However, Mark Darcy, who is the acting attorney in the case, happens to be fetching cigarettes for his client at the same moment as Bridget, and in a gesture of generosity, he grants an exclusive interview between his client and Bridget. The avenues are now open for Mark and Bridget to begin a romance of their own, but not before Mark has done another good deed to seal his reputation in Bridget's eyes.

When Bridget's mother leaves the country with Julio and thousands of pounds scammed from her friends and family, it is Mark who follows Julio to Portugal to make sure Bridget's mother is returned safely. After this is accomplished, he commandeers Julio's capture in England at the annual Christmas party, and he rescues Bridget from another lonely holiday by whisking her away to an expensive hotel suite. There he confesses his love for Bridget, and the diaries conclude with the two together in bed.

BRIDGET JONES: THE EDGE OF REASON

First published: 1999

Type of work: Novel

Bridget and Mark Darcy overcome the by-now-familiar Fielding obstacles of self-help books, opinionated friends, and schemers to finally realize that they love each other.

The sequel picks up exactly one month and four days after the first novel, the amount of time that Bridget and Mark Darcy have been boyfriend and girlfriend. Bridget's boyfriend bliss, however, is decisively short-lived. From the outset of the novel, people and situations seem to conspire to keep the lovers apart. Their evenings together are ceaselessly interrupted by phone calls from Bridget's friends; a case of mistaken identity makes it seem that Mark is a sexual pervert; and, worst of all, another woman has taken it into her head to woo Bridget's man.

This woman, Rebecca, who was introduced briefly in the first novel as an acquaintance (not much liked) of Bridget and her friends, is a major player in the sequel. Thin and rich and many other things that Bridget is not, Rebecca is known among Bridget's friends as a "jellyfish"; she is always sneaking up on a person unawares with her conversational stings. After inviting Mark and Bridget to a party at her parents' cottage, Rebecca arranges an evening of discord for the happy couple. Having informed her teenage nephew that Bridget and Mark are splitting up, she makes space for the boy and Bridget to be alone, and then she and Mark "accidentally" walk in on the boy trying to kiss Bridget. The result of this setup is the eventual split between Bridget and Mark, the reunion of which is complicated by the often contradictory advice Bridget receives from her library of self-help books and the counsel she solicits from her friends. Soon after the party, Bridget sees Mark with Rebecca one night in town. Though he offers to explain the situation, Bridget—encouraged by the support of Shazzer and Jude, who are in her apartment when he calls—will not listen to him. Shortly after this conversation, Mark and Rebecca begin dating.

Single once more, Bridget has the time to devote herself completely to preparing for a freelance assignment her friend Tom has helped her land: an interview, in Rome, with Colin Firth, the actor who plays Mr. Darcy in the British Broadcasting Corporation version of Pride and Prejudice (as well as Mark Darcy in the film version of Fielding's novels). Although the interview is supposed to focus on Firth's role in an upcoming film, Fever Pitch, Bridget cannot help herself from constantly referring back to the character of Mr. Darcy. As she is not able to write an account of the interview in time for the deadline, the newspaper prints the complete transcript of the interview, to Bridget's embarrassment and to great comic effect.

As in the first novel, world travel proves to be an impetus for Mark and Bridget to realize their love for one another, although Bridget journeys much farther away than her mother did in the previous book. Having recently dumped her library of self-help books into the dustbin and filled with hopes of detachment from her romantic struggles, Bridget joins Shazzer on a vacation to Thailand. On the plane, Shazzer meets a handsome stranger named Jed who strikes up a romance with her. For a week the two are almost inseparable, and Jed finds a hut next door to Shazzer's.

Unfortunately for Shazzer, Jed, like Julio in the previous novel, has ulterior motives for romance. The day before they are to leave Thailand, Bridget and Shazzer find that their island hut has been broken into and their plane tickets and most of their money is gone. Bridget goes to the hotel nearby for assistance and finds Jed. He gives her money for the train to the Bangkok airport and a bag to carry the few things that were not stolen from their hut. Shazzer and Bridget go to the airport, where Bridget is detained by the Thai authorities. The bag Jed has given them is lined with narcotics, and Bridget is told she may be facing up to ten years in a Thai prison.

Immediately after hearing what happened, Mark flies to Asia, tracks down Jed, and extracts a confession for theft and planting drugs. Despite Mark's efforts, Bridget still has to spend a little more than a week in a Thai prison. Upon her return to England, she receives a terrible scare: the "gift" in the mail of a live bullet inside a pen. While the police investigate who might be trying to kill her, Bridget keeps a low profile, staying first at Shazzer's house and then, when he has been ruled out as a suspect, at Mark's. Once there, both Mark and Bridget reveal their feelings for each other and begin sleeping together again. Shortly after this, the police discover the originator of the bullet-pen, a builder at Bridget's apartment who has a record for stealing from the homes on which he works.

The novel concludes with the wedding of Jude and Vile Richard, during which Bridget overhears a conversation between Rebecca and Mark confirming that Mark indeed does not have any romantic feelings for Rebecca, but in fact loves and needs Bridget.

SUMMARY

It is an open question whether Helen Fielding's novels will prove to be of lasting literary value, but the cultural significance of Bridget Jones is unquestionable. Critics may bemoan Bridget's superficiality, self-centeredness, and ignorance of the world, and champions may see these very traits as part of a larger cultural critique. However, no one can deny that Bridget Jones is "real" in the sense that she is a character who speaks to and for women all over the Western world.

Zachary W. Czaia

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Cause Celeb, 1994

Bridget Jones's Diary, 1996

Bridget Jones: The Edge of Reason, 1999

Bridget Jones's Guide to Life, 2001

Olivia Joules and the Overactive Imagination, 2003

SCREENPLAYS:

Bridget Jones's Diary, 2001 (with Andrew Davies and Richard Curtis)

Bridget Jones: The Edge of Reason, 2004 (with Andrew Davies, Richard Curtis, and Adam Brooks)

NONFICTION:

Who's Had Who in Association with Berk's Rogerage: An Historical Rogister Containing Official Lay Lines of History from the Beginning of Time to the Present Day, 1987 (with Simon Bell and Richard Curtis)

About the Author

Marsh, Kelly A. "Contextualizing Bridget Jones." College Literature 31, no. 1 (2004): 52-72.

Moseley, Merrit. "Helen Fielding." In British Novelists Since 1960: Fourth Series. Vol. 231 in Dictionary of Literary Biography. Detroit: Gale, 2001.

- Murphy, Olivia. "Books, Bras, and Bridget Jones: Reading Adaptations of Pride and Prejudice." Sydney Studies in English 31 (2005): 21-38.
- Van Slooten, Jessica Lyn. "A Truth Universally (Un)Acknowledged: Ally McBeal, Bridget Jones's Diary, and the Conflict Between Romantic Love and Feminism." In Searching the Soul of Ally McBeal: Critical Essays. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006.
- Whelehan, Imelda. Bridget Jones's Diary: A Reader's Guide. London: Continuum International, 2002.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Helen Fielding's Bridget Jones books are clearly meant to be read as comic works of literature. Is it possible for something to be funny and "serious literature" at the same time? Explain. Do the Bridget Jones books achieve this balance?
- Some critics of the Bridget Jones books feel that they trivialize feminism and do a disservice to women. Is this a valid criticism or not? How so?
- Although Bridget spends much time worrying about men, she spends little or no time contemplating marriage for herself. Why is this?
- Compare the plots of Jane Austen's novels Pride and Prejudice (1813) and Persuasion (1818) to the two Bridget Jones novels. What are the similarities and differences between the plots? What is the significance of the differences and similarities?
- Some reviewers have complained that the Bridget Jones books are not a realistic depiction of modern single life. Make an argument for or against this complaint.
- Part of the cultural phenomenon of Bridget Jones is wrapped up in the Hollywood film adaptation of the two novels. Compare the characters, action, and setting of the books versus the films.

Library of Congress

HENRY FIELDING

Born: Sharpham Park, Somersetshire, England
April 22, 1707

Died: Lisbon, Portugal
October 8, 1754

Fielding's greatest achievement lay in his contributions to the development of the novel, eclipsing his multifaceted career as a dramatist, a journalist, and a lawyer and magistrate deeply involved with the problems of his society.

BIOGRAPHY

Henry Fielding was born at Sharpham Park, his maternal grandfather's estate near Glastonbury, in Somersetshire, England, on April 22, 1707, the first child in a family of five. His father, Edmund Fielding, was a lieutenant who fought under the duke of Marlborough against the forces of Louis XIV of France. His mother, Sarah, was the granddaughter of Sir Henry Gould, baron of the exchequer; her family had been considered gentry for several generations. Yet Fielding himself was not fully included among this upper class; with his family being considered "poor relations," he was déclassé. This situation, perhaps, was the genesis of his later contemptuous attitude toward many of the upper class, an attitude exhibited particularly in his novels.

During his childhood, Fielding lived in the village of East Stour, Dorsetshire. He was educated at home during his early years. His mother died when he was eleven, and he was then sent to the home of a cantankerous maternal aunt, who encouraged his impudence when his father remarried when Fielding was thirteen, this time to a "papist" Italian. For this impudence, he was sent to school at Eton. Consequently, his father and the family servants saw him in a very unflattering light. He discovered firsthand the malicious misjudgments others could make, a realization that he used later in The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749; commonly known as Tom Jones). At Eton, however, he found lifelong friends, as well as enjoyment of his studies. There, he developed deep friendships with George Lyttleton and with William Pitt the Elder. After an unsuccessful elopement when he was nineteen, he then settled in London. In time, he began to see the city, with the numerous temptations available, as a great corrupter of the susceptible, another realization that he put to use in his novels.

Fielding's literary career began early, before he was twenty-one. His first publication, "The Masquerade," a verse satire, appeared in late January, 1728, and weeks later, his first play, Love in Several Masques, a light comedy, was produced. In spite of finding it somewhat difficult to judge what audiences wanted, Fielding became the leading playwright of the period between 1730 and 1737. During these years, his dramatic skill in great demand, he produced a number of comedies, numerous skits, and farces, including his best farce, Tom Thumb: A Tragedy (pr., pb. 1730; revised as The Tragedy of Tragedies: Or, The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great (pr., pb. 1731). The Historical Register for the Year 1736 (pr., pb. 1737) was a vicious attack on the contemporary political corruption. The stage—and his dramas—had become a part of the political background of his time. Fielding, chief among the attackers, satirized the government of Prime Minister Robert Walpole through his farces. The government, however, finally struck back. The Theatrical Licensing Act of June 21, 1737, shut down this criticism, including Fielding's. With drama now severely restricted and future dramas to be censored by a powerful Lord Chamberlain, Fielding was thus effectively denied the stage.

With the closing of the theaters, Fielding turned to law, studying at the Middle Temple and qualifying in 1740. In 1734, he married Charlotte Craddock. They became the parents of two daughters. With her ill health and his own health deteriorating, Fielding found it difficult to maintain his law career. Partly because of his own improvidence, he endured some long periods of "considerable poverty," but, assisted by a longtime friend, Ralph Allen of Bath, along with his wealthy Eton friend, Lyttleton, he was able to continue. (Fielding used Allen and Lyttleton as models for Squire Allworthy in Tom Jones. His wife became the model for Sophia Western in Tom Jones and for the heroine in his last novel.) When his wife died in 1744, he was too devastated to write much for more than a year afterward.

More by circumstance, Fielding became enmeshed in the writing of novels. In the fall of 1740, Samuel Richardson had developed the series of model letters for newly educated young ladies into a connected whole that became his first novel, Pamela; Or, Virtue Rewarded (1740-1741). The book was immensely popular. Fielding, however, had found Richardson's heroine "too passive" and regarded Richardson himself as a "milksoop and a straitlaced preacher out of his pulpit." Five months later, An Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews (1741) appeared, clearly a parody, showing in a savage satire a money-grubbing, lusty wench, decidedly the opposite of Richardson's chaste heroine. That book, also in epistolary form, was published under a pseudonym. This parody has been ascribed to Fielding, but whether he actually produced it is debatable: A number of Fielding's biographers do not include it among his accomplishments.

Fielding's The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews, and of His Friend Mr. Abraham Adams (1742; commonly known as Joseph Andrews) is more often acknowledged as his first novel. He followed this with the heavily satirical, fictionalized The History of the Life of the Late Mr. Jonathan Wild the Great (1743, 1754), based on an actual highwayman of the same name, using this new genre to criticize Walpole again. He followed with Tom Jones, considered to be his masterpiece, and finally with Amelia (1751).

In 1747, Fielding remarried, this time to his wife's maid and friend, Mary Daniel. This marriage, though it raised some scandal in class-conscious England, was quite happy. Five children were born of it.

In 1748, with Lyttleton's aid, Fielding was appointed police magistrate, or justice of the peace, for Westminster in London. He had long been disturbed by the various corruptions that he had observed in the courts; once powerless to intervene, he was now able to battle from within against this corruption, including the "trading justices" who had been padding their incomes by imposing and embezzling fines. In 1749, his jurisdiction was to include the whole county of Middlesex; he also was chairman of the quarter sessions court at Westminster, in addition to a court at Bow Street. Together with his blind half brother, John Fielding, also a magistrate, he established new standards of honesty and competence on the bench. To do this, he wrote a number of legal inquiries and pamphlets, including a proposal for banning public hangings and for organizing the Bow Street Runners, a pioneer group established to detect crime. In 1753, in spite of increasingly ill health, he wrote an exhaustive and humane "A Proposal for Making an Effectual Provision for the Poor." That same year, he both organized and established a plan for breaking up the criminal gangs then flourishing in London. His often sympathetic treatment of the lower classes in his novels is evident. Unlike many of his contemporaries, he recognized the existence of the "deserving poor."

Since 1741, Fielding's health had been gradually deteriorating. In 1754, he resigned his magistracy and, with his wife and a daughter, sailed to Lisbon, Portugal, where, he felt, the milder climate could possibly help him. In that city on October 8, however, only two months after his arrival, he died. He left a nonfiction journal, The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, published posthumously in 1755.

ANALYSIS

Fielding, a man of his eighteenth century society, was naturally class-conscious, perhaps opinionated, and possibly a bit self-righteous; like many of his contemporaries, he was "conservative, consistent, and orthodox" in his beliefs. His view of a stratified society was hardly unusual, for almost everyone felt that "all government was based on the principle of subordination and the duty of all classes of men is to contribute to the good of the whole.” To Fielding, the homes of the high-placed were no more than prisons: “Newgate [Prison] with the mask on.” He displayed caustic attitudes toward this group in both Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones. His own religious beliefs were integral to his very being. As a magistrate he acted upon these beliefs; he was sympathetic toward his impoverished clients and also accepted a smaller salary. Fielding’s scrupulously honest efforts in time reduced the questionable practices that he had seen. He carried this same honesty into his novels.

Yet Fielding was his own man, a truly independent thinker. Not entirely in sympathy with his contemporary world, he was hypercritical of the mores of every class, satirizing the various odious behaviors of his world in the persons of numerous characters in Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones, particularly those that exemplified hypocrisy, which he deemed “an ungenerous behavior,” whatever the class of the person. The upper class provided numerous examples. In Joseph Andrews, he satirizes Lady Booby’s attempt to seduce her much younger, chaste footman, Joseph, an act not only reprehensible but also ludicrous. In Tom Jones, he shows a lady by position as actually no more than a high-born prostitute or pimp.

Fielding did not spare the middle class, either. In Joseph Andrews, he depicted the un-Christian behavior of Parson Trulliber, who laughed at Parson Adams’s swine- and mud-stained clothes, constantly berated his own wife, regardless of who was present, and then spurned Parson Adams’s need of a loan, though he could have spared much more money than what had been requested. The latter was the essence, Fielding thought, of “faith without works,” in his mind typical of a then-current popular religious leader whose ideas Fielding especially detested. Innkeepers, doctors, lawyers, maids, tutors—these became the targets of Fielding’s strong disapproval. “Money called the tune” at the time, an idea Fielding could not support.

The lower class, also, came under Fielding’s satire. While he could be compassionate toward many of this class, he could still deplore their flaws. A “practical idealist,” he gave to the needy, supported the foundling and lying-in hospitals, established subscriptions for old men, and shared his scant income and his plenteous writing talents where he could, even up to the few months before his death. Moreover, unlike his contemporaries, he recognized the dualities of human nature, the constructive-destructive natures of human beings. In Tom Jones, he shows the basically admirable Squire Western and Squire Allworthy as each having the human blemishes of class consciousness. He portrays Tom Jones as a basically decent young man but one who still must learn prudence through a number of devastating experiences, which he eventually surmounts, gaining the necessary wisdom. Even Parson Adams, in Joseph Andrews, shares this duality of nature.

Fielding, then, was indignant at the world that he knew. This feeling led to his satiric view of this world, an irony he reiterated repeatedly on stage, in journals, and in his novels in order to correct and redress the awfulness of existing conditions, high and low. He became, then, in his novels especially, “the most faithful representative of his age: he gave its coarsenesses, its brutalities, and sometimes with too little consciousness of their evils, though no one ever satirized more powerfully the worst abuses of the time.” He found that his witty but serious approach with his “sure and just sense of values” could and did make dents in the general attitudes and behavior.

Fielding also “represents the strong, healthy common sense and stubborn honesty of the sound English nature” in his particular way, with his object “to give a faithful picture of human nature.” Thus, he usually created the illusion of reality, using all ranges of humor—slapstick, situational (based on characters in situations), and the practical joke—to show the various behaviors in his characters that needed correcting. His world appreciated humor in whatever form, and Fielding knew his world very well.

JOSEPH ANDREWS

First published: 1742

Type of work: Novel

A parody in the first ten chapters, this novel tells of the adventures of a young man, although centering more on his traveling companion.

Many critics say Joseph Andrews is Fielding’s first novel, discounting An Apology for the Life of Mrs.

Shamela Andrews (1741). Joseph Andrews, however, though a parody of Pamela: Or, Virtue Rewarded (1740-1741; commonly known as Pamela) in its first ten chapters, is “more refined and truly comic” than Shamela. Joseph is the “newly invented” brother of Richardson’s heroine, and Squire Booby and Lady Booby the counterparts of Pamela’s Mr. B. When Fielding had achieved his purpose, his novel soon moved on into an almost picaresque tale centered more on Parson Adams, who, from the eleventh chapter on, dominates the novel.

The full title is typically eighteenth century: The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews, and of His Friend Mr. Abraham Adams, Written in Imitation of the Manner of Cervantes, Author of Don Quixote. The novel was published anonymously in 1742 and did not achieve the immediate acclaim that Pamela had, though a new edition came six months later. Fielding was not part of the literary mainstream, a situation true generally of the other early novelists. Individuals “of taste and intellect” liked Fielding’s book, finding Joseph Andrews truer, more real, “not a tissue of silly make-believe.” Fielding—and Richardson—thus validated this new form of fiction.

Joseph Andrews could be called a picaresque novel in structure, for its plotline is similar to the one-line structure of picaresque fiction, much like Miguel de Cervantes’s Don Quixote de la Mancha (1605, 1615), Fielding’s mentor’s book. The plot of the novel progresses by “shuttling,” moving forward by “small oscillations of emotion,” which, in the larger, all-over design, are small parts of a unified whole, episodic in nature. At times, events seem like reversals, followed by forward movement.

In the novel, Fielding employed ironies, unmaskings, conflicts, and reversals. He used coincidences, too, but credibly, indicating one should trust in Divine Providence, the basis of his own creed. One of these coincidences is the peddler, as a burlesque of Sophocles’ Oedipous Tyrannos (c. 429 B.C.E.; Oedipus Tyrannus, 1715), acting as a messenger in the novel: He arrives just as he is needed, and he happens to know the rights of the births of the two young people, the very information that is needed then. Fielding himself acted as a superior observer, writing in the third person (rather than using Richardson’s first person of the epistolary form). Though there are realistic situations and characterizations in Joseph Andrews, Fielding did not strive for complete authenticity.

By reversing the sexes of the two main figures of Pamela in his own novel, Fielding showed more clearly, he felt, the silliness, the ludicrousness of the “sentimentality and improbability” prevalent in much of his contemporary world. His title character becomes Joseph because he acts like the biblical Joseph, who rejected Potiphar’s wife. With his engagement to Fanny, Joseph, at first almost a paragon, becomes more like a normal human being, more real, rather than an improbable “cardboard” character.

In the general plot, Joseph rises from a low rank to become a footman in the London house of a baronet (actually the lowest rank of gentry), Sir Thomas Booby, who dies early in the novel. Not long after, Joseph is inappropriately importuned by the newly widowed Lady Booby and then by Mrs. Slipslop, Lady Booby’s horrendous waitingwoman. In the meantime, Fanny Goodwill, Joseph’s eventual “intended,” is dismissed for her “immorality” (as Slipslop terms her behavior), but principally because she is attractive. A virtuous, chaste young woman, though naïve, she exists to be rescued. She is sent home to Somersetshire, on the Booby’s country estate. Joseph, too, has now been dismissed and has headed for the same destination.

Parson Adams, who was Joseph and Fanny’s tutor en route to London, happens upon Joseph in an inn just outside London. The Parson reverses his route and, with Joseph, makes his way back to Joseph’s country home, encountering numerous characters and adventures on the way, including rescuing Fanny from a dire situation. At home comes the denouement: the revelation of Fanny and Joseph’s true parentages, a seeming reversal, and a hilarious nighttime bedroom scene at Lady Booby’s. After all the reversals and seeming conflicts, Joseph and Fanny overcome their difficulties.

Fielding, in this novel, followed “the quixotic pattern of master and Man meeting on the road,” much as Cervantes did. Yet he used his previously developed theater skills, too, for the last book of Joseph Andrews, the “musical bed” situation, showed quite surely “excessive stagecraft in Fielding’s art.” In other places, too, he evidently used this previous experience, adapting it to this new genre.

Looking at Fielding’s cast of characters in Joseph Andrews, one sees that the psychology of the characters stands out more so than Fielding’s “puppet-like manipulation” of them. Fanny and Joseph, while humanized, are hardly more than conventional young lovers. Parson Adams, however, is a “living human being,” both aggressive and humble, a mixture of strong and yet unsophisticated sentiments, comic and yet maddening, but lovable in his unselfish kindness, his unwavering goodness, and his thoroughly honest nature. He is the epitome of naïve virtue, probably Fielding’s finest conception.

In Joseph Andrews, Fielding utilizes his characters to expose eighteenth century mores: the class consciousness and the easy willingness to admit a formerly lower-class person into a higher class, when circumstances rectify situations. Two incidents illustrate this last point. The Boobys readily admit Fanny, a former serving maid, into their upper-class family, having learned that Fanny is by birth really Pamela’s sister, and Mr. Wilson, formerly an outcast rake of London absorbed in the “bright lights,” is readily reaccepted once he becomes a respectable country gentleman.

Joseph Andrews, however, is not merely a didactic novel. It is that, true, but the didacticism is masked with the overlay of irony and humor. Fielding’s characters are part of a plot replete with ludicrous but essentially serious undertakings and reversals. It is a plot carried out by psychologically realistic characters in humorous yet realistic situations. Fielding’s didacticism is, therefore, effective.

TOM JONES

First published: 1749

Type of work: Novel

In this pseudoautobiographical novel, a thoroughly good young man, through a series of adventures, evolves from innocence to maturity.

Fielding’s best-plotted novel, his masterpiece, The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling, probably was begun in 1746. When the novel finally appeared, it was “enthusiastically received” by the general public, though not by two groups, the Tory journalists, who strongly disliked Fielding for supporting the House of Hanover, and Richardson and his group, who saw Fielding as a “filthy and immoral writer,” even to the point of slandering Fielding himself, particularly for “marrying his cook.”

This novel can be labeled pseudoautobiographical: Tom Jones, the main character and hero, is to a large degree a fictionalized version of his creator’s own boyhood experiences, as well as Fielding’s own psychological responses to those experiences. The narrative structure moves, through the journey to London that Tom makes, from innocence to experience. Fielding, in this novel, used a central plot interspersed with seemingly peripheral incidents or subplots, all of which helped the central plot to move steadily toward a desired terminal objective. These peripheral episodes thus fit into the main plot—seeming detours, but all part of the route that Tom must take on his road to knowledge. Using the tight construction of a well-made play, Fielding produced in Tom Jones one of the best-plotted novels in English.

Fielding himself called Tom Jones a “comic epic poem in prose,” though others say it is “essentially a comic romance.” Yet Fielding does include some parts that parody the effects of heroic poetry, particularly the digressions. Like other eighteenth century writers, Fielding felt it was his duty to try to change his society. Thus, he headed each of the eighteen books of Tom Jones with an introductory essay, each of which elaborates on an idea that he wished to promote, much like the Greek chorus in a tragedy. The digressions that he interjected only briefly divert the plot, which continues inexorably on to its conclusion.

The structure of Tom Jones shows three major parts, each six books in length. The first third of the novel is set in the Paradise Hall of Squire Allworthy in Somersetshire. Here, Tom's infancy and early years to age twenty need only the first three books to be told; the beginning of his twenty-first year and his break with the squire highlight the next three books. The second third, books 7 through 12, take but weeks to complete, recounting Tom's adventures on the road to London. The third part, books 13 through 18, is set in London, taking only days to complete. Yet the tone is grimmer, not the comical rowdy, farcical adventures Tom has hitherto met on the road but ugly involvements: prostitution, incest, and the like, similar to what Fielding had seen of London himself.

Tom, as a seeming orphan, is an antihero (part of the picaresque tradition). As such, he is in a sense isolated from his society, which does not know what a truly good person is; as such, he does not fit in. Fielding shows this in numerous scenes. Tom is the essentially good person, though he does sometimes do things that result in harmful outcomes. After Tom's foolishness results in Black George being fired, Tom tries, typically, to atone by giving financial assistance to Black George's family and obtaining another job for him. Nothing Tom does deeply harms another person—more often, Tom harms himself. He is even able to forgive Thwackum's vicious beatings. Throughout the novel, Tom's adventures illustrate his good impulses, his desire to do the right thing each time. Fielding does not see virtue without fault—one has to achieve it by experience, taking it as one goes, the good with the bad. The good-natured will survive, as Tom does.

Blifil, Tom's foil, is quite evidently Tom's mirror side. Fielding shows the reader Blifil's toadying in the presence of the tutors, his freeing Sophia's bird and giving a glib, rationalized excuse to Squire Allworthy—"the bird wanted to be free"—and his remembering Tom's trespasses and relating them to the squire in the worst light, so that Tom is dismissed from Paradise Hall. There, Blifil is the snake, so to speak, "cold, calculating, selfish, ambitious," eager to supplant his good-natured opposite by manipulation. The two have the same mother, the same environment, the same education, but totally different natures, again illustrating Fielding's fascination with determinism, or predestination (fate). The other characters in Tom Jones may be additional old stock types, with each of the four humors represented. The Man of the Mountain can be said to represent the melancholy; Partridge, Tom's putative father, the sanguine; with others representing the choleric and phlegmatic humors.

A mentor character, Squire Allworthy, Fielding's mouthpiece, is never shown as a "pompous fool." Having been modeled on two of Fielding's good friends, Squire Allworthy is shown as a good man, though not all wise. Fielding would have been ashamed to mock these friends. Like many good people, Allworthy is not able to imagine what some others would think or do; he is thus all too susceptible to the villains' manipulations. As a result, he puts Tom out of Paradise Hall and onto the road. He is an honorable man, who, when finally presented with the deeds of his nephews, Tom and Blifil, is able to recognize his own shortcomings, restoring Tom to grace and Blifil to his own hell. As a mentor character, his purpose is to put the author's ideas into practice; like other such characters, he is not especially well developed but remains wooden and static.

Squire Western is an example of the Tory independent landowners who generally favored the Stuarts. He, like his society, hated the German Hanoverians, who, in his view, were foisted upon the English. (Fielding himself favored the Hanoverians.) Decidedly Church of England (as Fielding was), he is hostile to central government, preferring peace rather than the upset of war, especially internecine, or civil, war.

Squire Western's sister, having been immersed in the Hanoverian court, is therefore suspect at home, not only for her political and social leanings but also as a model for Squire Western's daughter Sophia, who is of marriageable age. Never having been married herself, Sophia and the squire finally discredit her as a suitable role model.

The tutors, modeled after two Salisbury acquaintances, are foils to Tom. Thwackum, the principal tutor, represents violent authority; he rationalizes his vicious beatings of Tom, having no concern with goodness or charity. Fielding shows Thwackum to be an outraged, morally bankrupt hypocrite; when the tutor learns that Squire Allworthy plans on leaving one thousand pounds to him, Thwackum laments that it is only that. Another hypocrite is the other tutor, the deist Square, who on the surface upholds the “natural beauty of virtue” but finds no qualms in sneaking out to Molly Seagrim’s for a sexual tryst, where Tom discovers him. Square represents rational persuasion, but both he and Thwackum vitiate the principles they have espoused as teachers. Of the two, though, Square does grow as a character.

SUMMARY

Henry Fielding was an “innovating master of the first order.” In Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones, as in his other novels, he discarded his predecessor’s epistolary method, calling his own books “comic epics in prose”—in effect, the first modern novels, the development of which influenced Charles Dickens and William Makepeace Thackeray in the nineteenth century. Though he is hardly an “exalted moralist” or a philosopher, his opinions do shape his novels, in part or in whole, in various episodes. Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones show him to be one of the most thoughtful of novelists. Though satiric, he maintained a somewhat realistic outlook; he is the first novelist to give the impression of frankly and fully recording normal behavior: His characters are “real people” who could step off Fielding’s pages into real life, thus sidestepping the encroachment of the then-prevalent sentimentality.

Mary Beale Wright

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

An Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrews, 1741

The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews, and of His Friend Mr. Abraham Adams, 1742 (commonly known as Joseph Andrews)

The History of the Life of the Late Mr. Jonathan Wild the Great, 1743, 1754

The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling, 1749 (commonly known as Tom Jones)

Amelia, 1751

DRAMA:

Love in Several Masques, pr., pb. 1728

The Author’s Farce, and The Pleasures of the Town, pr., pb. 1730

Rape upon Rape: Or, Justice Caught in His Own Trap, pr., pb. 1730 (also known as The Coffee-House Politician)

The Temple Beau, pr., pb. 1730

Tom Thumb: A Tragedy, pr., pb. 1730 (revised as The Tragedy of Tragedies: Or, The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great, pr., pb. 1731)

The Letter-Writers: Or, A New Way to Keep a Wife at Home, pr., pb. 1731

The Welsh Opera: Or, The Grey Mare the Better Horse, pr., pb. 1731 (revised as The Grub-Street Opera, pb. 1731)

The Covent Garden Tragedy, pr., pb. 1732

The Old Debauchees, pr., pb. 1732

The Mock Doctor: Or, The Dumb Lady Cur’d, pr., pb. 1732 (adaptation of Molière’s Le Medecin malgré lui)

The Modern Husband, pr., pb. 1732 (5 acts)

The Lottery, pr., pb. 1732

The Miser, pr., pb. 1733 (adaptation of Molière’s L’Avare)

Don Quixote in England, pr., pb. 1734

The Intriguing Chambermaid, pr., pb. 1734 (adaptation of Jean-François Regnard's Le Retour imprévu)

The Universal Gallant: Or, The Different Husbands, pr., pb. 1735 (5 acts)

An Old Man Taught Wisdom: Or, The Virgin Unmask'd, pr., pb. 1735

Tumble-Down Dick: Or, Phaeton in the Suds, pr., pb. 1736

Pasquin: Or, A Dramatic Satire on the Times, pr., pb. 1736

Eurydice Hiss'd: Or, A Word to the Wise, pr., pb. 1737
The Historical Register for the Year 1736, pr., pb. 1737 (three acts)

Eurydice: Or, The Devil's Henpeck'd, pr. 1737 (one act)

Miss Lucy in Town, pr., pb. 1742 (one act)

The Wedding-Day, pr., pb. 1743 (5 acts; also known as The Virgin Unmask'd)

The Fathers: Or, The Good-Natured Man, pr., pb. 1778 (revised for posthumous production by David Garrick)

NONFICTION:

The Journal of a Voyage to Lisbon, 1755

TRANSLATION:

The Military History of Charles XII King of Sweden, 1740

MISCELLANEOUS:

Miscellanies, 1743 (3 volumes)

About the Author

Bertelsen, Lance. Henry Fielding at Work: Magistrate, Businessman, Writer. New York: Palgrave, 2000.

Ehrenpreis, Irvin. Afterword to The History and Adventures of Joseph Andrews, by Henry Fielding. New York: New American Library, 1979.

Paulson, Ronald. The Life of Henry Fielding: A Critical Biography. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2000.

Rawson, Claude, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Henry Fielding. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

Sherburn, George. "Fielding's Social Outlook." In Eighteenth Century English Literature: Modern Essays in Criticism, edited by James L. Clifford. London: Oxford University Press, 1959.

Sherwood, Irma Z. "The Novelists as Commentators." In The Age of Johnson: Essays Presented to Chauncey Brewster Tinker, edited by Frederick W. Hilles. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1949.

Stephen, Leslie, Sir. History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century. 2 vols. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1962.

Stevenson, Lionel. The English Novel: A Panorama. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1960.

Watt, Ian. The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding. 2d American ed. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Henry Fielding's Joseph Andrews, and thus the mainstream of the English novel, began as a literary competition between Fielding and Samuel Richardson. Trace the development of this competition.
- Parson Adams in Joseph Andrews is considered one of Fielding's greatest characters. Writers often prefer bad clergymen as more interesting. How does Fielding make Adams, a good clergyman, interesting?
- The titles of Fielding's novels refer to them as "histories." What is the etymological link between "history" and "story"?
- Fielding refers to Tom Jones as "a comic epic poem in prose, perhaps a confusion, but certainly an assemblage, of literary genres." What does his use of such a phrase suggest about the literary situation in Fielding's time?
- Speculate on possible reasons for the extraordinarily simple name and mysterious origin (he was a foundling) of Tom Jones.
- Demonstrate how Tom Jones resembles, but also differs from, an established literary type called the picaresque, a common synonym for which is "rogue."
- Samuel Richardson, Fielding's early rival, claimed with reference to Tom Jones that Fielding was trying "to whiten a vicious character." Comment on the unfairness of that assertion.

RICHARD FLANAGAN

Born: Rosebery, Tasmania, Australia
1961

Flanagan's fiction reflects his desire to present Tasmania's distinctive history and qualities to the rest of Australia, as well as to the wider world. His novels explore small, tight-knit societies, which are driven by the need for connection through families and through social contacts. He regards his work as a conversation between European culture and Australian experience.

BIOGRAPHY

Richard Flanagan (FLAN-ih-guhn) was born in Rosebery, Tasmania, Australia, in 1961, the fifth of six children and the descendant of Irish convicts transported to Tasmania (then known as Van Diemen's Land) during the Great Famine of the 1840's. He spent his childhood in Rosebery, a small mining town on the west coast of Tasmania, an area which has featured extensively in his novels.

Flanagan left school at sixteen to work as a bush laborer but later attended the University of Tasmania, earning a first class honors degree in 1982. He was awarded a Rhodes Scholarship and attended the University of Oxford in England, where he earned a master's degree in literature in 1983. Like the protagonist of his first novel, Flanagan has worked as a river guide, and he took part in the first expedition to canoe the Jane River and the Gordon Gorge. He has also worked as a building laborer.

Flanagan's first novel was the now much celebrated Death of a River Guide (1994), which was so popular that it sold out its entire print run of 3,500 copies in less than four weeks—an unusual development for an Australian first novel. A second print run sold out almost as quickly. Death of a River Guide went on to win the 1996 National Fiction Award in Australia and the 1995 Victorian Premier's Award for First Fiction. His second novel, The Sound of One Hand Clapping (1997), was similarly successful, winning the 1999 Australian Booksellers Book of the Year Award, the Vance Palmer Prize for Fiction, and the 1998 Victorian Premier's Prize for Best Novel.

Gould's Book of Fish: A Novel in Twelve Fish (2001), Flanagan's third novel, drew attention not only for its story but for its production, featuring colored portraits of the fish mentioned in the novel, with the text printed in a variety of different colored inks. It won the 2002 Commonwealth Writers Prize for Best Book in the Southeast Asia and South Pacific Region and was short-listed for the 2002 Miles Franklin Award. Flanagan's next novel, The Unknown Terrorist, was published in 2006.

Flanagan is also a well-known and outspoken campaigner on environmental and political issues in Tasmania. He has been highly critical of the Tasmanian government and regularly campaigns against activities he regards as being detrimental to the Tasmanian landscape and its inhabitants. In 2008, he was living in Tasmania with his wife and three children.

ANALYSIS

In an interview after Death of a River Guide was published, Flanagan commented that "Art is the closest thing we have to holding on to that inner spirit world that we feel always to be on the verge of vanishing and which we recall only as the vaguest of sensations: the touch of a loved one, the shadow of a forgotten tree, the sound of a parent crying." Flanagan's concern to hold onto that "inner spirit world" is shown time and again in his novels. His characters are preoccupied with remembering the past or with reclaiming lost details of their own lives.

As he lies trapped under a waterfall, Aljaz Cosini, the eponymous river guide, becomes the conduit for the memories not only of his immediate family but of all his ancestors. On the one hand, he relives the parts they played in the creation of Tasmania as a country and a landscape, but on the other hand, his visions recapture all the tiny details of their lives that no one thought to record. The dilemma of William Buelow Gould, the protagonist in Gould's Book of Fish, lies in the fact that he has created a fake life for himself because he has no other life available to him, but Flanagan then poses two questions: What happens if you start to believe in the identity you have constructed for yourself, and what happens if that identity is revealed to be a fake? Flanagan is immensely preoccupied with the opportunities that migration presents for people to literally reinvent themselves but also with the ways in which they lie to themselves as a result of having that chance to make themselves anew.

Flanagan is also fascinated by the structures of narrative, and both Death of a River Guide and Gould's Book of Fish experiment with ways of breaking out of conventional narrative frameworks. Death of a River Guide works with three different narrative threads, two working forward in time, and one working backward in time, with all three interlinking and criss-crossing to produce a complex picture of the immigrant experience in Tasmania. Gould's Book of Fish employs what appears at first sight to be a standard framing device, with an unreliable narrator telling a story from within the framing device. Only gradually does it become clear that no part of this narrative structure can be safely relied on and that the whole narrative is in fact gradually collapsing in on itself, under the weight of its own artifice. As Flanagan clearly shows, there is no one person to whom ownership of the creative act can be fully assigned. Everyone, including the reader, is participating.

DEATH OF A RIVER GUIDE

First published: 1994

Type of work: Novel

Trapped beneath a waterfall on the Franklin River in Tasmania as he lies drowning, Aljaz Cosini, a river guide, travels back in time, seeing not only his life but that of his family, friends, and ancestors, providing a unique perspective on the turbulent history of Tasmania.

Flanagan's breathtaking debut novel opens with the protagonist, Aljaz Cosini, trapped among rocks, under a waterfall. He is at the point of death, drowning, and as is expected of drowning people, his life is flashing before his eyes. However, it is not simply a matter of recapitulating his own life. Aljaz has also been granted visions and he is traveling beyond his own life, into the lives of others, the earlier members of his own family. Through their eyes he learns not only the history of his family but also of Tasmania itself.

Aljaz has only taken on this job to help out an acquaintance, having recently returned to Tasmania. His father has just died and he is alone in the world, with nothing to tie him down. He is being paid badly, and the river trip is poorly equipped; he is also out of condition, having long since given up working as a river guide. However, he has got nothing else going on in his life, and as he has drifted through life over the last few years, so he drifts into this final job, afraid, uncertain, but at the same time determined to do the decent thing by his clients.

In fact, as Aljaz lies under the water, he tells three stories. One is his own, beginning with his birth in Italy to the mercurial Sonja and the absent Harry, and moving forward in time through his relationship with the enigmatic Couta Ho, from another generation of immigrants, and the loss of their child, Jemma, to the ill-fated river rafting expedition and his imminent death. The second is the story of the rafting expedition itself, while the final story is one that comes to him in flashes and visions, which send him traveling back and forth through time.

This last is the story of Harry's family, the Lewises and the Quades, decent, honest settlers, as Harry's mother, Rose, insists, not like the convicts transported to Van Diemen's Land, or Tasmania, as it was later called. Harry's father, Boy, was a lumberjack and a trapper. After Rose died, Harry went up into the mountains to work with his father until Boy was killed by a falling tree, after which Harry wandered the world, ending up in Italy, where he met Aljaz's mother, Sonja.

However, as visions assail Aljaz, he begins to realize that his family's beginnings are much more complex than he had been led to believe. His family are not the settlers his grandmother insisted they were but instead are descended from convicts. There was no mayor of Parramatta, but instead there was Ned Quade, transported from Salford, England, a convict who escaped and tried to make his way home. No one in Tasmania is quite what he seems to be, but each has a respectable cover story; everyone insists they came to Tasmania of their own free will.

As the visions intensify, Aljaz sees how his family's story is also a story that reflects the history of European settlement in Tasmania, even up to the present day and his arrival there with his mother. Gradually, however, he begins to see that there is another, secret history, more secret even than the fact of having convict ancestors. Throughout the novel there is an awareness of the indigenous inhabitants of Tasmania, the Aboriginal peoples, being displaced from their lands or murdered, but by the present day they have vanished, seemingly without trace. However, as Aljaz gradually comes to realize, while the Aboriginal people may no longer be visible, they still exist in the interstices of the white world. All of his life he has been taunted by other white Tasmanians for being an "immigrant." It turns out, as the reader has probably already suspected for some time and perhaps Aljaz himself has guessed, that his father's family is not as "white" as it claims to be and that he in fact has Aboriginal ancestors, thus tying him more closely to the land than most of the people who taunted him.

Aljaz's death is inevitable and is indeed signaled in the novel's title. Yet in his dying Aljaz transcends the wretchedness of his recent life and at long last finds a secure place for himself, among his ancestors, a part of the history of Tasmania, the country he finds he cannot live within, but from which he cannot live away.

GOULD'S BOOK OF FISH

First published: 2001

Type of work: Novel

A first-person narrative in which William Buelow Gould, convict and reluctant artist, tells a story of the settlement of Tasmania through the paintings that he is obliged to produce.

Who William Buelow Gould was to begin with will never be known. Gould himself has no idea who he really was, other than that he was the product of a nameless man who died making love to a nameless woman who died in the act of childbirth. Young William is brought up in the poorhouse until apprenticed to a stonemason. Unsited to the heavy work, he runs away to London and begins an odyssey that will take him across the world, finally arriving at the Tasmanian penal colony of Sarah Island.

Indeed, Gould never set out to be a painter at all; all he wanted to do was survive. As luck would have it, in America he falls in with Jean-Babeuf Audubon, with whom he embarks on an abortive business venture. Audubon, not unlike his namesake John James, is a painter of birds, and from him Gould gets the first inkling of what it might mean to be an artist. However, Gould himself has no particular interest in painting until he reaches a situation where claiming to be an artist will conveniently get him out of trouble. At this point, Gould assumes the identity of an artist, helped by having worked for a few months decorating porcelain, and he manages to fake his way as such until, having arrived at Sarah Island, he finds himself employed by the prison doctor.

Tobias Lempriere is desperate to become a fellow of the Royal Society, and he believes that Gould's skills will help him to secure this coveted position by having Gould paint the fish of Macquarie Harbor. At first, Gould struggles to fulfil Lempriere's demands; he is more used to painting copies of old master paintings. However, almost in spite of himself, Gould begins to paint in earnest, and he struggles with the fact that he is no longer faking his skills, as he has faked so much throughout his life, but is in fact an artist.

However, the reader learns Gould's story through words rather than through pictures. Gould is, or so he claims, writing his life story while imprisoned in a cell that is flooded by the tide twice a day, and which also contains the rotting corpse of a man whom Gould has indirectly killed. He is, by his own admission, an entirely unreliable narrator, and the experienced reader will have noticed that someone—perhaps Gould, perhaps someone else—has studded Gould's narrative with elements of other stories. An episode from Laurence Sterne's The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent. (1759-1767) makes an appearance, as does a fragment of plot from Thomas Hardy's The Mayor of Casterbridge (1886). These are stories Gould is unlikely to have come across, which throws open the question of whether this is Gould's own narrative, or whether Gould even existed.

For Gould's narrative is in fact being re-created by one Sid Hammet, who found the book in a junk shop and was entranced by the extraordinary paintings and the peculiar, multicolored narrative, until one night he left the book on a pub counter and, so he says, lost it. The narrative that is available to readers is Sid's recollection of Gould's narrative rather than the book itself, and it may in turn be wrong. Gould's own concern in writing his narrative is to record his autobiography, having discovered that the official history of the Sarah Island penal colony is at considerable variance to his actual experience. Whereas Gould sees the island commandant's megalomaniac desire to build an empire, fired by letters (faked letters, it turns out) from the sister of the man whose identity he assumed, Gould discovers that the colony's official records have been faked. Instead of recording the effects of the commandant's insanity, they show a colony gradually being established and becoming successful. Which is accurate? It is impossible to say.

Gould escapes from the penal colony and travels into the Tasmanian interior. However, he begins to become aware that the narrative that holds his world together is disintegrating around him. Most significantly, he becomes aware of his own fictional nature, as his world and someone's re-creation of it begin to collapse into one another. Finally, Gould believes he has become a fish, a weedy sea dragon, and the story comes full circle, as he is now the fish that Sid Hammet is staring at in a tank. Except that nothing is at all certain.

Flanagan's novel questions the entire nature of fiction and forgery, a subject particularly pertinent in Australian culture, with its long history of literary fakery and reinvention of identity.

SUMMARY

Richard Flanagan's novels explore the nature of Tasmania, his native land and a place of which he is inordinately proud. Flanagan does not hesitate to address the darker side of Tasmania's history as a penal colony, nor the fact that the country's indigenous inhabitants were all but exterminated by white settlers. However, he also seeks to show that his country's history is more complex than a simple matter of settlement and extinction. For Flanagan, Tasmania's history is closely related to the land, but he also shows how modern Tasmanians are affected, often unwittingly, by the experiences of their forefathers, and that they carry the history of their country deep inside themselves. Flanagan's role as a writer is to remind the world of this.

Maureen Kincaid Speller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Death of a River Guide, 1994

The Sound of One Hand Clapping, 1997

Gould's Book of Fish: A Novel in Twelve Fish, 2001

The Unknown Terrorist, 2006

SCREENPLAY:

The Sound of One Hand Clapping, 1998 (adaptation of his novel)

NONFICTION:

A Terrible Beauty: History of the Gordon River Country, 1985

"Joyce's Politics and Mine," 1988

"Parish-Fed Bastards": A History of the Politics of the Unemployed in Britain, 1884-1939, 1991

Codename Iago: The Story of John Friedrich, 1991 (with John Friedrich)

"Stripped Naked by Film," 1993

"The Stars and the Mountains: A Politics to Reclaim the Commons," 1995

EDITED TEXT:

The Rest of the World Is Watching, 1990 (with Cassandra Pybus)

About the Author

Bonner, Raymond. "Tasmanian Literary Prize Shunned by Its Originator." The New York Times, April 22, 2003, p. E3.

Delrez, Marc. "Nationalism, Reconciliation, and the Cultural Genealogy of Magic in Richard Flanagan's Death of a River Guide." Journal of Commonwealth Literature, 42, no. 2 (2007): 117-129.

Flanagan, Richard. "Hook, Line, and Thinker." Interview by Kate Kellaway. The Observer, June 9, 2002, p. 15.

_____. "Intimations of Mortality: Richard Flanagan Interviewed." Interview by Chris Wisbey. Island Magazine 66 (Fall, 1996).

_____. "Points of Origin." Interview by Elizabeth McMahon. Island Magazine 75 (Winter, 1998).

Shipway, Jesse. "Wishing for Modernity: Temporality and Desire in Gould's Book of Fish." Australian Literary Studies. 21, no. 1 (May, 2003): 45-53.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does Richard Flanagan's writing tell the reader about Tasmania? How important is it to his novels that Tasmania is an island, isolated from the rest of Australia?
- Connections between people are very significant in Flanagan's novels. How is this significance illustrated in his writing?
- Flanagan describes himself as having come from an "oral culture." How is this reflected in his writing?
- In Gould's Book of Fish, William Buelow Gould has worked as a forger. Even his names are all borrowed from other people. What can this tell us about the nature of identity?
- Flanagan has described his novels as a dialogue between European culture and the Australian experience. In the novels, find ways in which European culture impinges on Australian life.
- In Flanagan's novels, his characters live close to nature. How does the interaction with nature affect their daily lives?

Library of Congress

GUSTAVE FLAUBERT

Born: Rouen, France
December 12, 1821

Died: Croisset, France
May 8, 1880

*Flaubert is recognized as one of the world's greatest novelists. His novel Madame Bovary is particularly acclaimed as a masterpiece of world literature and an example of realism.*

BIOGRAPHY

Gustave Flaubert (floh-BEHR) was born in the historic Normandy city of Rouen, in northern France, on December 12, 1821. His father, Dr. Achille Cléophas Flaubert, was a surgeon in Rouen, where Gustave went to school. Gustave was one of six children, only three of whom survived to adulthood. Among them was his older brother Achille, who became a doctor like his father. Gustave was a good student, winning prizes for history and earning his baccalauréat in 1840.

Between 1840 and 1843, Flaubert studied law in Paris but failed his examinations. In 1844, he began to suffer from strange fits identified as epilepsy. The first attack rendered him an invalid for several months and led to the family's moving to Croisset, outside Rouen. A second consequence of the illness was that Flaubert's family came to accept that he would not pursue a career and allowed him to devote himself to his writing. Certain critics, among them the French existentialist Jean-Paul Sartre, have commented extensively on the role of Flaubert's debilitating illness on his subsequent literary career.

In 1846, Flaubert's father died, a loss quickly followed by the death of his sister Caroline in childbirth. Flaubert remained with his mother, Caroline Fleuriot (she died in 1872), and his infant niece, and he began to develop his literary ideas. His first draft of La Tentation de Saint Antoine (1874; The Temptation of Saint Anthony, 1895), the final version of which was not published until 1874, was read to friends at this time, and the seeds of the novel that would become Madame Bovary (1857; English translation, 1886) were sown. While working, Flaubert lived a hermitlike existence at the family's country house at Croisset. This reclusive regime did not prevent Flaubert from visiting Paris, as well as more distant and exotic sites. In October, 1849, Flaubert left France with his friend Maxime du Camp for a journey to the Middle East that lasted until May, 1851.

Both during and after this journey, Flaubert kept in touch through letters, and his correspondence, edited and published after his death, survives as an important record of his thoughts and ideas, as his extensive correspondence with the novelist George Sand illustrates. During the period from 1851 through 1853, when Flaubert was working intensively on Madame Bovary, he also wrote to Louise Colet, herself a writer; she was his mistress and, some have argued, one of the models for the character Emma Bovary.

Flaubert did not publish his first novel, Madame Bovary, until 1856, when it began to appear in serial form in the Revue de Paris. The following year, the novel became the subject of a trial. The agents of the repressive Second Empire regime unsuccessfully prosecuted the novel for obscenity, claiming that the depiction of adultery would corrupt public morals. Flaubert was eventually acquitted of the charges, and the novel appeared in book form. Even without the publicity of the trial, the novel became famous, in part thanks to Flaubert's now-famous style (Flaubert was extraordinarily demanding of himself and was constantly revising until he found le mot juste) and his development of “free indirect style,” a form of reported speech in which it becomes increasingly difficult to distinguish between the voice of the narrator and the interior monologue of the protagonist.

After the turbulence of the trial, Flaubert took another trip that lasted from April to June of 1858. This time he traveled to Tunisia to collect information for a book he was planning, to be set in Carthage. This novel, Salammô (1862; English translation, 1886), was subsequently published in 1862 and marked a new trend in Flaubert’s work. His eye for detail was every bit as keen, and the novel boasts lush passages of description that illustrate Flaubert’s romantic tendencies, but his choosing to set the novel in the distant past has been seen by many critics as significant.

Flaubert returned to a contemporary setting in his next novel, L’Éducation sentimentale (1869; A Sentimental Education, 1898). The book was first published in France in 1869, near the end of the Second Empire; its description of the 1848 revolution added to Flaubert’s reputation as a realist, thanks to his meticulous documentation of contemporary life. Flaubert’s career was interrupted by the political events of 1870, when France went to war with Prussia, a confrontation that quickly brought about the end of the Second Empire. Flaubert continued to suffer from nervous illness but served in the National Guard. The interruptions to his work were not only political, however, for on April 6, 1872, his mother died. Flaubert persevered with his writing despite the setbacks. He dabbled briefly in theater, but his play Le Candidat (pr., pb. 1874; The Candidate, 1904) ran for only four performances in 1874 before being canceled. Flaubert had more success with his novel The Temptation of Saint Anthony, an idea on which he had been working since the 1840’s. The novel was finally published in 1874.

During the remaining years of his life, Flaubert worked alternately on two projects: Trois Contes (1877; Three Tales, 1903) and Bouvard et Pécuchet (1881; Bouvard and Pécuchet, 1896). These works required prodigious quantities of documentation, and progress was slow. In addition, Flaubert was beset by health problems, as well as financial worries. When the husband of his niece Caroline, Ernest Commanville, went bankrupt, Flaubert helped out financially to avoid bringing dishonor on the family, but the cost was great. He himself was ruined financially, forced to sell many family heirlooms that he was reluctant to part with, and he faced the prospect of relying on his writing to bring in an income. Three Tales was eventually published in 1877, and Flaubert could finally give his undivided attention to Bouvard and Pécuchet, but it was too late. He died on May 8, 1880, in Croisset, his last work still unfinished. Even though this novel was incomplete, it nevertheless was published in 1881, the year after Flaubert’s death.

ANALYSIS

Flaubert has been hailed as a realist, thanks mainly to his masterpiece Madame Bovary; he has also been claimed as a precursor of decadence, but Flaubert cared little for labels. He did not affiliate himself with any particular school of literature, and his main concern was with style. His works alternate between works of realism and exoticism. His first novel, Madame Bovary, his most celebrated accomplishment, was followed by Salammô, a work set in the distant past. Flaubert returned to the recent past and the politically charged years of the 1848 revolution with A Sentimental Education but again departed from this realistic approach in The Temptation of Saint Anthony.

Despite this alternation, all of Flaubert’s works share certain features: They are meticulously researched, stylistically rich, and exhaustively rewritten. His letters are a valuable complement to his prose fiction works, documenting his struggles with style and recounting how, for example, he would declaim his work aloud in order to find exactly the right word to fit not just the meaning of the sentence but its formal structure and poetic cadence as well. Flaubert’s style became legendary, and admirers could recite typical passages. One favorite example was the opening sentence of Salammô, whose tripartite structure was typical of Flaubert’s style.

Although Flaubert is often associated with the realist school, his works were influential in a number of other ways. The themes of mysticism, sadism, and the femme fatale, a pattern in Flaubert’s work already discernible in Salammô but accentuated by The Temptation of Saint Anthony and by the short story “Hérodiade” (published in Flaubert’s collection Three Tales), were recognized in the 1880’s as important precursors to the Decadent movement in literature.

Flaubert's interest in realism was also a reflection of his preoccupation with the power of the cliché to obscure meaning even as it appears to make meaning possible. Throughout his life, Flaubert was fascinated by what he came to call "received ideas"—ideas that on the surface seem meaningful but, when examined, reveal lack of critical thought and mediocrity. The first illustration of this theme occurs in the character of Homais, the chemist in Madame Bovary. Homais has an opinion about everything, but his pronouncements are usually unoriginal, pompous, and complacent.

Flaubert was still preoccupied by this idea at the end of his life, as demonstrated in his final novel, Bouvard and Pécuchet. Although unfinished, it is nevertheless a masterpiece, like most, if not all, of Flaubert's published works. The result, once again, of meticulous research, the novel illustrates Flaubert's mockery of bourgeois complacency through the figures of two middle-class clerks who, meeting by chance, decide that they are soul brothers based on the (to them) portentous realization that they have the same ideas. Flaubert undercuts this spiritual affinity by revealing that their uncanny sympathy is proven (in their estimation) by the fact that each had the brilliant idea of writing his name inside his hat. The banality of this initial point of commonality sets the tone for their joint story. They retire from their menial jobs and buy a farm in Normandy, determined to devote themselves to a great communal project that will realize their ambitions and ideals. They sink their fortunes into a series of fads, each sillier than the next (landscape gardening, fertilizer experimentation, social reform, and the study of phallic symbolism), in which their total lack of talent or inspiration brings failure after failure. While Flaubert created characters who become mouthpieces for received ideas, he also collected examples of received ideas and compiled them into a sort of dictionary arranged alphabetically by theme and titled Dictionnaire des idées reçues (1910, 1913; Dictionary of Accepted Ideas, 1954).

Flaubert's relentless mockery of middle-class self-satisfaction is extremely humorous but relies heavily on irony for its effect, and the reader must be constantly vigilant in order to perceive the disjunction between the high tone of the speeches of various characters and its inappropriateness. Flaubert seldom intrudes as narrator to point out these juxtapositions; indeed, his famous style of free indirect mode obscures the role of the narrator. This style lies somewhere between interior monologue (presenting things the way they are perceived by a given character) and indirect (or reported) speech presented by a third-person narrator or observer. The narrator does not tell the reader what to think but presents narrative events colored by the perceptions of individual participants, which the reader must then evaluate. Thus, a famous scene in Madame Bovary depicts a troubled Emma seeking to unburden herself to the priest Bournisien. Emma catches him at a bad moment, when he is distracted by the more temporal concerns of controlling an unruly group of boys. His attention is only half on Emma, a problem compounded by his own lack of spiritual vision and understanding. The best comfort he can offer is to suggest her problem may be due to something she has eaten.

MADAME BOVARY

First published: 1857 (English translation, 1886)

Type of work: Novel

A young woman, unable to reconcile her idealistic vision of life with reality, commits suicide after a series of adulterous affairs.

Madame Bovary, Flaubert's first published novel, is arguably his greatest. Emma Bovary has become one of the most famous characters in world literature, and critics continue to debate and interpret her life, which, in its depiction of the conflict between idealism and reality, remains every bit as relevant today as it did when first published.

Formally divided into three parts, each one corresponding to a stage in Emma's life, the novel opens with Charles Bovary's youth and ends after Emma's death, making Charles, as it were, a set of parentheses that enclose Emma's life. Each section corresponds to an important stage in the narrative. The first part ends with the move to Yonville and the news that Emma is pregnant, thus presenting optimism at the prospect of change. As the reader suspects, however, the change does not bring happiness, and Emma quickly becomes dissatisfied once again. In her search for happiness, she turns to adultery with the rakish and unabashedly exploitative Rodolphe, whom Emma persists in seeing as a romantic hero. Emma plans to elope with him, but he balks at the last minute, and Emma is thrust into a depression that ends the second part of the novel. In the final section, Emma engages in yet another adulterous affair, this time with Léon, using the pretext of music lessons as the cover for her regular visits to nearby Rouen. The affair quickly becomes a routine, however, and a typical day sees Emma lying ever more blatantly to cover her tracks, selling property to pay the mounting bills, juggling the money problems, and taking less and less trouble to be discreet about the affair. For once, Emma is getting what she wants—excitement, romance, luxuries—and is forced to confront the fact that these are not the things that bring happiness. Unable to extricate herself from the financial problems that are ruining the family, and now irrevocably disillusioned about the possibility of finding happiness, she concludes that the only alternative is suicide.

Her dissatisfactions are highlighted by the contrast between her ideals and her uninspiring husband. The novel opens with the description of Charles Bovary as a schoolboy, a rather bumbling and boorish figure who provokes derision and mockery in his new classmates. It has often been noted that the name “Bovary,” derived from the Latin for “ox,” symbolizes Charles’s bovine character: slow, coarse and unrefined, rather dull-witted. Charles’s unfortunate start in life does not prevent him from becoming a doctor with a modest country practice and marrying for the second time for love, not for money. He marries Emma, the daughter of one of his farmer-patients, who then takes over as the central character of the narrative. Charles is an “officier de santé,” a phrase often simply translated as “country doctor,” but it is important, especially for contemporary readers, to remember that this was a second-class kind of doctor. Thus, although Charles is associated with the prestigious field of medicine, he is presented as one of its less-skilled practitioners. His was a modestly paid and extremely unglamorous occupation, which consisted mainly of contact with the most distasteful aspects of human malaise.

Flaubert describes in detail Emma’s background and education, for the fact that her outlook has been conditioned by reading novels is important in understanding her subsequent disappointments in life. She has high expectations of marriage and looks to it to fulfill all her dreams and ideals. When reality does not live up to these hopes, she is quickly dissatisfied. She imagines that satisfaction can be found in motherhood, romantic affairs, religion, material possessions, and any number of other fads that temporarily inspire her enthusiasm, but she is disappointed every time. At the end of the novel, when she despairs of finding happiness and realizes that she has ruined her family’s life through the debts she has incurred, she poisons herself with arsenic, turning her disillusionment inward in a self-destructive gesture of defeat.

Critics have disagreed over how Emma’s character should be interpreted. According to some, her idealism is seen as destructive and unrealistic, an example of the negative forces unleashed by romantic and indulgent imagination or, more reductively, as the folly of a materialistic and acquisitive woman who brings about the downfall of her family through her unbounded and selfish desires. A more sympathetic reading has also emerged based on a different understanding of the role of gender in the novel, a reading that sees Emma less as a silly woman, and more as a character in search of a deeper meaning to life but trapped by circumstances. These differences of interpretation are highlighted by different interpretations of the title of the work, which stresses that the heroine is not Emma, but Madame. Does the title, symbolizing Emma’s married, public identity, call attention to what she betrays, or to the situation that entraps her?

A SENTIMENTAL EDUCATION

First published: L'Éducation sentimentale, 1869; (English translation, 1898)

Type of work: Novel

The idealistic young Frédéric Moreau falls in love with an inaccessible woman and, over the course of a lifetime, gradually loses his ideals.

A Sentimental Education, Flaubert's third novel, furthered the author's reputation for realism through its depiction of the recent past, specifically the events of 1848. The novel also had another realistic twist in its autobiographical underpinnings: The basis for Frédéric's infatuation with Madame Arnoux is Flaubert's idealization of Madame Maurice Schlésinger (Elisa Foucault), whom he had met while on vacation at Trouville, when he was only fourteen. Madame Schlésinger, the wife of a music editor and then twenty-six years old, became for Flaubert the model of an ideal but distant woman.

A Sentimental Education follows its hero Frédéric Moreau over a period of many years, from his youth and its romantic aspirations through a series of lessons in life in which Frédéric is exposed to the decidedly unromantic side of a number of lifestyles. Political idealism, brotherhood, high society, finance, and the art world are all demystified as Frédéric learns more about each segment of society. Gradually, his ideals are eroded, leaving him only with disillusionment. When he gets together with his old childhood friend, Deslauriers, at the end of the novel, they relive their schoolboy days, including one incident in particular when they went to a brothel. In the closing words of the novel, the two men decide that these were the best times they had ever had. The nostalgia for their lost youth and innocence is poignant, yet at the same time the reader is left wondering. If a botched visit to a brothel is the highlight of their youth and the best that they remember, this fact alone speaks volumes about the many disappointments their lives contain.

A constant theme weaving together Frédéric's lessons in life is his love for Madame Arnoux. He meets her for the first time by chance when she is a fellow traveler on the ferry he is taking home to Nogent, and it is love at first sight for him. He is only eighteen years old at the time, but this idealized love quickly becomes the dominant passion of his life. Frédéric befriends the expansive and genial Monsieur Arnoux, Marie's husband, and becomes more deeply involved in his fortunes than he (Frédéric) would otherwise prefer, all in an attempt to retain his proximity to Arnoux's wife. Frédéric loans money and becomes implicated in Arnoux's affairs with mistresses, all to retain some contact with the family. Each time he resolves to take action, a twist of events thwarts him at the last minute (or are these merely pretexts to disguise his own ambivalence?), and Flaubert's talents are fully deployed in creating dramatic irony that constantly defers resolution of the plot.

The most significant example of this irony comes when Frédéric finally has a chance to consummate his relationship with Madame Arnoux. They arrange a rendezvous, for which Frédéric even arrives early, but his anticipation gradually turns to disappointment as he waits and waits. Finally, after five hours, he leaves. This disappointment precipitates Frédéric's next action, for he goes to see Arnoux's mistress Rosanette in order to get his revenge. Thus, by the time he learns the real reason for Madame Arnoux's failure to appear (her child had fallen ill), he had already judged the situation and engaged himself in another course of action (with Rosanette).

While preserving his ideal love, unconsummated, for Madame Arnoux, Frédéric enters a number of liaisons with other women that highlight in various ways the primary relationship. The relationship with Rosanette, for example, serves to contrast carnal love with the ideal and spiritual qualities with which Frédéric endows his love for Madame Arnoux. Similarly, his relationship with Louise underscores the role of inaccessibility in the development of the plot. Louise is ultimately uninteresting to Frédéric because she is accessible, and this paradox (wanting only what one cannot have) provides the key to understanding the failure of Frédéric's relationship with Madame Arnoux: The moment that he thinks that she has finally become accessible to him is the moment that he starts looking elsewhere.

Frédéric Moreau is a male counterpart to Emma Bovary (indeed, the poet Charles Baudelaire once remarked that Emma Bovary had a man's soul in a woman's body), both characters trying to break out of the human condition of frustrated desire. Superficially, both characters can be read as weak and misguided individuals who suffer from the illusion that the grass is always greener somewhere else. Yet Flaubert treats this theme with indulgence for his characters' weakness and suggests that their dissatisfactions also possess a metaphysical dimension.

THREE TALES

First published: Trois Contes, 1877 (English translation, 1903)

Type of work: Short stories

The life story of an obscure country servant is followed by the medieval story of Saint Julian and complemented by a reworking of the biblical story of Herodias.

Three Tales consists of three short stories: "Un Cœur simple" ("A Simple Heart"), "La Légende de Saint Julien l'Hospitalier" ("The Legend of St. Julian, Hospitalier"), and "Hérodias" ("Herodias"). Taken together, these three stories reflect Flaubert's thematic concerns and artistic style. "A Simple Heart" tells the story of Félicité, a simple-minded and religious family servant. Set in contemporary, provincial France, this short story became an exercise in realism and narrative style. "The Legend of St. Julian, Hospitalier" reactivates Flaubert's interest in historical settings and the lives of saints (with a fantastic twist), while "Herodias" shares some of these features (the historical setting) while also incorporating the themes of exoticism and the femme fatale, a theme frequently explored by nineteenth century writers through the story of Salomé, which enjoyed a particular vogue in literature and painting at the turn of the century. Despite these different settings and themes, the three stories present a certain unity through recurrent motifs and patterns.

Stylistically, these stories reveal Flaubert's mature writing skills, and the minimal use of dialogue gives Flaubert ample room to develop his narrative techniques. Félicité, whose name ironically means "felicity" or "happiness," is shown through a third-person narrator whose voice blends imperceptibly into a more articulate version of her own inner voice. It is the story of an obscure and overlooked life, told in five carefully structured parts. Félicité lives vicariously through the children of her mistress Madame Aubain, through a nephew, and finally even through a parrot. Just when she seems most unwanted herself, she adopts an unwanted parrot, Loulou, who becomes her companion. When the parrot dies, she has it stuffed, and at the moment of her own death she confuses the sight of Loulou with a vision of the Holy Ghost descending from heaven.

Flaubert stated that his intentions in "A Simple Heart" were not to be ironic but to evoke pity. He relied heavily on autobiographical details for the background materials and even brought home a stuffed parrot that he kept on his desk as inspiration during the writing of the story. It was not pity for himself he wished to evoke, even though his recent financial ruin was still a source of pain. Instead, he was responding to a challenge from the novelist George Sand, who had reproached him for being unable to depict simple goodness. Sand died before she was able to see her challenge bear fruit in this story.

This rather muted story stands in contrast to the two historical panels of this triptych, a structure echoing the alternation in Flaubert's work between contemporary and exotic works. In the companion panels, the reader finds the story of Saint Julian, which invokes the bright colors of a gothic stained-glass window, and the equally colorful, but more barbaric, story of Herodias, also with a saintly figure, that of John the Baptist.

The story of Saint Julian focuses on the fulfillment of three predictions. Julian's birth is accompanied by two divine prophecies. The first, that he will be a saint, is delivered to his mother, while the second, predicting military glory, is told to his father. Julian himself receives a third, and more troubling, prophecy. The young Julian is an avid hunter, but when one of his targets, a stag, addresses him in a human voice to tell him he (Julian) will kill his parents, he leaves home to avoid his fate.

The second part of the story sees Julian fulfilling the prophecy of military glory, where he continues to indulge his bloodlust. Like his more familiar counterpart Oedipus, Julian nevertheless cannot escape his destiny, and the narrative leads the reader to the inexorable fulfillment of the stag's curse. Leaving his palace one night to hunt, Julian returns to find two people in his bed. Supposing them to be his wife and a lover, he kills them in a rage, only to discover that the couple was his own parents, on a pilgrimage, to whom his wife had given up the bed.

To complete the cycle of prophecies, the third segment takes up the prediction of sainthood. Julian has become an outcast to atone for his sins and lives a poor and hermitlike existence. One night, during a storm, a leper asks to be ferried across the river. Julian complies and also grants the leper's requests for food and shelter. The leper eventually requests that Julian warm him with his own body, and when Julian does this, the leper is miraculously transformed into Jesus, who transports Julian with him to heaven.

Here, Flaubert does not focus on the inner thoughts and perceptions of characters, choosing instead to present them like the naïve characters of the cathedral window that inspired them and to show the workings of tragedy. Julian is a tragic character, doomed by his own love of pointless killing but redeemed by charity and humility. The twin themes of fate and faith link all three stories in this series.

The final panel of the triptych is also similar to the story of Saint Julian by also being depicted on Rouen cathedral, in Flaubert's hometown, though this time in the form of a stone carving rather than a stained-glass window. "Herodias" throws the reader into the midst of the narrative at a crucial time, precisely when the actors in a tragic drama can yet intervene to change the course of events. In the opening scene of "Herodias," Herod Antipas is up before dawn, agitated, contemplating the need for decision and action. The timing of the action, which occupies twenty-four hours, from dawn to dawn, gives the story a classical form. Herod must decide how best to use his prisoner John the Baptist (Iaokanann) in his quest to control Jerusalem.

Herod's situation is precarious. He is planning to celebrate his birthday, and a number of powerful Romans have been invited to attend, but at the same time he is being attacked by the king of the Arabs. Once again, prophecy has a role to play, for it has been predicted that someone important will die in the citadel that day. Herod's problem is that there are so many important people around, it is not clear who the victim will be. The irony is that Iaokanann is not on his list of possibilities, since he fails to consider him important.

A Roman inspection of the citadel is the pretext for a lavish description of the visiting dignitaries, the fortress, and of Iaokanann himself, setting the tone of intrigue and excitement that dominates. The description, reminiscent of Flaubert's earlier novel Salammô, continues with the evening feast, which also serves to illustrate the clash of cultures and to air the growing rumors concerning Iaokanann's role in a new religious movement.

The climax of the evening is Salomé's dance. Salomé is the puppet of her scheming mother Herodias, who uses her daughter's seductive charm to manipulate the powerful men around her. Flaubert maintained that the interest of "Herodias" lay not in the religious theme but in the figure of Herodias as a kind of Cleopatra figure, that is, a study in power and seduction. Herod is particularly smitten by Salomé because of her resemblance to Herodias (Salomé is her daughter by an earlier marriage) and offers her any reward she chooses. Salomé asks for the head of Iaokanann, which is brought to her on a platter.

SUMMARY

Gustave Flaubert's reputation as a master of prose fiction is based on a number of long novels, as well as some shorter fiction, that sustain the quality of his best moments.

His style, innovative in its use of an ambiguous narrative voice and the result of much care and labor, has contributed to his standing as a major writer. His psychological insight, and, more recently, an appreciation of his experiments in the control of narrative perspective make him one of the first modern novelists and one of the greatest of all time.

Melanie Hawthorne

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- La Première Éducation sentimentale*, wr. 1843-1845, pb. 1963 (The First Sentimental Education, 1972)
Madame Bovary, 1857 (English translation, 1886)
Salammbo, 1862 (English translation, 1886)
L'Éducation sentimentale, 1869 (A Sentimental Education, 1898)
La Tentation de Saint Antoine, 1874 (The Temptation of Saint Anthony, 1895)
Bouvard et Pécuchet, 1881 (Bouvard and Pécuchet, 1896)

SHORT FICTION:

- Novembre*, wr. c. 1840, pb. 1885 (November, 1932)
Trois Contes, 1877 (Three Tales, 1903)

DRAMA:

- Le Château des cœurs*, wr. 1863, pr. 1874 (with Louis Bouilhet; The Castle of Hearts, 1904)
Le Candidat, pr., pb. 1874 (The Candidate, 1904)

NONFICTION:

- Par les champs et par les grèves*, 1885 (with Maxime Du Camp; Over Strand and Field, 1904)
Correspondance, 1830-1880, 1887-1893
Notes de voyage, 1910
Dictionnaire des idées reçues, 1910, 1913 (Dictionary of Accepted Ideas, 1954)
The Letters of Gustave Flaubert, 1980-1982 (2 volumes; Francis Steegmuller, editor)
Correspondance, 1981 (Alphonse Jacobs, editor; Flaubert-Sand: The Correspondence of Gustave Flaubert and George Sand, 1993)
Gustave Flaubert-Alfred Le Poittevin, Gustave-Flaubert-Maxime Du Camp: Correspondances, 2000 (Yvan Leclerc, editor)

MISCELLANEOUS:

- The Complete Works*, 1904 (10 volumes)
Œuvres complètes, 1910-1933 (22 volumes)

About the Author

- Brombert, Victor. The Novels of Flaubert: A Study of Themes and Techniques. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1966.
 Brown, Frederick. Flaubert: A Biography. Boston: Little, Brown, 2006.
 Culler, Jonathan. Flaubert: The Uses of Uncertainty. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1974.
 Giraud, Raymond Dorner, ed. Flaubert: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1964.
 Haig, Stirling. Flaubert and the Gift of Speech: Dialogue and Discourse in Four "Modern" Novels. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1986.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Is Gustave Flaubert's subtle narrative style in effect a tribute to the capacities of his reader?
- What does Madame Bovary gain from its introductory chapter on an episode in the school life of Emma's future husband?
- What interpretation would you offer for the use of the word "Madame" in the title of the novel about Emma Bovary?
- If Frédéric Moreau of A Sentimental Education is a male counterpart to Emma Bovary, is he, as a man with a better chance to control his circumstances, therefore less susceptible to sympathetic interpretation?
- What qualities are most necessary in a translator of Flaubert?
- How does the mentality that could compose a work called Dictionary of Accepted Ideas reveal itself in Flaubert's fiction?

- La Capra, Dominick. "Madame Bovary" on Trial. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1982.
- Lloyd, Rosemary. Madame Bovary. Boston: Unwin Hyman, 1990.
- Reed, Arden. Manet, Flaubert, and the Emergence of Modernism: Blurring Gender Boundaries. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Sherrington, R. Three Novels by Flaubert: A Study of Techniques. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1970.
- Starkie, Enid. Flaubert: The Making of the Master. New York: Atheneum, 1967.
- Tipper, Paul Andrew. Flower Poetics in the Works of Gustave Flaubert. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.
- Williams, Tony, and Mary Orr, eds. New Approaches in Flaubert Studies. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1999.

DARIO FO

Born: San Giano, Italy
March 24, 1926

Fo is an internationally acclaimed political playwright whose widely performed plays utilize characteristics of traditional Italian theater to treat topical issues satirically.

BIOGRAPHY

Dario Fo was born in a small Italian town near Lake Maggiore, near the Swiss border. His father, a railway worker, found time to act in an amateur theater company. His mother authored a book of regional reminiscences. The eldest of three children, Dario had a brother who became a theater administrator and a sister who wrote books about the family's wartime experiences.

The northern region where Fo lived had a strong tradition of popular antiauthoritarian narrative, maintained by traveling storytellers who told stories about fantastic adventures to local fishermen and to peasant farmers. Fo listened to these stories and picked up a substantial repertoire for his own use.

Following an abortive army stint, Fo studied architecture in Milan but dropped out to become a performer. His career began in revues, escapist entertainment of postwar Italy. He proved to be a gifted comic, mime, and stage designer. Fo had built a reputation with his monologues over Italian national radio as Poer Nano, a poor simpleton who confuses biblical and secular stories so that, for example, Cain is the victim of a priggish Abel. Fo also performed Poer Nano on stage, fleshing out his satirical gifts and championing the underdog. In 1954, he married Franca Rame, a talented Milanese actress from a popular touring theater family. Together they embarked on a successful series of productions.

Without being a Communist Party member, Fo held leftist political perspectives and attacked concepts he felt were inspired by fascism and preserved by the Christian Democrats, the ruling right-wing party. Despite frequent police visits to his satirical performances, Fo grew in stature as a performer and skillful storyteller. In the 1950's, Fo had a three-year film career designing and acting, but he returned to the stage in Milan. He and his wife together founded Compagnia Dario Fo-Franca Rame, producing farces and boulevard comedies, with several works subsequently receiving English and American productions.

In 1959, the company opened Milan's Odeon Theater season with a six-play series. The first, Gli arcangeli non giocano a flipper (pr. 1959, pb. 1966; Archangels Don't Play Pinball, 1987) was written, directed, and designed by Fo, and it ridiculed government bureaucracy. His success in the conventional theater was confirmed by pieces fusing comedy, music, farcical plots, and social references. In a period seething with unrest, authorities threatened to ban performances, but the Fos, having earned success in the theater, were securely established as performers.

Fo presented some of his one-act farces on Italian television. He appeared on a popular show, presenting satirical sketches and songs, which caused immediate censorship problems. A conflict with producers ended in Fo's walking out of the studio.

Leaving the mainstream theater, Fo in 1968 created the Associazione Nuova Scena, a leftist collective that dispensed with traditional stage company organization and set itself up as a private club. Offering revue-length sketches satirizing the communists as well as establishment institutions, the company played in working-class areas. From this period came Fo's internationally popular one-person show called Mistero buffo: Giullarata popolare (pr. 1969, pb. 1970; Mistero Buffo: Comic Mysteries, 1983), which uses gospel and secular stories to exemplify the common person's struggle. The company had a brief life, torn apart not only by internal arguments but also by difficulties with the initially supportive Communist Party, which had become annoyed by the fun Fo made of it. When Nuova Scena terminated in 1970, Fo and his wife broke with communist cultural organizations and formed another theater, headquartered in Milan and dedicated to examining sociopolitical issues. An important play presented there was his now internationally known Morte accidentale di un anarchico (pr., pb. 1970; Accidental Death of an Anarchist, 1979), which satirizes police injustice. During the early 1970's, Fo's plays dealt with political issues of the time. The new, Milan-based La Comune theater group toured plays to local audiences and performed at workers' demonstrations. This politically oriented activity was harshly judged by the conservative forces in power. Franca Rame suffered kidnapping and rape by fascists. Fo was arrested for barring police from performances. In 1975, Fo's theater ejected him from the organization, claiming that his star status was not in keeping with the company's political aims.

In the late 1970's and 1980's, Fo returned to television. His plays have been produced in Europe, England, and America, including Accidental Death of an Anarchist in New York City. For political reasons, Fo was denied a visa to enter the United States until 1985. Dario Fo and Franca Rame have continued to enjoy international exposure and recognition through their works for the political theater.

Fo was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1997. In announcing the award, the judges described Fo as a writer "who emulates the jesters of the Middle Ages in scourging authority and upholding the dignity of the downtrodden."

ANALYSIS

Dario Fo and Franca Rame consider theater to be an intervention. Fo's leftist perspective was shaped by his sympathy with the wartime resistance to the Fascists, and after World War II he continued to oppose Italy's right-wing politicians. By the 1950's, Fo had so stung his targets in the government and religious bureaucracies that he drew fire from them. Finding a political affinity with the work of Marxist playwright Bertolt Brecht, Fo was influenced by Brecht's epic theater techniques and later employed them in his own work. Wedded to his political perspective is Fo's experienced skill as comic actor and mime, trained in revues employing a format of short satirical, farcical sketches. These factors, plus his love of commedia dell'arte characters, with their different regional dialects, are reflected in his work. An early example is Il dito nell'occhio (pr. 1953; finger in the eye). Cowritten with Franco Parenti and Giustino Durano, the play is a cabaret-style revue composed of twenty-one short sketches interspersed with music. It satirizes the social mores and the traditional values of the Italian middle class. This mixture of mime, spectacle, and social comment was successful with audiences but roused the authorities to police performances.

Fo's first play at Milan's Odeon theater was Archangels Don't Play Pinball, an accomplished farce combining political content with Brechtian epic theater. In the play, government bureaucracy and other aspects of Italian society are ridiculed. The protagonist discovers he has been mistakenly registered as a dog and is sent to a kennel. The play attracted productions abroad, as well as censorship. Other pieces followed, also fusing comedy, music, farcical plot, and social comment. It was common for the authorities to threaten to ban performances. Beginning in 1960, Fo presented short farces, satirical sketches, and songs on national television criticizing such sensitive issues as, for example, working conditions in factories, which caused official censure and his departure from television.

Returning to mainstream, establishment theater, Fo used material from the Middle Ages to evaluate the present from a historical perspective. His Isabella, tre caravelle è un cacciaballe (pr., pb. 1963; Isabella, three sailing ships, and a con man) debunks the romanticized, storybook Columbus. Another play presents Adam and Eve as the only human survivors, along with a corrupt general, of a vast cataclysm, after which cats take over the world. Settimo: Ruba un po' meno (pr., pb. 1964; seventh commandment: thou shalt steal a bit less) is a bitter, farcical comedy about real estate speculation supported by official corruption. Historical farce is the basis for La colpa è sempre del diavolo (pr., pb. 1965; always blame the devil), which is set in an imaginary period of the Middle Ages that resembles 1965 and that exposes superstitions and clerical oppression of the poor. La signora è da buttare (pr., pb. 1967; the lady is discardable), produced during the Vietnam War, uses a revue-sketch format and circus setting to indict America as an imperialistic, capitalist society. Threatened with arrest, Fo ceased productions for the mainstream, bourgeois theater.

In 1968, Fo created Nuova Scena, a company allied to the Italian Communist Party, which toured the country performing for working-class and popular audiences in nontraditional locations such as factories and market squares. The company's first play was an allegorical puppet play using marionettes and mechanical figures to represent social forces like capitalism, the middle class, and royalty. It used revue-length sketches to satirize the Church, monarchy, the army, and industrialism. Its central theme was the historical struggle between the middle class and the working class. Another representative play was Fo's one-man show Mistero Buffo: Comic Mysteries, for which he drew on apocryphal gospel stories, secular tales, and the counterculture of the Middle Ages. He uses a language composed of partially invented and archaic tongues, drawn partially from the dialects of northern Italy. The playwright played all the roles, in the tradition of both the guillare, traveling comic/singer/mime of the Middle Ages, and the clown of the commedia dell'arte.

After internal disputes and the Communist Party's withdrawal of support ended Fo's connection with Nuova Scena in 1970, he created an independent political theater group called La Comune, dedicated to examining sociopolitical issues, for which he wrote several major works. The first play this group presented was his Accidental Death of an Anarchist, which was based on an actual case. The satirical farce deals with the tension between a murder by the police and the ridiculous explanations of the officials trying to cover it up. Other works in the 1970's utilize such themes as police brutality, the treatment of political prisoners, the Palestine struggle, and the like. Non si paga! Non si paga! (pr., pb. 1974; We Can't Pay! We Won't Pay!, 1978) treats the subject of civil disobedience in a story of a shop steward's wife who raids a supermarket to protest rising prices and incurs her husband's disapproval. Clacson, trombette e pernacchi (pr. 1981; Trumpets and Raspberries, 1981, also as About Face, 1983), also espousing a political cause, is based on the actual terrorist kidnapping and murder of an Italian politician whose colleagues of the Christian Democrat Party refused to negotiate with his captors and thus ensured his execution. The play farcically mocks political cynicism and the overzealousness of police, who see terrorists everywhere. It tells of a falsely accused proletarian rescuer of a kidnapped executive whose identity becomes confused with that of the victim.

In the late 1970's, Fo withdrew from La Comune. He continued to write and act in plays. That Fo's work had not lost its power to upset the authorities was demonstrated in 1987 by a piece introduced on Italian television. The work featured remarks about the Church that drew protest.

Dario Fo, with his wife Franca Rame, has continued to enjoy international exposure and recognition as an actor, mime, and dramatist. He is a master political satirist and farceur. His work is noted as a vehicle for sociopolitical protest in the context of comic theater.

MISTERO BUFFO: COMIC MYSTERIES

First produced: Mistero buffo: Giullarata popolare, 1969 (first published, 1970; English translation 1983)

Type of work: Play

Apocryphal gospel and secular stories are satirized to accent common people's struggles against capitalistic and ecclesiastic oppression.

Mistero Buffo: Comic Mysteries stands as Fo's most important one-person play. The playwright drew on religious and secular stories, and he played all the roles in the tradition of a medieval jongleur who presents the underdog's disrespect for authority. For many characters Fo created a language culled from northern Italian dialects. Mixing the sacred and the burlesque, the episodes subvert accepted wisdom and challenge entrenched authority. Among the play's twelve episodes is a key text, "The Birth of the Jongleur," in which the jongleur figure is a serf whose land is taken from him, and whose family is destroyed through the tyranny of a feudal lord aided by the Church. The despairing peasant is saved from suicide by the appearance of an antiestablishment Christ, disguised as a stranger, who endows him with hope and the eloquence to spread the message to the oppressed underling to oppose the rich and powerful. His mission is political—to be the articulate spokesman for the exploited. The theme is repeated in a companion piece, “The Birth of the Villeyn,” as the master of a serf born from an ass’s rectum is advised by an angel to treat him harshly since he has no soul, thus predicting the underling’s sad future.

Other gospel stories bear similar approaches and themes. The title characters of “The Morality Play of the Blind Man and the Cripple,” meeting Christ en route to Calvary, attempt to flee to avoid his miraculously curing their afflictions and thus restoring them to a master’s subjugation. A miracle is demythicized in “The Wedding Feast at Cana” by a bibulous peasant who describes the event as a drunken party, and in “The Resurrection of Lazarus,” as peasants describe a fairground spectacle with graphic references to the smell and sight of Lazarus’s decomposing, worm-ridden body. “Boniface VIII” illustrates the capacity of a vain, supercilious pope to oscillate between arrogance and humility when confronted by Christ carrying the cross.

The play contains four texts about the Passion, two of which display the irreverence of the common-man jongleur toward sacred events. As the Fool in “Death of the Fool,” the jongleur plays cards at the inn housing the Last Supper, distracting and seducing Death, who is embodied as a grieving virgin who has come to take Christ away, but is diverted from her purpose. The same figure in “The Fool Beneath the Cross” wins Christ’s body on the cross only to have the body reject him. In two other “Passion Plays,” the Madonna overcomes her grief at the Crucifixion through angry political awareness.

Satirization of sacred subjects often is the result of a purposeful focus on the common-man figure who is painfully aware of his sorry lot. In Mistero Buffo’s mixture of narrative and dialogue, Fo creates a bounteous expression of his social views.

ACCIDENTAL DEATH OF AN ANARCHIST

First produced: Morte accidentale di un anarchico, 1970 (first published, 1970; English translation, 1979)

Type of work: Play

In this satirical farce, a madman of many disguises exposes the ridiculous lies covering up a police murder.

Internationally popular, Accidental Death of an Anarchist is based on a 1969 incident in which an anarchist railway worker, arrested in connection with a terrorist bombing in Milan, fell to his death from a fourth-story window at police headquarters during the course of an interrogation. His death was officially declared a suicide. The police report held blatant contradictions. Subsequent investigation revealed the probable innocence of the worker. Fo set out to demolish the official story through the play’s production at his collective, La Commune.

Fo created one of his most successful roles for this play, that of a maniac who infiltrates the Milan police headquarters and carries out a number of impersonations in order to force the police to admit the illogic of the worker’s alleged leap from a window and to confess their culpability. The Maniac resembles the Zanni figure of the commedia dell’arte.

Called “a grotesque farce” by its author, the play’s dramatic action takes the form of a mock investigation carried out by a make-believe judicial examiner. A madman impostor (the Maniac), summoned to police headquarters to answer to charges of false identity, luckily happens to steal the file on the anarchist’s death. He then changes his identity, posing as an investigating judge, purportedly to ascertain that the police have constructed a solid case which can be upheld by the magistrates. In the course of the interrogation of the officers, the Maniac is forced to assume numerous disguises. He exposes the blatant contradictions and lies of the police, who admit their guilt, whereupon the Maniac invents for them another outrageous story about the anarchist’s fall. The arrival of a journalist and police who recognize him forces the Maniac’s disclosure and his threat that he has taped their confession and plans to blow them all up to destroy the capitalist police state. One confused policeman handcuffs his superiors to the wall. In a Brechtian-like conclusion, the Maniac confronts the journalist—and the audience—with a choice of alternate endings: to free the police, which will result in the impostor's death and perpetuate police duplicity, to allow the Maniac to escape with evidence of police duplicity, or to allow the Maniac to escape with evidence of police guilt.

Fo's purpose throughout is to arouse the audience's indignation at police authoritarianism. The play's farcical action and zaniness counterpoint the serious indictment being made. Moreover, the play's use of a historical event demonstrates the directness of Fo's left-wing politics. The play has been performed in more than forty countries, including the United Kingdom and the United States.

ARCHANGELS DON'T PLAY PINBALL

First produced: Gli arcangeli non giocano a flipper, 1959 (first published, 1966; English translation, 1987)

Type of work: Play

A man mistakenly registered as a dog struggles against a mindless government bureaucracy to restore his identity.

Archangels Don't Play Pinball was the first of a series of six plays that Fo produced with his wife at Milan's Teatro Odeon, the equivalent of a Broadway or West End theater. A three-act farce with music, based on a short story by Italian writer Augusto Frassinetti, it is one of Fo's most accomplished farces and his first play to be performed outside Italy. It has been performed many times since and has brought its playwright international recognition.

Structurally, Archangels Don't Play Pinball is a fast-moving farce, with bedroom mix-ups and officious officialdom, similar to those crafted by such French farceurs as Georges Feydeau and Eugene Labiche. The intervention of the archangels at the play's end parallels the deus ex machina of classic Greek theater as well as Brecht's use of gods in Der gute Mensch von Sezuan (wr. 1938-1940, pr. 1943, pb. 1953; The Good Woman of Setzuan, 1948). It is Fo's first play to combine political-satirical content with a Brechtian form, abandoning the revue-sketch and short farce format for a consistent plotline and character development. In the traveling company tradition of doubling roles, ten of the play's twelve characters play several parts. The device becomes a source of farcical complication as the protagonist recognizes the players in their new identities.

The play is set in Milan's industrial outskirts and introduces a gang of loutish youths given to conning tricks, who have made the hero, Lofty, the fall guy for their jokes. For example, they pay a harlot (Blondie) to set up a fake marriage with Lofty. When Lofty tries claiming a disability pension, he finds himself registered as a dog and must submit to being sent to a kennel. From there the story follows his struggles to clarify his identity and to defend himself against a series of mindless bureaucrats—from dog-catchers to a government minister. He encounters them in a number of farcical episodes in different locales. With his innocent, literal interpretation of situations, Lofty reveals them in all their absurdity. Ultimately, Lofty wakes up in a house in the red-light district, where he has suffered a fall and unconsciousness. He realizes that he has been dreaming. He is delighted to find himself mock-married to Blondie, and they subsequently find happiness in each other.

Fo's satirization of government bureaucracy caused the play to be censored. The exposure of the failings of the conservative government was not lost on Italian audiences of the 1950's. By his own admission, Fo, dealing at the time with a middle-class audience, had to make social and political truths palatable by serving them in a sauce of farcical satire.

SUMMARY

Dario Fo has become an internationally acclaimed political playwright whose work has won popular success and critical praise for its content, its skilled improvisatory and comedic techniques, and its satirical perspective. With his wife and collaborator, Franca Rame, Fo has been active in the Italian and European theater for more than thirty years, performing in many countries to many groups. His work came to the wide attention of English-speaking audiences only in the 1980's. Fo's life and work evince his belief that the theater can be an instrument of political illumination as well as entertainment.

Christian H. Moe

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does Dario Fo's work owe to the com-media dell'arte?
- What is traditional and what is antagonistic to conventional religious themes in Mistero Buffo: Comic Mysteries?
- Consider the suitability of the protagonist of Accidental Death of an Anarchist being a "maniac."
- Explain why farce is an appropriate dramatic form in Archangels Don't Play Pinball.
- Explain the force of improvisation in Fo's plays.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- Poer nano*, pr. 1951 (radio play), pr. 1952 (staged)
Il dito nell'occhio, pr. 1953 (with Franco Parenti and Giustino Durano)
I sani da legare, pr. 1954 (with Parenti and Durano)
Ladri, manichini, e donne nude, pr. 1958, pb. 1962 (includes L'uomo nudo e l'uomo in frack [One Was Nude and the Other Wore Tails, 1985], I cadaveri si spediscono le donne si spogliano, Gli imbianchini non hanno ricordi, and Non tutti i ladri vegono per nuocere [The Virtuous Burglars, 1992])
Comica finale, pr. 1959, pb. 1962 (includes Quando sarai povero sarai re, La Marcolfa, Un morto da vendere, and I tre bravi)
Gli arcangeli non giocano a flipper, pr. 1959, pb. 1966 (Archangels Don't Play Pinball, 1987)
Aveva due pistole con gli occhi bianchi e neri, pr., pb. 1960
Chi ruba un piede è fortunato in amore, pr., pb. 1961
Isabella, tre caravelle e un cacciaballe, pr., pb. 1963
Settimo: Ruba un po' meno, pr., pb. 1964
La colpa è sempre del diavolo, pr., pb. 1965
La signora è da buttare, pr., pb. 1967
Grande pantomima con bandiere e pupazzi piccoli e medi, pr. 1968, pb. 1975
La fine del mondo, pr. 1969
L'operaio conosce trecento parole, il padrone mille: Per questo lui è il padrone, pr. 1969, pb. 1970 (The Worker Knows Three Hundred Words, the Boss Knows a Thousand: That's Why He's the Boss, 1983)
Mistero buffo: Giullarata popolare, pr. 1969, pb. 1970 (Mistero Buffo: Comic Mysteries, 1983)
Legami pure che tanto spacco tutto lo stesso, pr. 1969, pb. 1975 (includes Il telaio and Il funerale del padrone)
Vorrei morire anche stasera se dovessi pensare che non è servito a niente, pr., pb. 1970
Morte accidentale di un anarchico, pr., pb. 1970 (Accidental Death of an Anarchist, 1979)
Tutti uniti! Tutti insieme! Ma scusa, quello non è il padrone?, pr., pb. 1971

- Fedayn*, pr., pb. 1972
Oridine per DIO.000.000!, pr., pb. 1972
Pum, pum! Chi è? La Polizia!, pb. 1972, pr. 1973
Guerra di popolo in Cile, pr., pb. 1973
Non si paga! Non si paga!, pr., pb. 1974 (We Can't Pay! We Won't Pay!, 1978)
Le commedie di Dario Fo, pb. 1974-1998 (13 volumes)
Il Fanfani rapito, pr., pb. 1975
La giullarata, pb. 1975, pr. 1976
La marijuana della mama è la più bella, pr., pb. 1976
Parliamo di donne, pr. 1977 (with Franca Rame; televised)
Tutta casa, letto e chiesa, pr., pb. 1978 (with Rame; adapted as Female Parts, 1981; also as Orgasmo Adulto Escapes from the Zoo)
La storia di un soldato, pr. 1978, pb. 1979 (libretto by C. F. Ramuz; adaptation of Igor Stravinsky's opera The Soldier's Tale)
La storia della tigre, pr. 1978, pb. 1980 (The Tale of a Tiger, 1984)
La tragedia di Aldo Moro, pr. 1979
L'opera dello sghignazzo, pr. 1981 (music by Kurt Weill; adaptation of Bertolt Brecht's play The Threepenny Opera and John Gay's play The Beggar's Opera)
Clacson, trombette e pernacchi, pr. 1981 (Trumpets and Raspberries, 1981; also as About Face, 1983)
Patapumfete, pr., pb. 1982
Il fabulazzo osceno, pr., pb. 1982
Coppia aperta, quasi spalancata, pr. 1983 (with Rame; An Open Couple—Very Open, 1985)
Elisabetta: Quasi per caso una donna, pr. 1984 (Almost by Chance a Woman, Elizabeth, 1987)
Dio li fa e poi li accoppa, pb. 1986
Hellequin, Arlekin, Arlecchino, pr. 1986
Il ratto della Francesca, pr., pb. 1986
Parti femminili, pr. 1987 (with Rame; includes revised version of Coppia aperta [An Open Couple, 1990] and Una giornata qualunque [An Ordinary Day, 1990])
Papa e la strega, pr. 1989, pb. 1994 (The Pope and the Witch, 1992)
Zitti! Stiamo precipitando!, pr. 1990, pb. 1998
Johan Padan a la scoperta de le Americhe, pb. 1992, pr. 1998 (Johan Padan and the Discovery of the Americas, 2001)
Plays, pb. 1992-1994 (2 volumes)
Dario Fo incontra Ruzzante, pr. 1993 (revised pr. 1995 as Dario Fo recita Ruzzante)
Mamma! I Sanculotti!, pr. 1993, pb. 1998
Sesso? Grazie, tanto per gradire, pr. 1994, pb. 1998 (with Rame)
Il diavolo con le zinne, pr. 1997, pb. 1998 (The Devil in Drag, 1999)
We Won't Pay! We Won't Pay!, and Other Plays, pb. 2001

SCREENPLAY:

Lo Svitato, 1956

POETRY:

Ballate e canzoni, 1974

NONFICTION:

Manuale minimo dell'attore, 1987 (The Tricks of the Trade, 1991)

Il paese dei Mezàrat: I miei primi sette anni (e qualcuno in più), 2002 (My First Seven Years (Plus a Few More), 2006)

About the Author

Behan, Tom. Dario Fo: Revolutionary Theater. London: Pluto Press, 2000.

Cairns, Christopher, ed. The Commedia dell'Arte from the Renaissance to Dario Fo. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1989.

Cowan, Suzanne, comp. "Dario Fo: Bibliography, Biography, Playography." London: Theatre Quarterly, 1978.

Farrell, Joseph. Dario Fo and Franca Rame: Harlequins of the Revolution. London: Methuen, 2001.

Farrell, Joseph, and Antonio Scuderi, eds. Dario Fo: Stage, Text, and Tradition. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.

Jenkins, Ron. Dario Fo and Franca Rame: Artful Laughter. New York: Aperture, 2001.

Mitchell, Tony. Dario Fo: People's Court Jester. 2d rev. ed. London: Methuen, 1986.

Schechter, Joel. "Dario Fo's Obscene Fables." Theatre 14 (Winter, 1982): 87-90.

Taviano, Stefania. Staging Dario Fo and Franca Rame: Anglo-American Approaches to Political Theatre. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2005.

Archive Photos

FORD MADOX FORD

Born: Merton, England
December 17, 1873

Died: Deauville, France
June 26, 1939

One of the most productive writers of the modernist period, Ford was a stylistic innovator, an invaluable editor and collaborator, and a great novelist.

BIOGRAPHY

Ford Madox Ford was born Ford Hermann Hueffer in Merton, Surrey, a suburb of London, England, on December 17, 1873, the eldest son of Francis Hueffer, a musicologist and critic, and Catherine Brown Hueffer, daughter of the renowned painter Ford Madox Brown. He was given the upbringing appropriate to the scion of an artistic family; lessons in languages, in music, and in painting preceded entry into an experimental school, Praetorius. There he remained until his father died in 1889, leaving the family penniless; they had to be taken in by Ford's grandfather.

Fordie, as he was known to his friends, roamed the streets of London for the next few years, associating with aesthetes and decadents, anarchists and artists. Aided by his grandfather, he published three books of fairy tales by the time he turned twenty-one and began working on a serious novel; these accomplishments emboldened him to elope with Elsie Martindale, whom he had met years before at Praetorius, in 1894.

After two very uncomfortable years, Elsie's parents forgave their daughter and agreed to help support the young couple; by that time, Ford's own career was progressing with the publication of Ford Madox Brown (1896) the official biography of his late grandfather, and his introduction to Joseph Conrad, the Polish-born novelist, with whom Ford would be connected for the next decade. Although the value of this relationship has been much debated, it is undeniable that Ford (who was by now calling himself Ford Madox Hueffer) provided Conrad with vital information about English idioms and customs, in addition to psychological support during the latter's frequent bouts of despondency. Nevertheless, the products of this collaboration—The Inheritors (1901), Romance (1903), and The Nature of a Crime (1909, serial; 1924, book)—are markedly inferior to the works each wrote on his own during this period, such as Conrad's Lord Jim (1900) and Ford's Fifth Queen trilogy (1906-1908).

During the first decade of the twentieth century, Ford was best known as a writer of nonfiction. His study of the English Channel towns, The Cinque Ports, appeared in 1900; The Soul of London appeared in 1905, and two further books on English country life followed in 1906 and 1907. Interspersed with these were collections of fairy tales, biographies of artists such as Hans Holbein, and a weekly newspaper column. Though these works made little money for Ford, they kept his name before the public; meanwhile, he was preparing his brilliant re-creation of the life of Katherine Howard, fifth queen of King Henry VIII, published as The Fifth Queen (1906), Privy Seal (1907), and The Fifth Queen Crowned (1908). In this trilogy, Ford for the first time successfully fused his lifelong learning about England with his growing knowledge of contemporary human psychology; in Ford's hands, Henry VIII's fifth queen, actually executed for fornication, becomes a champion of conscience framed for her efforts to restore Catholicism to England.

Unfortunately, none of these books ever sold more than a few thousand copies. In fact, Ford's career up to the outbreak of World War I was marked by outright failures, interspersed with a few half-successes, such as Mr. Apollo (1908), Ladies Whose Bright Eyes (1911), and The New Humpty-Dumpty (1912). Perhaps his greatest fame stemmed from the English Review, which Ford edited from its first issue in December, 1908, until the middle of 1910. This journal, like Ford's later magazine Transatlantic Review, gave voice to an entire generation of literary artists, from established writers such as H. G. Wells and Henry James to new voices such as those of Wyndham Lewis, Ezra Pound, and D. H. Lawrence. It also lost nearly £500 an issue, and within two years, Ford had been forced out. It was perhaps in response to this lack of critical and financial success that Ford began an affair with Violet Hunt, who had five previous liaisons, including one with the writer W. Somerset Maugham. Ford's wife refused a divorce, took him to court, and ultimately forced him to leave England for most of the next two years. Such shows of force could not persuade Ford to return to his wife, and though Elsie never agreed to a divorce, she finally allowed him to advertise his mistress as his wife, making Ford and Violet acceptable once more in polite society. Ironically, these ugly years of struggle provided Ford with material for his greatest work, The Good Soldier (1915).

By the time this novel appeared, England was at war with Germany. Ford wrote two books of propaganda, then enlisted in the army as a junior officer. Although he was never directly in the front lines, he spent several weeks under continual artillery fire, received a concussion, and was sent home in March, 1917. Ford's experiences in World War I would serve as the raw material for his other great work of fiction, Parade's End (1924-1928, 1950). Still suffering from the effects of shell shock, Ford moved to a cottage in Sussex, where he was joined by Stella Bowen, a young Australian painter whom he had met through Ezra Pound; to prevent a repetition of his earlier legal difficulties, he changed his name at this time to the familiar Ford Madox Ford. His shell shock might explain the frequent lapses from factuality that fill the pages of Thus to Revisit (1921), the first of several books of memoirs and recollections Ford would write, which also include Return to Yesterday (1931) and Portraits from Life (1937; published in England as Mightier than the Sword, 1938). These works are characterized by incisive description of events that never took place; their inaccuracies and outright fantasies have haunted Ford's reputation ever since.

The last twenty years of Ford's life were spent alternately in France and the United States, where a new generation admired him as a teacher and father figure. He began The Transatlantic Review, which he edited with Ernest Hemingway, publishing works by writers as disparate as James Joyce and Gertrude Stein. He went on a long lecture tour in the United States in 1926 and 1927, returned to France, ended his liaison with Stella Bowen, and sailed back for another American tour in 1928. In the spring of 1930, he was back in Paris, where he met the woman with whom he would pass the rest of his life, Janice Biala; in 1931, he wrote his last first-rate work, a collection of poems about Janice called Buckshee, which was published in 1966.

The onset of the Depression made the life of a writer even harder, and Ford was pushed into a series of works designed simply to pay the bills that inexorably mounted around him; by the end of his career, he had returned to that nonfictional form with which he had begun, perhaps the best example of which is Provence (1935). Still dreaming of critical respectability, he finished a comprehensive literary history entitled The March of Literature in 1938. The accumulated effects of forty years' overindulgence in food and wine, however, finally caught up with him; on June 26, 1939, in Deauville, France, he died of uremia and heart failure.

ANALYSIS

Ford is best known for his leadership of the modernist movement in literature, a movement famous for its experiments in form and style but equally important for its revolution in subject matter. The Victorians, for example, had turned to fantasy as a way of escaping the evils of urbanization and industrialization; the modernists, in contrast, used the fantastic as a way of confronting human beings' deepest psychological reactions to extreme situations. These writers thought of themselves as discovering new planes of existence, or (in a famous image invented by the novelist Virginia Woolf) exposing the buried connections among the isolated, alienated inhabitants of the times. Such efforts were underscored by the scientific discoveries of the time, such as Sigmund Freud's psychoanalytical theory, Henri Bergson's theory of temporality, and Albert Einstein's theory of relativity, all of which were published between 1895 and 1905.

Throughout his career, Ford insisted that literature must confront the main issues of contemporary life, even though its outward subject might be a tale five centuries old (the Fifth Queen Trilogy) or might involve actions considered physically impossible (Henry for Hugh, 1934). Ford even wrote a series of satires on contemporary life—The Simple Life Limited (1911), The New Humpty-Dumpty (1912), and Mr. Fleight (1913)—though he lacked sufficient courage to publish them under his own name, using the pseudonym Daniel Chaucer for the first two titles. The Parade's End novels contain the most vivid re-creation of wartime experience in the history of English literature.

Most of Ford's serious analysis of the social and political changes that characterized the early twentieth century remains unacknowledged by contemporary readers, however, because of Ford's striking stylistic experimentation. Ford often used a point of view that is mistakenly called the "interior monologue," but he was one of the first to recognize that people do not, as a rule, make speeches to themselves. In place of the unrealistic "monologue," Ford offered a succession of fragments, each one arising into consciousness but quickly succeeded by other, seemingly unrelated, fragments. His work can thus be called the first truly realistic work in literary history.

Ford's technique offered a second advantage as well. Since Samuel Richardson wrote Pamela: Or, Virtue Rewarded as a series of letters in 1740-1741, writers have striven to record action that takes place in the immediate present accurately yet effectively, but all that they have created is a series of acceptable conventions for interpreting retellings of past events as if they were happening in the present. James Joyce in Ulysses (1922) and Ford in novels from The Fifth Queen to The Last Post (1928) created a sense that what was taking place for the character was being immediately transcribed for the reader. Ford's name for this new technique was "impressionism," a term he borrowed from the painters among whom he had grown up during the 1890's.

The method of literary impressionism has not proven to be as historically important as pictorial Impressionism was. Both techniques seemed unnatural and chaotic at first, demanding a wholesale reeducation of the audience. Yet where Impressionism in art ultimately allowed audiences to appreciate the beauty of painted surfaces as well as the beauty of pictured scenes, literary impressionism could not offer an equivalent alternative form of satisfaction. Works written in this style remain notoriously difficult to read; for full understanding, they must be enacted, not merely scanned. Those who are willing to give the work this extra attention, however, will find that they have enlarged their experience along with their understanding.

The primacy of memories and impressions is the greatest strength of Ford's fiction, but it is simultaneously the gravest weakness in his nonfiction. To be plain about it, Ford was a liar—but a liar out of art, not malice. Each time Ford wrote a fictitious anecdote about one of his more famous contemporaries, he would convince himself that the incident was true in every detail; each time such an anecdote was called into question, the entire memoir became suspect. Soon, no one believed anything Ford wrote. The real culprit was, in fact, Ford's commitment to literary impressionism. At the time he wrote the lie he thought it was true; the lie had first appeared, and subsequently taken shape, in his mind, and therefore it must be thought of as a truthful image, if not an image of the truth. If only Ford could be granted his stylistic premise, the lapses from factuality of his books would no longer be grounds for condemnation.

Nevertheless, Ford's made-up memories caused him to alienate one old friend after another. As an example, when Joseph Conrad died in 1924, Ford published a long appreciation of his old friend, receiving high praise for the way in which he had brought a literary giant to vibrant, breathing life—that is, until those who had known Conrad best began to protest over the "vast differences," as Conrad's widow put it, between the incidents they had witnessed and those which Ford now described. In turn, Ford defended his approach, calling the book "a novel, not a monograph; a portrait, not a narration."

THE GOOD SOLDIER

First published: 1915

Type of work: Novel

A widower reveals the corruption and depravity hidden beneath the polite surface of a longtime relationship.

The Good Soldier is several novels at once. It is a romantic comedy of manners that turns sour; it is a social satire that offers no normative way of life; it is a true confession by a consummate liar; it is a profound psychological study of people one can never quite understand; it is a modernist tour de force. Most tellingly, it is Ford's masterwork.

The image one must keep in mind when reading The Good Soldier is the onion. It is composed of layer upon layer; cutting into it at any point brings tears to one's eyes, and when one has peeled away the final layer there is absolutely nothing left for one's efforts—no kernel, no pith, no ultimate moral. Ford wanted to call it "The Saddest Story," and only his publisher's insistence that no one would buy a book with such a depressing title in the middle of the Great War led him to change it.

The novel is a first-person narrative, covering a little more than ten years in the life of John Dowell. Dowell is a member of that privileged class whose names echo through history. His "farm," as he calls it, occupies several blocks of downtown Philadelphia. In 1901, drifting through a life of gentlemanly idleness, he meets and marries Florence Hurlbird of Stamford, Connecticut; they sail to Europe for their honeymoon, only to discover that Florence has a heart ailment that prevents her from ever returning to America. Thus they drift from one resort to the next, following the social calendar; in one of these resorts, Bad Nauheim, they meet Edward and Leonora Ashburnham, whose lives will intertwine with theirs in disastrous fashion.

For nine years life seems perfect; the two couples meet at Nauheim, spend an idyllic summer, and part the best of friends. Underneath that immaculate surface, however, deadly currents seethe—lust and greed disguised as sentiment and prudence. Florence and Edward are lovers; Leonora, to whom Edward has turned over management of his estate, does not dare to speak out for fear of scandal and financial ruination. Then Florence discovers that she has been supplanted in Edward's heart by Nancy Rufford, Leonora's young ward. That same evening, an old acquaintance spots Florence and reveals Florence's lurid sexual history; her veils of deceit stripped away, she poisons herself. Edward and Leonora return to England, where Leonora informs her ward about Edward's growing love; the resulting complex emotions drive Nancy to a breakdown. Leonora asks John to keep Edward company, while she ships Nancy out to India in the hope that a change of scene will help her. Faced with this second loss, Edward kills himself. Within months, Leonora has remarried and started a new family. John, who also loves Nancy, resumes his old role of nursemaid.

It is a plot worthy of a soap opera, but it is only half the story. The other half is made up of the revelation of John's character and his associated revelations about the idle rich—and these are far more profound than the melodramatic incidents of the surface. Readers have never succeeded in understanding John Dowell. His dry wit belies his pose as "an ignorant fool." His ability to contrast the problems that arise from "keeping a shut mouth to the world" with the "hell" that results from Florence's and Leonora's compulsive talking shows that he is in fact a consummate reader of character. Yet he is himself a connoisseur of talk. He deliberately obscures his story with flashbacks and digressions, he presents statements as truths that he later labels lies, and he invites the reader to admire his closest friends, only to sentence them to death, insanity, and "intense solitude." Does he hate his wife for the twelve years of lies she imposed on him? At one point, he claims that he "hates her with the hatred of the adulterer," but later in his narrative he claims not to think about her at all. Does he admire Leonora for her efforts to save her marriage, her faith, and finally herself? Again a reader can only answer, "sometimes."

The Good Soldier is thus a triumph of literary impressionism. It is a melodrama without a hero, a psychological study conducted by a dolt, and a confession (made up as the narrator goes along) by the only character who has not been guilty of a crime. It is, in other words, terrifyingly like real life. Moreover, most readers will conclude, if real life is like The Good Soldier, then they had better beware.

PARADE'S END

First published: Some Do Not . . ., 1924; No More Parades, 1925; A Man Could Stand Up, 1926; The Last Post, 1928; published collectively as Parade's End, 1950

Type of work: Novels

An unlikely hero survives desertion by his friends, calumny by his wife, and the terrors of the Great War, finding happiness at last with the woman he loves.

Parade's End is a series of four novels depicting the meeting, courtship, and ultimate fulfillment of two modern heroes, Christopher Tietjens and Valentine Wannop, despite social condemnation, personal travails, and World War I. Into these novels Ford poured his own experiences as a writer, as a lover, and as a soldier; he used the techniques of literary impressionism to transform them into an utterly believable narrative. Some people have felt that, taken as a whole, these four novels constitute the best record available of the revolution in English society caused by the Great War.

The first novel of the sequence, Some Do Not . . ., begins just before the outbreak of World War I and records the creation of an emotional bond between Christopher and Valentine during a police pursuit, a breakfast party, and a fog-shrouded late-night carriage ride. Ford presents his hero and heroine as two of the last moral human beings left in Western society; while all around them friends, relatives, and nations succumb to their passions, Christopher and Valentine, as the title puts it, do not. At the same time, they are being judged according to these others' standards, and thus their fornication is presumed on all sides. As a result, acquaintances will cut them, employers will demote them, and even their parents will endure bitter disappointment; and because Parade's End is not a fairy tale, these reactions will never be wholly resolved.

The second novel of the sequence, No More Parades, finds Christopher with the army in France. His efforts are going unrewarded; his wife, Sylvia, is raising a scandal about him; and his love for Valentine has been buried deep under layers of responsibility. At the climax of the novel, he must undergo an extended interrogation to avoid a court-martial on charges of striking a superior officer (who had stormed into his hotel room late at night without identifying himself); that same morning, his command is to be subjected to a formal inspection. The resulting interior monologue invites comparison with Molly Bloom's final monologue in James Joyce's Ulysses (1922). In A Man Could Stand Up, the third volume, Christopher has been moved up to the front lines, where he must survive a last-ditch enemy barrage. Shortly thereafter, the war finally ends; it is at last time for his love to surface from under four years of military repression. When Valentine's name does pop into his conscious mind, he is astonished: "What! Is that still there?" Ford finally grants his lovers their first embrace, though not until the very conclusion of the novel: "They were dancing! . . . They were setting out."

Later in life, Ford claimed that these three novels formed a perfect whole; the addition of The Last Post, he felt, broke the unity of time and place created by the frame of World War I and the dual themes of battles in the trenches and battles between the sexes. Most readers, however, find this final novel emotionally necessary, for in it Christopher's wife, Sylvia, finally ends her private war and agrees to a divorce; the "curse" on the Tietjens family, which has been a recurring subtheme, is ended with the cutting down of Groby Great Tree; and Valentine gives birth to the first undisputed Tietjens. In addition, Ford provides another culminating monologue, this time the dying thoughts of Christopher's brother Mark; confronting his impassive presence, even Sylvia falls silent.

Finally, Ford's introduction of this final theme, a reprise of his earlier concern in The Good Soldier, gives Parade's End a larger significance. In this tetralogy, Ford examined the profound crises that he, and England, had recently faced, and he found not the mere accommodation of "peace in our time" but the dawning of a final resolution, the acknowledgment that "you must have a pattern to interpret things by." It is not itself a statement of the pattern, but it will have to do.

SUMMARY

Had Ford Madox Ford written only half a dozen novels, served as editor of only one great literary magazine, and encouraged only a few writers and artists to embrace the principles of modernism, he would still be remembered as a great man and a great artist. He drank too deeply from the cup of life, writing too many words, loving too many women, and leaving behind too many disappointed expectations. Only now, when his personal and artistic imperfections have faded, can one perceive the real and lasting power of Ford's vision and the truth of his impressions.

Hartley S. Spatt

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Shifting of the Fire, 1892
The Inheritors, 1901 (with Joseph Conrad)
Romance, 1903 (with Conrad)
The Benefactor, 1905
The Fifth Queen, 1906
Privy Seal, 1907
An English Girl, 1907
Mr. Apollo, 1908
The Fifth Queen Crowned, 1908
The "Half Moon," 1909
The Nature of a Crime, 1909 (serial), 1924 (book; with Conrad)
The Portrait, 1910
A Call, 1910
The Simple Life Limited, 1911
Ladies Whose Bright Eyes, 1911
The Panel, 1912
The New Humpty-Dumpty, 1912
Mr. Fleight, 1913
The Young Lovell, 1913 (also known as Ring for Nancy)
The Good Soldier, 1915
The Marsden Case, 1923
Some Do Not . . ., 1924
No More Parades, 1925
A Man Could Stand Up, 1926
The Last Post, 1928
A Little Less than Gods, 1928
No Enemy, 1929
When the Wicked Man, 1931

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Relatively few writers have owed as much to a grandfather as did Ford Madox Ford. What can make a grandfather a better guardian than a father for a young writer?
- What was the most significant aspect of Ford's relationship with Joseph Conrad?
- Why must the onion be kept in mind when reading Ford's The Good Soldier?
- Ford showed an early interest in fairy tales. Did this interest appear in any of his mature writing?
- What is the basis for Ford's use of the word "parade" in his tetralogy, Parade's End?

The Rash Act, 1933

Henry for Hugh, 1934

Vive le Roy, 1936

Parade's End, 1950 (includes Some Do Not . . ., No More Parades, A Man Could Stand Up, and The Last Post)

POETRY:

The Questions at the Well, 1893 (as Fenil Haig)

Poems for Pictures, 1900

The Face of the Night, 1904

From Inland, and Other Poems, 1907

Songs from London, 1910

High Germany, 1911

Collected Poems, 1913

Antwerp, 1915

On Heaven, and Poems Written on Active Service, 1918

A House, 1921

New Poems, 1927

Collected Poems, 1936

Buckshee, 1966

NONFICTION:

Ford Madox Brown, 1896

The Cinque Ports, 1900

Rossetti, 1902

The Soul of London, 1905

Hans Holbein, the Younger, 1905

The Heart of the Country, 1906

The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, 1907

The Spirit of the People, 1907

Ancient Lights, 1911 (pb. in the U.S. as Memories and Impressions, 1911)

The Critical Attitude, 1911

Henry James, 1913

Between St. Dennis and St. George, 1915

When Blood Is Their Argument, 1915

Zeppelin Nights, 1916

Thus to Revisit, 1921

Women and Men, 1923

Joseph Conrad: A Personal Remembrance, 1924

A Mirror to France, 1926

New York Essays, 1927

New York Is Not America, 1927

No Enemy, 1929

The English Novel, 1929

Return to Yesterday, 1931 (autobiography)

It Was the Nightingale, 1933 (autobiography)

Provence, 1935

Great Trade Route, 1937

Portraits from Life, 1937 (pb. in England as Mightier than the Sword, 1938)

The March of Literature, 1938

The Correspondence of Ford Madox Ford and Stella Bowen, 1993

A Literary Friendship: Correspondence Between Caroline Gordon and Ford Madox Ford, 1999

Ford Madox Ford

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

The Brown Owl, 1891

The Feather, 1892

The Queen Who Flew, 1894

Christina's Fairy Book, 1906

Mister Bosphorus and the Muses, 1923

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Presence of Ford Madox Ford: A Memorial Volume of Essays, Poems, and Memoirs, 1981

About the Author

Brown, Dennis, and Jenny Plastow, eds. Ford Madox Ford and Englishness. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2006.

Haslam, Sara. Fragmenting Modernism: Ford Madox Ford, the Novel, and the Great War. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2002.

_____, ed. Ford Madox Ford and the City. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2005.

Judd, Alan. Ford Madox Ford. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1991.

Mizener, Arthur. The Saddest Story: A Biography of Ford Madox Ford. New York: World, 1971.

Saunders, Max. Ford Madox Ford: A Dual Life. 2 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996-.

Snitow, Ann Barr. Ford Madox Ford and the Voice of Uncertainty. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1984.

Stang, Sondra J., ed. The Presence of Ford Madox Ford. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.

Thompson, Robert, and Max Saunders, eds. Ford Madox Ford's Modernity. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2003.

Wiesenfarth, Joseph, ed. History and Representation in Ford Madox Ford's Writings. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2004.

Archive Photos

E. M. FORSTER

Born: London, England

January 1, 1879

Died: Coventry, Warwickshire, England

June 7, 1970

Forster was a prominent English novelist, essayist, and short-story writer. His works display an enormous depth of insight into the human condition.

BIOGRAPHY

Edward Morgan Forster (FOR-stur) was born in London, England, on January 1, 1879, the only son of Edward Morgan Llewellyn Forster, a descendant of prominent members of the Clapham Sect, an evangelical group of social activists, and Alice Clara (Lily) Whichelo Forster. His father, an architect who had studied with Sir Arthur Blomfield (Thomas Hardy's mentor), died unexpectedly in 1880. That left the one-year-old Edward Forster in the care of his mother, his maternal grandmother, Louisa Whichelo, and his paternal great-aunt and godmother, Marianne Thornton, who financed his education and became his benefactress. In 1893, Forster and his mother moved to Tonbridge and he attended Tonbridge School, where he was very unhappy, from 1893 to 1897. In 1897, he went to King's College, Cambridge, and developed a number of personal relationships that had a profound influence on his work. In his last year at Cambridge, Forster became a member of the Apostles society, which later evolved into the Bloomsbury Group. This group was a literary, artistic, and intellectual society, active in the Bloomsbury area of London, and comprising such notable figures as Virginia Woolf, the novelist; Lytton Strachey, the biographer; Clive Bell, the art critic; Roger Fry, the artist and critic; John Maynard Keynes, the influential economist; Victoria Sackville-West, the poet and writer; and others. After Forster left Cambridge, he took an extended tour of Italy and Greece with his mother. This travel provided the setting and material for his early novels, which satirize English tourists abroad. His literary career began in 1903 with his contributions to The Independent Review, a Bloomsbury Group periodical of liberal anti-imperialist sympathies.

In 1905, Forster tutored the children of the Countess von Arnim in Germany and returned to England for the publication of his first novel, Where Angels Fear to Tread (1905). He taught Latin at the Working Men's College and lectured on Italian art and history for the Cambridge Local Lectures Board. In 1906, Forster became a tutor and developed a strong relationship with Syed Ross Masood, an Indian Muslim patriot. The Longest Journey, Forster's second novel, published in 1907, A Room with a View, published in 1908, and Howards End, published in 1910, established Forster as one of England's leading novelists.

Forster visited India between 1912 and 1921, and during World War I he spent three years in Egypt. He published two minor works: Alexandria: A History and a Guide (1922) and Pharos and Pharillon (1923). In 1924, Forster published A Passage to India, his final and most critically acclaimed novel. He began the work in 1913, and after an extensive hiatus, Forster completed the novel in England after his return from India.

After inheriting a house from his aunt in West Hackhurst, near Dorset, Forster lived there with his mother until her death in 1945. He gave the Clark Lectures at Cambridge and published them as Aspects of the Novel (1927). In 1936, he published his first collection of essays, Abinger Harvest—A Miscellany, which was an attack on the hypocrisy and self-righteousness that he attributed to the British mentality. After being evicted from his West Hackhurst apartment in 1947, Forster visited the United States and lectured at Harvard and Hamilton colleges. Forster wrote two biographies, Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson (1934) and Marianne Thornton: A Domestic Biography, 1797-1887 (1956), collaborated with Benjamin Britten and Eric Crozier on the libretto for the opera Billy Budd (1951), and published his second collection of essays, Two Cheers for Democracy (1951), and an uneven collection of his letters and experiences from India in The Hill of Devi (1953).

Forster received significant recognition for his literary achievements. Queen Elizabeth II awarded him membership in the Order of Companions of Honour to the Queen in 1953. In 1960, Santha Rama Rau adapted A Passage to India for the stage. After playing in London for a year, the play opened on Broadway and ran for 110 performances. Most critics believed that the play was inferior to the novel; however, Forster was pleased with the adaptation. On June 7, 1970, he died in Coventry, England, at the home of Bob and May Buckingham. He had two works published posthumously, Maurice (1971), written in 1913 but not released until the public disclosure of his homosexuality, and The Life to Come, and Other Stories (1972), fourteen stories that reveal much about his private inner life.

ANALYSIS

Critics generally agree that Forster's finest achievements were his novels, in which plot is overshadowed by the conflict of ideas and development of character. Forster achieves objectivity in many of his novels by utilizing the figure of the outsider as narrator. His narrative style is straightforward, with events progressing in logical order. Much of Forster's work is a study of personal relationships. Personal emotion is elevated above social convention in most of his novels, and Forster utilizes the recurring theme of society's oppression of the individual's characteristically generous and sensitive inclinations. The heart/conscience conflict, as illustrated in Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884), is a major concern in many of Forster's works. He consistently expresses opposition to racism and prejudice among individuals.

A Passage to India is generally considered to be Forster's artistic masterpiece; it was his last novel. This work is a sympathetic rendering of the assumption that, once human beings are prisoners of mythology, it is very difficult to change their thinking. They must transcend the elements of culture that imprison them in order to reach out to humanity. The title of Forster's novel comes from Walt Whitman's poem but is its thematic antithesis. Whitman envisions the total unity and spiritual connections of all people, and Forster suggests that this is not possible. As a humanistic novel, A Passage to India illustrates the indifference of nature and humanity's compulsion toward order: "The inarticulate world is closer at hand and readier to resume control as soon as men are tired."

His subsequent works took the form of literary criticism, general essays, and biography. Perhaps his most well-known and influential volume of non-fiction is Aspects of the Novel. Forster posits a theory of characterization coupled with a "pattern and rhythm" for the novel. He suggests that characters in a novel are either round, able to surprise the audience, or flat, stereotypes or caricatures.

Many of Forster's works use music and art as basic tools for communicating meaning. It was his belief that music is the deepest of the arts and that music, more so than language, "would civilize the barbarian." In A Room with a View, Reverend Arthur Beebe understands the nature of Lucy Honeychurch by the way that she plays Beethoven. He is aware of the depths of her passion and observes that, if she lived the way she plays, her life would truly be exciting. A passage in Howards End explores the reaction of the audience to Ludwig van Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and ironically makes clear the ineffability of a musical experience. A sensitive or intuitive person might have insights into realities communicated via the medium of music, since word symbols or language is an inadequate tool for expressing life. Music has a way of transcending and displays an integrating power. It plays a powerful and evocative tool in five of Forster's works.

In E. M. Forster (1970), Martial Rose observes Forster's ironic temper. He pigeonholes Forster as an acute observer and disinterested craftsman who rarely allowed an indulgence of personal passions to ruin the pattern of a work of order. Forster admired the work of Voltaire, praising him for his critical genius and humanity. He applauded Voltaire for his concern for truth, belief in tolerance, pity for the oppressed, and ability to “drive his ideas home.”

The ethical impulse characterizes the whole of Forster’s writing. This quality constrained his writing in aesthetic terms. He was oftentimes locked into a defensive and contradictory position. Often, he insisted on the separation of the creative and critical faculties, and other times he felt that they were inextricable.

A ROOM WITH A VIEW

First published: 1908

Type of work: Novel

Italy provides the landscape and the freedom to abandon English boundaries and to experience life passionately.

A Room with a View may be considered in two parts, with part 1 taking place in Italy and representing the Greek world and its Dionysian element and part 2 taking place in England and representing the medieval or ascetic. A synthesis of the views or divisions will provide a balanced perspective.

Miss Lucy Honeychurch, a young Englishwoman, and Miss Charlotte Bartlett, her cousin and chaperon, arrive at the Pension Bertolini and are disappointed to find that they have been misled about their rooms. They are not south, but north, and neither has a view. During dinner, Mr. Emerson and his son, George, generously offer to exchange their rooms, which do have a view. Emerson believes that women like looking at a view; men do not. He does not care what he sees outside; his view is within. Charlotte and Lucy are startled by the so-called tactlessness and indelicateness of their offer. They see Reverend Arthur Beebe, who assures the ladies that some niceties go against the grain. He agrees to act as an intermediary and makes arrangements with the Emersons to switch rooms. Charlotte is careful not to give Lucy the room formerly occupied by George. She believes that, in a small way, she is a woman of the world and knows where some things can lead.

Later, Beebe hears Lucy playing the piano and asks if he can say something daring. He tells her that if she could live in the way that she plays Beethoven, it would be very exciting for everyone. Music provides the one outlet for Lucy’s enormous passion and is indeed a force that will eventually lead her to a more vital and spontaneous existence.

Lucy later decides to go for a walk alone. She sees Mr. Emerson at Santa Croce Church. He is clearly a nonconformist and guides her through the Giotto frescoes. Lucy finds that she is very comfortable with him, but she is confused over why he is so concerned about his son. Meanwhile Miss Eleanor Lavish, a novelist, and Charlotte are wandering about Italy alone. Miss Lavish believes that only by exploring the unknown does one get to know a country. She tells Charlotte that she has her eye on Lucy, for she believes that Lucy is open to the physical sensations and can be transfigured in Italy.

Lucy walks through the Piazza Signoria and passes two men arguing over a debt. She faints at the sight of the ensuing street brawl as a stabbed man, bleeding from the mouth, dies at her feet. George is there to retrieve her. After he revives her, she asks him to get the photographs that she dropped during the chaos. Because they have blood on them, George throws them away. The Italian’s death brings them close together. Lucy asks that George not tell anyone about the incident.

Traveling with a number of guests from the pension, Lucy and Charlotte drive to Fiesole. The group disperses, and Lucy asks to be taken to speak with Beebe. The driver mistakenly leads her to George, who is standing at the end of a beautiful pathway covered with violets. Captivated by the moment, George embraces Lucy. Their kiss is interrupted by Charlotte, who rushes Lucy away. Charlotte is afraid that George will talk about the kiss and tells Lucy that he is obviously accustomed to stealing kisses. Cutting their visit short, Charlotte and Lucy take the train to Rome.

Lucy returns home to Surrey and promises to marry Cecil Vyse, a decadent dilettante who revels in material possessions. Beebe visits Lucy and comments on how promising she seems to be. He notes that she plays Beethoven passionately and lives so quietly. Beebe suspects that one day music and life will mingle and that Lucy will be wonderful at both. Cecil startles Beebe with the announcement of his plans to marry Lucy. While traveling in Rome, Cecil meets the Emersons and convinces them to lease a villa in Surrey from Sir Harry Otway. The local residents had hoped that a certain class of residents would move into the villas, and Cecil encourages the Emersons to move in to disrupt the social order.

Beebe takes Freddy Honeychurch (Lucy's brother) to meet the Emersons, and Freddy encourages George and Beebe to "go for a bath" at the pond. Lucy, Cecil, and her mother encounter the frolicking swimmers while walking through the grounds. Lucy is shocked to learn that the Emersons have taken the Otway villa. Cousin Charlotte comes to visit and is concerned that the Emersons are in Surrey. George, Freddy, Lucy, and a friend invite Cecil to play tennis with them, and he sneeringly declines. After the tennis game, Cecil reads "Under the Loggia" by Eleanor Lavish aloud to George and Lucy, who recognize the description of their kiss. On the way into the house, George kisses her again. Lucy scolds Charlotte for telling Miss Lavish about the kiss.

Lucy lies to George about her feelings for him. She implores him to leave and never return. George tells her that Cecil is incapable of loving her as a woman and can only love her as a possession; he tells Lucy that he loves her and that Cecil does not. George reluctantly leaves. Symbolically, George can be seen as a protagonist of life, Cecil of material possessions (art), and Charlotte of order and decorum (antilife). If Lucy marries Cecil (who thinks of her as a work of art, not as a woman), she would be denying her own happiness. At this point, however, she is ashamed of her passionate attraction for George. Denying her love for George, Lucy breaks her engagement to Cecil and makes plans to meet Teresa and Catherine Alan in Athens. Charlotte arranges a meeting between the elder Mr. Emerson and Lucy. Lucy lies to George, Cecil, Beebe, and Mr. Emerson about her feelings. She finally abandons her plans to go to Greece, marries George against the wishes of her mother, and returns to Italy with George to their room with a view.

In The Achievement of E. M. Forster (1962), J. B. Beer posits the notion of the importance and symbolism of the "view" in a conversation between Lucy and Cecil:

"I had got an idea—I dare say wrongly—that you feel more at home with me in a room."

"A room?" she echoed, hopelessly bewildered.
"Yes. Or at the most, in a garden, or on a road. Never in the real country like this." . . .

"I connect you with a view—a certain type of view. . . . When I think of you it's always as in a room" . . .

To her surprise, he seemed annoyed.
"A drawing-room, pray? With no view?"
"Yes, with no view, I fancy. Why not?"

Significantly, the novel begins and ends with the same view in the pension in Italy. The reticent Lucy is finally victorious over the repressive urgings of conformity and accepts her call of life. She is a different person now and has opted for life rather than antilife. The union of George and Lucy represents a comingling of intellect and heart.

A PASSAGE TO INDIA

First published: 1924

Type of work: Novel

The domination of the Indian people by the forces of British imperialism suggests the impossibility of bridging the gulf of antipathy between the races.

A Passage to India has a tripartite structure labeled mosque, caves, and temple. Each section serves as a symbolic signpost and corresponds to the seasons of the Indian year.

After being summoned to the house of Major Callendar, Dr. Aziz, a Moslem doctor at the government hospital, discovers that the major has gone and that he must walk back to his house because two English women departed in his hired tonga (two-wheeled vehicle). While stopping at a mosque on his way back to Chandrapore, Aziz meets Mrs. Moore, the mother of Ronald Heaslop, the city magistrate. Aziz and Mrs. Moore seem to "connect" with each other and share a common understanding of life. Under the racially fragmented system of British colonialism, however, neither the British nor the Indians can speak publicly of this kind of communication. The elderly Mrs. Moore invites Aziz to walk back to the club with her and introduces him to Adela Quested, newly arrived from England and the fiancé of her son. Although A Pas- sage to India clearly addresses social and political issues, the major theme is the plight of the human race. The fact that the characters struggle unsuccessfully to “connect” in the novel indicates Forster’s pessimism, yet he portrays a desire on the part of Aziz, Fielding, Mrs. Moore, and Adela to understand and to establish meaningful relationships with each other.

Mrs. Moore and Adela want to see the real India and complain about the colonized India that they have seen. Turton, a member of the British club, holds a bridge party for them and invites a few native Indian guests. The party is a failure, in that the Indians separate into groups apart from the British and the situation is uncomfortable. Fielding, the government college principal who associates freely with the Indians, invites the ladies to tea at his home. Adela persuades him to include Aziz and Professor Godbole, a Hindu teacher and associate of Fielding. At the tea, Adela and Mrs. Moore have a refreshing conversation with Aziz and Godbole. Aziz is overjoyed by the interaction of the group members and invites all of them to visit the Marabar Caves. Mrs. Moore and Adela accept the invitation, and Aziz plans an elaborate outing.

Heaslop arrives to escort his mother and his fiancé to a game of polo and is very rude to Aziz. The incident causes Adela and Heaslop to quarrel, and she breaks off their engagement. The couple then goes for a ride, and after striking an unidentified animal on the road, Adela changes her mind, and they are reconciled.

Unfortunately, Godbole and Fielding miss their train and Aziz must escort the British ladies to the Marabar Caves alone. Mrs. Moore is frightened by a loud booming echo in the first cave and stops to rest. Considering the gulf between the British and Indians, Mrs. Moore sees the futility of her Christian and moralistic ideas about life echoed in this hollow sound. Mrs. Moore declines to continue their explorations, and Aziz, a guide, and Adela proceed along. Adela upsets Aziz by inquiring whether he has more than one wife. Aziz leaves her briefly to regain his composure, and Adela wanders into a cave and claims that she is almost assaulted by Aziz. She stumbles down a hill, where she meets Nancy Derek, who has brought Fielding to the caves. Nancy takes Adela back to Chandrapore.

The Marabar Caves section of the novel is one of the most puzzling. Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson and a number of readers and other reviewers of Forster’s works objected to the mystery of the caves scene. In a June 26, 1924, letter to Dickinson, Forster wrote the following:

In the cave it is either a man, or the supernatural, or an illusion. And even if I know! My writing mind therefore is a blur here—i.e. I will it to remain a blur, and to be uncertain, as I am of many facts in daily life. . . . It sprang straight from my subject matter.

Mrs. Moore is at once devastated and terrified by the hollow, booming echo from the caves. Her revelation suggests that perhaps the gulf that lies between the British and Indians cannot be bridged and that her Christianity is no match for the inexplicable. She has no answer for the confusion at the caves and realizes that all the British can do is to “muddle.”

Aziz meets Fielding at the caves, and neither knows what has happened. They assume that Adela decided to leave with Nancy. Aziz and Fielding return by train, and Aziz is met by the police inspector and arrested. Fielding and Mrs. Moore alienate themselves from the British by siding with Aziz. Realizing his mother’s position about the matter, Heaslop arranges passage for Mrs. Moore to return to England, and she dies at sea. During the trial, one of Aziz’s friends accuses Heaslop of smuggling his mother out of India so that she cannot testify in defense of Aziz. The Indian spectators loudly begin calling for Mrs. Moore. Then, Adela exonerates Aziz with her testimony and is publicly ostracized by the British. Fielding rescues Adela, encourages Aziz not to file a damage suit against her, and she returns to England.

Two years later, Aziz is the personal physician to the rajah of Mau, a Hindu state in India, and Godbole is the minister of education. Aziz has become totally disillusioned with the British, including Fielding. He has not accepted any letters from Fielding because he assumes that Fielding has married Adela. Aziz is angered to learn that Fielding is visiting Mau as a part of his official duties. When Aziz meets Fielding again, he discovers that the former Stella Moore, daughter of Mrs. Moore, has married Fielding. Because of the distance between them, Aziz and Fielding cannot renew their friendship. The floods in Mau prevent the Fieldings from leaving immediately.

Before Fielding and his family make their departure from India, he and Aziz decide to go horseback riding together and begin rather amicably discussing the British/Indian problem. Sensing the end of their association, Aziz and Fielding attempt to swear eternal friendship but are forced down separate paths by rocks presenting narrow pathways for the horses. This symbolizes their inability to bridge the gulf between their races and indicates that a friendship between them is not yet possible.

The Indian setting is very important in A Passage to India and is an antagonistic agent to the British colonialists. The landscape attempts to expel the British, and some critics pinpoint the correspondence of the three sections of the novel to three divisions of the Indian year: cool spring, hot summer, wet monsoon. The caves are elemental, and the narrative begins with extensive references and descriptions of the physical setting. The nothingness of the caves should convince people to accept the irrational and emphasizes their relative insignificance. The British experience in India suggests that humanity must not oppose the natural rhythms of the earth and attempt to impose order on the “chaos” that is India.

HOWARDS END

First published: 1910

Type of work: Novel

The manor house is a symbol of personal freedom and offers hope to a disordered society.

Howards End, sometimes proclaimed as Forster’s most mature novel, uses the country house as a symbol of cultural unity. On the title page of the early editions is the phrase “Only connect.” Forster admonishes humankind that its most significant failure is the reluctance to establish relationships with each other and eliminate the obstacles of prejudice that divide and subjugate individuals. The Schlegels and the Wilcoxes represent two different ways of life. The Schlegels signify culture (“sweetness and light”), and the Wilcoxes represent materialism (acquisitiveness and power). The threat of the “machine in the garden” or the growing materialism in Edwardian England challenges the order of traditional English society. Although the mood of the novel is social comedy, it exhibits the trappings of a novel of manners, and the serious subject of social and political upheaval is implied.

The narrative begins with Helen Schlegel’s letter to her sister Margaret. She writes from Howards End, where she is a guest of the Wilcox family. The Wilcox family had met the Schlegels while both families were vacationing in Germany. Both sisters had been invited to Howards End, but Margaret stays with Tibby, their brother, who is ill. Helen Schlegel falls in love with Paul Wilcox and the Wilcox family, but both families are opposed to the match. In a rather indelicate manner, Helen breaks off her relationship with Paul. In a bumbling rescue by her aunt, Mrs. Munt, Helen returns home. Mrs. Munt breaks every rule of decorum and embarrasses Helen and herself. Soon the Wilcox family rents a flat across the street from the Schlegel home. The Schlegel home is a leasehold property, inherited from their father. At the expiration of the lease, they will have to move. Mrs. Ruth Wilcox and Margaret Schlegel become good friends.

Helen Schlegel accidentally takes an umbrella from Leonard Bast at a concert. This working-class young man intrigues the Schlegel sisters, who do not know of his attachment to Jacky, a woman some years older than Leonard and soon to become his wife.

Shortly after Ruth Wilcox and Margaret Schlegel become friends, Ruth dies. She leaves Howards

End to Margaret, much to the dismay of her husband and son. No one tells Margaret of her inheritance since it is not part of the official will. After several years, Helen and Margaret meet Henry Wilcox in the park. Wilcox deliberately misleads them about the stability of the firm for which Leonard Bast works. Wilcox is attracted to Margaret and sees Bast as a possible rival. Unaware of that, the two women advise Bast to change jobs, and he does so.

When the long-term lease on the Schlegel home expires, Margaret receives a letter from Henry Wilcox offering to lease them his house in London. Margaret goes with him to look at the house, and he proposes marriage. In spite of the joint disapproval from the Wilcox and Schlegel families, Margaret accepts his proposal. There is the hope that a union between Henry and Margaret will form a vital bond and facilitate the coalescence of the two different ways of life. Forster writes the following:

Mature as he was, she might yet be able to help him to the building of the rainbow bridge that should connect the prose in us with the passion. Without it we are meaningless fragments, half monks, half beasts, unconnected arches that have never joined into a man.

Deprived of experiencing the power of true love, Margaret has expectations that she might be able to bring him to her way of thinking.

After learning that Leonard Bast lost everything he had following the bad advice that Helen and Margaret had given him, Helen believes that Henry Wilcox should compensate Bast. Margaret learns that Jacky Bast had been a mistress to Wilcox and thinks it unnecessary and in poor taste to assist the Basts. Helen falls in love with Leonard Bast, spends part of a night with him, and offers him £5,000, which he refuses. Helen remorsefully leaves England. Unaware of the relationship between Helen and Bast, Margaret marries Henry Wilcox, and Helen does not return for the ceremonies. Several months pass and Helen finally returns to England. She avoids Margaret and Wilcox but wants to retrieve some books that she had stored at Howards End. When Margaret sees Helen, she discovers that Helen is pregnant. Helen asks to spend a night with her sister, but Henry forbids it.

Margaret disobeys her husband and spends the night at Howards End with Helen. Charles Wilcox comes the next morning to get them out of the house. He meets Leonard Bast, who has come to try to get funds from Margaret. Seeing Bast, Charles seizes a saber and strikes him several times. Bast dies suddenly. Charles is sentenced to three years in prison for murdering Bast. Publicly disgraced by the manslaughter verdict and imprisonment of his son, Henry Wilcox becomes an invalid and unfortunately is unable to connect and form the bridge between his own and Margaret's divergent lifestyles. Margaret takes care of Henry out of kindness rather than love. Margaret, Henry, and Helen move into the house at Howards End.

Helen and Leonard have a son, and Henry develops a deep attachment to this child. Finally following the wishes of his former wife, Henry makes a new will that gives Howards End to Margaret. Upon her death, the house will go to the illegitimate child of Leonard Bast. Ironically, this child will be the inheritor of all that Henry Wilcox and his son had been trying to keep. Helen and Leonard's offspring represents the epitome of human diversity and the future of England.

SUMMARY

E. M. Forster writes: "As a rule, if a writer has a romantic temperament, he will find relationships beautiful." This statement encapsulates the optimistic truths that Forster asserts in his literature about the nature of humanity. Considered by some critics to be one of the greatest moralists of his time, Forster directs his attention to character flaws that cause temporary disharmony in personal relationships.

In "E. M. Forster as Victorian and Modern: Howards End and A Passage to India," Malcolm Bradbury contends that Forster demands a personal connection between inner and outer worlds and demands that both society and humankind be whole. This explains the fact that Forster's works focus on individual redemptions and personal relationships, while, at the same time, they are very social novels.

Charlene Taylor Evans

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Where Angels Fear to Tread, 1905
The Longest Journey, 1907
A Room with a View, 1908
Howards End, 1910
Maurice, wr. 1913, pb. 1971
A Passage to India, 1924

SHORT FICTION:

The Celestial Omnibus, and Other Stories, 1911
The Eternal Moment, and Other Stories, 1928
The Collected Tales of E. M. Forster, 1947
The Life to Come, and Other Stories, 1972
Arctic Summer, and Other Fiction, 1980

DRAMA:

Billy Budd, pb. 1951 (libretto, with Eric Crozier; music by Benjamin Britten)

NONFICTION:

Alexandria: A History and a Guide, 1922
Pharos and Pharillon, 1923
Aspects of the Novel, 1927
Goldsworthy Lowes Dickinson, 1934
Abinger Harvest: A Miscellany, 1936
Virginia Woolf, 1942
Development of English Prose Between 1918 and 1939, 1945
Two Cheers for Democracy, 1951
The Hill of Devi, 1953
Marianne Thornton: A Domestic Biography, 1797-1887, 1956
Commonplace Book, 1978
Selected Letters of E. M. Forster, 1983-1985 (2 volumes; Mary Lago and P. N. Furbank, editors)
The Feminine Note in Literature, 2001

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Abinger Edition of E. M. Forster, 1972-1998 (17 volumes; Oliver Stallybrass, editor)

About the Author

Bradshaw, David, ed. The Cambridge Companion to E. M. Forster. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007.
Christie, Stuart. Worlding Forster: The Passage from Pastoral. New York: Routledge, 2005.
Colmer, John. E. M. Forster: The Personal Voice. Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1975.
Crews, Frederick. E. M. Forster: The Perils of Humanism. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1962.
Edwards, Mike. E. M. Forster: The Novels. Basingstoke, England: Palgrave, 2002.
Furbank, P. N. E. M. Forster: A Life. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1978.
McDowell, Frederick. E. M. Forster. Boston: Twayne, 1987.
Robbins, Ruth. Pater to Forster; 1873-1924. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
Summers, Claude J. E. M. Forster. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1983.
Trilling, Lionel. E. M. Forster. 2d ed. New York: New Directions, 1965.
Wilde, Alan. Art and Order: Critical Essays on E. M. Forster. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1985.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In Aspects of the Novel, E. M. Forster puts great emphasis on the importance of “story.” Since this is an obvious element in fiction, why did he insist on it so strongly?
- Investigate the significance of music as reality and metaphor in Forster’s fiction.
- In A Passage to India, what character traits allow Aziz and Mrs. Moore to connect as well as they do?
- Comment on the motto of Howards End, “Only connect,” as it applies to other Forster novels.
- In Howards End, Forster mentions the importance of “the past sanctifying the present.” Explain how this happens in the novel.
- Consider the desire for possessions as a frequent failing of Forster’s characters.

Camera Press, Ltd./Archive Photos

JOHN FOWLES

Born: Leigh-on-Sea, Essex, England
March 31, 1926

Died: Lyme Regis, Dorset, England
November 5, 2005

Fowles was both critically and popularly received for his first four novels—The Collector, The Magus, The French Lieutenant's Woman, and Daniel Martin—three of which were made into films.

BIOGRAPHY

John Fowles (fowlz) was born in Leigh-on-Sea, Essex, England, on March 31, 1926. During World War II his family was evacuated to the more remote town of Ippeplen, South Devon; there Fowles discovered the beauty of the countryside that figures so prominently in his fiction. In these early years, he developed a love of nature, patterning Frederick Clegg's butterfly-collecting obsession in his novel The Collector (1963) after his own. It was not until later that he learned to love nature for itself.

As a student at the Bedford School, Fowles studied German and French literature and eventually rose to the powerful position of head boy. At Bedford, he learned to love literature and power; only later did he learn to hate the latter. He then went into military service and spent six months at the University of Edinburgh, completing training as a lieutenant in the merchant marine right as the war was ending. Following the war, he continued his education in German and, more particularly, French literature at New College, Oxford, where he graduated with a B.A. with honors in 1950. His fiction owes much to his study of French literature, particularly his early interest in existentialism and his continuing interest in the Celtic romance, from which stems his express belief that all literature has its roots in the theme of the quest.

After graduation, Fowles taught English at the University of Poitiers. A year later, he took a job teaching English on a Greek island, which provided the grist for his first written (but not his first published) novel, The Magus (1965, 1977). It was also there that he met Elizabeth Whitton, whom he married three years later. Having begun writing, he continued to teach in and around London until the success of his first published novel, The Collector, allowed him to quit teaching to become a full-time writer. Two years later, The Magus was published following twelve years of writing and revision; still not happy with it despite its favorable reception, Fowles revised and republished it in 1977.

In 1966, he and Elizabeth moved to Lyme Regis in Dorset. Their first residence was a farm at the edge of the Undercliff; subsequently, they moved to an eighteenth century house overlooking Lyme Bay. The town and the farmhouse figure prominently in The French Lieutenant's Woman (1969), both the book and the film (1981). He is perhaps best known for this novel, for which he won two awards: the Silver Pen Award from the International Association of Poets, Playwrights, Editors, Essayists, and Novelists (PEN) in 1969 and the W. H. Smith and Son Literary Award in 1970. Fowles himself was most pleased with the film adaptation of the novel, the only one of his books that achieved popular success as a film.

The Ebony Tower (1974)—Fowles's collection of short stories, a novella, and a translation of a twelfth century French romance—was written in the midst of writing his next novel. In 1986, the title story in the collection was made into a film in England. Daniel Martin was published in 1977 and marked the high point of his popular success.

The novels that have followed have not been as well received, by either the critics or the public, because of their increasingly experimental nature. These include Mantissa (1982), which takes place inside the head of a writer with amnesia, and A Maggot (1985), a historical novel, set in the eighteenth century, about the mysterious disappearance of a duke's son and the various versions of the story told by those who knew him.

While principally known for his fiction, Fowles also wrote a volume of poetry, Poems (1973); a philosophical work, The Aristos: A Self-Portrait in Ideas (1964); and a historical work, A Short History of Lyne Regis (1982). He also wrote a number of essays accompanied by photographs, including Shipwreck (1974), Islands (1978), The Tree (1979), and The Enigma of Stonehenge (1980), and the foreword to an illustrated volume, The Undercliff (1989).

A mild stroke in 1988 limited his output. After his wife, Elizabeth, died in March, 1990, from stomach cancer, Fowles continued to live and work in Lyne Regis. In 1998 he married Sarah Smith. He died on November 5, 2005.

ANALYSIS

Fowles's fiction has one main theme: the quest of the protagonists for self-knowledge or wholeness. In each of his novels, as well as in his short stories, the protagonist is faced with learning how to quest in a world in which the contemporary quester is cut off from the traditions and rituals of the past that once gave questers of old—exemplified by heroes such as Lancelot, King Arthur, and the Knights of the Round Table—purpose and direction.

What separates the journey of the Fowlesian hero from the journey of the medieval hero is that much of it has become internalized. Where the quester of old battled dragons, monsters, and mysterious knights, the modern quester has no such obvious obstacles. For the modern quester, the battles are largely inward, as the quester must struggle against ignorance and inertia. The modern journey can thus be seen in psychological terms with the results measured by the quester's ability to attain self-knowledge or wholeness, which is often characterized in Fowles's fiction as the ability of the hero to know love.

In this respect, Fowles saw his fiction as having a social dimension in its capacity to help alter people's view of life. While he claimed to pay little attention to what the critics wrote, he always paid serious attention to the opinions of his readers. From the many thousands of letters he received, he felt that his fiction moved readers to think and act differently as they identified with the struggles of his questers. His main social concern is with the condition of human beings, trapped like potential fossils in a receding sea—an image that figures prominently in The French Lieutenant's Woman.

Likewise, Fowles is concerned with nature, in the sense of the "natural man" who must be discovered by the protagonists on the quest, as well as with humanity's respect for nature. Many of the pivotal scenes in his fiction are set in natural landscapes, such as the Undercliff in The French Lieutenant's Woman or Thorncombe in Daniel Martin. The antiheroes are often those who fail to understand or respect nature, an example most succinctly portrayed in the character of Frederick Clegg in The Collector.

His short-story collection, The Ebony Tower, was originally called "Variations" because Fowles saw the stories as variations on the themes of his longer fiction. These same variations are evident within the long fiction, making the whole body of Fowles's fiction subject to examination under one central theme—that of quest and discovery—with variations.

Its clearest statement is made in Fowles's first written, later rewritten, novel The Magus. About its conception, he once said, "I only knew the basic idea of a secret world, whose penetration involved ordeal and whose final reward was self-knowledge, obsessed me." To look briefly at the basic idea of this secret world and the ordeal and reward that await the successful protagonist is to understand the basis of Fowles's fiction in its many variations.

In the story, Nicholas Urfe, well educated and in the prime of life, nonetheless wants to kill himself because he does not see sufficient reason to live. Embarrassed by his lack of commitment even to death, which prevents him from pulling the trigger on the gun, he soon stumbles into the land of adventure provided by his guide on the quest, Conchis, who represents the mythic wise old man. Within this secret realm, always described as an otherworldly place, Nicholas experiences all the challenges of the quest: danger, love, temptation, and moments of clear vision. Finally ejected from the mythic landscape, he returns to London with enough understanding to know that it is Alison, the woman whose love he earlier rejected, for whom he must now wait and of whom he must prove himself worthy. The final scene, cast in the garden of Regents Park, does not answer the question of whether they ultimately reunite because it is not as important as the evidence of the self-knowledge Nicholas has attained. For Fowles, this ambiguous ending, made more so in the revised version, is a way of leaving the story “unconcluded,” a device he varies in subsequent novels, with multiple endings in The French Lieutenant’s Woman and no ending in A Maggot. It is only in Daniel Martin that the happy ending is achieved, and then only after much struggle on the part of the protagonist-author. It comes as no surprise that the novel following Daniel Martin leaves reality behind altogether, as the protagonist-author of Mantissa creates a fiction inside his head. There the ending is circular, returning to its unclear beginning.

While many of his questers are successful to the extent that they gain self-knowledge and come to know and experience love, not all succeed. The most poignant failure is Frederick Clegg in The Collector. In this novel there are no winners, for Clegg, who longs for love and thinks he understands nature, is in fact as trapped as the butterflies he traps and kills. Likewise, he traps and kills Miranda, the girl he thinks he loves, because he does not know how to journey and cannot learn from the signs and signals presented to him. His fear keeps him trapped in a downward spiral of worsening experience. Following Miranda’s death, it is inevitable that he will trap again and that the inevitable cycle will repeat itself.

Other questers fail, particularly those presented in the short-story collection, The Ebony Tower. There, the variations are largely those of the dark side of the quest: what happens when the protagonists, for a variety of reasons, cannot choose to respond to the call to the quest. From the ebony tower of the first story to the dark cloud of the last in the collection, the stories are increasingly dark portrayals of the questers’ failure to break out of their molds. In A Maggot, Bartholomew may succeed in breaking free, but the mystery of his disappearance is never fully determined. The woman he leaves behind can free herself only by removing herself completely from society to join a new religious order and give birth to its future leader.

Throughout all of these variations, however, the central theme persists: Can people choose, and, if so, how do they choose? These ideas concerned Fowles, not only for his characters but also for himself as a novelist and a human being.

THE COLLECTOR

First published: 1963

Type of work: Novel

A butterfly collector wins the lottery and, with the money, buys a house in the country and captures the girl of his dreams.

The Collector, Fowles’s first published novel, was an instant hit. While the British viewed it as criminal fiction, Americans liked it for its psychological exploration of a troubled character. Written from a split viewpoint, it tells the story first from Clegg’s point of view, then repeats the same story from Miranda’s diary, and finally returns to Clegg describing the inevitable ending and his plans for the future. In the telling, the marked differences separating the two characters are evident. Clegg’s narrative is halting, formal, and nearly inarticulate in places. Miranda’s narrative is free-flowing, alive with feeling, expressive, and natural. Their two tales, divided as they are by language and background, reflect the vast differences that separate them.

Echoing many of the same ideas expressed in his philosophical work The Aristos: A Self-Portrait in Ideas (1964), Fowles examines his social concerns over the split between “the Many,” which Clegg represents, and “the Few,” which Miranda represents. Clegg, who suddenly finds himself wealthy as a result of winning money in the football pools, is given the money of “the Few” without any of the education to appreciate it or to use it wisely. He is freed to quest, but he does not have the inner or outer knowledge to understand what confronts him and what he can choose. Thus, he fails not only for himself; his failure also causes Miranda to die. For Clegg, Miranda remains nothing more than his most prized specimen, better than even his most beautiful butterflies.

Miranda, too, has lived in a world isolated from “the Many,” and it is only as a result of being Clegg’s prisoner that she is forced to think about the world he inhabits. As a result of her entrapment, she takes the journey of inward discovery that her diary later reveals. She knows that she will be a better person for her experience if she survives the imprisonment. To her credit, she comes to understand Clegg and to have sympathy for him. Still, even with all of her education and class superiority, she cannot humanize him.

Clegg’s only emotion is that concerning the loss of his ideal. He has admired Miranda from afar and idealized her to be all that he believes a woman should be. When her reality and vitality cloud the picture, his admiration turns to disgust and gives him “permission” to treat her as a specimen to be chloroformed and photographed to suit his perverted tastes. In most of the photographs, he cuts off her head, symbolic of his repressed desire to see her merely as a beautiful body, without her willful intelligence.

Miranda’s diary breaks off with the words. “Do not let me die.” Clegg’s account picks up after that, first as a rationalization of his failure to prevent her from dying, which is also an unrealized admission of his inability to accept the call to the quest. When he goes to the doctor’s office, it is crowded with people and he does not have the courage to go straight in to see the doctor. Unnerved by the people and the look of the doctor, he flees; the result is that Miranda dies. At first it bothers him terribly, and he romantically imagines killing himself so that the two can lie together forever. Even this notion soon passes, however, as he begins to find fault with her, eventually blaming her for her own death.

His final chilling thoughts of his next victim, a girl he has already identified specifically to avoid making the mistake he made with Miranda of “aiming too high,” demonstrate the repetition of the cycle that will be Clegg’s life: Unable to quest toward self-understanding, he is doomed to repeat himself.

THE MAGUS

First published: 1965

Type of work: Novel

A young man journeys to a small Greek island, where he experiences many adventures under the watchful eye of his guide, Maurice Conchis.

The Magus was the first novel Fowles wrote, although not the first that he published. After working on it for many years, he finally released it for publication in 1965. Despite its success, Fowles remained dissatisfied with the novel and subsequently revised it for republication in 1977. It is an important work for its portrayal of the protagonist trapped in a meaningless world who must learn to choose life and love, and for its use of myth and mystery to define what is lacking in the protagonist’s life. The Greek island setting is important as the other world in which the journey takes place; likewise, it was important to Fowles as the place where his journey as a writer began.

Nicholas Urfe is the protagonist who becomes the quester. Fleeing England and the love of Alison, he journeys to Greece to find adventure and to escape his commitments. Adventure he does find, but not in the form he expected. He seeks mystery with a small “m”; what he finds is Mystery with a capital “M”: the mystery of himself, which he learns as he quests.

His guide for the journey is Maurice Conchis, who has already taken the journey of self-discovery and who has knowledge to impart to others. As in all of Fowles’s fiction, one of the central themes of this novel is that of unmasking. Each person hides behind many masks; the question is knowing which is the real person. Conchis wears many masks as part of the “godgame” he prepares and presents for Nicholas’s education. Various characters are unmasked, leading up to the unmasking of Nicholas in the central trial scene and the announcement that he is now one of the “elect.” Nicholas knows that he has been exposed and feels changed, but he does not fully comprehend the extent of the change. Thus, as he is evicted from the realm of myth and returned to the real world of London, he comes slowly to understand that the final challenge of the quest will be a reunion with Alison, whom he had earlier rejected.

Since so much of Fowles's fiction measures the success of the quester in terms of the ability to know and experience love, Nicholas is given the opportunity to demonstrate his changed relationship toward women and to continue to learn from several women: Lily de Seitas, the mother of the twins who play such an important role in the Greek island adventure; Jojo, the young waif he takes in and who falls in love with him; and Kemp, the crusty landlady who is actually one of his guides on the quest. Finally, with the breaking of the plate, the gift that Mrs. de Seitas has given him, and an almost-tearful scene involving Nicholas that subsequently and inexplicably occurs, Kemp knows that Nicholas is ready to receive Alison again, and she arranges it.

Whether they reunite or separate is not important to Fowles, although it continues to remain important to his readers. What matters in terms of Nicholas's quest is how far he has come in his ability to know and want love and in his ability to share. His journey will continue, with Alison or perhaps with someone else.

What may make this novel such a perennial favorite on college campuses are the techniques Fowles uses to present the tale. The story is told in a first-person narrative by Nicholas after the events have taken place; he nonetheless reveals only what he knew at any given point in the story. Readers tend to want to decipher the truth or mystery of the events just as Nicholas does. They share Nicholas's surprise, shock, and fear at the strange twists and turns of events. Thus, as Fowles hopes his fiction will do, the book has the potential to change readers. When Nicholas does not tell the new American quester, Briggs, what he will really experience on the island of Bourani, so, too, the reader is as likely not to tell a friend what he or she will experience when reading this book. The adventure awaits each reader.

THE FRENCH LIEUTENANT'S WOMAN

First published: 1969

Type of work: Novel

A nineteenth century gentleman abandons the woman to whom he is engaged in order to pursue "the French lieutenant's woman," who, meanwhile, has mysteriously fled.

Charles Smithson, the protagonist of The French Lieutenant's Woman, is very much like Nicholas Urfe of The Magus. He is well-born and well-bred and should be in an excellent position to enjoy the fruits of life, but he finds himself vaguely dissatisfied. Thinking that marriage to the clever Ernestina Freeman will provide the sense of fulfillment his life lacks, he is quickly dissuaded of this notion upon his instant attraction to Sarah Woodruff, the "French lieutenant's woman."

She is Mystery with a capital "M," and her separate world, which she has created for herself with her fabricated tale of sexual encounter with the French lieutenant, gives her the freedom the nineteenth century setting and her circumstances would not otherwise provide. She and the Undercliff that she frequents become the mythic landscape, the otherworld that Charles enters in search of adventure, just as Nicholas enters Bourani in The Magus.

Both Charles and Sarah are trapped in roles that neither wants. Sarah has the education of a well-bred lady but her lower social standing keeps her in the working class. Charles is a gentleman, but he chafes at the rigid world he inhabits. Unknown to him is his longing to break free. His hobby is the study of fossils trapped by the receding seas when the world changed. Likewise, his place in history is at a turning point in the world, at the end of the Victorian era. The question that the novel poses is whether Charles, like his echinoderm fossils, will be trapped as the world changes or will be able to break free.

Commerce is on the rise, and even while Charles does not expect that he will have to work to earn a living, he is surprised to find that his uncle, from whom he has expected to receive a handsome inheritance, has remarried, dimming Charles's chances of living the life of perpetual ease. Even so, he declines an offer by Mr. Freeman, Ernestina's father, to come into the world of business, feeling ill-suited for this endeavor.

Charles believes in a Darwinian view of the world and enjoys arguing about this new scientific view with Dr. Grogan; but the scientific pursuit of knowledge does not fully satisfy him, which explains why he is so easily and surprisingly taken by the mysterious woman he first sees at the end of the quay in Lyme Regis. The pursuit of Sarah becomes his obsession. In discovering the "Sarah" within him, he discovers his ability to feel love. As is true of many Fowles characters, this is the mark of his progress on the journey. Charles chooses, as the questing hero must, to give up certainty and reputation (marriage to Ernestina) to pursue the unknown (Sarah) and all that it might hold.

Freedom of choice, freedom for the individual, is a major concern in this novel as well as in others by Fowles. What is particularly compelling in The French Lieutenant's Woman is Fowles's use of the Victorian setting and the form of the Victorian novel, complete with intrusions by the author to comment on the action and even change the ending. The first "ending" comes in the middle of the novel, so it comes as no surprise that this is not really the ending but rather a device to show what the traditional Victorian ending to the tale would be: Charles's decision to avoid the temptation of Sarah and to marry Ernestina and live out his lot in life.

Having dispensed with the traditional Victorian ending, Fowles steps in to inform the reader that it was a myth. So saying, he returns Charles to the pivotal moment of choice, and this time Charles chooses to get off the train in Exeter to go find Sarah, who he knows is there. They do meet in a brief sexual encounter, but when Charles learns that she has fabricated a turned ankle to get him into her room, he flees her in disgust. Later, realizing that he has been rash and determining to break off his engagement to Ernestina to marry Sarah (something a gentleman does not do), he finds, on his return, that Sarah has mysteriously left. The rest of the novel focuses on Charles's growing awareness of his feelings, which his desire for Sarah represents.

Two more endings conclude the novel. In both, Charles and Sarah meet each other once again, just as Nicholas and Alison meet again in the conclusion to The Magus. In the first ending, the couple are reunited through the intercession of the child born of that brief sexual encounter. In the second and final ending, the one Fowles hoped readers would accept as the most real, the clock is turned back and Charles and Sarah are again reunited, only to part. As Charles once again flees from Sarah, he knows that he must begin again, as though reborn. Yet he knows that he is not a trapped echinoderm but a man who has broken free into a new world of choices. Although Sarah cannot be the object of his love, he now has found "an atom of faith in himself," and the future, with all of its potential, awaits him.

THE EBONY TOWER

First published: 1974

Type of work: Novella, short stories, and translation

Fowles translates a twelfth century romance about a questing knight who resurrects a princess from a deadly sleep, then contrasts that tale with his own stories about twentieth century characters who are less successful in pursuing their personal quests.

The Ebony Tower includes the title novella, three short stories, and the author's translation of Marie de France's Eliduc, a twelfth century romance. Eliduc is included in the volume because it is a source of inspiration for the other stories. In this medieval romance the knight leaves his faithful wife, Guildelüec, to travel to a foreign land where he falls in love with the ravishingly beautiful princess, Guilliadun. After some trials and tribulations, including the miraculous resurrection of the princess from a deathly sleep, the story ends happily with the marriage of the princess and the knight and Guildelüec's gracious acquiescence in her new status as former wife. Absolving Eliduc of any blame for falling in love with the princess, Guiddelüec becomes a nun.

In the title novella, the protagonist, David Williams, a British abstract painter and art critic, has left his faithful wife at home to travel to France to interview the renowned artist Henry Breastley, a representational painter who detests the kind of abstract art in which David believes. Living with Breastley are two young women; one of them is a modern version of the “princess” who needs to be rescued. At the crucial moment, David discovers that he is no modern-day Eliduc who can muster the courage to overcome convention and rescue this damsel in distress. The story concludes with a disillusioned David returning to his wife and realizing that he is only “surviving” and not really living.

In “Poor Koko” an elderly scholar recounts how a young burglar surprised him in a country cottage where he was attempting to finish writing his manuscript about a nineteenth century novelist. The burglar tied him up but did not hurt him. The scholar was shocked, though, when the burglar destroyed his manuscript. The scholar ponders this puzzling act and presents various unconvincing explanations for it.

“The Enigma” also ends without solving the mystery at the heart of the story. John Marcus Fielding, a Conservative member of Parliament, disappears without a trace, and a police detective named Jennings investigates the case. Jennings interviews Isobel Dodgson, the former girlfriend of Fielding’s son. Jennings and Dodgson become romantically involved, and Jennings loses all interest in his investigation. In Fowles’s ironic reenvisioning of the detective story, a genre that requires that the mystery be solved, romance seems to be more important than a solution to the mystery.

The final work, “The Cloud,” is a discursive story about a diverse group of British people picnicking in rural France. Near the end of the story, an alienated woman named Catherine, whose husband has committed suicide, tells her young niece a rambling story of a princess who is waiting for her prince to rescue her and “just love her for herself.” Later Catherine wanders away from her fellow picnickers. When one of their group, a man named Peter, finds her, the two have sex, and Peter returns to the group while Catherine does not. Then the group, except for Catherine, leaves under an ominous cloud. The story concludes with these words:

“The princess calls, but there is no one, now, to hear her.” That final metaphoric sentence is an apt conclusion not only for “The Cloud” but also for this collection of stories.

DANIEL MARTIN

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

A middle-aged screenwriter living in Hollywood is called back to England to his dying friend’s bedside and there returns to his first love, the man’s wife.

In his fourth novel, Daniel Martin, Fowles writes his first happy ending. The protagonist, Daniel Martin, a writer and alter ego for Fowles, struggles throughout the novel with the concept of the happy ending and whether the late twentieth century world can accept it. He finally decides, as his own life reveals to him, that the happy ending is possible. The route to that decision forms the action of the novel. At the same time, Daniel’s story becomes Daniel Martin, the novel Daniel has wanted to write.

The quester has now come of age; in fact, he is middle-aged. His dilemma is like that of the questers of the earlier novels whose stories were of younger men confronting issues of choice and freedom. Once again, the protagonist is a man who seems to have everything. In this case, his “everything” is a successful life as a playwright and now screenwriter in Hollywood and a beautiful young actress for a lover. Yet the same longing and sense of incompleteness are within him, just as they are within Nicholas and Charles in Fowles’s previous novels. For Daniel, the call to the quest comes in the form of a phone call that returns him to the bedside of his former best friend, who is now dying. Returning to England, he is faced with the unfinished business of his life. With Anthony’s suicide, the way is cleared for him to become reunited with Jane, his true love and now Anthony’s widow. Daniel sees his opportunity to come alive again; Jane resists.

To know where they began, Fowles takes the action back to their college days at Oxford and to the deep bond of friendship among four friends: Anthony, Jane, Jane's sister, and Daniel. Although Daniel and Jane come to realize that they love each other, Daniel makes the "correct" choice (the same choice Fowles presents in the first ending of The French Lieutenant's Woman) and marries the one he is "supposed" to marry, not the one he loves. That marriage ends in divorce, and although Jane stays married to Anthony until his death, their marriage does not provide the true depth of feeling that she might have had with Daniel.

Once Daniel has rediscovered the significant moments and sacred places in his past, he longs to find these places and moments again. Thus, the journey moves into the present and the future with Daniel's invitation to Jane to take a trip with him. Fittingly, the trip is a journey up the Nile, which symbolizes lost worlds as well as the potential for a future world with Jane. From that journey, in which he explores much about his feelings for Jane and his own feelings, he persuades Jane to continue with him to Palmyra, an ancient city of wealth and prosperity now in ruins. Again the symbolism of place is apparent: Their arrival in the wasteland of Palmyra can symbolize either what they will become or the potential to turn their own wasteland into a garden if they can escape the bonds that separate them. They do the latter in Jane's symbolic burial of her wedding ring in the sands of the desert. Thus, with her ties to the past severed and with their earlier ties to each other revived, they journey together into the future. The only unfinished business for Daniel is to let Jenny, his Hollywood lover, gently go. The last scene of this first novel with a happy ending places Daniel and Jane in the kitchen together, the quintessential picture of home, talking about the novel Daniel can now write—which is in fact the one the reader has just read.

SUMMARY

The whole body of John Fowles's fiction can be seen as variations on the theme of quest as discovery, which Fowles sees as at the heart of literature dating back to the twelfth century. Fowles gives that theme a distinctly modern twist with his psychological examination of characters in search of meaning in a meaningless world. The successful questers learn to choose freely; the unsuccessful ones remain trapped in roles they merely play out over the course of their lives.

The freedom of choice is more important to Fowles than any specific choices his characters make, which is why he tries to give his characters so much choice. It is also why he writes open endings and multiple endings in some of his novels. Not only are his characters left to choose for themselves, but so, too, are his readers.

Carol M. Barnum; updated by Allan Chavkin

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Collector, 1963

The Magus, 1965, 1977

The French Lieutenant's Woman, 1969

Daniel Martin, 1977

Mantissa, 1982

A Maggot, 1985

POETRY:

Poems, 1973

NONFICTION:

The Aristos: A Self-Portrait in Ideas, 1964

Shipwreck, 1974

Islands, 1978

The Tree, 1979

The Enigma of Stonehenge, 1980 (with Barry Brukoff)

A Short History of Lyne Regis, 1982

Lyne Regis Camera, 1990

Wormholes: Essays and Occasional Writings, 1998

Conversations with John Fowles, 1999 (Dianne L. Vipond, editor)

The Journals, 2003 (Charles Drazin, editor; pb. in U.S. as The Journals: Volume 1, 1949-1965, 2005)

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Ebony Tower, 1974 (novella, 3 short stories, and translation of a French medieval romance)

About the Author

Acheson, James. John Fowles. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Aubrey, James R. John Fowles: A Reference Companion. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.

_____, ed. John Fowles and Nature: Fourteen Perspectives on Landscape. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1999.

Barnum, Carol M. The Fiction of John Fowles: A Myth for Our Time. Greenwood, Fla.: Penkevill, 1988.

Foster, Thomas C. Understanding John Fowles. Columbia: University of South Carolina, 1994.

Neary, John. Something and Nothingness: The Fiction of John Updike and John Fowles. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1992.

Onega, Susana. Form and Meaning in the Novels of John Fowles. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1989.

Reynolds, Margaret. John Fowles. New York: Vintage, 2003.

Salami, Mahmoud. John Fowles' Fiction and the Poetics of Postmodernism. Rutherford, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1992.

Warburton, Eileen. John Fowles: A Life in Two Worlds. New York: Viking, 2004.

Wilson, Thomas M. The Recurrent Green Universe of John Fowles. New York: Rodopi, 2006.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What is John Fowles's purpose in presenting the reader with different endings for The French Lieutenant's Woman instead of one definite ending? Which ending is most appropriate for the novel?
- In some of Fowles's works, such as The Ebony Tower, France and England symbolize two different outlooks or "lifestyles." What is Fowles suggesting by this opposition?
- What is the narrative and thematic significance of the "damsel in distress" motif in Fowles's work?
- Infidelity is a situation that occurs repeatedly in Fowles's work. What is Fowles's attitude toward infidelity? Do you agree?
- Examine gender roles in The French Lieutenant's Woman. Does the novel reinforce conventional assumptions about gender roles or challenge those assumptions?
- In "A Personal Note" that accompanies Fowles's translation of Eliduc in The Ebony Tower, he suggests that the type of medieval romance that he includes in this collection is "seminal in the history of fiction" and also in his own fiction. Explain Fowles's preoccupation with medieval romance and its influence in various ways on his short stories and novels.
- In The French Lieutenant's Woman, The Collector, and some of Fowles's other works (such as "Poor Koko"), the class status of the characters seems to be very important. Discuss what Fowles is suggesting about class divisions in the society of The French Lieutenant's Woman and some of his other works.
- Many of the conclusions of Fowles's stories are open-ended. Examine some of the endings and explain the thematic implications of concluding in this manner.

(Courtesy, George Graziller, Inc.)

JANET FRAME

Born: Dunedin, New Zealand

August 28, 1924

Died: Dunedin, New Zealand

January 29, 2004

Frame was one of New Zealand's greatest writers, who won numerous literary prizes worldwide for her novels, short stories, and poems.

BIOGRAPHY

Janet Paterson Frame was born in Dunedin, New Zealand, the third in a family of five children. George Samuel Frame, her father, worked as a railroad engineer, and the family moved frequently as his place of work changed. Her mother, Lottie Clarice Godfrey, had to raise a large family with little money. Despite difficult circumstances and childhood tragedies, Frame went on to become New Zealand's best-known writer since Katherine Mansfield.

Frame's compiled reflections, An Autobiography (1989), tells the poignant tale of young Janet—sensitive, intelligent, and gifted—growing up in the repressive atmosphere of provincial New Zealand. As a child, Frame watched her mother, a talented storyteller and poet, subjugate her life to her husband's needs and submit to his sometimes brutal moods. In spite of this, Lottie Frame managed to establish an atmosphere of intellectual liveliness in her household, where Janet and the other children were surrounded with poetry and stories. Janet created an inner world that allowed her to retreat into her imagination in self-defense as life became increasingly troublesome. In the world of her imagination there was no punishment for being original or different as there was at school and in society. At home, she and her sisters were beaten by their father for any signs of pubescent sexual curiosity. In small-town New Zealand in the 1930's no deviation from acceptable behavior was tolerated and people were rigidly stratified into social and economic classes.

During these years, Frame also experienced family tragedy. Her brother, Bruddie, was epileptic—a disease that was not understood at the time—and he was punished when he could not control his fits. In 1937, Janet's eldest sister, Myrtle, drowned in the local swimming pool. A few years later, her younger sister, Isabel, also drowned while swimming in Picton Sound. These were terrible blows to Frame. She transformed her suffering into fiction and poetry, and around the time of Myrtle's death one of Janet's poems won a prize. Increasingly, Frame longed to live in her dreams, in spite of being a practical child who loved mathematics. Later, she longed for recognition as an artist in a world where creativity was suspected and scorned.

Frame found recognition when she went to a teachers' college in Dunedin. While there, she developed a romantic attachment to a male teacher who recognized her talent and intelligence. Owing in part to his glorification of the mental illness of the painter Vincent van Gogh and other creative geniuses, Frame sought his affection and interest by playing with insanity. This, in addition to her growing fear that the life and identity she was creating for herself would never allow her to express her passion for writing, resulted in severe depression and a suicide attempt. She was subsequently institutionalized for eight years, diagnosed as schizophrenic. Frame underwent extensive electroshock treatment and was only saved by the publication of her first collection of short stories, The Lagoon (1951), which won a prominent award.

After leaving the asylum, Frame became friends with Frank Sargeson, a New Zealand short-story writer, who gave her a place to live and encouraged her to write. For the first time in her life she met people who valued literature and recognized her talent. She was now free to live simply and to write. She finished her first novel, Owls Do Cry (1957), a fictionalized account of her traumatic childhood and early adulthood, and was awarded a grant to travel. After a period in London, she went to Paris and Barcelona, and then returned to England. While in London she sought professional psychiatric help and discovered that she had been misdiagnosed and was not schizophrenic. This news was problematic, for she now had to cope with the loss of an identity that had ironically become a comfort to her. Her psychiatrist helped her to realize a new identity through her writing, encouraging her to recount her experience in mental institutions. Frame finished Faces in the Water (1961) during this period. Upon hearing that her father had suddenly died, she returned to New Zealand, where she remained until she died of acute myeloid leukemia in Dunedin on January 29, 2004.

During her lifetime, Frame received numerous awards and honors for her work. She was made a Commander of the Order of British Empire in 1983; won the Commonwealth Writers' Prize for Best Book for her novel The Carpathians (1988) in 1989; and in 1990 was admitted to the Order of New Zealand by Queen Elizabeth II. Shortly before her death, she received the New Zealand Prime Minister's Award for Literary Achievement.

ANALYSIS

Frame will be remembered not only for her novels, short stories, and poems but also for her autobiography, which has been called one of the greatest autobiographies of the twentieth century, and which was made into a film, An Angel at My Table (1990), directed by Jane Campion.

Although Frame's work often deals with insanity, it would be simplistic to classify her novels as the literature of madness. Readers will discover in her work a continual resistance to enclosure in any such category. She evades classification. She has been called a surrealist, a magical realist, a postcolonial writer, and a postmodern feminist. Her writing encompasses much but takes no fixed point of view. She is a protean voice from the inner world of insanity which, as a refuge from an outer world of oppression, allows her to speak the truth about insanity and about the experience of those thought to be insane. She reflects this truth facet by facet, examining language in its relation to meaning and memory, being in relation to language and the self, and insanity from the standpoint of the self's integrity. All this results in a manifestation of the spirit that is sometimes lyrical and poetic, sometimes strange and humorous, often apocalyptic and extraordinary.

Frame's unusual thematic material is evident in her earliest works. Her first published novels, Owls Do Cry and Faces in the Water, are semiautobiographical accounts of her difficult early years. Frame said in her autobiography that when she wrote Faces in the Water she omitted a lot because she was afraid of appearing too dramatic. Even so, the book is a chilling rendition of life in a mental institution, including the nightmare of receiving shock treatment. Her description of these sessions with the so-called new electric treatment tells of being obliterated, of being ripped away from recognizable reality. Frame apparently received massive doses of electric shock two hundred times in eight years. Such treatment was given without anesthesia and to many it is more like legalized torture than medical science. These repeated traumas were perhaps the origins of Frame's extended examination of the nature of language and reality. For example, in describing the shock treatment, she wrote in Faces in the Water: "It is time to leave the words themselves and parachute to their meaning in the dark earth and seas below."

Faces in the Water is written as a straightforward narrative and is closest in tone to Frame's autobiography. The style that is most characteristic of her subsequent novels first appears in Owls Do Cry, the title of which comes from William Shakespeare's play The Tempest (pr. 1611, pb. 1623). The main characters in the novel are based indirectly on the author's family and her own early experience. In the novel, Francie's life has parallels to Frame's older sister Myrtle; Toby is an epileptic, like her brother Bruddie; and Daphne is put in an asylum. Daphne represents an alternative life Frame might have had if her writing had not saved her. After her stay in the asylum Daphne goes to work in the wool mills and advances as a “normal person.” Before her “strange fancies” are taken from her, Daphne often speaks in a voice that is poetic and tragic, giving a good indication of what Frame’s inner world might have been like. At the opening of the novel are these lyrical and disturbing words: “But what use the green river, the gold place, if time and death pinned human in the pocket of my land not rest from taking underground the green all-willowed and white rose and bean flower and morning mist picnic of song in pepper-pot breast of thrush?” This style of writing is often encountered in Frame’s work and indicates the degree to which she presses at the limits of language.

In Owls Do Cry, Frame develops powerful and complex images that recur throughout her work. One of these is the image of fire, including electrical fire, reminiscent of shock treatment. In the novel, the children spend time playing at a rubbish dump where they find treasures. However, Francie, the eldest, is accidentally burned to death at the dump. Francie, like Frame’s own sister Myrtle, was sexually precocious and the image of fire recalls the Christian idea of burning in Hell for sin. As such images recur in Frame’s work, they begin to function like symbols that have many meanings and that are very suggestive poetically.

Owls Do Cry and Faces in the Water are a lasting and powerful testament to what Frame called “the brutality that lurks under a conspiracy of decency.” This theme is present in many of her subsequent novels and stories, and much of her literary career was spent in articulating an alternate vision of life, whereby the normal appears strange and even absurd, while the abnormal seems closer to the truth of authentic experience.

Another central theme in Frame’s work concerns the effects of colonialism and its aftermath. New Zealand was a colony of Britain from 1841 until 1947. For white New Zealanders, England represented the cultural and geographical center, while New Zealand was a mere colony at the extreme edge of the world. Frame examines this motif in many works, but most thoroughly in The Edge of the Alphabet (1962). The degree to which Frame succeeded in gaining a large international readership suggests that this colonial sense of cultural inferiority was unnecessary and outmoded. As her fame spread, and as she garnered prestigious prizes for her work, Frame became an increasingly important voice in the world of literature.

THE EDGE OF THE ALPHABET

First published: 1962

Type of work: Novel

Toby Withers, an epileptic from New Zealand, travels to London to become a writer. On the way, he meets Zoe Bryce, a spinster schoolteacher, and Pat Keenan, an Irish bus driver, both of whom, in different ways, are also seeking a purpose for their lives.

The Edge of the Alphabet was written after Frame’s travels to England and, like her other novels, contains elements of autobiography. The novel is narrated by Thora Pattern, one of many elusive impostor narrators to be encountered in Frame’s novels. She tells the story of Toby Withers (the same name, but not the same character as in Owls Do Cry), who is an epileptic New Zealander traveling to London to find his “center.” Equally important are Zoe Bryce, an English spinster schoolteacher, and Pat Keenan, an Irish bus driver. What they all have in common is their marginality, something that many of Frame’s characters possess. Marginality can be defined as a distance from a privileged center, whether that distance be social (the misfit or outcast), economic (the poor or the working class), political (the unsophisticated colonial), or sexual (the unloved spinster). Frame’s novels often explore the process and effects of marginalization.

The edge of the alphabet is a metaphor for what is peripheral or marginalized, and it works on several levels. Toby, for instance, is marginalized by his epilepsy. He is not normal, not acceptable to other people. Even in his inner world, he is alienated from his central self by his fragmenting epileptic fits. He is further marginalized by being a New Zealander, someone far from the geographical “center” that England represents. When Toby mentions in England that he is from New Zealand, people ask him if that is somewhere in Australia. For people at the “center,” the periphery is inconsequential. In traveling to the center—London—Toby is also looking for his self, a self from which he is distanced by inner and outer conditions. Thora Pattern, the narrator, asks, “And what if we meet ourselves on the edge of the Alphabet and can make no sign, no speech?” For some, living far from the “center” deprives them of the possibility of fitting in with others, or even with themselves. Marginalization denies legitimacy. Nevertheless, a central argument in the book and a general one in all of Frame’s novels is that the absence of a center is legitimated as a part of human experience. From one standpoint, as Toby says, “Everybody comes from the other side of the world.” There is no real “center.” London is simply “the other side.”

The primary reason for Toby’s trip is to write his book The Lost Tribe. London represents for him the center of writing (the alphabet), just as New Zealand symbolizes the edge. At the center, Toby hopes to be able to control and master words, but as he sits down to write in his exercise book, he discovers that, even at the center, language is elusive. Toby’s inability to write The Lost Tribe comes to represent the absence of centrality, since for him the center turns out to be no better than the margin. Furthermore, to complete a book suggests closure, and that is seen to be an illusion, an obstacle to the truth of self-realization as a continual process. In the end, Toby returns to New Zealand, where, ironically, he is more acceptable after having been overseas.

THE CARPATHIANS

First published: 1988

Type of work: Novel

Mattina Brecon, a rich editor from New York City, travels to New Zealand for a holiday. She gets to know the inhabitants of Kowhai Street in Puamahara, a small town, and witnesses the rain of the alphabet and the death of the memory of the people on that street.

The Carpathians is one of Frame’s later novels. In this work Frame has fully developed the themes found in her earlier books. These themes include the imposture of the writer and of language itself, postcolonial New Zealand, and the experience of insanity.

The Carpathians has an impostor narrator, Dinah Wheatstone. In the novel multiple narrative voices take turns assuming the role of author or central authority. The reader assumes the novelist is JHB, a writer and husband of Mattina Brecon, but finds out at the end that it is her son John Henry, who announces that both his parents died when he was young, and that he never knew them. This series of illusory authors describing illusive experience becomes an analogy for mistaken notions of reality.

Mattina begins the narrative by recounting her trip to the town of Puamahara, where she rents a house on Kowhai Street. Mattina becomes acquainted with her neighbors and meets Dinah Wheatstone (Dinny), a self-proclaimed impostor and novelist. Mattina agrees to read Dinny’s manuscript and, in part two, the narrative voice shifts to Dinny, who describes herself as a graduate impostor and who denies the “existence of anything, of anywhere and anytime.” In the course of the novel the reader becomes familiar, one by one, with the “ordinary, extraordinary” people of Kowhai Street. At the same time, Mattina begins to experience what she calls the presence of the disorder of space and time.

Mattina is awakened one night by cries in the street. Her neighbors are being destroyed in a deadly rain of words and letters, which are falling on them as seed and jewels and excrement. The rain is the letters of all the languages of the world, and the work of “transforming being, thought and language” has begun. The people are reduced to primitive, prelinguistic sounds. Within these sounds there is “a new music, each note effortlessly linking the next, like dew-drops or mercury.” The people of Kowhai Street experience the disaster of “the unknowing and unbeing that accompanies death.” The following morning all the inhabitants, including the impostor novelist, are dead. Only Mattina survives.

Mattina returns to New York. Before she goes, she buys Kowhai Street—a reminder of America’s new economic power. Mattina dies soon after, but not before asking her husband to go to see her new property in New Zealand. She also asks him to visit a former inhabitant of Kowhai Street, Decima Townsend, who is autistic and who lives in a mental institution outside town. Jake visits New Zealand but is unable to learn anything about what really happened at Kowhai Street, since everyone has either forgotten about it or denies the calamity occurred. In the end, the memory of truth is kept alive only by the “Housekeepers of Ancient Springtime”: the insane, the poets, who live at the edge of the alphabet.

YOU ARE NOW ENTERING THE HUMAN HEART

First published: 1983

Type of work: Short stories

The title story of the collection is set in Philadelphia. A visitor to a museum sees a large replica of a human heart, made to allow children to see the passage of a single blood cell. The visitor then watches a teacher giving a lesson on snakes.

“You Are Now Entering the Human Heart” is a macabre tale of an elderly schoolteacher who permits a harmless snake to be wrapped around her neck in order to demonstrate to her class that there is no reason for fear. As she sits, trying to overcome her revulsion for the sake of impressing her class, the reader sees into her inner world, her heart. She is old and will soon retire to a life of fear and solitude, afraid to go out onto the streets of Philadelphia. She has no reason to learn not to fear snakes, but she is willing to lie for her class. The children remain too scared to touch the snake, but the teacher’s mask slips when the snake moves its head close to hers. She involuntarily throws the snake from her and shatters the illusion she has created. The children, who a moment before were filled with admiration, now see their teacher helplessly exposed.

The violence of casting the snake away is symbolic of the violence with which Frame casts away illusion. She has had to learn to balance her extreme sensitivity with her ferocious integrity.

“Keel and Kool” is the story of a New Zealand family taking an outing after the death of the eldest daughter, Eva. “Keel and kool” is the sound made by seagulls crying in the sky. In the story it becomes a lament for the death of Eva, Winnie’s older sister. This may be interpreted as a reference to Frame’s older sister, Myrtle, as autobiographical detail is mixed with fantasy.

Eva’s best friend Joan has come on the picnic. The two girls go off to play, and Joan starts telling Winnie things that Eva had told her. Eva and she had had secrets. As Joan talks about her friendship with Eva, Winnie knows that they shared things she and Eva never shared. This heightens her grief, and she turns on Joan, calling her a liar. In the next moments she tries to come to grips with the permanence of her loss. She climbs a tree and listens to the seagulls cry. Her mother never talks of death. She always says Eva has passed away, “as if it were not death really, only pretend.”

Winnie learns the truth from the seagulls’ cry: Eva is gone, and will never come again. A child rejects the lies of the adult world in favor of the truth. Frame’s preoccupation with truth and falsehood pervades her writings.

“The Terrible Screaming” is a story about a town where one night terrible screaming is heard but everyone lies about it. The screaming begins one night and then continues. All the people in the town are afraid to admit that they heard the screams because they think others will consider them insane. They continue to live as if they hear nothing. One day a distinguished stranger visits the town and hears the screaming. The head of the welcoming committee denies the screams, and the stranger is sent to an asylum. The screaming continues unacknowledged. At the end of the story readers learn that the screaming is called Silence.

This story, in its use of allegory, resembles a fable. It is also a sketch of what develops into a major theme in Frame's novels: the insane live close to the truth, while the sane live in a world where truth is denied. Those who speak the truth are brutalized, locked up, or marginalized.

SUMMARY

Janet Frame, in her novels, stories, poems, and autobiographies, transmitted a harrowing vision of death and resurrection and the spiritual power of language. She affirmed the purity and strength of being against the dark antithesis of human mediocrity, confusion, and dishonesty. She transmuted the cruelty and unspeakable suffering of her early life into a worldly wisdom and humor, an affirmation of life itself. Hers was a unique and enduring literary legacy.

Tina Kane

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Owls Do Cry, 1957

Faces in the Water, 1961

The Edge of the Alphabet, 1962

Scented Gardens for the Blind, 1963

The Adaptable Man, 1965

A State of Siege, 1966

The Rainbirds, 1968 (also known as Yellow Flowers in the Antipodean Room)

Intensive Care, 1970

Daughter Buffalo, 1972

Living in the Maniototo, 1979

The Carpathians, 1988

SHORT FICTION:

The Lagoon, 1951

Snowman, Snowman: Fables and Fantasies, 1962

The Reservoir: Stories and Sketches, 1963

You Are Now Entering the Human Heart, 1983

POETRY:

The Pocket Mirror, 1967

Janet Frame, Stories and Poems, 2004

The Goose Bath, 2006 (Pamela Gordon, editor)

NONFICTION:

To the Is-Land, 1982

An Angel at My Table, 1984

The Envoy from Mirror City, 1985

An Autobiography, 1989 (includes the previous 3 volumes)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How did the events of Janet Frame's life give support to her "resistance to enclosure"?
- Consider whether Frame gains any literary advantages from working in a nation so remote from the Western world.
- What is most beneficial about marginalization?
- What is an "impostor narrator," and what is the function of the impostor narrator in The Carpathians?
- Is Frame contending that the sane have no reliable access to the truth?

Janet Frame

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Mona Minim and the Smell of the Sun, 1969

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Janet Frame Reader, 1995 (Carole Ferrier, editor)

About the Author

Ashcroft, Bill, et al., eds. The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literatures. New York: Routledge, Chapman & Hall, 1989.

Delbaere, Jeanne, ed. The Ring of Fire: Essays on Janet Frame. Sydney, N.S.W.: Dangaroo Press, 1992.

Evans, Patrick. Janet Frame. Boston: Twayne, 1977.

King, Michael. An Inward Sun: The World of Janet Frame. Auckland, New Zealand: Penguin Books, 2002.

_____. Wrestling with an Angel: A Life of Janet Frame. Washington, D.C.: Counterpoint, 2000.

Oettli-van Delden, Simone. Surfaces of Strangeness: Janet Frame and the Rhetoric of Madness. Wellington, New Zealand: Victorian University Press, 2003.

Panny, Judith Dell. I Have What I Gave. New York: George Braziller, 1993. Rev. ed. Palmerston North, New Zealand: Dunmore Press, 2002.

Ross, Robert L., ed. International Literature in English: Essays on the Major Writers. New York: Garland, 1991.

Wilkse, Maria. Materialisations of a Woman Writer: Investigating Janet Frame's Biographical Legend. New York: P. Lang, 2006.

AP/Wide World Photos

DICK FRANCIS

Born: Lawrenny, near Tenby, Pembrokeshire, Wales
October 31, 1920

Francis has helped raise the literary status of the mystery genre through highly informed exploration of the subject he knows best: the diverse world of thoroughbred horse racing.

BIOGRAPHY

Richard Stanley Francis was born in Wales on October 31, 1920, the son of George Vincent and Catherine Mary Francis. His father, a powerful influence in Francis's life, had been a professional steeplechase jockey and later a riding instructor to royalty. Francis later dramatized in his novels his love-hate relationship with his demanding father.

Francis quit school at age fifteen in order to work with horses. His ambition was to become a steeplechase jockey like his father and to outperform his father in that dangerous profession. When he later became a writer, he had to work hard to make up for his scholastic deficiencies.

He postponed his career as a jockey when World War II began, joining the Royal Air Force in 1940, hoping to become a pilot. For a long time he had to be content with working ground crew but eventually overcame such obstacles as his limited education and learned to fly fighters, troop-carrying gliders, and bombers. His enthusiasm for this dangerous but exciting branch of military service was characteristic.

Francis married Mary Brenchley at war's end. He rode his first steeplechase at age twenty-five, but not until he had ridden thirty-nine races did he experience his first win. By the end of the racing season in 1947, he had ridden nine winners and was thinking of turning professional when he had a major riding accident.

Physical pain and injuries are constant topics in Francis's novels. His novels' protagonists display a jockey's indifference to such punishment. Francis writes from experience. During his career he suffered twelve broken collarbones, five broken noses, many broken ribs, three crushed vertebrae, a fractured skull, several broken arms and wrists, and a ruptured spleen. He retired in 1957 after a very bad fall, having decided he was getting too old for such punishment and wishing to quit while still at the top of his profession.

At the peak of his career, Francis was riding in three hundred to four hundred races annually. During the 1953-1954 racing season he earned the title of Champion Jockey for winning seventy-six races. He was noted for his bravery and empathy with his mounts. His love of horses is the common factor in his dual careers of jockey and novelist.

One major disappointment of Francis's life was his failure to win England's most prestigious sweepstakes event, the Grand National. In the 1956 Grand National, while riding Queen Mary's horse, Devon Loch, eleven lengths ahead of the nearest contender, his mount faltered only thirty yards short of the finish line in front of a cheering crowd of 250,000. Devon Loch's mysterious collapse and his resultant injuries helped influence Francis's choice of a second career as a mystery writer and also influenced many of the plots he created.

His fame enabled Francis to make a good sum of money writing his autobiography, The Sport of Queens: The Autobiography of Dick Francis (1957, revised 1968, 1974, 1982, 1988). This writing experience, as arduous and painful psychologically as some of his spills and recuperations, made it possible for him to become a racing correspondent for the London Sunday Express. His journalism experience was invaluable to his career as a novelist. Encouraged by his wife, he learned to use simple, concrete English. When he published Dead Cert in 1962, he was already a competent professional writer.

One of the most traumatic events of Francis's life was his wife Mary being stricken with polio in 1949 and having to live in an artificial respirator. He dramatized the incident in his award-winning novel Forfeit (1968). Fortunately, unlike the woman in the novel, Mary recovered from the disease and lived a normal life, bearing two sons and working as Francis's researcher and collaborator. The couple enjoyed world travel but made their permanent home in the Caribbean (a partial setting for Forfeit). Francis's fiction often contains disguised autobiography, a dramatization of personal experiences and emotions that heightens the power of his novels and their reader appeal. The couple also conducted research through experience. The Francis's own private air-charter business provided the background for Rat Race (1970), Mary took up painting for In the Frame (1976), and both spent time in pharmacological laboratories preparing for Banker (1982). Twice Shy (1981) draws inspiration from Francis's son Felix, a physics teacher, while Driving Force (1992) draws on his son Merrick's experiences in the horse transport business.

Over the years, Francis became sophisticated, self-confident, and cosmopolitan. These changes are reflected in the settings of his novels and the characters with whom his protagonists interact. Francis, who wrote his first novel because "the carpets were wearing thin, the house needed painting, and the boys needed educating," became a millionaire who could be depended upon to produce a best seller every year. In 1983, he was knighted, receiving the Order of the British Empire for his achievements as horseman and author. After Mary Francis's death in 2000, Dick Francis stopped writing, but in 2006, with his son Felix acting as researcher and manager, he returned to his serial character Sid Halley with Under Orders (2006), one of his best, with its focus on determination in the face of injury and loss.

Dead Heat, published in September, 2007, brings together food poisoning and a terrorist bomb with a chef and restaurateur as amateur detective. In the year following the book's appearance, Francis had open-heart surgery to insert a new valve, fractured his pelvis in a fall, and suffered severe circulatory problems, resulting in the amputation of his right leg.

ANALYSIS

Although Dick Francis has only two sustained heroes, Sid Halley and Kit Fielding, he accomplishes the more difficult feat of creating a sustained subject: horse racing (especially steeplechasing), an inherently appealing topic because of its action, color, and danger and the aura of glamour and glory left over from when courageous horses were an essential part of warfare.

Francis's novels are told in the first person with strikingly similar underlying plot formulas: some unknown villain threatening the world of thoroughbred racing through skullduggery. The hero must uncover this villain's identity, while, in turn, the power-hungry villain, often an aggressive social climber, takes increasingly drastic steps to protect his anonymity. Excruciating abuse only strengthens the resolve of Francis's heroes. The villain's identity usually comes as a big surprise, as it does in the classic English mystery novel. The fact that Francis reworks this same basic story in varied ways reveals his conservative nature. His heroes embody his own old-fashioned values of British fair play, hard work, loyalty, honesty, modesty, courtesy, diplomacy, monogamy, and patriotism. He believes that good must ultimately triumph over evil even though it may seem that good is always on the defensive and that evil sprouts a hundred heads for every one lopped off. Francis reassures readers that the world is a safe place where justice triumphs over injustice and truth over falsehood. As a consequence, over the years he has had to subject his amateur detectives to increasing mental and physical torment and make the triumph of justice a very near thing, because his long-term readers are too sure the heroes will come out all right in the end.

Francis is a prolific writer, and for many years he published an average of one novel a year, his research often assisted by his wife. His mysteries, in the classic English tradition, feature an amateur detective who becomes involved in a tight little world in which there is a strictly limited number of suspects. As an amateur detective, the hero is motivated by principle or by sympathy for the victim. Going against a deep grain of English culture, he is also egalitarian, moving easily between classes, admiring competences of different types, suggesting involvement in challenging tasks as a way out of delinquency, despising the selfish, the greedy, the inhumane. While most literary detectives follow the example of their earliest prototypes (Edgar Allan Poe's C. Auguste Dupin and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes) by working with their brains, Francis's amateur detective heroes use their brains and instincts while engaged in continuous movement—running, driving cars at high speed, flying in airplanes, or riding thoroughbred horses over hurdles. Some of his heroes' finest insights occur while they are being tortured, trampled, or burned. Francis thus marries the British cozy mystery and elements of the American hard-boiled detective tradition.

Francis suffered many broken bones and much physical pain during his racing career and enjoyed proving his ability to recuperate. His writing career began only because it became impossible for him to continue riding. His novels are full of regret for the lost days of thrills, cheering crowds, and the joys of victory, but they also capture the dark side of the sport. His professional detective, Sid Halley, lost the use of his arm when his jumper fell and a passing hoof sliced into him, and, in Under Orders, while making discreet inquiries into gambling and race fixing, his tenacity in the face of injury results in his Dutch girlfriend being beaten and then shot to derail his investigation.

Despite his reliance on the same underlying plot formula, Francis makes each novel unique by creating a new hero with a new set of problems. He sets each story in a different locale and features varied facets of horse racing, but unlike some conventional series books, Francis's provide the pleasure of familiar central figures and situations in uniquely interesting, individualized circumstances, often reflecting current problems in horse racing or social issues of the moment. There is never a sense of a new backdrop for its own sake; plot, problem, and setting are tightly integrated. Admirers of Dick Francis enjoy learning more and more about the complex world of horse racing, a microcosm including all social classes: the lowest touts and crooks, stable cleaners, horse handlers, jockeys, trainers, and cheap bettors, as well as the big plungers, wealthy breeders, filthy rich owners, dukes, duchesses, kings, and queens. Francis greatly values competence and his heroes teach readers about their special expertise, whether it be computers, diplomacy, flying, winemaking, amateur photography, banking, accounting, gold mining, or filmmaking, mainly in England, but also in Norway, Canada, the Caribbean, Russia, and the United States. Wild Horses (1994), for example, brings to life the collaborative process of adapting a book to the screen that, at the same time, leads the film director to solve a cold case the screenplay builds on, just as his ingenuity as a toymaker enabled the hero of High Stakes (1975) to outwit opponents. Francis also admires bravery in the face of debilitating diseases or injuries, explaining how a myoelectric false hand works or a bone marrow transplant takes place. In a sense, Francis reflects changes in British culture, retaining a proper respect for British tradition and the venerable customs of the racing community while embracing a modern meritocracy based on technical competence.

Although his early novels emphasized action, Francis quickly realized that adult readers are more interested in action that proceeds from character. Consequently, over the years he has become so much more proficient at depicting the complexity and variety of human character that his novels have come to be considered mainstream rather than genre fiction. In his best novels, Francis manages his characters as a conductor does an orchestra. In Decider (1993), for example, he paints a mural of humanity, including children, young men and women, older men and women, and representatives of all social classes. Multiple and subtle motivations make his characters (heroes and villains) seem true to life. The hero of Decider, an example of Francis's mature work, has multiple motives: sympathy for several people embroiled in a bitter family dispute, professional interest in the architectural problems involved with renovating the racetrack, financial interest as a shareholder, sexual attraction, and anger at the unknown villain who threatens him and his children, among various other motives.

At the same time, the other characters in Decider are driven by complex motivations of their own. One, desperately in need of money, wants the track converted to building lots. Another tries to protect the family name from disgrace. A traditionalist wants to preserve the racetrack in its pristine form. A modernist wants the Victorian structure transformed by the latest innovations into stainless steel and plastic.

Francis's plots also have become more complex and more intriguing as he has become more successful. The descriptions of pain have moved from the literal to the psychological: self-doubt, fear, obsession. Over the years he has grown from a penniless, uneducated farm lad living in the muck of stables to a cosmopolitan millionaire at home on two continents and knighted by the queen of England, a writer capable of wry humor and complex psychological analysis. He received the Agatha Lifetime Achievement Award in 2000.

DEAD CERT

First published: 1962

Type of work: Novel

A jockey discovers that a small army of taxi drivers, directed by an unknown mastermind, is using intimidation, mayhem, and murder to fix horse races.

Dead Cert, Francis's first published novel and his first attempt at fiction, is written in the first person from the point of view of a jockey turned amateur detective because wicked individuals intrude into his life and threaten to kill him. The novel is full of action and episodes in which the hero is subjected to incredible torture, from which he seems to recover with superhuman ease. Having established this prototype, Francis has hardly deviated from it in the novels he has published since. He has stated: "I write in the first person because that's how I like to describe things. . . . As they're written in the first person, a lot of each book describes what's in the hero's mind. It would be difficult to portray on screen."

In Dead Cert, the hero is a young amateur jockey named Alan York, whose father is a South African multimillionaire. The book opens in the middle of a steeplechase at Maidenhead. York is trailing Admiral, ridden by his best friend Bill Davidson, when he sees the unbeatable horse, the dead certainty of the title, trip and his friend take a fatal fall. York is the only person who has seen a wire deliberately stretched across the top of a hurdle, clearly to prevent the favorite from winning.

The fact that York, in second place, becomes the winner attracts attention from the police, who also suspect that he is having an affair with Davidson's wife. Francis provides a strong "push-pull" motivation for York to investigate the crime: to find out who was responsible for his friend's death and to clear himself of suspicion. Although York is warned off his investigation and subjected to torture, he persists until he exposes the mastermind's identity and destroys the entire ring of crooked taxi drivers.

York's relationship with beautiful, aristocratic Kate Ellery-Penn helps him discover the mastermind's identity. Dead Cert also established the convention of the love affair featured in most of Francis's novels. His early descriptions of such relationships were inhibited and chaste. Despite his brilliant description of physical sensations, such as the pain of injured jockeys, Francis does not titillate readers with descriptions of torrid passions; however, his handling of sexual relationships has become more open in later works, as evidenced by the hero's sensual yearning for his lover in Under Orders.

Critics have praised the fine writing in the long sequence of closing chapters in which the hero rides a thoroughbred horse across the English countryside, jumping fences and hedges and darting through motor traffic in an effort to elude the murderous taxi drivers who are receiving radio orders from the criminal mastermind.

FORFEIT

First published: 1968

Type of work: Novel

The world of horse racing journalism is being corrupted by crooked gamblers who intimidate owners, trainers, and jockeys and who sometimes kill or cripple favored horses.

Forfeit, published six years after Dead Cert, represents a leap forward in Francis's craft, with more emphasis on characterization and less on action for action's sake. Largely because of its greater realism and stronger characterization, Forfeit won the prestigious Edgar Allan Poe Award, bringing his work to the attention of a wider American audience.

The plot is based on the system of wagering in England before the introduction of pari-mutuels. Bookies would set the odds on each horse based on the number of bets they were taking in. If a horse were scratched before the race, the bets would be forfeited to the bookie, hence the title.

In Forfeit, a gambler who owns a string of betting parlors exploits this archaic system by making sure that heavy favorites fail to appear or at least fail to win. This unknown kingpin enhances his profits by bribing turf journalists to praise certain horses so enthusiastically that bettors heavily back them, only to later forfeit their wagers. Through bribery or intimidation of jockeys, trainers, and owners, the gambling czar makes sure that certain horses do not win.

Hero James Tyrone, a former jockey who is now a journalist, like Francis himself, becomes suspicious when an alcoholic colleague warns him against selling his integrity as a writer and dies shortly thereafter under mysterious circumstances.

Tyrone's wife Elizabeth is incapacitated by polio and can only breathe by means of a mechanical respirator. As a result of her frailty, she cannot have normal marital relations. Tyrone remains devoted to her in spite of this deprivation and the demands that her condition impose. Since he cannot afford full-time care, he must act as her nurse and write his column at the same time.

His sexual impulses involve him with an attractive biracial woman, Gail, but he feels guilty about his infidelity. This triangle gives Forfeit a more mature, more dramatic impact than Francis's previous books.

The villain and his crew of thugs try all their tactics on Tyrone, but as a typical Francis hero, this courageous, idealistic jockey turned reporter refuses to quit. Eventually he gives up his illicit liaison, exposes the race-fixing racket in print, and wins against the sadistic mastermind.

In Forfeit, Francis perfected the kind of plot line he was to follow with variations in later novels. An honest man connected in some way with the world of horse racing turns amateur detective in order to expose an unknown mastermind who is spreading corruption. The detective-hero is motivated by the desire to see good triumph over evil, not by financial gain.

DECIDER

First published: 1993

Type of work: Novel

An architect becomes entangled with a family of temperamental, sometimes violent aristocrats fighting over whether to renovate, rebuild, or demolish their historic racetrack.

Decider shows Francis at the peak of his form. There is plenty of action and suspense, but his complexity of characterization explains why critics regard him as a serious writer. Like Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler, Elmore Leonard, and John le Carré, Francis has transcended his genre by treating it with the same scrupulous care customarily given to mainstream fiction. Francis has been honored by fellow detective-fiction writers because he has helped elevate their profession for critics and the public.

The amateur-detective, first-person narrator of Decider is Lee Morris, an architect who happens to own a small interest in the historic old Stratton Park racecourse. The major shareholders are the self-willed, eccentric, outspoken, snobbish members of an aristocratic family who have conflicting ideas about what should be done with the facility.

Francis's heroes invariably face family problems or personal handicaps that affect their behavior. In Decider, the hero endures a loveless marriage, cares for five rambunctious children, and copes with the problems caused by the Stratton family. His concern for his children's safety, his Achilles' heel, almost gets him killed.

Interestingly, Francis's worldview has widened over the years, with his increasing maturity, fame, and prosperity and with the world itself changing since 1962. Later novels such as Decider are full of Americanisms, such as “wimpish,” “rough trade,” “look-see,” “max,” “the slammer,” “Peter Pan syndrome,” “sob stuff,” and “trashed.” His heroes and heroines now dine in restaurants that serve haute cuisine and vintage champagne. He writes about the upper class with the assurance of one accustomed to moving in such circles.

The hero of Decider is not a member of the working class like the jockey-detective in Dead Cert or the overworked, financially harassed journalist-detective in Forfeit; Lee Morris owns real estate and shares of a racetrack. Decider sounds modern and sophisticated, whereas Dead Cert reads like an old-fashioned English detective novel, with a chaste love relationship leading toward marriage (“Kate’s kisses were sweet and virginal”), and quaint British expressions such as “Rum looking cove,” possibly incomprehensible to speakers of non-British varieties of the language. Alan York of Dead Cert moves in a world of jockeys, taxi drivers, bartenders, and other working-class types; Lee Morris of Decider moves with ease in the upper reaches of bourgeois society.

Stratton, determined to destroy the stately racetrack so that it may be sold to tract housing developers, tries sabotage, intimidation, murder, kidnapping, and torture to get his way, but Morris, a typical Francis hero, becomes tenacious under pressure. Although Stratton’s henchman plants dynamite and causes extensive wreckage, Morris ultimately exposes the mastermind and saves the racetrack, an ornate Victorian structure that might be said to symbolize Francis’s love for the world of horse racing.

COME TO GRIEF

First published: 1995

Type of work: Novel

No one believes Sid Halley when he maintains that his close friend, a fellow jockey much beloved in the racing world, has committed a series of atrocious crimes.

The title Come to Grief sums up what happens throughout the book, as disease, injury, and negative publicity bring humans and animals to grief. The dominant grief is perpetrated by a serial mutilator, who chops off the forefeet of valuable thoroughbred horses, much beloved of owners but uninsured, and that of the pony of an impressionable child. The novel brings back champion jockey turned private investigator Sid Halley, who appeared in Odds Against (1965) and Whip Hand (1979), and who sees in these injuries a mirror image of his own physical loss of a forearm, hacked off by a sadistic fiend. The nightmare he faces—the loss of his good hand—proves a near reality when his longtime friend, Ellis Quint, in the grip of his criminal obsession, sadistically assaults Halley with the weapon he had used on defenseless horses.

Quint has won British hearts with his fearless rides as a jockey and with the heartwarming stories he creates as a television host (including a particularly moving piece on a child with leukemia, whose pony is one of the victims), yet his deeds bring his disbelieving family to grief. Quint’s father mutilates a horse to provide his son an alibi and then tries to kill Halley; his mother commits suicide. The gentlemanly, kindly facade Quint projects hides a lust for power and for blood, but while Halley struggles to expose Quint’s dark side, he must deal with character assassination by a local newspaper, rejection by the racing community, and public opinion that turns even those he seeks to help against him. Those who fall under Quint’s influence come to grief as well, with Owen Yorkshire giving vent to a murderous temper, and Lord Tilepit discovering that he has colluded with a murderer.

Winner of the Silver Dagger Award from Britain's Crime Writers' Association, Come to Grief provides a satisfying study of the slogging footwork of detection, the interviewing of witnesses and checking of alibis, but it is also a powerful psychological study of friendship, what leads to it, and the difficulty of walking away from it. Halley struggles with his perceptions; his instincts tell him that his friend, Quint, shows up at the crime scene or is connected to the crime scene too many times for it to be coincidence, and yet Quint is a former jockey like himself, someone Halley thinks he understands as deeply as he understands himself. When the evidence builds until it is irrefutable in his mind and he must turn over his discoveries to the police, Halley grieves for the loss of his friend. At the end, he understands the dark forces that drive Quint and sees behind the madness and corruption some glimmers of the man he once held in such high esteem: Quint could have left Halley armless, and he pulled back from the deed; Quint could have let his father kill Halley, but he killed his father instead. Thus, Halley grieves for what has been lost—the friendship, the bright potential, and the lingering comradeship—despite the grave perils threatened.

SUMMARY

Dick Francis has, amazingly, written more than forty novels over a period of more than forty-five years, all on the subject of horse racing in all its diversity. His heroes think on their feet while engaged in strenuous action. Over the years, his heroes, like their creator, have become more affluent, sophisticated, and cosmopolitan; they also have become more fully developed and more credibly motivated. Francis has received many honors for helping bring serious critical and scholarly attention to the genre of popular detective fiction. He merges the American and the British mystery-writing tradition, giving readers the best of both worlds.

Bill Delaney; updated by Gina Macdonald

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Dead Cert, 1962
Nerve, 1964
For Kicks, 1965
Odds Against, 1965 (Sid Halley series)
Flying Finish, 1966
Blood Sport, 1967
Forfeit, 1968
Enquiry, 1969
Rat Race, 1970
Bonecrack, 1971
Smokescreen, 1972
Slayride, 1973
Knockdown, 1974
High Stakes, 1975
In the Frame, 1976
Risk, 1977
Trial Run, 1978
Whip Hand, 1979 (Sid Halley series)
Reflex, 1980

Dick Francis

Twice Shy, 1981
Banker, 1982
The Danger, 1983
Proof, 1984
Break In, 1985 (Kit Fielding series)
Bolt, 1986 (Kit Fielding series)
Hot Money, 1987
The Edge, 1988
Straight, 1989
Longshot, 1990
Comeback, 1991
Driving Force, 1992
Decider, 1993
Wild Horses, 1994
Come to Grief, 1995 (Sid Halley series)
To the Hilt, 1996
Ten-Pound Penalty, 1997
Second Wind, 1999
Shattered, 2000
Win, Place, or Show, 2004
Triple Crown, 2005
Under Orders, 2006
Dead Heat, 2007 (with Felix Francis)

SHORT FICTION:

Field of Thirteen, 1998

SCREENPLAY:

Dead Cert, 1974 (adaptation of his novel)

NONFICTION:

The Sport of Queens: The Autobiography of Dick Francis, 1957 (revised 1968, 1974, 1982, 1988)
A Jockey's Life: A Biography of Lester Piggott, 1986

EDITED TEXTS:

Best Racing and Chasing Stories, 1966-1969 (with John Welcome)
The Racing Man's Bedside Book, 1969 (with Welcome)
The Dick Francis Treasury of Great Racing Stories, 1990
(with Welcome)
Classic Lines: More Great Racing Stories, 1991 (with Welcome; also known as The New Treasury of Great Racing Stories)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Competence is a running theme in the novels of Dick Francis. Choose a character you admire from your favorite Francis novel and explain what evidence it provides of competence. How can one recognize competence? What psychological benefits does competence produce?
- Francis has written credibly about children. What characterizes young Rachel in Come to Grief? Is she credible? Why, or why not?
- Francis's heroes follow traditional methods of detection. Choose three methods in any novel and explain how they further the detective's investigation.
- Choose five specialized racing terms that occur in a Francis novel and explain what they mean from context.
- Class distinctions are always interesting in Francis, with some self-made men becoming more snobbish than the aristocrats. Find an example in any of the books mentioned in this essay and illustrate that snobishness.
- How do Francis's characters deal with pain? Provide examples.
- Francis's detectives have a tenuous relationship with newspaper reporters, sometimes seeking their help, other times suffering their criticism. Explain with examples.
- In every Francis novel, readers glean lessons about horses. What are some specific facts you learned about horses from reading his books?

About the Author

- Davis, J. Madison. Dick Francis. Boston: Twayne, 1989.
- Forbes, Steve. "Saddling up Another Equine Mystery." Forbes 156, no. 11 (November 6, 1995): 24.
- Fuller, Bryony. Dick Francis: Steeplechase Jockey. London: Joseph, 1994.
- Guttman, Robert J. "Dick Francis." Europe 361 (November, 1996): 18-21.
- Honan, Corinna. "Dick's Greatest Whodunit." Daily Mail, September 1, 2007, p. 1.
- Lord, Graham. Dick Francis: A Racing Life. London: Little Brown, 1999.
- Reed, J. D. Review of Come to Grief, by Dick Francis. People Weekly 44, no. 18 (October 30, 1995): 34.
- "Who Done It?" People Weekly 52 (November 22, 1999): 202.

ANNE FRANK

Born: Frankfurt am Main, Germany
June 12, 1929

Died: Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, near Hanover, Germany
March, 1945

Frank's diary has made the horrors of the Holocaust real for millions of readers. From her account of more than two years hiding from the Nazis, many have gotten to know and love an ordinary girl who died simply because she was Jewish.

BIOGRAPHY

Anne Frank was born on June 12, 1929, in Frankfurt am Main, Germany. Her parents were Otto and Edith Frank, and she had an older sister, Margot. When Anne was small, the family lived in two different houses, both in neighborhoods populated by Jewish, Protestant, and Catholic families. The Franks were Reform Jews who mixed with Christians for social and business purposes. Otto Frank read widely and kept many books in the house, and from a young age, his children were encouraged to love books.

In 1933, the year Anne turned four, Adolf Hitler came to power. He quickly began enacting laws to limit Jews' freedom and take their businesses. Alarmed by the events in their country, the Frank family decided to immigrate to the Netherlands. Otto Frank received an offer to start a new business in Amsterdam selling pectin, which is used in making jam. He later added a second business venture selling spices.

Margot, Anne, and their mother stayed with Anne's grandmother in Aachen for several months while Otto made arrangements for their arrival. The family eventually settled in a newly constructed neighborhood in Amsterdam and were joined by other Jewish families who had fled Germany. Margot and Anne attended a Montessori school. They were good students, although Anne sometimes got into trouble for talking in class.

The German army invaded the Netherlands in 1940. Almost immediately, policies discriminating against Jews were enacted. Their papers were marked so they could be easily identifiable as Jews.

Jews had to attach stars visibly to their clothing and were banned from using public transportation or even bicycles. Jewish children were no longer allowed to attend schools with Christian children. Margot and Anne moved to a school for Jewish children only. Anticipating that, as in Germany, Jews in the Netherlands would have their businesses taken from them, Otto Frank transferred his businesses to non-Jewish associates.

As evidenced by her diary, Frank was aware of discrimination against the Jews even before her family went into hiding. Frank's parents, however, were careful to ensure that her life was as normal as possible. She and her friends socialized at one another's homes. Early entries in her diary highlight Frank's growing interest in the boys who walked her to school.

Otto Frank arranged for the family to go into hiding in an annex to the building where his business was housed. Margot Frank was in the first group of Jews to receive a notice that she was being deported from the Netherlands. The family moved into the annex on July 6, 1942, the day after the notice arrived. Sympathetic workers at the company made sure that they had food and other needed items while in hiding. Those helpers who provided for their needs and protected them were Victor Kugler, Johannes Kleiman, Miep Gies, and Bep Voskuijl.

Frank's diary primarily records the events of the years her family spent in hiding. The Frank family was joined in their small quarters by the van Pels family—Hermann, Auguste, and their fifteen-year-old son Peter. Fritz Pfeffer joined the two families in the fall.

The diary records the tedium of staying in one small space for more than two years. It also records the inevitable personality conflicts and disagreements of eight people living together in a small space under extremely stressful conditions.

Frank read widely while in hiding, and her reading must have influenced her writing style in the journal. Her reading included novels for adolescents and adults, works of history, and mythology. The residents of the annex looked forward to their helpers bringing them library books every week.

Perhaps most significantly for readers, Frank wrote a great deal during her years in the annex. Besides her diary entries, she also wrote short stories and poems. She decided that when she grew up she wanted to be a journalist and writer. She also decided that, after the war, she wanted to publish her diary so that others would know what she and her family went through. These literary ambitions led her to make additions to the diary with publication in mind. The result is no doubt a more polished and complete version of the story than readers would expect from the diary of an adolescent girl.

The last entry of Frank's diary is dated August 1, 1944. In the mid-morning of August 4, an officer and several members of the security police arrived at the building. They arrested the eight people hiding there. They also arrested Victor Kugler and Johannes Kleiman, who had helped protect and provide for them.

Anne and the seven other Jews from the annex were imprisoned in Amsterdam and then sent to a transit camp called Westerbork. From there, they were sent to the Auschwitz concentration camp in Poland. They were members of the last group deported from the Netherlands on September 3, 1944.

Margot and Anne were transferred to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany in late October, 1944. Both died of typhus, along with thousands of other prisoners at the concentration camp. Margot died first, and Anne died a few days later. The exact date of her death is not known, but based on accounts of witnesses at Bergen-Belsen, it most likely occurred in early March, 1944. Margot and Anne's bodies were placed in mass graves at the concentration camp. The camp was liberated on April 12, 1945, only weeks after Anne's death.

Although she was only fifteen when she died, because of her diary Anne Frank is the most well-known Jew to die at the hands of the Nazis. Of the eight people who lived in the annex, only Otto Frank survived the war. After the war, Miep Gies, one of the people who helped the family survive in hiding, gave him the diary. Otto Frank spent much of the rest of his life making sure that it was published and read by as many people as possible.

ANALYSIS

Anne Frank is the most famous victim of Nazi oppression. Her diary has allowed millions of readers to feel they know a teenage girl who shared her thoughts and experiences in an honest way—a girl who died in a concentration camp simply because she was Jewish.

While the absolute horror of the Holocaust and the vast numbers of Jews murdered are beyond comprehension, readers know that once there was a girl named Anne Frank who hid with her family and four other people for more than two years. Their goal was to escape being murdered because they were Jews.

Frank and the others lived in a small space and could not go outside or even open the curtains for much of the time. They feared discovery and bombing and had little to eat as the war progressed. Readers know about the stress and deprivation of those eight people in hiding. Readers, however, also know that Frank thought about the everyday things that teenagers normally think about—friends, boys, hair and clothes, and parents who do not understand what being a teenager is like. Readers may never be able to fully comprehend the Holocaust, but Anne Frank is real to millions.

Frank began writing her diary as a forum for her own thoughts and feelings after receiving it as a gift for her thirteenth birthday. She named the diary "Kitty" and wrote to it as a best friend. Readers learn everything a girl would tell her best friend. The diary's heartfelt and conversational tone makes readers feel like valued confidants.

A month after she started writing in the diary, her family went into hiding from the Nazis in a secret annex to a business in Amsterdam. As she extensively recorded the details of their lives in the annex and wrote short stories and poems, Frank developed an interest in writing professionally. After hearing Queen Wilhelmina say on the radio that she would like to see reports published about what happened during the Nazi occupation, Frank decided she wanted to publish her diary after World War II.

She revised sections written earlier to prepare the diary for publication once the war ended. As a result, the published version of the diary combines the candid observations and concerns typical of an adolescent with a literary style and polish that would not appear in writing solely for a teenager's own use. While readers get a sense that an ordinary girl wrote the diary, Frank's writing ability clearly sets her apart from the average teenager. Her talents for rendering realistic details and articulating her feelings have allowed millions of readers to share her experiences.

Frank wrote her last diary entry several days before the eight people hiding in the annex were captured. Miep Gies, one of the people who had provided the Franks with food and other necessities while they were in hiding, found the diary and protected it until the war ended. She gave it to Otto Frank after he returned from being imprisoned in a concentration camp.

Otto Frank followed his daughter's wishes and had the diary published. He devoted his time to promoting the diary. The original edition, published in 1947, omitted some of the passages that deal explicitly with sexuality and that portray residents of the annex in a particularly bad light. Edits were made to keep the diary a readable length, and the passages were edited for grammar and spelling. For the most part, however, what was published was exactly what Frank had written. Every effort was made to maintain the diary's accuracy as a historical document.

In 1991, following the discovery of several pages of the diary that had not previously been published, a definitive edition was released. It includes the newly found passages and the previously omitted diary entries that address sexuality and portray the annex residents in a negative way.

Since its original publication, the diary has been translated into more than fifty languages and has sold more than twenty million copies. It has been adapted for stage plays and films, and a number of books by Frank's friends and admirers have supplemented its contents. A collection of the short stories Frank wrote while in hiding, Verhaaltjes en gebeurtenissen uit het Achterhuis (1982; Anne Frank's Tales from the Secret Annex, 1983), appeared in 1982.

The annex in Amsterdam is open to visitors. Since the diary was written by a child, it has proved an excellent introduction to the Holocaust for school children around the world.

THE DIARY OF A YOUNG GIRL

First published: Het Achterhuis, 1947; definitive edition, 1991 (English translation 1952; definitive edition, 1995)

Type of work: Nonfiction

A teenage girl and seven other Jews hide from the Nazis for more than two years in a secret annex of a building in Amsterdam.

Anne Frank receives her diary as a gift for her thirteenth birthday on June 12, 1942. It is her favorite present. She names the diary "Kitty" and writes to it as a best friend. The first entries are mainly about her friends and the boys who show interest in her. Although Anne writes that she is glad to have Kitty, since she does not have a good friend, it is clear that she is popular, well liked, and socially inclined.

Later that month, the Nazis, who are occupying the Netherlands, announce a policy to deport Jews to concentration camps. Anne learns of her family's plan to go into hiding shortly before it is put into action. They hide in a secret annex, where Anne shares a room with her sister, Margot.

A few days later a family, who in the diary are called the van Daans, move into the annex with the Franks. Their son Peter is a few years older than Anne. At first she does not like him, describing him as lazy and shy. The pressures of families sharing small quarters are quickly evident. Arguments erupt, especially between Mrs. Frank and Mrs. van Daan. Many of the arguments arise from Mrs. Frank's belief that the van Daans are taking more than their share of commonly held items or taking the best food for themselves.

Like the others, Anne has a hard time living in the annex. She cannot go outside, and the families must keep the curtains closed and not make noise during the day so that workers at the surrounding businesses will not suspect that they are there. They are even limited to when they can flush the toilet or run water.

The situation becomes more difficult after a few months, when a man Anne calls Albert Dussel in her diary moves in with the families. He shares a room with Anne, and Margot sleeps in their parents' room. Dussel is inconsiderate about sharing the room and is critical of Anne.

Anne misses her friends, and life in the annex is monotonous. The families pass their time reading and studying. Anne, Margot, and Peter continue their schoolwork, so they will be able to attend school again when the war ends. Both they and the adults study several languages, and the teenagers take a correspondence course in shorthand.

Over time, there are food shortages, making it harder to obtain the same variety and quantity of food as before. As the war progresses, the residents of the annex are kept awake by air raids. Several times, break-ins at the business downstairs cause them to be especially fearful that they will be found and captured. Besides the possibility that the burglars will find them and turn them in for a bounty, they also fear that the police will discover them when they investigate the crimes.

Anne experiences the normal concerns of teenagers while her family endures this difficult situation. She is curious about her body and writes several diary entries about getting her period, how male and female bodies differ, and her attitudes about sexuality. After the families have been together for some time, she and Peter become attracted to one another. They discuss intimate details about themselves. Anne knows little about male anatomy or sexual intercourse, but she and Peter share what they know about these topics.

As her attraction to Peter develops, Anne learns to see the conflicts between the two families from both sides. She initially supports her mother in disagreements with Mrs. van Daan and assesses this woman in harsh terms, but she later learns to recognize Mrs. van Daan's good points.

Anne's ongoing conflicts with her mother figure prominently in her diary entries. Anne sometimes goes as far as to say that she and her mother do not love each other. In the context of a diary, however, these comments seem to be the typical venting of a teenager with little outlet for her feelings. Anne admires her father, who supports her when conflicts arise with other residents of the annex.

Anne and her sister Margot enjoy each other's company, although Anne is sometimes jealous of her sister and feels insecure in comparison with her. She worries that others think Margot is prettier and smarter. She thinks her mother favors Margot.

In Anne's candid presentation of herself in her diary, she is clearly imperfect. She sometimes says nasty things about other residents of the annex and plays jokes on them. For example, she once posts a notice on the bathroom door noting Mr. Dussel's regular timetable for using that room.

Ultimately, it is those details about Anne's struggles and her very human reactions to her difficult situation that make the diary so compelling. She is a real teenager with real emotions who is forced to share a small space with seven other people over a very stressful two-year period.

SUMMARY

Anne Frank's diary has made her the best-known Jewish victim of the Nazis. The diary has given a human voice to the unfathomable horrors of the Holocaust. Her story of hiding in a secret annex for more than two years vividly describes a life that most readers could not imagine on their own. Above all, Frank comes through as a real and authentic girl, who in spite of her difficult situation writes about the concerns typical of any teenager. Knowing that she later died in a concentration camp, readers have a chance to mourn one of the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis.

Joan Hope

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

Het Achterhuis, 1947; definitive edition, 1991 (The Diary of a Young Girl, 1952; definitive edition, 1995)

SHORT FICTION:

Verhaaltjes en gebeurtenissen uit het Achterhuis, 1982
(Anne Frank's Tales from the Secret Annex, 1983)

About the Author

Alagna, Magdalena. Anne Frank: Young Voice of the Holocaust. New York: Rosen, 2001.

Bloom, Harold, ed. A Scholarly Look at "The Diary of Anne Frank." Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1999.

Immell, Myra H. Readings on "The Diary of a Young Girl." San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 1998.

Kopf, Hedda Rosner. Understanding Anne Frank's "The Diary of a Young Girl": A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1997.

Lindwer, Willy. The Last Seven Months of Anne Frank. Translated by Alison Meerschaert. New York: Pantheon, 1991.

Van der Rol, Ruud, and Rian Verhoeven. Anne Frank: Beyond the Diary. Translated by Tony Langham and Plym Peters. New York: Viking, 1993.

Van Maarsen, Jacqueline. A Friend Called Anne. Retold for children by Carol Anne Lee. New York: Viking, 2004.

Wukowits, John F. The Importance of Anne Frank. San Diego, Calif.: Lucent, 1999.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does the diary format help readers feel like the writer is a good friend?
- What details does Anne Frank share about herself that make her seem like an ordinary teenager?
- What passages in the diary are particularly effective in making readers aware of the effects of prejudice?
- How do the residents of the annex cope with the stress of life in hiding and of sharing tight living quarters with so many other people?
- How does Frank place her family's problems in the larger context of Adolf Hitler's effort to eliminate the Jewish people?
- Frank revised passages of her diary with publication in mind. What evidence is found in the text that she was thinking about an outside audience?

MILES FRANKLIN

Born: Talbingo station, New South Wales, Australia
October 14, 1879

Died: Carlton, New South Wales, Australia
September 19, 1954

Franklin's novels capture not only the history of Australia but also its spirit. In her portraits of family life, she portrays independent women, a rarity at the time, and families ruled by paternalistic men bent on success, all of which are presented within a rich context of politics, economic change, and social theory, mostly from a liberal viewpoint.

BIOGRAPHY

Stella Maria Sarah Miles Franklin was born on October 14, 1879, in Talbingo station in New South Wales, Australia, a mountainous region near Canberra, the nation's capital. She spent her first ten years on the family cattle station with her six younger brothers and sisters. Her education was provided by a Scottish tutor, a Mr. Auchinvole, who taught her about William Shakespeare, the Bible, Charles Dickens, and Aesop's fables. After the family's cattle business was dissolved, the Franklins went to live on a dairy farm near Bangalore, where Franklin's mother named the small property with scant resources Stillwater.

Franklin was jealous of her younger, prettier sister, who remained with her grandmother at Brindabella, and she was often at odds with her mother. She attended the nearby Thornford School, where she excelled in music. In 1896, she got a position at Oakdale with her uncle, George Franklin, who hired her to teach his eldest children. However, she soon returned home to write, with the guidance of Thomas J. Hebblewhite, editor of the Goulburn Post.

She turned to fiction and in just ten weeks wrote My Brilliant Career (1901), her first novel and best-known book, when she was only sixteen. After three Australian publishers rejected the book, she asked poet and short-story writer Henry Lawson to take the novel to England and find a publisher for her. Lawson read the novel and wrote a preface for it. In 1901, the book was published abroad, under the pseudonym Miles Franklin, by Blackwoods, the same Edinburgh-based company that published Lawson's work. Because so many of the characters and events in the novel corresponded closely to those in Franklin's life, many readers, including her own family, particularly the relatives at Oakdale, and her former neighbors, regarded the novel as fact, not fiction, and were hurt by their treatment in the book. Despite those reservations, the novel brought Franklin to the attention of Australia's literati, but she withdrew the book from publication after it went through four editions, and it was out of print from 1904 until 1966.

Upset by criticism at home, she moved to Sydney in 1904, where she wrote for the Bulletin under the pen name Mary Anne while employed as a domestic servant. She also worked on My Career Goes Bung, a reworking of My Brilliant Career, but the novel was not published until 1946 because of its daring language and tone. While she was in Sydney, she met Rose Scott, a suffragette who deepened her feminist views. After her second novel was rejected by publishers, she left Australia for the United States, stopping at Auckland, New Zealand, and then at San Francisco, where she performed relief work in the aftermath of the 1906 earthquake and fire.

Moving on to Chicago, she became involved with the Chicago Renaissance writers and met Alice Henry, another Australian feminist and a labor activist. Franklin worked with Henry at the Women's Trade Union League, becoming the manager of the league's national office in Chicago and the editor of the league's magazine, Life and Labor. In 1909, she published Some Everyday Folk and Dawn, a novel featuring a suffragette named Dawn, who seems to be an older version of Sybylla, the heroine of My Brilliant Career.

At the start of World War I, Franklin went to London, where she worked first in slum nurseries and then for the Scottish Women's Hospital Unit in the Balkans from 1917 through 1918. After the war she returned to London, where she found employment at the National Housing Council in Bloomsbury. Although she returned twice to Australia for short trips in 1924 and 1930, she did not visit the bush country she described in her novels. While living in London she focused on her Brent of Bin Bin series, six novels about Australian pioneer families from the 1850's to the 1930's, which were published under the pen name Brent of Bin Bin. Up the Country, the first book in the series, appeared in 1928, and the final novel, Gentlemen at Gyang Gyang, was published in 1956.

After returning to Australia in 1933, she published All That Swagger (1936) under her own name. Literary critics consider this multigenerational novel about Irish pioneers in Australia to be her best-written book. All That Swagger won the Sydney Bulletin's S. H. Prior Prize. Despite the novel's success, the plays and essays she wrote during the rest of her life were not well received. She died in 1954 of several coronary problems. In her will, she provided the funds for the Miles Franklin Award, an annual literary prize for the best Australian-published novel or play portraying Australian life. The first winner was Patrick White for his novel Voss (1957).

ANALYSIS

Although Miles Franklin devoted her years in London, and particularly her Chicago years, to feminist causes, such as the right to vote and improved working conditions for women, those concerns are not the focus of her novels. Instead, her books are about the Australian experience, especially during the pioneer stage of the country's development. Since that experience began for many pioneers in Ireland, she provides the context in which emigration from Ireland took place. Her books are saturated with details of the landscape, machinery, wildlife, and the rituals of domestic and agricultural chores. She is also adept at drawing class distinctions, defining the "squatocracy" or discussing the niceties of elegant living. Sprinkled throughout her novels are "asides," insightful comments about persons and mores. For example, she elaborates on the phrase, "Masculinity leant heavily on beards," ironically suggesting the importance of beards to macho Australians. At times, she offers ironic assessments of events, such as this description of homecoming parades after World War I:

Brutalized and exhausted peoples, destitute of leaders of vision or followers of faith, groped in a limbo of shattered ideals and discredited philosophies. Nevertheless the welcome home celebrations were flattering to the survivors, and a relief to the spiritual lesions of the non-combatants who organized them.

Franklin had few illusions about governments.

The verisimilitude in Franklin's descriptions is matched by her accurate transcription of the dialects her characters use. The Irish speech of Danny, the protagonist in All That Swagger, is especially interesting and entertaining; his pronunciation of "moind" for "mind" works well for comic effect. She also captures the nuances of formal English. Even the letters she includes in her novels reflect their writers' background, class, and education. Since My Brilliant Career is written in the first person by Sybylla, the epistolary additions are also effective because they provide a means of knowing what other characters think and provide a balance against the egocentric Sybylla. On the other hand, All That Swagger, an epic, uses the omniscient point of view, giving readers the thoughts and opinions of many characters.

Franklin's novels are also much concerned with the business of marriage, of "making good marriages," and with marriage itself. Franklin never married, even though she had many suitors, and her views about marriage are reflected in her novels. Sybylla sees marriage as slavery, and that view is borne out by the marriages in Franklin's novels. Chauvinistic males, even if displaying good character traits, unthinkingly commit insensitive acts.

Danny does not get a priest for his dying wife and neglects Della when he portions out his estate. Harold, although willing to support Sybylla's writing, does so in a manner reminiscent of Torvald condescendingly indulging Nora in Henrik Ibsen's A Doll's House (1879). (In an interesting switch from a typical romance, it is Harold, not Sybylla, who suffers when his love is unrequited.) The good men "just don't get it," or they are weak dreamers, like Harry in All That Swagger, or they are impractical spendthrifts, like Harry's brother Robert, intent on preserving their image. The women are not much better. Aside from Sybylla, and from Della and Clare in All That Swagger, the women seem content to accept their lot in life, fulfilling their stereotyped roles. When Sybylla defies her mother, she soon finds that even her female supporters turn against her and urge her to behave the way a young girl should. A quotation from All That Swagger aptly and sardonically describes Franklin's opinion of marriage: "The mating instinct brews a delirious spring, then follows a long summer and autumn, frequently of incompatibility."

Franklin's characters in All That Swagger tend to be one-dimensional: Harry, the dreamer; Robert, the spendthrift; Della, the independent woman. Since the cast of characters in that novel is so large, perhaps flat characters are inevitable. It is Franklin's complex characters that attract the reader. Danny is certainly the most interesting character in the novel because he is so complex. A one-legged dreamer; a friend to the Aborigines; the savior of Wong Foo; an intrepid horseman; a comic figure with his ridiculous hat, his brogue, and his misfit entourage; an insensitive yet loving husband—he is the legend he becomes to his neighbors. Sybylla is bright, independent, talented, yet snobbish and selfish at the same time. She, like Danny, has as many foibles as virtues.

Franklin's countless characters, some of them introduced to provide an amusing anecdote, such as the pub owner Hennesy and the widow he courts in All That Swagger, and others simply disappearing from sight, are not conducive to well-made plots. My Brilliant Career is primarily a coming-of-age book, ending where the author was at the time it was written. Franklin's novels tend to simply progress chronologically, with some entertaining digressions, but readers do not turn to her for plots. They read her for her characters, her skillful rendering of Australia and Australians, and for the delight she takes in providing readers with a view of an evolving, fascinating country.

MY BRILLIANT CAREER

First published: 1901

Type of work: Novel

This novel, which draws heavily on Franklin's own life, focuses on a young Australian girl's coming-of-age and progress from rags to comparative riches. In the course of the novel, Sybylla rejects what appears to be her ideal man in favor of independence and a literary career.

My Brilliant Career is the first-person account of a talented young woman's coming-of-age, as well as a kind of "portrait of the artist as a young woman." It was also, for many Australians, a thinly veiled autobiographical novel, with characters and events that closely parallel Franklin's own life. Sybylla, the protagonist, recounts her father's economic, social, and mental decline, when the family had to move to 'Possum Gully, and describes her mother's decline as the result of her marriage. After seeing what her mother endures, Sybylla vows never to marry, considering marriage "slavery" and a "terrible let down and unfair to women."

Her resolve is tested when she leaves the family's sorry homestead to live with her wealthy grandmother. There she meets Harold Beecham, a rich, young man who only gains her affections when he loses his money and must, she thinks, depend on her. Sybylla has her own misfortune. Her mother forces her to return home to help the family financially by serving as governess to the M'Swat children, whose parents are better off financially but who lack any trace of refinement. When she falls ill because of her situation, Sybylla returns to her home. Harold, who has regained his position and wealth, asks her to marry him. She rejects him, thus turning what might have been a fairy-tale romance into something else—the story of a woman who will sacrifice marriage for career and independence.

Although the novel contains Sybylla's praise of the love between a man and a woman, she undercuts that description by describing a lover as "someone who is a part of our life as we are part of theirs, someone in whose life we feel assured our death would leave a gap for a day or two." "A day or two" may be understatement, or it may be Franklin's way of debunking society's notions about undying romantic love.

Except for Harold, the men in My Brilliant Career are weak, childish, petulant, and insensitive. When Harold professes his determination to aid Sybylla in her pursuit of a writing career, he would seem to be her perfect "helpmeet" (helpmate). Yet Sybylla ultimately spurns him. When he needs her, she loves him, but when he is independent and able to help her achieve her goals, she rejects him. What Sybylla wants is control over her life and other people. When she senses that Harold has "the calm air of ownership" as he approaches her, she strikes him with a whip, leaving him with a scar. She regrets the action, but her description of their relationship—"the amused tolerance held by a great Newfoundland for the pranks of a kitten"—reflects her resentment at being patronized by a man.

For the most part, the women in the novel accept their lot in life, even though it destroys them; they are unsympathetic to Sybylla, whom they do not understand. Even Sybylla thinks herself "queer" for harboring her feminist beliefs. What makes her ideas so out of step is the time they are expressed—a time when feminist ideas were not fashionable—and the place—an Australian bush traditionally macho and paternalistic.

ALL THAT SWAGGER

First published: 1936

Type of work: Novel

This novel chronicles four generations of a pioneering Australian family.

Franklin wrote All That Swagger partly to appease her family, some of whom thought they were negatively depicted in My Brilliant Career. The novel begins in Ireland, where Franklin's paternal grandfather, Joseph Franklin, was born. Daniel (Danny) Brian Robert M. Delacy, the protagonist of the first half of the novel, has much in common with Joseph Franklin. Danny has "swagger," a certain amount of bravura, and he is a true pioneer pursuing new frontiers. He elopes with Johanna Cooley, whose Catholic parents do not approve of Protestant Danny, and takes her to Australia, where he acquires some property and gives it its Aboriginal name, Bewuck. Not content there, he pushes on to even lonelier mountain territory in Berrabinga, where his wife, without any of the trappings she enjoyed in Ireland, is miserable. When the house at Berrabinga burns and their eldest child is killed in the fire, Johanna has to cope in Danny's absence, and the event sours her permanently on the Australian bush and her husband, whom she banishes to the guest room.

Although he put his ambitions ahead of his wife, fails to get a priest to administer the last rites to Johanna, and totally ignores his daughter, Della, when he takes his sons into partnership, Danny is, for the most part, sympathetically portrayed. Rather than battle the Aborigines for the land, he negotiates with them, avoiding conflict. His humanity also is displayed through his rescue and "adoptions" of Doogoolook, an Aborigine boy, and Maeve, who is half white and half Aborigine; his rescue of Wong Foo from the snow; as well as his salvaging the injured horse Nullad-Mundoe, who becomes the sire of a long line of racehorses.

Danny, who lost a leg in an accident, is undaunted by his handicap and continues to ride, even fording raging rivers. Enjoying the respect of all of his neighbors for his honesty and generosity, Danny possesses "swagger" in the best sense of the word. For Franklin, Danny is one of the "givers" who “provide lashings and leavings of raw material” for the “shrewder investors—the takers.”

With Danny’s death, there is decline, as his children lack his pioneering spirit. Robert’s lavish entertaining bankrupts Berrabinga; William has no pioneering spirit; and Harry, who has some of Danny’s spirit, is physically weak. Danny’s spirit persists, however, in Clare Delacy, Robert’s daughter, who marries her cousin, Harry’s son Darcy. It is their son, Brian, who will fulfill the Delacy pioneering destiny. The characters generally agree that “Old Danny will never be dead as long as he [Brian] is alive.”

Brian’s frontier is not earthly; his frontier is the sky. After studying in Great Britain, he leaves the university to work in an airplane factory and then joins the Royal Air Force (RAF) as a pilot, but illness leads to his dismissal from the RAF. Fortunately, he finds a benefactress, Lola Bradley, a wealthy aviator, and the two, who get married, get a contract to fly the Multiple-Vertical-Gyro to Australia. The result of their successful flight is that “Here was posterity fulfilling Danny.”

SUMMARY

Miles Franklin’s literary reputation rests upon My Brilliant Career, hardly her best novel, but the one that attracted readers who were impressed by the portrait of pioneering Australians and the depiction of a spunky young narrator, whose “yarn” about her coming-of-age was a significant break with conventional nineteenth century novels about courtship and marriage. The novel resurfaced in 1966, and when it was adapted, somewhat loosely, as a film released in 1979, during the Women’s Movement, it gained even more popularity.

She revisited the material covered in My Brilliant Career in a series of six novels written during the 1920’s and 1930’s, the “Brent of Bin Bin” books, which have been unjustly neglected. All That Swagger, hailed as her best book, captures the Australian pioneering spirit and the country’s ties to Ireland as no other Australian novel has, but the book does tend to get bogged down in its later stages by quite a bit of political and social theorizing.

Thomas L. Erskine

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- My Brilliant Career*, 1901
- Some Everyday Folk and Dawn*, 1909
- Old Blastus of Bandicoot*, 1931
- Bring the Monkey*, 1933
- All That Swagger*, 1936
- Pioneers on Parade*, 1939 (with Dymphna Cusack)
- My Career Goes Bung*, 1946
- Sydney Royal*, 1947

LONG FICTION (AS BRENT OF BIN BIN):

- Up the Country*, 1928
- Ten Creeks Run*, 1930
- Back to Bool Bool*, 1931
- Prelude to Waking*, 1950
- Cockatoos*, 1954
- Gentlemen at Gyang Gyang*, 1956

DRAMA:

- No Family*, pb. 1937

NONFICTION:

Joseph Furphy, 1944 (with Kate Baker)

Laughter, Not for a Cage, 1956

Childhood at Brindabella, 1963

My Congenials, 1993 (2 volumes)

About the Author

Barnard, Marjorie. Miles Franklin. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Barnard, Marjorie, and Jill Roe. Miles Franklin: The Story of a Famous Australian. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1988.

Coleman, Verna. Miles Franklin in America: Her Unknown (Brilliant) Career. London: Angus and Robertson, 1981.

DeVries, Susanna. Great Australian Women: From Pioneering Days to the Present. New York: HarperCollins, 2002.

Duncan, Roy. On Dearborn Street. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1982.

Gardner, Susan. "My Brilliant Career: Portrait of the Artist as a Wild Colonial Girl." In Gender, Politics, and Fiction: Twentieth-Century Australian Women's Novels, edited by Carole Ferrier. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1985.

Kent, Valerie. "Alias Miles Franklin." In Gender, Politics, and Fiction: Twentieth-Century Australian Women's Novels, edited by Carole Ferrier. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1985.

North, Marilla, ed. Yarn Spinners: A Story in Letters (Dymphna Cusack, Florence James, Miles Franklin). St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 2001.

Roderick, Colin Arthur. Miles Franklin, Her Brilliant Career. Sydney: Rigby, 1982.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- To what extent is My Brilliant Career about a "brilliant career"? How do you think Miles Franklin intended the title to be interpreted?
- Do you believe that Sybylla could ever find a "helpmeet" (helpmate) suitable to marry? Explain.
- Some critics believe that All That Swagger really ends with Danny's death and that Brian's triumph does not "save" the novel. Do you agree? Explain.
- Speaking of his father, Harry in All That Swagger says: "Perhaps when all our hides are in the tanyard, it will be difficult to say who were the failures and who the successes." Is Danny, Harry's father, a failure or a success? Explain.
- Identify the successful marriages in All That Swagger and My Brilliant Career. What characterizes them?
- Danny and Brian are the bookends of All That Swagger. Why is Danny a more interesting character?

MAX FRISCH

Born: Zurich, Switzerland

May 15, 1911

Died: Zurich, Switzerland

April 4, 1991

Frisch, a Swiss novelist, playwright, diarist, and essayist, is regarded as one of the most important post-World War II writers in the German language, examining complexities of identity and the emptiness of middle-class values in the mid-twentieth century.

BIOGRAPHY

Max Frisch was born on May 15, 1911, into a middle-class Swiss household headed by Franz Bruno Frisch, an architect and real estate broker, and Karolina Bettina Wilderman Frisch. He attended the mathematical high school in Zurich and went to the University of Zurich in 1931 to study German. In 1933, his studies were interrupted by the death of his father and the resulting need for Frisch to support himself and his mother. Frisch then earned a living as a freelance reporter for Zurich's liberal newspaper, Neue Zürcher Zeitung, and traveled to the Balkans and southeastern Europe. In 1935, he returned to Zurich to study architecture at the Federal Institute of Technology, earning his degree in 1940.

Between 1940 and 1945, Frisch served intermittently in the Swiss army. In 1942, he married Gertrud Constanze von Mayenburg, also an architect, and opened his own architectural firm. His play Nun singen sie wieder: Versuch eines Requiems (pr. 1945, pb. 1946; Now They Sing Again, 1972) was performed in 1945 by the Zürcher Schauspielhaus, one of the most renowned German-speaking theaters. This marked the beginning of Frisch's collaboration with his dramaturgical mentor, Kurt Hirschfeld, director at the Zürcher Schauspielhaus, who, along with American playwright Thornton Wilder and German playwright Bertolt Brecht, exerted the greatest influence on Frisch's dramaturgy. Frisch's debt to Wilder is evidenced by the theatricalism of his play Die chinesische Mauer (pr. 1946, pb. 1947; The Chinese Wall, 1961), and Frisch acknowledged Wilder's influence in an essay entitled "Theater ohne Illusion" (1948; theater without illusion).

In 1947, Frisch met Bertolt Brecht, who lived in Zurich for a year before returning to East Berlin in 1948. Brecht's theory of epic theater, which Frisch read about in drafts of Brecht's essays for Kleines Organon für das Theater (1948; A Little Organum for the Theater, 1951), informed Frisch's developing aesthetic. However, Frisch could not accept Brecht's contention that drama can change society. Frisch felt that the role of drama was to raise questions and thereby stir the consciousness of audience members, who, as individuals, have the power to effect change in their own lives.

The years 1949 to 1956 were marked by the publication of his first book of biographical sketches, Tagebuch, 1946-1949 (1950; Sketchbook, 1946-1949, 1977); productions of three new plays; study in the United States, supported by a Rockefeller grant (1951); and the broadcast of a radio version of Biedermann und die Brandstifter (The Firebugs, 1959) over Public Bavarian Radio in 1953. In 1954, Frisch published his novel Stiller (1954; I'm Not Stiller, 1958), the success of which allowed him to sell his architectural firm and devote himself full time to writing. He also separated from his first wife in 1954 and received a divorce in 1959.

The year 1957 marked the publication of what is considered one of his best novels, Homo Faber (Homo Faber: A Report, 1959). In 1958, Frisch's international reputation as a playwright was cemented by the production of a stage version of The Firebugs, which has become part of the modern dramatic repertoire. In the same year, Frisch received the most prestigious award for German literature, the Georg Buchner Prize. Also that year, he met German writer Ingeborg Bachmann in Paris, with whom he lived in Rome from 1960 through 1962.

Frisch's well-received analysis of racial prejudice, Andorra (pr., pb. 1961; English translation, 1963), was performed at the Zurich Schauspielhaus in November, 1961. By this time, Frisch had achieved international stature. He returned to live in Switzerland in 1965 and married his mistress, Marianne Oellers, in 1968, divorcing her in 1979. Frisch's most successful later works include the novels Montauk (1975; English translation, 1976) and Der Mensch erscheint im Holozän (1979; Man in the Holocene, 1980); the biographical sketches Tagebuch, 1966-1971 (1972; Sketchbook, 1966-1971, 1974); and the play Triptychon; Drei szenische Bilder (pb. 1978, pr. 1979; Triptych, 1981). Frisch was diagnosed with cancer in 1990 and died in his Zurich apartment in 1991.

Throughout his life, Frisch traveled extensively, visiting Eastern and Western Europe, the United States, Russia, the Middle East, and Japan. These experiences enriched him as a person and as a writer. In Sketchbook, 1946-1949, Frisch describes the liberating quality of travel. For Frisch, travel allows the individual to encounter people who have not formed opinions about the traveler's identity; the individual is completely unknown and unjudged. This opens the individual up to new possibilities, to what is possible in life. Travel, relocation, and dislocation are themes that recur throughout Frisch's work.

ANALYSIS

Based on a story that Frisch included in Sketchbook, 1946-1949 and adapted into a radio play in 1953, The Firebugs premiered at the Zurich Schauspielhaus on March 29, 1958. An immediate success, the play sharply satirizes capitalism and middle-class values through the person of Gottlieb Biedermann, whose last name in German translates as "conventional man." A great deal of speculation has been made about the political overtones of the play: Is it referring to the takeover in Germany by Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party; to Switzerland's neutrality during World War II, which allowed the country to benefit economically, both from the Nazis and the Allies; or to the accession of the West to Communist demands after World War II and the creation of the Soviet bloc? Frisch referred to The Firebugs as a morality play without a moral, which implies that in a general, and not a topical, way it exposes the inability of any democracy built on middle-class values and pretended liberal ideals to deal effectively with terrorism because of its lack of moral courage and need to appear respectable.

Andorra, like The Firebugs, grew out of a story idea Frisch included in Sketchbook, 1946-1949, entitled "Der andorranische Jude" ("The Andorran Jew"). Premiering at the Zurich Schauspielhaus on November 2, 1961, the play attracted international attention as a study of the effects of racism. Frisch said that the country of Andorra was meant to be a model, a simulacrum or exemplum of any society, anywhere, in which identity can be determined by social context. Andri, one of the play's characters, is as much an Andorran as anyone else in the play. He was told since childhood, however, that he is a Jew and his identity is determined by society's prejudices, despite his attempts to free himself from these imposed limitations.

Homo Faber illustrates what Frisch called the "dramaturgy of permutation," a story in which the identity of the protagonist mutates from a fixed and settled point to becoming more complex and protean, more fully reflecting the moral and existential complexity of the modern world. Throughout his journeys, Faber invents and reinvents himself, as events force him to reevaluate who he is and form a new understanding. The dramaturgy of permutation operates at some level in all of Frisch's works.

THE FIREBUGS

First produced: Biedermann und die Brandstifter, 1953 (radio play; first produced on stage, 1958; first published, 1958; English translation 1959; also translated as The Fire Raisers, 1962)

Type of work: Play

A middle-class businessman does not have the courage to evict three arsonists from his home, ultimately resulting in the destruction of his house and his city.

Gottlieb Biedermann is a captain of industry whose wealth comes from manufacturing a brand of hair tonic invented by his former valet, Knechtling, whom Biedermann dismissed when he asked for a share in the profits. The play begins at a moment when arsonists are setting houses on fire throughout the city. Although Biedermann suspects that Schmitz, a homeless stranger who insinuates himself into the Biedermann household and asks for shelter, could be an arsonist, he offers him dinner and allows him to move into his attic.

During dinner, Biedermann is disturbed by the arrival of Knechtling, who pleads through Biedermann's servant, Anna, for financial assistance because he has a sick wife and three children. Biedermann will not admit Knechtling and tells Anna, "Let him put his head in the gas oven or instruct a solicitor—go ahead—if Herr Knechtling can afford to lose or win a case." Schmitz witnesses Biedermann's callousness but flatters his show of humanity. Biedermann allows Schmitz to stay, after asking for reassurance that he is not an arsonist. Schmitz is able to manipulate both Biedermann and his wife, Babette, by playing on their need to appear kind and compassionate. Soon Schmitz is joined by two more strangers: Eisenring, a former waiter, and an unemployed doctor of philosophy, who is driven to join the conspirators by political ideology, whereas the other two appear drawn to their arson because they merely enjoy starting fires.

The scenes in the Biedermann household are punctuated by the speeches of a chorus of firemen, who warn the city's residents of the "stupidity" of allowing fires to start. They are the guardians of the homes and lives of the citizens and attempt to bring Biedermann to his senses about the danger presented by the barrels of gasoline the three conspirators bring into the attic, along with paraphernalia to detonate an explosion. Biedermann, however, asserts his right as a free citizen "not to think at all" and proceeds with his plan to win the friendship of the arsonists by sponsoring a sumptuous family-style dinner. Biedermann has all the middle-class accoutrements removed from the dining room—the silver candelabra and wine bucket, damask napkins and tablecloth—in order to create an informal atmosphere. However, the conspirators had been expecting such trappings, and the embarrassed Biedermann calls for their return.

The meal culminates with Schmitz and Eisenring asking Biedermann to supply them with matches, which he does. At the end of the play, the stage is engulfed in red light, with sirens blaring and alarm bells ringing, and the audience knows that the conflagration has started. The culpability of Biedermann and his disingenuous life are evidenced in his treatment of Knechtling, who followed Biedermann's advice to commit suicide by putting his head in a gas oven. During the course of the play, Knechtling's widow visits Biedermann, since the bill for the funeral wreath sent by the Biedermanns is sent to the Knechtlings by mistake. Sure that Mrs. Knechtling will ask for financial assistance, Biedermann refuses to see her. Though morally responsible for Knechtling's death, Biedermann smugly clings to his pretense of innocence.

After the initial production, Frisch added an epilogue to the play, in which Biedermann and Babette find themselves in Hell, with the three arsonists presiding in disguise. The Biedermanns cannot accept that they are not in Heaven and reveal their greediness and lack of acceptance of their culpability. Babette, for example, dies in the fire because she rushes back to her bedroom to rescue her jewelry. At the very end, all the workers in Hell go on strike, and, consequently, the Biedermanns are saved. The city appears to be rising again, and the chorus of firemen announces that all of those individuals who were killed in the fire have been forgotten. The lesson of this experience has been lost; just as Biedermann never acknowledges his guilt, society itself, made up of many Biedermanns, is doomed to repeat its past mistakes.

HOMO FABER

First published: 1957 (English translation, 1959)

Type of work: Novel

Walter Faber, an engineer for the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and a prototypical twentieth century technocrat, learns that human identity and worth are not defined by the material world but by human relationships.

The protagonist of Frisch's Homo Faber (literally in Latin, "man the maker") embarks on a business trip to South America, only to be transformed by his travels, which take him back to his past and forward to his future. Walter Faber, an engineer working for UNESCO, sets out from his Manhattan apartment to check on engines being manufactured in Venezuela. On board his flight, he meets a German named Herbert, and after their plane crashes in the Sierra Madre desert in Mexico, he learns that Herbert is the brother of one of his old friends, Joachim. Walter also discovers that Joachim married Walter's former mistress, Hanna, and that they had a child together. Telling this story as a reminiscence at a future time, Walter recalls that when he left Hanna she was pregnant with his child, which he speculates may be the child who is supposed to be Joachim's.

After their rescue, Walter decides to accompany Herbert to Guatemala, where Joachim has been managing a tobacco plantation. During their strenuous trip to the plantation, Walter reflects on his relationship with Hanna and acquits himself of any guilt about the way he abandoned her. Upon arrival, they learn that Joachim hanged himself months before. The two men film and then bury the untouched body, and Herbert determines that he will remain on the plantation assuming Joachim's responsibilities. Walter goes on to Venezuela, only to discover that the engines have not been assembled. Upon returning to New York, Walter tries to avoid a scene with Ivy, his married mistress, with whom he had broken off prior to his journey. He decides to sail to Paris to attend a conference rather than wait for his scheduled flight.

Aboard the ship, Walter becomes infatuated with a young woman named Sabeth. After arriving in Paris, he tries to meet her again in the Louvre. He develops a friendship with her and offers to drive her to Rome. Walter, narrating the story from the future, insists that he did not suspect that Sabeth was his daughter. On the road trip through France and Italy, Sabeth eventually goes to Walter's room, and they sleep together. As Walter begins to question Sabeth about her family, he realizes that she is Hanna's child and his daughter. He absolves himself from guilt, however, because Sabeth initiated their sexual relationship.

Time lapses and Walter awakens in a hospital in Athens, unclear about what has just occurred. His memory returns, and he recalls that he brought Sabeth to the hospital after she was bitten by a poisonous snake as they walked on the beach at night. Hanna has come to look after her daughter, and she is surprised to learn that Walter is the man with whom her daughter has been traveling. Walter tells Hanna about the night of the snakebite, and Hanna confesses that Sabeth is his daughter. Sabeth eventually dies from an undiagnosed concussion that resulted from her fall after she was bitten.

The remainder of the novel chronicles Walter's continued travels, during which he is haunted by memories of Sabeth and his growing realization of how important Hanna has become to him. At the novel's end, Walter returns to Athens, where he enters the hospital for tests. Throughout his journeys, from the very beginning of the novel, he has been plagued by stomach pains, which are ultimately diagnosed as cancer. Walter prepares for an operation and expects to die. He comes to the realization that identity and worth do not depend on his mastery of the material world but on his relationships with others.

Early in the novel, Walter relishes travel because it makes him feel disconnected and anonymous, and, therefore, empowered to reinvent himself. Through the agency of Hanna, he begins to realize how important it is to be with people who know him, with whom he shares a history, a life. As Walter is wheeled into the operating room, he understands that the only person who will remember him, for whom his life made any difference, is Hanna.

ANDORRA

First produced: 1961 (first published, 1961;
English translation, 1963)

Type of work: Play

A teacher raises his illegitimate son as a Jew in a small village in the fictional country of Andorra, where he is destroyed by anti-Semitism.

Andorra centers on a teacher named Can, who returned from Andorra's neighboring country, the nation of the Blacks, accompanied by an infant, whom he claimed was an orphaned Jew. Since the Blacks are notorious for their anti-Semitism, he rescued the boy and adopted him as his own child. The boy, Andri, has grown to be a young man who is in love with Can's daughter, Barblin (Andri's half sister), who has also promised to marry him.

As the play begins, Barblin is whitewashing her father's house in preparation for St. George's Day. Pieder, a soldier, ogles her and scoffs at her assertion that she is engaged. Andorra is described as a snow-white country, beautiful, peaceful, and pious. Pieder, however, points to the fact that underneath the whitewash is red clay, and when the rains come the church and houses are revealed for what they are, blood red like a slaughtered pig. At the inn, the townspeople are also revealed for what they really are in their treatment of Andri, whom they regard with disdain because they think he is a Jew. They ascribe to him traits they associate with Jewishness: avarice, sneakiness, ambition, unfeelingness, and cowardliness. The Cabinetmaker, for instance, asks for an exorbitant fee to take Andri as an apprentice because he thinks that Andri would make a better salesman.

Andri accepts the identity that is forced on him by the town and feels disappointment and resentment when Can refuses to allow him to marry

Barblin, thinking that his adopted father will not allow his daughter to marry a Jew. That night, Pieder sneaks into Barblin's room and overpowers her. In the early morning, Can stumbles into the hallway where Andri is sitting guard outside Barblin's room. The drunken Can tries to tell Andri the truth about his birth but hesitates, and Andri refuses to listen to him. Once Can retreats, Andri pounds on Barblin's door, which Pieder opens and tells him to go away or he will smash his face in.

The next day, the despondent Andri meets with the Priest, who attempts to help Andri reconcile himself to the fact that he is different from the Andorrans. In the town square, Andri accosts Pieder and provokes a fight. The Senora, a woman from the country of the Blacks, intervenes after the soldiers have knocked Andri down and kicked him. She cleans Andri's wounds and leads him home, arm in arm. She then confronts and upbraids Can for the lie he perpetrated to save his reputation. She accuses him of being a coward and makes him promise to tell Andri and the townspeople the truth.

The Senora forges a bond with Andri before leaving to return home. Before she departs the town, however, she is murdered by someone who throws a stone at her. Andri is accused of the murder by the Innkeeper, who claims to have witnessed the event. Andri was with the Priest at the time, who was trying unsuccessfully to convince him that he truly is Can's son and not a Jew. The Blacks invade Andorra, capture the town, and begin the process of identifying the Senora's killer. All the men of the town are forced to parade barefoot across the town square with sacks over their heads while the Jew Detector seeks to identify the culprit. He pronounces that Andri is the Jew who killed the Senora, and despite the protestations of Can and his wife that Andri is not a Jew and that he is innocent of the murder, Andri is killed.

The play ends with the image of Barblin again whitewashing what she thinks is her father's house, but now her head is shaven and she is obviously unstrung because of Andri's death and her father's suicide by hanging. She says, "I'm whitewashing so that we shall have a white Andorra, you murderers, a snow-white Andorra; I shall whitewash all of you, all of you."

SUMMARY

In the fictional worlds projected by Max Frisch's novels and plays, human beings strive to accommodate themselves to socially defined roles, many times never fully understanding themselves and their true potential. The quest for identity is Frisch's central theme, and his works provide examples of individuals who either fail in the process of self-discovery or make tentative stabs at reinventing themselves in more complex, imaginative, and morally responsible ways. This quest for identity drove Frisch's own personal life and is reflected in his commitment to evolve his own consciousness.

Ernest I. Nolan

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What are some of the targets of Max Frisch's satire?
- How does Frisch treat the theme of racism?
- What is Frisch saying about the permanence or mutability of human identity?
- How does Frisch counteract the theater of illusion in his plays?
- What is the role of travel in Frisch's novels?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

Nun singen sie wieder: Versuch eines Requiems, pr. 1945, pb. 1946 (Now They Sing Again, 1972)

Die chinesische Mauer, pr. 1946, pb. 1947 (second version pr., pb. 1955, third version pr. 1965, fourth version pr. 1972; The Chinese Wall, 1961)

Santa Cruz, pr. 1946, pb. 1947

Als der Krieg zu Ende war, pr., pb. 1949 (When the War Was Over, 1967)

Graf Öderland, pr., pb. 1951 (second version pr. 1956, third version pr. 1961; Count Oederland, 1962)

Biedermann und die Brandstifter, pr. 1953 (radio play), pr., pb. 1958 (staged; The Firebugs, 1959; also as The Fire Raisers, 1962)

Don Juan: Oder, Die Liebe zur Geometrie, pr., pb. 1953 (Don Juan: Or, The Love of Geometry, 1967)

Die grosse Wut des Philipp Hotz, pr., pb. 1958 (The Great Fury of Philip Hotz, 1962)

Andorra, pr., pb. 1961 (English translation, 1963)

Three Plays, pb. 1962

Biografie, pb. 1967 (Biography, 1969)

Three Plays, pb. 1967

Four Plays, pb. 1969

Triptychon: Drei szenische Bilder, pb. 1978, pr. 1979 in French, pr. 1981 in German (Triptych, 1981)

Three Plays, pb. 1992

LONG FICTION:

Jürg Reinhart, 1934

J'adore ce qui me brûle: Oder, Die Schwierigen, 1943

Stiller, 1954 (I'm Not Stiller, 1958)

Homo Faber, 1957 (Homo Faber: A Report, 1959)

Mein Name sei Gantenbein, 1964 (A Wilderness of Mirrors, 1965)

Montauk, 1975 (English translation, 1976)

Der Mensch erscheint im Holozän, 1979 (Man in the Holocene, 1980)

Blaubart, 1982 (Bluebeard, 1983)

SHORT FICTION:

Bin: Oder, Die Reise nach Peking, 1945

Wilhelm Tell für die Schule, 1971

NONFICTION:

Tagebuch, 1946-1949, 1950 (Sketchbook, 1946-1949, 1977)

Tagebuch, 1966-1971, 1972 (Sketchbook, 1966-1971, 1974)

Dienstbüchlein, 1974

Der Briefwechsel: Max Frisch, Uwe Johnson, 1964-1983, 1999

Die Briefwechsel mit Carl Jacob Burckhardt und Max Frisch, 2000

MISCELLANEOUS:

Gesammelte Werke in zeitlicher Folge, 1976 (6 volumes)

Novels, Plays, Essays, 1989

About the Author

Kopke, Wulf. Understanding Max Frisch. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

Lob, Ladislaus. "'Insanity in the Darkness': Anti-Semitic Stereotypes and Jewish History in Max Frisch's Andorra and Arthur Miller's Focus." Modern Language Review 92 (July, 1997): 545-558.

Rennert, Hellmut H. Essays on Twentieth-Century German Drama and Theater: An American Reception, 1977-1999. New York: P. Lang, 2004.

Reschke, Claus. Life as a Man: Contemporary Male-Female Relationships in the Novels of Max Frisch. New York: Peter Lang, 1990.

White, Alfred D. Max Frisch, the Reluctant Modernist. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1995.

Yang, Peter. Play Is Play: Theatrical Illusion in Max Frisch's "Chinese Wall" and "Epic" Plays by Brecht, Wilder, Hazelton, and Li. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 2000.

AP/Wide World Photos

CARLOS FUENTES

Born: Panama City, Panama
November, 11, 1928

Aside from affirming a powerful Mexican identity in his writing, Fuentes introduced innovative language and experimental narrative techniques into mainstream Latin American fiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Carlos Fuentes (FWAYN-tays) was born on November 11, 1928, in Panama City, Panama, into a Mexican family that he later characterized as typically petit bourgeois. As the son of a career diplomat, Rafael Fuentes, and Berta Macias Rivas, Carlos Fuentes traveled frequently, attending the best schools in several of the major capitals of the Americas. He learned English at the age of four while his family was living in Washington, D.C. He graduated from high school in Mexico City and then studied law at the National University and the Institut des Hautes Études Internationales in Geneva, Switzerland.

Upon his return to Mexico, he became assistant head of the press section of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1954. While he was head of the department of cultural relations at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, he also founded and edited Revista mexicana de literatura (Mexican review of literature). He later edited or coedited the leftist journals El espectador, Siempre, and Política.

In 1954, Fuentes published a collection of short stories entitled Los días enmascarados (the masked days), his first book. He also began to devote himself to writing full time—novels, book reviews, political essays, film scripts (for Luis Buñuel, among others), and plays.

Fuentes's first two novels reflect his social and artistic concerns at the time. La región más trans- parente (1958; Where the Air Is Clear, 1960) deals with Mexico's social, political, and cultural problems from a loosely Marxist perspective. The book was widely read, became controversial, and established Fuentes as the leading young novelist of Mexico. Las buenas conciencias (1959; The Good Conscience, 1961) is a portrait of a bourgeois family in the provincial town of Guanajuato.

The innovative techniques of Fuentes's first novel, Where the Air Is Clear, are more fully developed in La muerte de Artemio Cruz (1962; The Death of Artemio Cruz, 1964). That novel portrays the Mexican Revolution and its betrayal in modern Mexican society through the memories of Cruz as he lies dying. Generally considered to be Fuentes's most successful novel, it has been translated into fifteen languages.

With his novella Aura (English translation, 1965), a psychological fantasy published in 1962, Fuentes begins to turn away slightly from his earlier focus on social issues and toward Magical Realism. His next work, a collection of short stories, Cantar de ciegos (1964; Songs of the Blind), focuses on the secret and often bizarre lives of individuals, in a more realistic vein.

For the next several years, Fuentes lived primarily in Paris, although he returned frequently to Mexico City. Much of his next two novels, Cambio de piel (1967; A Change of Skin, 1968) and Zona sagrada (1967; Holy Place, 1972), was written in Paris. Fuentes moved back to Mexico in 1969 and published what was to become a famous essay on Latin American literature, La nueva novela hispanoamericana. His novella, Cumpleaños (1969), appeared the same year. Two plays followed the next year.

From 1975 to 1977, Fuentes served as Mexico's ambassador to France. Following completion of Terra nostra (1975; English translation, 1976) and La cabeza de la hidra (1978; The Hydra Head, 1978), he returned to his investigation of the European scene in Una familia lejana (1980; Distant Relations, 1982). Cristóbal nonato (1987; Christopher Unborn, 1989), a novel, as well as a collection of short stories, Constancia, y otras novelas para vírgenes (Constancia, and Other Stories for Virgins, 1990), were published in 1989. One of his best-known novels for American audiences is Gringo viejo (The Old Gringo, 1985), published in 1985 and then adapted to film in 1989. Fuentes was awarded the Cervantes Prize for Literature in 1987.

During the 1990's, Fuentes published several more books, three of them of particular interest and all three translated into English. El naranjo: O, Los círculos del tiempo (1993; The Orange Tree, 1994) consists of five novellas, all of which describe cultures in collision. Diana: O, La cazadora solitaria (1994; Diana, the Goddess Who Hunts Alone, 1995) describes the affair between a married Mexican novelist and an actress who stars in American films; the relationship purportedly is based on an affair between Fuentes and actress Jean Seberg. Los años con Laura Díaz (1999; The Years with Laura Díaz, 2000) is a tour de force epic about a woman's role in Mexican history, featuring fictional and historical figures, including Diego Rivera and Freda Kahlo.

Since 2000, Fuentes has continued to write novels and short stories, and his criticism of the United States has intensified. His satiric La silla del águila (2003; The Eagle's Throne, 2006) takes place in 2020, when Condoleezza Rice is the American president who shuts down Mexican communications after the Mexican government cuts off oil supplies to the United States, which is occupying Colombia. Contra Bush (2004) attacks President George W. Bush for intensifying the tensions between strong and weak countries. En esto creo (2002; This I Believe: An A to Z of a Life, 2005) won the Best Book of the Year Award from the Royal Spanish Academy.

An international figure, Fuentes for many years was denied a visa for travel to the United States because of his political views, but once that ban was lifted, he taught at many American universities, including Harvard, Princeton, Georgetown, Brown, Columbia, and George Mason, in addition to his teaching stints at the University of Paris and Cambridge University, where he was the Simon Bolívar Professor. He is considered to be Mexico's most important living writer.

ANALYSIS

Fuentes's overriding literary concern is with establishing a viable Mexican identity, both as an autonomous entity and in relation to the outside world. Myth, legend, and history often intertwine in Fuentes's work. Fuentes turns to Mexico's past—the Aztec culture, the Christian faith imposed by the Spanish conquistadors, and the failed hopes of the Mexican Revolution—and uses it thematically and symbolically to comment on contemporary concerns and to project his own vision of Mexico's future. In portraying Aztec civilization, Fuentes contrasts the superhuman Mexican gods with the classical deities, who do resemble mortals. The Mexican gods are “the other, a separate reality,” according to Fuentes. This separation incites a paradoxical encounter between what cannot be affected by humans (the sacred) and the human, physical, and imaginative construction of those sacred spaces and times.

The Cuban novelist Alejo Carpentier has argued in his famous essay “Lo real maravilloso” (the marvelous real) that indigenous American culture and nature provide its writers with a wealth of startling images. They constitute a spontaneous, native type of surrealism that contrasts with the artificial variety practiced by European Surrealists. In this kind of Magical Realism, supernatural events appear to grow out of the environment rather than descending upon it from beyond. Fuentes uses Magical Realism in two distinct but related capacities: to underline extreme psychological power and to suggest the presence of ancient cosmic forces drawn from Mexican mythology. The juxtaposition of seemingly incompatible images in his fiction often results from the proximity of two different cultures, from the intrusion of ancient beliefs or figures into modern life.

Cultural layering in Fuentes's fiction often manifests itself in character “doubling,” or the confusion of identities. Often the characters in Fuentes's work are psychologically or socially deviant. Many are misfits, while others do not tolerate ways of life that differ from their own.

THE DEATH OF ARTEMIO CRUZ

First published: La muerte de Artemio Cruz, 1962 (English translation, 1964)

Type of work: Novel

Through the deathbed meditations of Artemio Cruz, the novel explores how the Mexican Revolution has affected Mexican society at large.

In The Death of Artemio Cruz, Fuentes's most widely known novel, Cruz uses his memory to fight against death; Fuentes uses his novel to fight for the memory of the original ideals of the Mexican Revolution, subsequently forgotten and betrayed. The text that Artemio Cruz narrates during the final twelve hours of his life is perhaps his final attempt at domination before he is conquered by death. Struggles for power, however, pervade not only individual relations within the novel but also social relations. The hunger for power consumes not only Cruz as an individual but also society at large. During the Mexican Revolution, the original impetus of the struggle was fragmented, its spirit weakened by the power struggles of its generals; in the years following the revolution, the disruptive desire for power persists, in Fuentes's view.

Private power struggles, fragmenting and disintegrating intimate relations, are most fully developed in the war between Artemio and his wife, Catalina. The tension between the couple is only one manifestation of the continual play of opposing forces in the novel. Like Cruz, who is divided between past and present, body and mind, love and domination, Mexico is divided between the rich and the poor, Spanish and Indian heritages, modern buildings and ancient ruins, revolutionary ideals and mundane compromises. Compressed into the mind of one man, as he lies dying, these divisions take on urgency and universal significance.

The confrontation between memory and death continues throughout the novel. It motivates the most striking aspect of the novel—the division of the text into three different modes of narration and three different verb tenses. The interest of the novel depends to a large extent on the carefully orchestrated interplay between the different voices of Cruz.

With few exceptions, Artemio narrates the entire book. His sickness and imminent death are recounted in the first person and present tense; his meditations and desires in the second person and the future tense; and the events of his past life in the third person and the past tense. While the persons and tenses of the voices are clear, the perspectives of the voices preclude precise descriptions, since they share many images and ideas. They are often described as three distinct parts of the mind: the conscious, the subconscious, and the unconscious. These three different voices demonstrate the coexistence of Cruz's separate selves.

The novel reveals a continual interplay of historical and individual forces. Fuentes's technique is to alternate the three voices in brief sections rather than to present three long narratives, a technique that heightens the tension that the reader experiences between sympathy for and condemnation of Cruz. The shifting perspectives make the choice difficult.

From the novel's central focus on the conflicts within Cruz, the reader moves outward to the conflicts that divide Mexican society as a whole, particularly to the problems posed by the Mexican Revolution. Fuentes has compressed approximately 150 years of Mexican history into the novel. As in Cruz's personal story, so in the historical panorama of Mexico the narrative moves backward in search of origins.

Through the figure of Cruz's paternal grandmother, Ludivinia Menchaca, the historical narrative begins in 1810, the year of her birth and the year of the first revolution, the war of independence from Spain. Cruz's grandmother embodies the old order, the landed aristocracy, which resisted reform movements even back in the mid-nineteenth century. Artemio Cruz is born on her family's land but denied its heritage. Although he fights in the revolution against the order upheld by families such as the Mechacas, he ends up in virtually the same position as his grandmother, denying a voice to later revolutionaries.

Ludivinia's vision of the "green-eyed child,"

Artemio Cruz, outside her window, forms the link between the tumultuous period through which she lived and the later revolution. In between came the years of Porfirio Díaz, who originally rose to power when he opposed the reelection of the former president, Benito Juárez, in 1870. In order to strengthen Mexico financially, the Díaz regime allowed many foreign concessions to enter Mexico, gave away huge amounts of land taken from the Indians, and denied freedom to the press. The second revolution began in 1910, when Francisco Madero opposed the reelection of Díaz. Madero became president in 1911, but his government became weakened by continued fighting. Victoriano Huerta took over in 1913 and Madero was killed by Huerta's forces. These acts provoked Venustiano Carranza and Álvaro Obregón to rise against Huerta and to uphold the original constitution against Huerta's politics of personal power. Carranza and Obregón were supported intermittently by the forces under Pancho Villa and Emiliano Zapata.

In 1913, when the reader first sees Cruz in the revolution, he is fighting with the forces of Carranza against Huerta. When forced to choose sides between Carranza and Obregón, he chooses Obregón, who later becomes president. Fuentes suggests that, early in the revolution, leaders concentrated too heavily on ideology and ignored practical concerns of the common people, including land reform. The betrayal of the revolution by Cruz evokes Fuentes's own revolutionary perspective. Four specific failings of postrevolutionary Mexican society are echoed throughout the novel: class domination, Americanization, financial corruption, and failure of land reform.

TERRA NOSTRA

First published: 1975 (English translation, 1976)

Type of work: Novel

Using European history to investigate the origin of Latin American culture, Fuentes's novel explores the continuing dynamics of cultural colonialism and independence.

Terra Nostra opens amidst chaotic scenes in Paris: Repentant sinners converge on the church of Saint Germain de Pres and hundreds of women give birth along the banks of the Seine. A man named Pollo Phoibee meets a young woman with grey eyes and tattooed lips, called Celestina, who wants him to explain all these strange events to her. Pollo slips and falls into the Seine. Symbolically echoing The Fall of Icarus, the painting by sixteenth century Dutch artist Pieter Bruegel, the Elder, Pollo—and the reader—fall into the temporal realm of art. There, historical events are shifted out of their traditional sequence and combined with fantastic events. In the next chapter, Pollo, now nameless, has fallen back into sixteenth century Spain. He is discovered on a beach and taken to a palace by the queen of the land, La Señora. This occasion is the first of many instances in the novel in which water serves as a linking device between distant places and times.

The first section of Terra Nostra, called "The Old World," concerns the activities of La Señora's husband, El Señor, and his court. El Señor, an imaginary version of Philip II of Spain, is obsessed with the task of building an elaborate palace, the Escorial, to function primarily as a royal mausoleum, and with the prospect of his own death. By sacrificing his life to the building of the magnificent monument, with statues of his ancestors, he hopes to arrest time, to attain eternal life.

El Señor's religious passion ultimately causes him to neglect and mistreat his queen. She recounts a bizarre scene in which she falls on her back in the palace courtyard and cannot get up by herself because of her heavy iron hoopskirts. Everyone abandons her to the elements for days because only the king is allowed to touch her. Mold grows on her, her skin burns and peels, and she is so lonely that she welcomes the mouse that crawls under her skirts. When El Señor finally appears and has a mirror held before her, La Señora screams at seeing her now-unrecognizable face. She believes that her husband has caused her to fall and to rot, so that their appearances would be equally repulsive. La Señora finally realizes, however, that it is not her husband's evil nature that has caused his cruelty; his extreme Christian fervor has caused him not to touch her. She decides then that she will choose the Devil to combat him, and henceforth she will follow her own desires.

"The Old World" section of the novel ends with Celestina's companion, the pilgrim, as he begins to tell a tale to El Señor, the tale that constitutes his adventures in "The New World," the second and briefest section of the novel. At first, the visions of the New World are idyllic. Ultimately, however, the pilgrim and his friend, an old man named Pedro, are cast upon a beach covered with pearls. Pedro stakes out a claim and is killed defending it from the natives. The natives believe that the earth is divine and cannot be possessed by any person. Pedro has been destroyed by his need for private property in a society that seems to practice a kind of cosmic socialism. He has violated the native utopian tradition that Fuentes (in his essays) hopes will resurface in Mexico.

The society's anticipation and acceptance of the pilgrim as one of their original princes naturally recalls the Aztec belief that the arrival of Hernán Cortés constituted the long-awaited reappearance of the plumed serpent-god Quetzalcoatl. In each case, the conquest of the New World by the Old is facilitated by the incorporation of an Old World explorer into the New World religion. Earlier, the Spaniards killed the Indians with guns; now, the pilgrim offers them a mirror as a gift, but it is no less fatal. The ancient views himself and dies of terror. The people then claim the pilgrim as their chieftain and founder. He finally sees his aged reflection in a mirror, however, as the original ancient had done. (The mirror also might suggest a variety of external or internal conflicts—between two cultures, two people, and two parts of the self.)

Finally, before returning to the Old World, the pilgrim again meets the original ancient, who explains to him that he has killed his own hostile brother (part of himself). The ancient says that this continual struggle between opposing forces is necessary for life. This life cycle is precisely what El Señor is trying so desperately to avoid by his plan for eternal fixity within the Escorial.

It is also why, at the beginning of the third part of the novel, El Señor resists the discovery of the New World. This section of the novel is called "The Next World." El Señor is overwhelmed by the knowledge of the New World and also by the philosophy of the ancient, who proclaims that the essence of life is change. El Señor wishes to hide these things from his people so that they will not envision a system other than the one by which he rules them. Most of all, he fears the pilgrim himself, whose task is to achieve freedom. Near the end of the novel, presumably after El Señor dies, he climbs a stairway in his palace, where "on each step the world offered the temptation to choose anew . . . but always in the same, if transfigured place: this land, land of Vespers, Spain, Terra Nostra" Yet Terra Nostra is the known world on old maps, and El Señor has remained there, never venturing to explore his new domains across the sea.

The last chapter of the novel reiterates the opening scene in Paris, where Pollo and Celestina meet in a final embrace. They are fused into one androgynous being that can possess itself continuously in an ecstasy of love. Power struggles are abolished; this act of love abolishes the difference between the self and the other. Their embrace is a wedding that reverses time, since its single self-fertilizing being resembles the figure of Uroboros, an undifferentiated unity imagined in many ancient mythologies to precede humankind's division into individual creatures of different sexes.

This apocalyptic end is a vision, not a confirmation, of paradise and represents the hope that the "next world" will succeed the known world. Love triumphs here, but it cannot abolish the cruel cycles of history. Thus, at the end of the novel, the reader is left balanced between two visions: unity versus diversity, "ours" versus "yours" or "mine," love versus power, and satisfaction versus frustration.

THE OLD GRINGO

First published: Gringo viejo, 1985 (English translation, 1985)

Type of work: Novel

In his novel about the fictionalized death of American writer Ambrose Bierce (the Old Gringo), Fuentes explores Mexican history, stresses the importance of recall and remembrance, and places the action in Mexico, where the revolution is taking place.

The action in The Old Gringo occurs within a short period of time. The Old Gringo (Bierce), searching for yet another frontier, rides into Mexico with a few belongings, notably a suitcase with a couple of his books and a copy of Don Quixote (1605, 1615), whose protagonist is also on a quest. Miguel de Cervantes's "hero" is at once romantic and comic, and surely Fuentes is commenting ironically about the Old Gringo's venture. As he puts it, "My work is finished and so am I." As Inocencio Mansalvo describes the Old Gringo's purpose, "That man came here to die."

The Old Gringo searches for Pancho Villa's army but instead finds a band of rebels led by "General" Tomás Arroyo, the illegitimate son of the Mirandas, whose estate he destroys. After demonstrating his prowess with a gun, the Old Gringo joins Arroyo's band and in the fighting the next day displays "suicidal courage." Harriet Wilson, the teacher the Mirandas hired for their children, is also at the Miranda estate and is intent on educating children and salvaging what she can of the Miranda property. Unfortunately, only a ballroom full of mirrors remains. After the battle, as Arroyo and Harriet dance, she imagines he is her father, who died in Cuba, and she has intercourse with him. When the Old Gringo burns the papers Arroyo has proving Mexican ownership of the land, Arroyo shoots him. When Villa arrives, he discovers what has happened, exhumes the Old Gringo's body, and then has him shot by a firing squad. Villa also kills Arroyo. At the end of the novel, Harriet claims the Old Gringo is actually her father and has his body taken back to Washington, D.C., where he is buried next to her mother.

In addition to the events that transpire, Fuentes provides his readers with the thoughts and emotional baggage of the three main characters. The Old Gringo has already experienced "four successive and irreparable blows" (presumably the deaths of his four children) and seeks the "fifth, blind, murderous blow of fate." He suspects that "each of us carries the real frontier inside," and when Mansalvo says that the Old Gringo died because he crossed the frontier, he speaks literally, but the remark also is metaphorical.

Harriet has her own demons, especially the memory of her father, who had a black mistress in the family home in Washington and who stayed in Cuba with a "negress" rather than return home to his family. She is also the product of "God-fearing, sober" Methodism, which encourages strength, thrift, and wisdom, and her experiences in Mexico threaten that background. The hall of mirrors forces her to look critically at her life. She tests the Mexicans, leaving pearls where they can be stolen, which they are, but she persists in her notion of duty and desires to "civilize" the Mexicans. She also says she has crossed the frontier, and again the frontier is both literal and metaphorical.

Arroyo's remembered past is even more complex, since as the bastard Miranda son he was denied any rights and was almost killed when soldiers destroyed the village in which he was staying. Hidden in the cellar with two vicious dogs, he is rescued by a "moon-faced woman" who becomes his lover. The cellar and near-death experience, as well as the rescue, suggest a kind of rebirth for the revolutionary, who is determined to return to the Miranda estate in spite of Villa's orders that no one return to his home. For Arroyo, the dreams are not of his father but of his absent mother, whose love is out of reach. In returning home, he also crossed a frontier.

THE YEARS WITH LAURA DÍAZ

First published: Los años con Laura Díaz,
1999 (English translation, 2000)

Type of work: Novel

This novel spans the twentieth century, providing readers with Mexican history, politics, economics, mythology, and legend, as it explores a woman's eventual self-acceptance and emergence as a photographer, a woman with vision.

The Years with Laura Díaz begins and ends with Santiago López-Alfaro making a television documentary, first in Detroit in 1999 and then in Los Angeles in 2000. In Detroit, while looking at a mural painted by Diego Rivera, he sees the face of Laura Díaz, the woman whose story is covered in the ensuing pages; at the end of the novel, he is looking at another mural by a Mexican painter, whose work, like Rivera's, was also censored and obliterated.

The framing device sets the plot in motion, taking readers back to 1905, when Laura's grandmother, Cosima Kelsen, is traveling from Mexico City to the family home in Veracruz. On the trip home, a dashing bandit nicknamed the Hunk of Papantla cuts off her fingers in order to steal her rings, but, inexplicably, a legend develops that Cosima never got over her infatuation with the bandit. That legend is but one of many that persists in family history. At her home in Catemaco, Cosima has three daughters: the pianist Hilda, the writer Virginia, and Leticia, Laura's mother. She also "adopts" Maria de la O, her husband Felipe's mulatto daughter. At Cosima's funeral, Laura follows a white crow (more legend) to what she believes is a giant female figure covered with jewels, a sight that recurs later in the novel.

When Laura and Leticia join Leticia's husband, Fernando, in Veracruz, where he has become a bank president, Laura meets the first Santiago, her half brother, the son from Fernando's first marriage, and the two become very close. Santiago, a revolutionary, is executed by a firing squad, and Fernando is transferred to Xalapa. Laura marries Juan Francisco López Greene, a labor leader, and has two sons, Santiago and Danton, but she is unhappy, believing that she has "shrunk" rather than grown. She realizes that she knows only Francisco's public self, not his private self. After Francisco informs on Carmela Soriano, a rebel, Laura leaves her husband and is soon attending soirees with Orlando Ximenéz, a notorious womanizer. She also becomes friends with Diego Rivera and Frida Kahlo, who take her to Detroit, where Diego includes her in his mural. When she returns to Mexico, she meets Jorge Maura, the only man she really loves, but he leaves her to help his Jewish lover escape from Nazi persecution.

Laura then returns to Francisco and renews her relationships with her children. Santiago, the painter, gives his mother a painting she believes depicts the Fall of Man. Santiago dies at twenty-six, before he can realize his artistic potential. His brother, Danton, marries a wealthy woman and has a son, another Santiago, who rebels against his father, becomes political, and is killed at a demonstration, but not before his wife becomes pregnant. Her baby becomes the fourth Santiago, Laura's grandson, who begins and ends the story.

At the demonstration, Laura, who has been given a camera, photographs her son and begins her career as a photographer and her life as a complete human being. In 1972, after she learns that she has cancer, she returns to Catemaco, her childhood home, which has been restored by Danton, and finds the statue of the woman, as well as the ceiba tree, which her grandfather, in an effort to spare her from superstition, had told her was the statue she had seen. In embracing the ceiba tree, with its spines like "wounding daggers," Laura finds the tree ironically "protecting" in the sense that it provides her the release from life she seeks.

In addition to an intricate plot and a large cast of characters, Fuentes offers his readers a tour of Mexican history, a course in American-Mexican relations, McCarthyism, mural painting, and mythology. Most of the political content comes from discussions between Francisco and labor leaders and between Jorge and his friends, and the novel suffers a bit from the protracted harangues about why the revolution failed. The nature of Mexican-American relations is vividly portrayed through Rivera's mural and Santiago's interpretation of it. While Rivera paints many black and brown faces, he does not paint any white ones—the white workers are facing away from spectators. The machines on which American capitalism relies are depicted as menacing and outsized, so that they seem to be a threat. Harry Jaffee, one of Laura's lovers, is one of the many political refugees from the northeast United States and Hollywood whose careers have been destroyed by the anti-Communist paranoia fostered by right-wing politicians.

The legends and mythology in the book are, almost without exception, feminine. The giant female statue, the doll Li Po, and Leticia, "the central feminine image" for Laura, suggest that the real power in the novel is feminine.

SUMMARY

In his fiction, Carlos Fuentes confronts the problems of Mexican identity through the presence of ancestral voices and indigenous mythologies. His is a view of humankind molded by history yet morally responsible for individual actions, situated in time yet responsive to eternal values. The fictional mode that he uses to express his view is Magical (symbolic) Realism, a realism that can be comprehended only through symbols.

Genevieve Slomski; updated by Thomas L. Erskine

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- La región más transparente*, 1958 (Where the Air Is Clear, 1960)
Las buenas conciencias, 1959 (The Good Conscience, 1961)
Aura, 1962 (novella; English translation, 1965)
La muerte de Artemio Cruz, 1962 (The Death of Artemio Cruz, 1964)
Cambio de piel, 1967 (A Change of Skin, 1968)
Zona sagrada, 1967 (novella; Holy Place, 1972)
Cumpleaños, 1969 (novella)
Terra nostra, 1975 (English translation, 1976)
La cabeza de la hidra, 1978 (The Hydra Head, 1978)
Una familia lejana, 1980 (Distant Relations, 1982)
Gringo viejo, 1985 (The Old Gringo, 1985)
Cristóbal nonato, 1987 (Christopher Unborn, 1989)
La campaña, 1990 (The Campaign, 1991; first volume of the trilogy El tiempo romántico)
Diana: O, La cazadora solitaria, 1994 (Diana, the Goddess Who Hunts Alone, 1995)
Los años con Laura Díaz, 1999 (The Years with Laura Díaz, 2000)
Instinto de Inez, 2001 (Inez, 2002)
La silla del águila, 2003 (The Eagle's Throne, 2006)
Todas las familias felices, 2006
La voluntad y la fortuna, 2008

SHORT FICTION:

- Los días enmascarados*, 1954
Cantar de ciegos, 1964
Poemas de amor: Cuentos del alma, 1971
Chac Mool, y otros cuentos, 1973
Agua quemada, 1980 (Burnt Water, 1980)
Constancia, y otras novelas para vírgenes, 1989 (Constancia, and Other Stories for Virgins, 1990)

Días enmascarados, 1990 (includes Los días enmascarados and Cantar de ciegos)

El naranjo: O, Los círculos del tiempo, 1993 (The Orange Tree, 1994)

La frontera de cristal: Una novela en nueve cuentos, 1995 (The Crystal Frontier: A Novel in Nine Stories, 1997)

Inquieta compañía, 2004

DRAMA:

El tuerto es rey, pb. 1970

Todos los gatos son pardos, pb. 1970

Orquídeas a la luz de la luna, pb. 1982 (Orchids in the Moonlight, 1982)

Ceremonias del alba, revised edition pb. 1991

SCREENPLAYS:

El acoso, 1958 (with Luis Buñuel; adaptation of Alejo Carpentier's novel)

Children of Sanchez, 1961 (with Abbey Mann; adaptation of Oscar Lewis's work)

Tiempo de morir, 1966

Pedro Páramo, 1966 (adaptation of Juan Rulfo's novel)

Los caifanes, 1967

NONFICTION:

The Argument of Latin America: Words for North Americans, 1963

Paris: La revolución de mayo, 1968

La nueva novela hispanoamericana, 1969

El mundo de José Luis Cuevas, 1969

Casa con dos puertas, 1970

Los reinos originarios: Teatro hispano-mexicano, 1971

Tiempo mexicano, 1971

Cervantes: O, La crítica de la lectura, 1976 (Cervantes: Or, The Critique of Reading, 1976)

Myself with Others: Selected Essays, 1988

Valiente mundo nuevo: Épica, utopía y mito en la novela, 1990

El espejo enterrado, 1992 (The Buried Mirror: Reflections on Spain and the New World, 1992)

Tres discursos para dos aldeas, 1993

Geografía de la novela, 1993

Nuevo tiempo mexicano, 1994 (A New Time for Mexico, 1996)

Latin America: At War with the Past, 2001

En esto creo, 2002 (This I Believe: An A to Z of a Life, 2005)

Viendo visiones, 2003

Contra Bush, 2004

Los 68: París-Praga-México, 2005

Los caballeros del siglo XXI, 2005

EDITED TEXT:

The Vintage Book of Latin American Stories, 2000 (with Julio Ortega)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What is Carlos Fuentes's view of the United States' influence on Mexico?
- How does Fuentes use art and artists to convey his ideas about politics?
- What is the relationship between myth and history in Fuentes's works?
- What is the importance of Santiago's The Fall of Man painting that Laura renames The Ascent of Humanity in The Years with Laura Díaz? How does it relate to Fuentes's portraits of the two priests?
- To what extent has "General" Arroyo, a character in The Old Gringo, crossed a frontier to die?
- Discuss Harriet's feelings about her father and how those feelings affect her actions in The Old Gringo.
- What point does Fuentes make about the writing of history in The Old Gringo?
- Laura Díaz seems driven to probe her lovers' deepest secrets, to know their private and public selves. How does her desire affect her relationships, and if she changes her mind, what prompts her change of heart?

About the Author

- Brody, Robert, and Charles Rossman, eds. Carlos Fuentes: A Critical View. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1982.
- Brushwood, John S. Mexico in Its Novel. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1966.
- Duran, Gloria. The Archetypes of Carlos Fuentes: From Witch to Androgyne. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1980.
- Faris, Wendy B. Carlos Fuentes. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1983.
- Gonzalez, Alfonso. Carlos Fuentes: Life, Work, and Criticism. Fredericton, N.B.: York Press, 1987.
- Guzman, Daniel de. Carlos Fuentes. New York: Twayne, 1972.
- Gyurko, Lanin. Lifting the Obsidian Mask: The Artistic Vision of Carlos Fuentes. Potomac, Md.: Scripta Humanista, 2007.
- Helmuth, Chalene. The Postmodern Fuentes. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1997.
- Ibsen, Kristine. Author, Text, and Reader in the Novels of Carlos Fuentes. New York: Grove/Atlantic, 1996.
- Van Delden, Maarten. Carlos Fuentes, Mexico, and Modernity. Nashville, Tenn.: Vanderbilt Press, 1998.
- Williams, Raymond Leslie. The Writings of Carlos Fuentes. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1996.

Richard Corman

ATHOL FUGARD

Born: Middelburg, South Africa
June 11, 1932

A renowned and prolific playwright, Fugard has illuminated without didacticism the social situation in South Africa under apartheid.

BIOGRAPHY

Harold Athol Lannigan Fugard (FYEW-gard) spent his first three years in the village of Middelburg, where his parents owned a small general store. His crippled father was an English-speaking South African, his mother an Afrikaans-speaking descendant of Dutch pioneers who had settled the area during the seventeenth century.

In 1935, the family moved to Port Elizabeth, where Mrs. Fugard opened a tearoom which provided most of the family income. Her husband was not only physically handicapped but also an alcoholic.

When he had finished high school, Fugard went to Port Elizabeth Technical College, where he learned motor mechanics, and then obtained a scholarship to the University of Cape Town to study philosophy and social anthropology. He is quoted as dropping out in his senior year to avoid "being trapped as an academic." He then hitchhiked through Africa for six months to Port Sudan, where he signed up as the only Caucasian crew member on a tramp steamer.

His experiences during the two-year voyage to the Orient played an important part in the development of his view of race relations. Back in South Africa, he met and married (in 1956) Sheila Meiring, an actress, and Fugard began his lifelong interest in the theater.

In 1958, Fugard took a job as a clerk in the Fordsburg Native Commissioner's Court in Johannesburg, where local passbook law cases were tried. Under this law, native Africans were strictly controlled in regard to their housing and places of work. They were literally allowed to come to urban areas only to "minister to the needs of the white man" and required to leave when they "cease to so minister." Seeing Africans sent to prison for non-compliance at the rate of "one every two minutes," as Fugard said later in an interview, so appalled him, it motivated him to expose life under apartheid to the world.

Fugard left the court and took a job as stage manager at South Africa's white National Theatre Organization. He now had some black friends who were also interested in the theater, and he began writing short plays, such as No-Good Friday (pr. 1958, pb. 1977), and Nongogo (pr. 1959, pb. 1977), which they rehearsed and performed for private audiences.

In 1959, he and his wife went to London with the intention of gaining wider theatrical experience, but in March, 1960, seventy-two demonstrators protesting the passbook laws were massacred in Sharpeville, near Johannesburg, and the Fugards bought one-way tickets home.

One of the first diary entries made by the playwright in 1960 signifies his intention to personify South Africa's racial situation in two characters, the "coloured" brothers Morris and Zachariah. The result was The Blood Knot (pr. 1961, pb. 1963), which ran in London and then for seven months Off-Broadway in 1964. By this time, Fugard was not only writing but also directing, and for the last part of the New York run he acted in one of the roles.

At about the same time Fugard was approached by five men of the Xhosa tribe who asked him to help them form a theater company. The result was the Serpent Company, which with the playwright's help presented classic plays by Bertolt Brecht, Jean Genet, August Strindberg, and Sophocles. Although the group successfully toured Scotland, Ireland, and England, it was prohibited by the government from performing publicly before white or mixed audiences in South Africa.

In 1967, when the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) televised The Blood Knot, the government of South Africa withdrew Fugard's passport. Therefore, he was unable to attend performances of any of his plays outside the country until 1971, when, in response to a petition signed by four thousand people, his passport was returned in time for him to attend the London opening of Boesman and Lena (pr., pb. 1969).

During this same period, the Serpent Players started to work on improvisations, which resulted in two plays devised by Fugard in collaboration with John Kani and Winston Ntshona. The first, Sizwe Bansi Is Dead (pr. 1972, pb. 1973), shows an African assuming the identity of a corpse in order to secure a valid passbook. The second, The Island (pr. 1973, pb. 1974), reveals the unbelievable brutality of life on Robben Island, South Africa's maximum security prison for black political prisoners. Here two inmates entertain with a performance of the ancient Greek play Antigone, adapting its message of civil disobedience to life in South Africa. When these plays were performed on Broadway (1974-1975), they received three Tony nominations: Best Play, Best Director (Fugard), and Best Actor. Kani and Ntshona were given the acting award jointly.

Fugard has written a number of successful plays and a novel since 1975. At one point in his Notebooks 1960-1977 (1983), he writes of tearing up the first few chapters of a novel, deciding that he is primarily a playwright. In 1980, however, Tsotsi appeared and received excellent reviews. This realistic story of a young African hoodlum (the title means "gangster" in English) who has shut out his childhood and become a nameless sociopath is very moving.

In 1981, Fugard had moderate success with the play A Lesson from Aloes (pr. 1978, pb. 1981), and in 1982 "MASTER HAROLD" . . . and the Boys (pr., pb. 1982) played in many venues and on television in the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Road to Mecca (pr. 1984, pb. 1985) followed in 1984; My Children! My Africa! (pr., pb. 1990) came in 1990, with Fugard's daughter, Lisa, in a leading role; and in 1992, Playland was produced and published. The play Hello and Goodbye (pr. 1965, pb. 1966), first produced in 1965, was revised and presented successfully, under the playwright's direction, at Princeton University in 1994. At that time, Fugard said he intended to continue as a man of the theater, writing, directing, and acting both in and out of his beloved South Africa.

ANALYSIS

The society of South Africa under apartheid was unique; it seems necessary to describe some features of that society before analyzing Fugard's work. These features include the country's system, now dismantled in law if not in memory, of classification and separation by race.

South African whites include Afrikaners, who were descendants of the Dutch settlers, and other Caucasians, most of whom had English backgrounds. In terms of economic status, these people cover a broad spectrum. There are also Indians, some Asians, and those of mixed racial backgrounds, who are called "coloured." At the bottom of the social scale are the indigenous Africans.

The native Africans were strictly segregated to undesirable living quarters, usually slums on the outskirts of urban areas, frequently at some distance from employment. Furthermore, native Africans had at all times to carry identification cards that specified the most intimate particulars of their lives. Except for the employer-employee relationship, native Africans were supposed to have no contact with whites. For the most part, audiences at sporting events and the theater were either all white or all black. A small percentage of native Africans were literate; however, a few gained enough education to work as scribes, civil servants, actors, or even teachers, but most did heavy manual or menial work.

Finally, the criminal justice system was harsh, inhumane, and corrupt. For example, those in power allowed the roving gangs of African hoodlums, called "tsotsis," to prey on their own people with impunity, while arresting any nonwhite who failed to present a proper passcard when asked to do so by a policeman.

Fugard's work deals with all these conditions without (except for My Children! My Africa!) becoming overtly political. He accomplishes this by maintaining an aesthetic distance and by creating characters who, although sometimes symbolic, are always compelling as human beings involved in dramatic conflict.

In Notebooks, 1960-1977, Fugard discusses frankly his admiration for Samuel Beckett's plays and Albert Camus's novels, and acknowledges the influence of both men on his work. He asserts also that consciousness is a thin beach, and that the unconscious is the sea where his ideas originate. For example, his traumatic childhood experiences and his love-hate relationship with his alcoholic, crippled father led him to write "MASTER HAROLD" . . . and the Boys. The guilt he felt when as a young boy he spit in the face of an African became the source for the climax in that play.

An entry from 1963 in Notebooks 1960-1977 explains clearly Fugard's approach to writing his plays. He notices a young man aimlessly loitering near a bar in a white slum, Valley Road. His drunkenness suggests his need to shut out reality, so the playwright creates that reality. He gives him a name, Johnnie Smit; he visualizes the two rooms of the shack where Johnnie cares for his blind, crippled father; and he brings in Johnnie's sister, Hester, who has returned home after an absence of fifteen years.

Tired of her life as a prostitute, Hester has a single aim: to claim her share of the compensation money paid her father by the South African Railways after his accident. She believes the cash is hidden in some boxes in the old man's room, and she forces Johnnie to lug out box after box, which she rummages through, strewing their worthless contents around with mounting frustration, as her brother warns her not to awaken the invalid in the next room.

Some of the items in the boxes, such as her dead mother's clothes, birth and wedding certificates, old photographs, and a box of men's shoes—left ones only—bring back memories of a bleak childhood with many family fights and little cash.

While Hester is searching the boxes, Johnnie is trying out his father's crutches. Finally the last box is opened, and as Hester threatens to confront their father, Johnnie must tell her the truth. Johannes Cornelius Smit has died and there is no money.

At this point the furious Hester beats her unresisting brother to the floor, where he remains as she leaves to return to her life as "a woman in a room." After her exit, Johnnie crawls to the crutches, stands on them, and assumes the persona of his father. The play is given the title Hello and Goodbye.

This play is very representative of Fugard's style. All of his plays have only two or three characters; they are all set in South Africa and played out against the backdrop of that society; the dialogue is crisp and realistic, if occasionally somewhat poetic; and his characters are all three-dimensional, neither heroes nor villains, but frequently victims.

One of Fugard's best plays, Boesman and Lena, ran for a year in New York and received rave reviews. The coloured characters frequently speak Afrikaans, so a three-page glossary is a requirement. With talented actors, such as James Earl Jones and Ruby Dee, who first played the roles, there was no need for translation.

Boesman and Lena is the story of a nomadic coloured couple who have been together for many years. Time after time their makeshift shelter has been destroyed; they compare themselves to human rubbish—an apt description. Boesman takes out his disgust with life by abusing Lena; she defies him by inviting an old black to share their fire and food. All she wants is someone to talk to, even though the old African can only understand and repeat one word—Lena. When they realize that the black has died, Boesman starts to pack up. Were the authorities to find them with a dead man, there might be questions. Lena thinks she will not go this time, but the sight of Boesman trying to carry all of their poor possessions alone moves her, and she follows him into the darkness, carrying her share of the "white man's junk."

There is frequently physical violence in Fugard's plays. Characters become frustrated and misdirect their aggression, exploding, taking out their feelings on other, weaker victims. For example, in the one play which is openly political, My Children! My Africa!, Mr. M., the protagonist, is an older black teacher, who preaches peaceful coexistence with the ruling white society. A mob of young students, furious with this approach, consider Mr. M. a traitor to their cause and kill him. The play is meant to illustrate the desperation that can so easily lead to violence. The play's somewhat didactic approach is less effective than most of Fugard's work, which makes the point more subtly.

THE BLOOD KNOT

First produced: 1961 (first published, 1963)

Type of work: Play

Two colored half brothers, one very light, the other very dark, realize their inextricable connection.

This play, first produced in Johannesburg, may be considered seminal in that it defines clearly the society of South Africa under apartheid, a society that Fugard loathed.

Morris, who can pass for white, and his half brother, Zachariah, most definitely an African, share a one-room shack in the nonwhite slum of Korsten, near Port Elizabeth.

Zachariah is completely illiterate and a little slow-witted, but he has a menial job as a gatekeeper. Morris acts as homemaker—cleaning their room, cooking the meals, mending Zachariah's clothing, and preparing nightly footbaths for his brother.

In the year they have been together Morris has saved part of Zach's pay each week with the goal of accumulating enough cash to buy a small farm far from the area so that they can live as independent human beings.

Zachariah, however, is more interested in the present than the future. He remembers a friend who used to help him squander each week's pay on wine and women, and he is quite resentful of his brother's somewhat puritanical attitude.

To placate Zachariah, Morris suggests a pen pal, to be found in a newspaper listing women interested in this kind of activity. Not entirely convinced that this will take the place of "having a woman," Zach finally chooses Ethel Lange, and dictates a letter to Morris. She replies, enclosing a picture of herself that brings Morris to his senses. Zachariah has brought home a white newspaper, and has corresponded with a white woman whose brother is a policeman. She also writes that she will be coming to their area in June, and Morris panics. He wants to burn all the letters and forget the whole thing, but Zachariah convinces him to meet Ethel, passing as a white man, and insists on using all the money they have saved to buy the appropriate clothing for the occasion. The next letter from Ethel is a farewell note; she is being married and her fiancé does not want her to continue the pen pal correspondence.

This plot is the skeleton that Fugard fleshes out. Fugard emphasizes the blood knot that has brought Morris back to his half brother after years of separation. They remember having the same mother; they recall fleeting glimpses of early childhood when the light-skinned child was favored over his brother; they act out an imaginary scene in which Morris, dressed in the white man's finery, mistreats the African gatekeeper. They even pretend to chase away an old black woman, who represents both their birth mother and Mother Africa.

Throughout their playacting they vent their frustrations. Morris intimates that he has tried to "pass" but failed; Zachariah shows his deep-seated envy of Morris. At one time, after Morris has gone through the imaginary gate, it is "locked," and when he cannot "escape," the two men almost come to blows. In the end, Morris winds up his old alarm clock, the one he has used throughout the play to remind him of tasks such as fixing Zachariah's footbath, preparing supper, or going to sleep. Morris says: "You see, we're tied together, Zach. It's what they call the blood knot . . . the bond between brothers."

THE ROAD TO MECCA

First produced: 1984 (first published, 1985)

Type of work: Play

An elderly recluse thwarts the attempts of her Calvinist neighbors to send her to an old people's home.

This play is based on the facts of the life and work of Helen Martins of New Bethseda, South Africa. In Fugard's foreword he describes the isolated bleakness of the area, which is offset by Mrs. Martins, who has filled her yard with heathen statues and sculptures, all facing toward Mecca.

Helen receives an unexpected visit from her much younger friend, Elsa Barlow, who has driven eight hundred miles from Cape Town in response to a letter that seemed to her a cry for help. Helen's depression has two causes: First, she realizes that her age is catching up with her, and second, she resents the pressure she feels to leave her Mecca and go into an old people's home.

A third character, the Calvinist pastor, Marius

Byleveld, comes to Helen's house, expecting that she has decided to sign the form that will finalize her move to the old people's home; however, she resists and decides to continue living as she has.

Elsa has some serious problems of her own, which she does not reveal until the end of the play. She speaks only of the African woman carrying a baby to whom she had given a lift, food, and money, a woman she left trudging patiently to some unknown destination. The stage setting for this play is pivotal to understanding the theme. Helen's house is described as "an extraordinary room . . . the walls—mirrors on all of them—are all of different colors, while on the ceiling and floor are solid, multicolored geometric patterns . . . the final effect is not bizarre but rather one of light and extravagant fantasy."

Since the death of her husband fifteen years before, Helen has been creating art and repudiating the "Christian values" of the village, causing both fear and resentment among her neighbors. As a representative of the narrow-minded villagers, Pastor Byleveld argues with Elsa, bringing out the theme of the play, which is conflict between the paternalistic Calvinist doctrine of the town and the somewhat hedonistic attitude held by both Elsa and Helen.

In her final attempt to explain her self-created "Mecca" to Byleveld, Helen reveals her need for freedom, her desire for light, her intense pleasure in her creations. She instructs Elsa to light all the candles, and in prose bordering on poetry she describes the ecstasy she feels when the darkness has been vanquished. She then returns the unsigned form to the pastor, who leaves, but not before revealing his repressed feelings for Helen when he says: "There is more light in you than in all your candles put together."

At this point Elsa tells Helen the significance of the African woman and her baby. After Elsa's lover chose to return to his estranged wife rather than face divorce, Elsa had an abortion. The sight of the indigent black woman walking, her infant on her back, down the road where there would be no Mecca had simply overwhelmed her. Only now, with Helen's encouragement, can she cry.

At the end of the play, after Helen's admission that she has completed her Mecca and must now learn to blow out the candles, Elsa gives her tea laced with Valium. The two women joke about "artificial sweeteners," which may signify Helen's suicide. The actual Mrs. Martins died in this way.

"MASTER HAROLD" . . . AND THE BOYS

First produced: 1982 (first published, 1982)

Type of work: Play

A young high school boy makes some important discoveries about himself and his life.

As the play opens on a rainy afternoon in the St. George's Park Tea Room, two black waiters, Sam and Willie, are cleaning up while discussing a forthcoming dance contest that they plan to enter. Willie is having some difficulty mastering certain steps; Sam, the more expert dancer, is instructing him. There is a light mood of camaraderie between them, as the third character, a seventeen-year-old white boy, Hally, enters.

This is his mother's tearoom, and it is quickly established that Hally has known these two men since he was a young child, when they were servants in his parents' boarding house. The relationship, especially with Sam, involves some easy bantering about those bygone days with Hally hiding in Sam's room, cooperation on homework assignments, and an essay that Hally must write describing a cultural event. What is bothering Hally at the moment, however, is his family situation.

His crippled, alcoholic father has been in the hospital, and when his mother telephones the tearoom, Hally tries unsuccessfully to persuade her to leave him there. She refuses, and when the boy realizes that life with his father at home will resume that very night, he is furious and vents his anger and hatred with some violence. Sam tries to stem Hally's vitriolic outpouring, but he succeeds only in diverting the boy's wrath to himself. This culminates in Hally asserting his position as "Master Harold" and finally spitting in Sam's face. At first, Sam's reaction is great anger, but that quickly subsides as Willie reminds him that Hally is “just a child.”

In their reminiscences, Sam and Willie speak of a kite that Sam made for Hally, one made of tomato-box wood and brown paper, using flour and water for glue and old stockings for the tail, with scraps of string tied together so the boy could hold it. Hally had hoped no classmates would be up on the hill; he was sure that his kite would not fly—but it did. It flew high, dipped, and flew even higher. Then Sam left Hally because “he had work to do.”

After Hally's hateful act against his friend, Sam tells him why he had made the kite. It was meant to comfort the child who had been publicly humiliated as he went home from the hotel bar, carrying his father's crutches, and trailing after the big black man who carried the unconscious drunk on his back. Sam also explains that he could not sit with Hally to fly the kite because the bench had been marked: “whites only.” A resumption of the relationship between Sam and Hally seems impossible. Still, Sam talks of making and flying another kite and of Hally's realizing that he need not sit on the bench alone. The boy leaves, and the play ends with Sam tutoring Willie in his dance steps.

There is a parallel between this play and Mark Twain's Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884). In that novel Jim, a black man, acts as Huck's surrogate father; in the play Sam assumes the same role. Hally and Huck have alcoholic fathers who behave without concern for their sons; both children have ambiguous feelings toward the natural parent. Both also finally perceive the nature of unselfish love.

This play is possibly the most autobiographical of all Fugard's work. His mother's tearoom, his crippled, alcoholic father, and the experience of spitting in a black man's face are all factual. With consummate skill the playwright dramatically weaves these strands into a powerful text that successfully illuminates both the South African experience and emotions common to all audiences.

SUMMARY

Athol Fugard is a regional writer, which he does not consider a pejorative label since he has great love for his native South Africa. He also admits to an autobiographical quality to his work. What he denies is that he is a propagandist, believing that if one tells the human story, the propaganda will take care of itself. His plays, using few characters and generally sparse stage settings, depend almost entirely on interpretation by actors. In his best work, Fugard creates drama that transcends the particular and achieves universality.

Edythe M. McGovern

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

No-Good Friday, pr. 1958, pb. 1977

Nongogo, pr. 1959, pb. 1977

The Blood Knot, pr. 1961, pb. 1963

People Are Living There, wr. 1962, pr. 1968, pb. 1969

Hello and Goodbye, pr. 1965, pb. 1966

The Coat: An Acting Exercise from Serpent Players of New Brighton, pr., pb. 1967 (with Serpent Players)

The Occupation, pb. 1968 (one act)

Ten One-Act Plays, pb. 1968 (Cosmo Pieterse, editor)

Boesman and Lena, pr., pb. 1969

Friday's Bread on Monday, pr. 1970 (with Serpent Players)

Orestes: An Experiment in Theatre as Described in a Letter to an American Friend, pr. 1971, pb. 1978

Sizwe Bansi Is Dead, pr. 1972, pb. 1973 (with John Kani and Winston Ntshona)

Athol Fugard

Statements After an Arrest Under the Immorality Act, pr. 1972, pb. 1974

The Island, pr. 1973, pb. 1974 (with Kani and Ntshona)

Three Port Elizabeth Plays, pb. 1974 (includes The Blood Knot, Hello and Goodbye, and Boesman and Lena; revised pb. 2000 includes "MASTER HAROLD" . . . and the Boys)

Dimetos, pr. 1975, pb. 1977

A Lesson from Aloes, pr. 1978, pb. 1981

The Drummer, pr. 1980 (improvisation)

"MASTER HAROLD" . . . and the Boys, pr., pb. 1982

The Road to Mecca, pr. 1984, pb. 1985

A Place with the Pigs, pr. 1987, pb. 1988

My Children! My Africa!, pr., pb. 1990

Blood Knot, and Other Plays, pb. 1991

Playland, pr., pb. 1992

My Life, pr. 1994, pb. 1996

Valley Song, pr. 1995, pb. 1996

The Captain's Tiger, pr., pb. 1997

Plays: One, pb. 1998

Sorrows and Rejoicings, pr., pb. 2002

Exits and Entrances, pr. 2004

SCREENPLAYS:

The Occupation, 1964

Boesman and Lena, 1973

The Guest, 1977

Marigolds in August, 1982

TELEPLAY:

Mille Miglia, 1968

LONG FICTION:

Tsotsi, 1980

NONFICTION:

"The Gift of Freedom," in At the Royal Court: Twenty-Five Years of the English Stage Company, 1981 (Richard Findlater, editor)

Notebooks, 1960-1977, 1983

Cousins: A Memoir, 1994

About the Author

Brooks, Richard. "Not Redundant After All." New Statesman 135, no. 4784 (March 20, 2006): 28-29.

Fugard, Athol. An Interview with Athol Fugard. Interview by Gabrielle Cody and Joel Schechter. Theater 19, no. 1 (1987): 70-72.

Gray, Stephen. Southern African Literature: An Introduction. New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 1979.

Grotowski, Jerzy. Towards a Poor Theatre. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1968.

Sarinjeive, Devi. "Athol Fugard's Dramatic Representations and Gender Politics." In Pre-Colonial and Post-Colonial Drama and Theatre in Africa, edited by Lokangaka Losambe and Devi Sarinjeive. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2001.

Vandenbroucke, Russell. Truths the Hand Can Touch: The Theatre of Athol Fugard. New York: Theatre Communications Group, 1985.

Walder, Dennis. Athol Fugard. Tavistock, Devon, England: Northcote House in association with the British Council, 2003.

Wertheim, Albert. The Dramatic Art of Athol Fugard: From South Africa to the World. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Did Athol Fugard's parentage and early experiences amount to an ideal preparation for his writing?
- In what ways did South African apartheid pervert justice more thoroughly than did the plight of African Americans in the United States between Reconstruction and the 1960's?
- Comment on the significance of the title The Blood Knot.
- How did Samuel Beckett's plays influence Fugard's Boesman and Lena?
- Explain why sparse stage settings contribute to the universality of Fugard's plays.
- Explain how Fugard reshapes the historical events that underlie "Master Harold" . . . and the Boys.

© Miriam Berkley

MAVIS GALLANT

Born: Montreal, Canada
August 11, 1922

Primarily a writer of short stories, Gallant has explored, using her native Canada and adopted France as backdrops, the plight of individuals caught between cultures.

BIOGRAPHY

Mavis Gallant (guh-LAHNT) was born Mavis de Trafford Young in Montreal, Canada, on August 11, 1922, the daughter of parents who enrolled her, beginning at the age of four, in a series of schools, some seventeen in number, in Montreal, Ottawa, and the eastern United States. Although a Protestant, she also attended some Catholic schools, which later provided her with material for her stories. Her childhood years were marked by loneliness. Her mother virtually abandoned her to foster parents in Ottawa before Gallant, while in her teens, went to live with a New York psychiatrist and his wife, who became her legal guardians. Her father died when she was a young girl.

After she returned to Montreal in 1940, she worked for a short time with the National Film Board before becoming a reporter for the Montreal Standard in 1944. During the next six years she wrote many features, photo-stories, and reviews, some of which she later reworked into her fiction. In her features she reveals a knowledge of Freudian psychology, a wide acquaintance with English Canadian and French Canadian literature and culture, an interest in a variety of displaced people caught in an alien culture, and a fascination with the dynamics of family struggles.

For a variety of reasons Gallant left her job with the newspaper in 1950. Her brief marriage to Johnny Gallant had ended, leaving her determined to live independently. This was difficult in Montreal; she had always been drawn to Europe, where she wanted to write for a living. During her Montreal Standard years she had been writing short stories, a few of which appeared in the Montreal Standard Magazine and Preview, but her writing career began in earnest with the publication of the short story "Madeline's Birthday" in The New Yorker, a prestigious North American journal in which most of her stories have first appeared.

The Other Paris, her first short-story collection, appeared in 1956. The short stories concern cultural clashes between North America and Europe, family power struggles, and the gap between reality and the reality perceived by the characters. In 1959, she published her first novel, Green Water, Green Sky, which concerns the destructive relationship between a mother and daughter living abroad in Europe. Her second short-story collection, My Heart Is Broken: Eight Stories and a Short Novel (1964; published in England as An Unmarried Man's Summer, 1965), which contains the short novel Its Image in the Mirror, explores the relationship between past and present, as well as the process by which memory shapes reality.

In 1968, she turned to nonfiction for The New Yorker, which published her "The Events in May: A Paris Notebook," her description of the political upheaval in France. Her first full-length novel, A Fairly Good Time (1970), was followed by another nonfiction piece, The Affair of Gabriel Russier (1971), for which she wrote a lengthy introduction. She then returned to writing fiction and by 1980 had published three more short-story collections: The Pegnitz Junction: A Novella and Five Short Stories (1973), The End of the World, and Other Stories (1974), and From the Fifteenth District: A Novella and Eight Short Stories (1979).

Critical acclaim in Canada did not come until 1978, when Canadian Fiction Magazine devoted an entire issue to her work. Home Truths: Selected Canadian Stories (1981), which won a Governor-General's Award, firmly established her not only as an international writer, but as a Canadian one. It concerns Canadians at home and abroad, and the "Linnet Muir" sequence of stories has been read as Gallant's autobiographical account of her years in Canada.

Overhead in a Balloon (1985), a collection of short stories about Parisians, marked a stylistic departure for Gallant, who was influenced by comics and cartoons. What Is to Be Done?, a play about two Canadian women who are Communist sympathizers during World War II, was produced in 1982. In Transit (1988) and Across the Bridge (1993), two later short-story collections, reflect Gallant's continuing interest in how people behave when they are caught between two cultures or two stages in their lives.

ANALYSIS

Gallant's experiences often serve as material for her fiction. Her sense of abandonment as a child, her departure from her native Canada, and her subsequent life as an expatriate writer in Paris—these events have contributed to the recurrent themes of alienation, search for a voice, the effect of the past on the future, and the role memory and imagination play in shaping reality and history. Whether the stories take place in Canada or Europe, the protagonists, usually women, attempt unsuccessfully to create an ideal life, reach a point where insight is seemingly unavoidable, and yet often create instead a new reality that reshapes the history that might have precipitated that insight.

For Gallant, childhood is the source of memory, a rich repository of good and, more often, bad events that inevitably affect adult behavior. Often, there is, as amply illustrated in the stories in her Green Water, Green Sky, a destructive relationship between mother and daughter. The daughters' identities and voices in the stories in this collection are controlled by the mothers, who have accepted the roles society has created for them. Since Gallant regards Canada as a repressive, rigid society, she sometimes equates the mother figure with Canada and the daughter with Europe. The daughter, like Gallant, must escape and live the life of an expatriate in order to free herself and become independent—this, however, seldom happens in Gallant's work.

Daughters without dominating mothers often seem abandoned, psychologically orphaned, and intent on a man's approval and love. Fathers are ineffectual absentees who denigrate or patronize their daughters. Prospective husbands (many Gallant stories feature women who confront marital decisions) are not sympathetically portrayed. Retreating from the real world, toward intellectual pursuits, they seldom act decisively; instead they drift into decisions.

As the titles of her novels and short-story collections often indicate, her characters are often in transit or are at a critical junction in their lives. Gallant places them in the present, recounts the past that led to the present event, and then often somewhat abruptly ends the story. A geographical journey often serves as metaphor for the emotional or psychological trip her protagonists make. In The Pegnitz Junction, Christine's Paris holiday ends in disillusionment, and her meandering train trip back to Germany ends at a junction—she neither makes a decision about her two suitors nor continues her trip. In the six stories about Linnet Muir in Home Truths, Linnet attempts to return home, in this case to Canada (Linnet seems a thinly veiled Gallant). She finds that she, too, cannot return home. In her native Montreal, she remains, like so many Gallant characters, an alien, a foreigner caught between two cultures, between the past and the present.

In Gallant's fiction, women are often shielded from real experience, and they sometimes resort to creating ideal romantic worlds based on their culturally derived assumptions about men and marriage. In "Across the Bridge," the title story of Gallant's 1993 short-story collection, Sylvie constructs an enchanted world; in "The Other Paris," the title story of her 1956 short-story collection, Carol imagines a "dream Paris." Both worlds are revealed as unreal. In both cases the protagonist retreats from the revelation and imagines a new world in which she can live a lesser life. In The Pegnitz Junction this ability to create or construct other worlds is carried into the psychic realm. Christine's "scripts" for other people's lives, scripts that surpass her own story in interest and action, demonstrate the importance of the imagination and of control of the story.

Gallant's characters are bound to the historical settings in which their fictional lives exist. Whether it is sterile Montreal, drab 1950's or activist 1960's Paris, or the broader canvas of post-World War II Europe, the historical settings shape the characters' lives. The war in Indochina may not be the focus of The Other Paris, but it is on the periphery; what happens there deeply affects characters' lives.

Important as history is, for Gallant it is not a fixed, permanent record of past events, but a shifting account shaped by people who record public events (World War II, the Dreyfus case, the war in Indochina) in their own personal memories. Past events are interpreted as commentaries on the failed present by an older generation intent on giving meaning and consequence to their lives. Even professional historians fail to establish a true history. In "Kingdom Come" (1986), Gallant recounts the fate of a professor who attempts to document the linguistic past of an obscure tribe in a remote location. He is rejected by the tribe and his own children, and his "history" is dismissed by his colleagues.

Gallant demonstrates the complex interplay between characters and history by including journals and letters, which possess a documentary quality, in her fiction; by using multiple points of view, which often are abruptly shifted; and by employing interior monologues and flashbacks. Gallant also sometimes shifts the narrative point of view, for example, from third person limited to the omniscient; it is often difficult to detect the exact point of view, making it impossible to identify how aware a character is. The cyclical nature of many of Gallant's narratives also poses problems for readers, since some stories are framed by similar stories. This lends a claustrophobic air to the narrative. Some stories begin before a climactic moment, retreat into the past, return to the present, and stop just short of actual resolution. Although the "endings" of these stories are not told, they are implied and are, in a sense, created by the character, who anticipates an ending, reinterprets past action, and imagines a resolution that is at once true and false.

"THE OTHER PARIS"

First published: 1956 (collected in The Other Paris, 1956)

Type of work: Short story

In post-World War II Paris, when a young American woman fails to discover her imagined Paris in the real Paris, she reinvents her experiences and returns home.

"The Other Paris," the title story of Gallant's first collection of short stories, takes place in the drab Paris of the 1950's. Carol Frazier, the protagonist, is a young American whose views of Paris, love, and marriage have been shaped by the media and college lectures. The story begins at a dressmaker's, where Carol and Odile, her French friend, discuss Carol's impending wedding to Howard Mitchell, a coworker at an American government agency. The recollection of his proposal establishes the conflict between Carol's imagined Paris, with "the Seine, moonlight, barrows of violets, acacias in flower," and reality, a proposal at lunch, "over a tuna-fish salad." The imagined proposal scene, however, is the one Carol "had nearly come to believe . . . herself." Undaunted by the first disillusionment, Carol undertakes the "business of falling in love." Gallant's ironic coupling of "business" and "love" foreshadows the failure of Carol's undertaking. When she does not fall in love, she attributes it to the rainy weather and the winter season.

Despite her daily observation of "shabby girls," "men who needed a haircut," and whining children, Carol retains her belief that her imagined Paris exists, that she only has to find it. She smugly pities Odile, but her meeting with Felix, Odile's young boyfriend, who is Carol's age, upsets her preconceived notions. She maintains that she has no interest in Felix, but her actions reveal her fascination with him. Judging him by her standards, his unemployment is inexcusable. She interprets his possession of American cigarettes as a “bad sign.” She, however, fantasizes about him, so much so that at his apartment Carol’s heart “leaped as if he, Felix, had said he loved her.” She corrects herself quickly, denying her real feelings, telling herself that she desires not Felix, but some other man, someone who does not exist.

The meeting at Felix’s apartment follows a series of disappointments. Earlier in the story, Carol convinces Howard to take her to hear singing in the Place Vendôme, an outing that culminates in “acrid smoke,” Howard’s catching a cold, and her realization that “nothing happened.” Another blow comes at a musical debut given by Odile’s sister, who Carol believes will wear Carol’s “green tulle.” The concert is held at a theater where a piece of the ceiling falls and almost hits Howard, Odile’s sister does not wear Carol’s dress, and Odile’s family snubs Carol, a foreigner.

She discovers that her vision of love comes from Felix and Odile, but she must deny her insight, rationalize her decision, and conclude that what she has with Howard is better. She senses that she will reinvent her Paris experiences so that a “coherent picture, accurate but untrue,” will emerge.

THE PEGNITZ JUNCTION

First published: 1973

Type of work: Novella

As a young woman journeys, literally and metaphorically, she invents stories that are more “real” than her own.

Christine, a young German woman, is at a junction in her life. Although engaged to a theology student, she travels with her lover, Herbert, and Bert, his son, to Paris for a holiday. She considers the trip a test of how well she and Bert can get along. Most of the novella, which takes place after World War II, occurs not in Paris, but on the train back to Germany. Most of “what happens” is internal, rather than external. Although the narration leads to Christine’s marital decision, which she does not make, The Pegnitz Junction also concerns the creative process, which is capable of inventing a reality more “real” and interesting than reality. As the three travel on the train, Christine’s imagined scenarios regarding other passengers and people she sees make her own story pale in comparison. Gallant uses italics, for the most part, to distinguish Christine’s scripts from her own story.

Christine prefers Herbert to the theology student because she believes Herbert does not create “barriers”—the second thoughts, self-analysis, and talk that paradoxically prevent true communication. Before the end of the story, however, Herbert veers off into analysis, the language people use to control others. Small gestures and details add up; together they imply the dead end that Christine will eventually reach. When the drunken porter verbally abuses them in Paris, Herbert only contemplates action. On the train, he begs her to marry him and vows to put Bert in a boarding school, but later “it was as if nothing had been said.” Herbert, like so many other characters in Gallant’s fiction, is controlled by memories of his past, his failed marriage, and his mother.

Christine, who is bored and annoyed with Herbert, begins to retreat from the present, creating a stream-of-consciousness story which seems to emanate from an elderly woman passenger. That story, involving German immigrants in the United States, is full of envy, resentment, paranoia, greed, and revenge. It culminates in the woman’s petty triumph over relatives. Another invented scenario concerns a family and ends with the violent death of one of the characters. Another passenger remembers his childhood loss of Marie and the flight of his family; Christine believes that he knows that she knows about his memory. Her unspoken question to him, “Why spend a vacation in a dead landscape?” also applies to her own Paris holiday. In fact, all of Christine’s invented stories relate to her situation: the doomed search for love, the plight of the refugee, the violence felt but not expressed. At the end of the novella, Christine’s desire to have “the last word, without interference” reflects her need to take control.

“ACROSS THE BRIDGE”

First published: 1991 (collected in Across the Bridge, 1993)

Type of work: Short story

A young Frenchwoman attempts to create an enchanted romantic world, fails, and then rationalizes her acceptance of a mediocre married life.

“Across the Bridge” concerns Sylvie’s passage from one state to another. The story of a young woman who breaks her engagement because of an infatuation with another man, only to return to her fiancé, “Across the Bridge” also concerns the loss of romance and idealism and the acceptance of mediocrity, an acceptance Sylvie quite deliberately transforms into happiness. Before that transformation occurs, she comes to understand her real relationship to her mother and her real image in the eyes of her father and fiancé.

The story begins on a bridge, with Sylvie telling her mother that she does not love Arnaud, but instead loves Bernard Brunelle, with whom she is only casually acquainted. Her mother’s response, that love takes “patience, like practicing scales,” reflects her opinion of love and marriage, an opinion Sylvie will eventually come to share. She sees her mother and herself like “two sisters who never quarrel,” and interprets her mother’s throwing the wedding invitations into the Seine as a sign that both women have “put something over on life, or on men.” Sylvie does not, however, understand her mother’s real position.

While Sylvie proceeds to invent the details of her projected life with Bernard, her father writes to Bernard’s father, who rejects the proposed marriage. Sylvie must face the reality of knowing that her fantasy will not come true. Her parents respond with passive aggression, giving up their holiday as “penance” for their daughter’s sin. Sylvie’s mother, who was her “sister,” now turns from Sylvie to her husband and metaphorically commands

Sylvie to stand aside. Eventually her father says that he forgives her, but his “forgiving” words and his actions belie his ostensible forgiveness. His negative response to Sylvie’s reading a newspaper and his description of her as “washed up” further weaken her.

When Julien, a cousin and marital alternative, is reported missing in the war in Indochina, Sylvie’s mother decides to renew Sylvie’s relationship with Arnaud. Sylvie then recognizes the conspiracy that mothers engage in with the world, letting their daughters receive only as much understanding as they think necessary. The extent of Sylvie’s mother’s control is revealed when Sylvie lets her mother dictate a letter to Arnaud.

Arnaud meets Sylvie, and his discourse with her is not about them but about analogous characters from operas and plays. Sylvie unwittingly reveals her response to Arnaud when she describes him eating the dessert he does not wish to waste: “He must love me. Otherwise it would be disgusting.” So successfully does she internalize this “love” that she begins to shape their future by wondering about weaning him away from his cheap habits. Even though he does not look at her after he boards the train, she, on her walk home, imagines his return journey and a false “true life” that in retrospect makes her “happy.”

SUMMARY

As the number of expatriates in the world grows, writers are increasingly confronting the issue of cultural conflict. Marginal people, caught between native and adopted cultures, are currently the subject of much fiction. Mavis Gallant draws on her own experience in her native Canada and adopted France to depict characters caught in transit, people who are not only geographically, but psychologically and emotionally, aliens. More recently, she has explored the plight of post-World War II Germans. She has done so, however, in terms that cast as much light on the writing process as on her alienated characters.

Thomas L. Erskine

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

SHORT FICTION:

The Other Paris, 1956

My Heart Is Broken: Eight Stories and a Short Novel, 1964 (pb. in England as An Unmarried Man's Summer, 1965)

The Pegnitz Junction: A Novella and Five Short Stories, 1973

The End of the World, and Other Stories, 1974

From the Fifteenth District: A Novella and Eight Short Stories, 1979

Home Truths: Selected Canadian Stories, 1981

Overhead in a Balloon, 1985

In Transit, 1988

Across the Bridge, 1993

The Moslem Wife, and Other Stories, 1994

The Collected Stories of Mavis Gallant, 1996

Paris Stories, 2002

Montreal Stories, 2004

Varieties of Exile: Stories, 2005

LONG FICTION:

Green Water, Green Sky, 1959

Its Image on the Mirror, 1964 (novella)

A Fairly Good Time, 1970

DRAMA:

What Is to Be Done?, pr. 1982

NONFICTION:

The Affair of Gabrielle Russier, 1971

The War Brides, 1978

Paris Notebooks: Essays and Reviews, 1986

About the Author

Besner, Neil K. The Light of Imagination: Mavis Gallant's Fiction. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press, 1988.

Clement, Lesley D. Learning to Look: A Visual Response to Mavis Gallant's Fiction. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2000.

Coté, Nicole, and Peter Sabor, eds. Varieties of Exile: New Essays on Mavis Gallant. New York: P. Lang, 2002.

Gunnars, Kristjana, ed. Transient Questions: New Essays on Mavis Gallant. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2004.

Hancock, Geoffrey. "An Interview with Mavis Gallant." Canadian Fiction Magazine 28 (1978): 18-67. An issue devoted to Gallant.

Irvine, Lorna. "Starting from the Beginning Every Time." In A Mazing Space: Writing Canadian, Women Writing, edited by Shirley Neuman and Smaro Kamboureli. Edmonton, Alta.: Longspoon Press, 1986.

Keefer, Janice Kulyk. Reading Mavis Gallant. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Moss, John. A Reader's Guide to the Canadian Novel. Toronto: McClelland and Stewart, 1981.

Schaub, Danielle. Mavis Gallant. New York: Twayne, 1998.

Smythe, Karen E. Figuring Grief: Gallant, Munro, and the Poetics of Elegy. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1992.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How has the linguistic divisiveness of Canada affected Mavis Gallant's writing career?
- Does Gallant introduce a contemporary but essentially unfamiliar moral world to her readers, or does she help them make sense of a familiar but confusing world?
- How does one explain the rather late recognition of Gallant's merit by a Canadian audience?
- What does the adjective "other" signify in the title "The Other Paris"?
- How can the "acceptance of mediocrity" lead to happiness, as happens to Sylvie in "Across the Bridge"?

GAO XINGJIAN

Born: Ganzhou, Jiangxi province, China
January 4, 1940

An accomplished avant-garde dramatist, novelist, short-story writer, and painter, Gao Xingjian was the first person writing in Chinese to win the Nobel Prize in Literature, in 2000.

BIOGRAPHY

On January 4, 1940, during the Second Sino-Japanese War, Gao Xingjian (gow shihng-jyahn) was born in Ganzhou in China's Jiangxi province. His father held a senior position with the Bank of China, and his mother was a former actress who volunteered in patriotic plays staged by the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA). As the family retreated from advancing Japanese forces, survived the end of World War II and the subsequent civil war in China, which ended with a Communist victory on the mainland in late 1949, Gao's mother installed in her son a lifelong love for reading, writing, and painting.

In 1957, Gao graduated from high school in Nanjing. Instead of studying painting, he enrolled in the department of French at the Beijing Institute of Foreign Languages. Upon his graduation in 1962, he was made a translator at the Foreign Languages Press, a position he held formally until 1980. In the early 1960's, Gao lost his mother, who drowned when the Communists sent her to the countryside.

When the Cultural Revolution began in 1966, Gao's position linking him to the West became dangerous. He was sent to a cadre school for reeducation and from 1970 to 1975 labored in the countryside. There, he burned all his accumulated unpublished manuscripts. Allowed to return to Beijing in 1975, Gao resumed his job, writing, and painting. He traveled to France and Italy in 1979 as a delegation translator and published his novella, Hanye de xingchen (1980; stars on a cold night), and his first critical essay. In 1981, Gao published his influential book Xiandai xiaoshuo jiqiao chutan (a preliminary exploration of the techniques of modern fiction), which established him as a proponent of Western-style modernism.

After his travels to France as translator for Chinese writers, Gao was transferred to the Beijing People's Art Theater. His first play, Juedui xin hao (pr. 1982; Alarm Signal, 1996), was produced by Lin Zhaohua, one of China's most renowned theater directors. His second play, Chezan (pr. 1983; The Bus Stop, 1996), ran afoul of the Chinese government's "antispiritual pollution campaign" and was banned after its production in early 1983.

Wrongly diagnosed with lung cancer, which killed his father in 1981, and learning that the Communists wanted to send him to a reform camp, Gao left Beijing. He traveled to the source of the Yangze River in Sichuan province and back to its estuary near Shanghai from July to November, 1983. Part of his experience was included in his next play, Yeren (pr. 1985; Wild Man, 1990). In 1985, Gao again traveled to Europe, where there were solo exhibitions of his paintings in West Germany and Austria.

Gao's play Bi'an (pr. 1986, pb. 1995; The Other Shore, 1999) was banned; all of his plays would become forbidden in the People's Republic of China. He focused on painting and writing essays instead. In 1987, Gao was invited to West Germany, and Chinese authorities allowed him to go. In 1988, he settled in self-chosen exile in Paris, France.

After the Tiananmen Square massacre in Beijing on June 4, 1989, Gao renounced his membership in the Chinese Communist Party, and the party expelled him two years later. His play Taowang (pr. 1989; Fugitives, 1993, also as Escape, 2007) dealt with the massacre. In 1990, his first novel, Ling shan (Soul Mountain, 2000), was published in Taiwan.

Gao had begun writing it in 1982, brought his manuscript with him to Europe, and finished it in Paris in September, 1989.

In Paris, Gao supported himself by selling his paintings and continued to write. He published the play Shengsijie (pb. 1991, pr. 1993; Between Life and Death, 1999). In 1992, he was awarded the Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres de la France, and he published another play, Diuhua yu fanjie (pb. 1992; Dialogue and Rebuttal, 1999). In the 1990's, Gao wrote his next plays in French first, before translating them into Chinese. Quatre quatuors pour un week-end (pb. 1993; Weekend Quartet, 1999) was followed by Le Somnambule (wr. 1993, pb. 1995; Nocturnal Wanderer, 1999), for which he was awarded the Prix Communauté Française de Belgique in 1994.

Critical acclamation for Soul Mountain gathered steam and the novel won for Gao the 1997 Prix du Nouvel An chinois. He became a French citizen in 1998. Gao's next novel, Yige ren de shengjing (1999; One Man's Bible, 2002), was followed by the play Bayue xue (pb. 2000, pr. 2002; Snow in August, 2003).

Gao won the Nobel Prize in Literature on October 12, 2000, and delivered his acceptance speech in Chinese on December 7, 2000. The Chinese University in Hong Kong awarded him an honorary doctorate in literature in 2001.

Since winning the Nobel Prize, he has increasingly focused on painting. Pour une autre esthétique (2001; Return to Painting, 2002) featured Gao's ink paintings from an exhibition of the same name in New York City in 2002. Gei wo laoye mai yugan (1999; Buying a Fishing Rod for My Grandfather: Stories, 2004) contains short stories written by Gao between 1983 and 1991. "Escape" and "The Man Who Questions Death" (pb. 2007) featured two new English translations of his plays Taowang and Kouwen siwang (pr., pb. 2003), respectively. A solo exhibition of his paintings in Germany in 2007 was a huge success, perhaps solidifying Gao's shift from literature to ink printing.

ANALYSIS

The two outstanding literary characteristics of Gao Xingjian's masterful novels Soul Mountain and One Man's Bible are autobiographical elements and formal experimentation. At one level, the narrative of Soul Mountain is driven by Gao's personal impressions gathered during his own travels to the remote southwestern parts of China's Sichuan province and his subsequent journey along the Yangze River to its estuary into the East China Sea in 1983. Similarly, One Man's Bible tells of both the horrors and the tribulations witnessed and endured by Gao during the disastrous years of the Cultural Revolution, unleashed by Communist Party chairman Mao Zedong and his wife Jiang Qing from 1966 to 1976, and the upheavals and ironies of the subsequent post-Mao era witnessed by the author.

What further distinguishes both novels is Gao's forceful use of stylistic experimentation and literary innovation. Most strikingly, Gao splits the persona of his protagonists into different entities by means of experimentation with personal pronouns. In Soul Mountain, the narrator's "I" is juxtaposed with a second character addressed only as "you," who acts as if he were a different person, even though "you" is another part of the narrator's self. Midway into the novel, to create another level of self-alienation leading to self-awareness, "you" is left behind to become "he," described as a shadow of the narrator's "I." The women of the novel are identified only as "she." In One Man's Bible, when the narrator describes his past in Mao's vicious China, the third person "he" is used to relate that experience; to render his present visit to China, the narrator uses "you" to refer to himself. Gao's goal is to offer as many perspectives on one's self as possible by using these different pronouns.

Reflecting Gao's rich work as a playwright, even in his novels dialogue is of key importance, and descriptions of his characters are of secondary importance. One can see the work of Gao the dramatist active in his novels and short stories.

Appreciative of French modernism, existentialism, and the notion of the absurd that Gao encountered in mid-twentieth century French novels and plays he read and translated into Chinese, Gao's novels echo their literary themes and techniques. Both Soul Mountain and One Man's Bible eschew conventional, linear narratives, a unifying plot, and sharply drawn characters involved in a plot leading to a clear climax. They replace these conventions with stream-of-consciousness narration, meandering thoughts, a pastiche of elements of folktales, and journalistic interludes describing, for example, indigenous rituals, and end more in a vision than in a classic resolution of plot conflicts.

In addition to these Western influences, Gao includes elements drawn from Chinese history, philosophy, and religion. Critics have remarked on the Zen Buddhist-like qualities expressed in his novels, short stories, and plays. At the end of Soul Mountain, God may appear in the guise of a frog, and One Man's Bible finishes on a note of ambiguity.

Gao's many globally performed plays roughly fall into two categories. His early plays, written in China from 1982 until 1986, sought to adapt modern Western theatrical experimentation as a means of enlivening Chinese drama. His first play, Alarm Signal, ends with the unemployed protagonist choosing law over crime by helping to prevent a train robbery. The Bus Stop was banned in 1983 for its critical depiction of people waiting for a bus that never stops. Reminiscent of Samuel Beckett's En attendant Godot (pb. 1952, pr. 1953; Waiting for Godot, 1954), at the end of The Bus Stop some characters do indeed leave the stage, more active than their counterparts in Beckett's play.

The second set of Gao's plays, collected in The Other Shore (1999), increasingly adds traditional Chinese theatrical, philosophical, religious, and historical elements. With the exception of The Other Shore itself, Gao's last play written in China and banned from production in 1986, these later plays were written in France after 1987. What unifies them is the playwright's attempt to move beyond messages that can be impressed by language. Instead, Gao employs Zen concepts, such as gong-an storytelling moving through questions and answers, or hundun, the idea of depicting the self in chaos. In these plays, truth is grasped at by means of intuition rather than by reasoning. Snow in August is Gao's most openly Buddhist play, featuring the life of Huineng, the Zen monk who founded the Sudden Enlightenment School in the late seventh century B.C.E.

Gao's short stories collected in Buying a Fishing Rod for My Grandfather reveal a steady shift from realism to surrealism. Early stories like "Yuan'ensi" ("The Temple"), celebrating the joy of newlyweds, or "Gongyuanli" ("In the Park"), which reads more like a play, or "Choujin" ("Cramp"), telling of the protagonist's nearly fatal idea of impressing a woman by swimming far into the ocean, are followed by the absurd title piece. The last story, "Shunjian" ("In an Instant"), may remind a reader of the surrealist work of Chinese writer Can Xue or the Magical Realism of Gabriel García Márquez.

In his Nobel Prize acceptance speech, Gao emphasized that he writes neither for the proletarian masses or for a commercial audience. His novels, plays, and short stories seek to comment on the human condition and are created for an audience appreciating a unique artistic answer to the question of what constitutes the modern self.

SOUL MOUNTAIN

First published: Ling shan, 1990 (English translation, 2000)

Type of work: Novel

On a journey that is as much spiritual quest as physical endeavor, the protagonist travels to southwest China and then to the Yangze River estuary near Shanghai.

Gao Xingjian began writing Soul Mountain, the introspective and experimental novel key to his winning the Nobel Prize in Literature, in Beijing in the summer of 1982. Suddenly confronted with death after being wrongly diagnosed with lung cancer and feeling almost resurrected when the correct results came in, Gao perceived of Soul Mountain as a quest to the sources of self in mainland China in the post-Mao Zedong era. When he ran afoul of party authorities over his provocative plays, Gao set out on a five-month journey in 1983 that would provide much of the geographical content of the novel. Gao finally finished the work in self-imposed exile in Paris in September, 1989. Soul Mountain was first published in Taiwan in 1990 and translated into English in 2000.

Soul Mountain opens at the beginning of the journey of the protagonist, who is identified only by the first person pronoun "I." "I" soon finds himself encountering alternate versions of himself called "you" and "he," as well as meeting a variety of realistically described Chinese people and some enigmatic women referred to only as "she." The narrator, like the author in 1983, has left behind the literary world of Beijing and seeks contact with people living in the rugged Sichuan province. There he encounters a biologist trying to save the giant panda from extinction, as well as members of China's minority tribes holding on to their indigenous customs and traditions.

The narrator also enters a love affair with a rebellious woman, whom he ultimately causes to leave him as he eschews the responsibilities of a lasting relationship. At the same time, though, he admits to needing human company. A solitary existence, like that lived by Buddhist monks he encounters, is not for him as he strives for human interaction after all.

In addition to the narrator's philosophical musings, often rendered by the modernist literary devices of stream-of-consciousness internal monologue and fragmentary thoughts, Soul Mountain contains brilliantly rendered descriptions of the people and natural sights "I" encounters along his ten-thousand-mile journey. As he travels along China's mighty Yangze River, ancient folk customs are juxtaposed with the negative effects resulting from industrialization and degradation of the environment.

He also reflects on fate, the work of Chinese literary men of past ages, and these writers' relationship to their own society.

In the end, the protagonist achieves a revelation of some kind. He is convinced that God, a mysterious presence, is speaking to him through a tiny green frog in winter's snow. Just as humans cannot hope to understand God, so "I" fails to understand whatever message the frog may be relating. "I" is content to have revealed that he really knows almost nothing about the nature of humanity and its role in the larger universe.

The Nobel Prize committee praised Soul Mountain for its humanistic vision, its formal experimentation, and its universal poetic qualities. The novel has been seen as an original exploration of humanity's ongoing quest to find meaning in a modern world pressured by the lingering forces of totalitarianism and threatened by environmental destruction.

ONE MAN'S BIBLE

First published: Yige ren de shengjing, 1999
(English translation, 2002)

Type of work: Novel

Visiting Hong Kong with a German-Jewish lover, the narrator remembers his sufferings during the Cultural Revolution and ponders the meaning of human existence in the contemporary world.

In One Man's Bible, Gao Xingjian juxtaposes two time periods. In the recent past, there are the memories of the unnamed protagonist during mainland China's disastrous Cultural Revolution. In the present, the narrator experiences a love affair with Margarethe, a German-Jewish woman with whom he visits Hong Kong in 1996 to stage one of his experimental plays.

Drawing on the author's personal experiences, One Man's Bible also showcases Gao's formal literary experiments in the vein of modernism. Most strikingly, whenever the protagonist remembers his past, he uses the third person singular, "he," to refer to himself. Relating his present experiences, he switches to "you" when talking about himself. This literary technique is intended to indicate the fragmentary nature of the modern human self.

As the protagonist and Margarethe indulge in their love affair, his memories bubble to the surface in a string of fragmentary episodes highlighting the tremendous amount of suffering as Mao Zedong and his wife Jiang Qing unleashed the Cultural Revolution on their Communist subjects from 1966 until Mao's death in 1976. One Man's Bible reveals a nightmare world where children spied on and denounced their parents, playmates, and teachers. Then neighbor was forced to speak against neighbor; physical harm, banishment, or death lurked around every corner.

At the same time he is relating past events, the narrator also engages in philosophical interludes about the nature of storytelling, philosophy, memory, and human consciousness. Through his protagonist, Gao attempts to arrive at a modern view of human existence, haunted by the experience of totalitarian regimes. In the present, the narrator is worried about the dangers of interpersonal relationships that are always fraught with the danger of personal hurt and disappointment. The narrator's sexual liaisons remain unsatisfactory, yet he cannot give up his longing to find a soul mate.

Gao's rendition of the horrible effects of the Cultural Revolution paint a stark picture of the persistence of fear augmented by daily betrayals and denunciations. To protect himself, the narrator joins the system, only to realize that exile and social disassociation remain his only means of survival. The passages dealing with the past are on par with other superb accounts of this time, such as Jung Chan's Wild Swans (1992).

In the novel's present, the narrator seeks to chart the course of his future from a hotel room in Hong Kong in 1996, one year before the city is handed over to the People's Republic of China. At times using the technique of metafiction and directly addressing the reader about his endeavor to tell his story, the narrator is torn by his lust for life, including sexuality, and his great world-weariness.

One Man's Bible ends inconclusively with the narrator remembering an afternoon sitting in a restaurant in the French city of Perpignan. As various pieces of classical music are played by a live band nearby, he reflects on his past life and his decision to continue to write, and to seek love, despite his previous disappointments. Totalitarian China tried to break his soul, but language and literature have set him free.

SUMMARY

In his Nobel Prize acceptance speech, "Wenxue de liyou" ("The Case for Literature"), delivered in Stockholm on December 7, 2000, Gao Xingjian stated that he wrote neither to educate the masses nor for a commercial market. Instead, his writing is for himself and for those readers willing to accompany him on his quest for the meaning of self, of human existence, and of humanity's role in the physical world. A reader of his two outstanding novels, his innovative plays, and his experimental short stories may concur that Gao has remained true to his goals. His writings in many genres, as well as his paintings, all question the fate of the individual soul struggling to carve out some meaning in an often hostile environment. In the end, the characters of Gao's literary work refuse to become recluses but seek the comfort of a loving other, no matter how impossible to achieve this may be.

R. C. Lutz

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Hanye de xingchen, 1980 (novella)

Ling shan, 1990 (Soul Mountain, 2000)

Yige ren de shengjing, 1999 (One Man's Bible, 2002)

SHORT FICTION:

You zhi gezi jiao hongchun, 1984

Gei wo laoye mai yugan, 1988 (Buying a Fishing Rod for My Grandfather: Stories, 2004)

DRAMA:

Juedui xin hao, pr. 1982 (Alarm Signal, 1996)

Chezhan, pr. 1983 (The Bus Stop, 1996)

Yeren, pr. 1985 (Wild Man, 1990)

Bi'an, pr. 1986, pb. 1995 (The Other Shore, 1999)

Taowang, pr. 1989 (Fugitives, 1993; also as Escape, 2007)

Shengsijie, pb. 1991, pr. 1993 (Between Life and Death, 1999)

Diuhua yu fanjie (pb. 1992; Dialogue and Rebuttal, 1999)

Quatre quatuors pour un weekend, pb. 1993 (Weekend Quartet, 1999)

Le Somnambule, wr. 1993, pb. 1995 (Nocturnal Wanderer, 1999)

The Other Shore: Plays, pb. 1999 (includes The Other Shore, Between Life and Death, Dialogue and Rebuttal, Nocturnal Wanderer, and Weekend Quartet)

Bayue xue, pb. 2000, pr. 2002 (Snow in August, 2003)

Kouwen siwang, pr., pb. 2003 (Le Quêteur de la Mort, 2004; The Man Who Questions Death, 2007)

"Escape" and "The Man Who Questions Death," pb. 2007

NONFICTION:

Xiandai xiaoshuo jiqiao chutan, 1981

Dui yizhong xiandai xiju de zuiqiu, 1988

Meiyu zhuyi, 1996

Pour une autre esthétique, 2001 (Return to Painting, 2002)

The Case for Literature, 2007 (Mabel Lee, translator)

About the Author

Lovell, Julia. "Gao Xingjian, the Nobel Prize, and Chinese Intellectuals: Notes on the Aftermath of the Nobel Prize 2000." Modern Chinese Literature and Culture 14, no. 2 (2002): 1-50.

_____. The Politics of Cultural Capital: China's Quest for a Nobel Prize in Literature. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2006.

Quah, Sy Ren. Gao Xingjian and Transcultural Chinese Theater. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2004.

Tam, Kwok-kan, ed. Soul of Chaos: Critical Perspectives on Gao Xingjian. Hong Kong: Chinese University Press, 2001.

Zhao, Henry Y. H. Towards a Modern Zen Theatre: Gao Xingjian and Chinese Theatre Experimentalism. London: School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, 2000.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What are some of the key encounters of the protagonist of Gao Xingjian's novel Soul Mountain, and how do they affect him?
- Do you feel that the journey of the protagonist of Soul Mountain is successful, or not? Give reasons for your viewpoint.
- According to One Man's Bible, how did the Cultural Revolution affect the lives of the narrator and his friends and neighbors?
- How would you characterize the relationship between the narrator of One Man's Bible and the character of Margarethe? How is this relationship affected by the narrator's past experiences?
- Gao Xingjian has stated that his plays aim to overcome the barriers of language and realism. Looking at one of his plays, what are some means by which he attempts to reach this goal?
- For one of his short stories, discuss Gao Xingjian's formal experimentation with the concepts of characterization, narrative structure, and realistic storytelling.

FEDERICO GARCÍA LORCA

Born: Fuentevaqueros, Spain

June 5, 1898

Died: Víznar, Spain

August 19, 1936

Considered the most important Spanish dramatist in the twentieth century, as well as an outstanding poet, García Lorca made a major contribution to the poetical theater of his time.

BIOGRAPHY

The son of a well-to-do landholder, Federico García Rodríguez, and a former schoolteacher, Vicenta Lorca, Federico García Lorca (gahr-SEE-ah LAWR-kah) was born in the small village of Fuentevaqueros, Spain, near the Andalusian city of Granada on June 5, 1898. Legend has it that García Lorca was a slow walker and talker, but his mother and brother remembered that he was normal in his development. He did, however, display at an early age a vivid imagination and a strong creative flair. He was fond of staging puppet shows written and costumed by him for an audience composed of the family servants. He also liked to play the role of priest at impromptu masses. These childhood interests foretold his success as a playwright, director, and actor, and they underscore the importance of religious ritual in his life.

The years spent as a child in a rural Spanish village left an indelible imprint on his mind and inspired the many metaphors and symbols from the natural world that characterize his poetry and plays. He himself emphasized this influence:

I love the countryside. I feel myself linked to it in all my emotions. My oldest childhood memories have the flavour of the earth. . . . Were this not so I could not have written Blood Wedding.

García Lorca's first love was music. He played the piano extremely well and hoped that his parents would send him to Paris for lessons leading to a career as a concert pianist. They refused to grant his wish, and he turned to writing instead. Music's loss was literature's gain. He published his first book, Impresiones y paisajes (1918; Impressions and Landscapes, 1987), a series of prose vignettes about his travels in central Spain with a student group, followed by his first book of poetry, Libro de poemas (1921; book of poems). In these poems, fanciful and deft though they are, he has yet to find his own voice and is much influenced by the Nicaraguan poet Rubén Darío and two older Spanish poets, Juan Ramón Jiménez and Antonio Machado.

Although he finally managed to earn a law degree at the University of Granada, García Lorca was an indifferent student bent on becoming a poet despite his father's skepticism. In 1918, he went to Madrid and took lodgings at the Residencia de Estudiantes, a private residence for students attending the University of Madrid. The residencia was a center for liberal intellectual life in the capital. Many of its residents, such as García Lorca, went on to become internationally known. Two of them were the painter Salvador Dalí, who was then especially close to García Lorca, and the film director Luis Buñuel.

The publication of Romancero gitano, 1924-1927 (1928; The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca, 1951, 1953) catapulted its author into the limelight. Using the form of the Spanish ballad, García Lorca created a modern mythology for his gypsy protagonists. They are subject to the forces of nature (a malevolent female moon kidnaps a gypsy boy; an erotic wind chases a gypsy girl) and are persecuted by the guardians of society, the infamous Spanish Civil Guard. Sensual, provocative, and dazzling, The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca became a best seller overnight and branded its author as a poet interested only in Andalusian folklore, a label that García Lorca resented.

Seeking a change of environment and a new direction for his poetry, García Lorca went to New York City in June, 1929, enrolled in a class in English at Columbia University, made friends, and walked the streets of the metropolis. A few months after his arrival, Wall Street crashed, and he witnessed the hysteria provoked by this event. He responded to the vitality of African Americans and viewed them as victims of society, like the gypsies in his own country. New York's "cruel geometry," its heartlessness, the concrete wasteland, and the canyons formed by skyscrapers were overwhelming. Reading in translation the poetry of Walt Whitman and T. S. Eliot helped suggest new directions that his own poetry might take. He returned to Spain, via Cuba, in March, 1930, with the manuscript of Poeta en Nueva York (1940; Poet in New York, 1940, 1955), in which a strong poetic voice denounces in surrealistic imagery the inhumanity of capitalism's prototypical city.

In 1934, the bullfighter Ignacio Sánchez Mejías, a friend and fellow writer, was fatally gored in the bull ring. Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías (1935; Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter, 1937, 1939), written a short while after the tragedy, is generally considered to be one of the finest of modern elegies.

García Lorca's interest in the theater goes back to his childhood. His first efforts as a playwright met with dismal failure in Madrid in the 1920's. While in New York, he made a vow to return to writing plays. In a letter to his family, he said, "One must think of the theater of the future." Once more in Spain, he became a popular lecturer and also organized a student theater group known as La Barraca that toured the provinces with a repertoire of classical and modern Spanish plays. García Lorca served as director, actor, and set designer. Bodas de sangre (pr. 1933, pb. 1935; Blood Wedding, 1939), the first of what was to become a trilogy on the frustration and repression of women in rural Spain, opened to an enthusiastic Madrid audience in 1933. It was followed in 1934 with the premiere of Yerma (pr. 1934, pb. 1937; English translation, 1941). Posthumously, La casa de Bernarda Alba (wr. 1936, pr., pb. 1945; The House of Bernarda Alba, 1947) opened in Buenos Aires in 1945. These three plays are still presented around the world and are known equally well in Russia, China, and Japan.

Blood Wedding and Yerma represent some of the most successful examples of poetry written for the stage in the twentieth century.

García Lorca's fame, his friendship with left-wing figures, his proclamations of sympathy for the workers and the poor, and his homosexuality made him an object of loathing on the part of the Fascists. He was in Granada when the Spanish Civil War broke out in July, 1936. It was a period of anarchy in which many old scores were settled. Denounced to the Fascist military commander of Granada, García Lorca was summarily executed on August 19 of that year, in Víznar, Spain. His body lies in a mass grave along with many other victims of this tragic episode in Spanish history.

ANALYSIS

Humor, irony, and whimsy, the prime ingredients of García Lorca's early poetry, set the tone for the pervasive theme of his first books. His had been a relatively happy childhood, spent at play in a small village bathed in Mediterranean light, close to nature, where he busily observed animals and reacted to the mixture of the young, old, and infirm that naturally surrounded him. Many of his unpublished stories written as a teenager reveal a strong sense of compassion for those less fortunate than he, and this moral sense was to make itself especially felt in Poet in New York, as he witnessed the plight of the blacks and the poor in New York. In Libro de poemas, García Lorca sought the language of flowers and stones, playfully described an old lizard moving along the path like a nearsighted philosopher, and celebrated the cicada's endless need to sing. When he grew older, he realized that his childhood had been a kind of Eden, and its loss frequently provided him with poignant metaphors.

Andalusia also suggested a style and a theme for his first mature poetry. Flamenco singing (el cante jondo, the deep song) had come to Spain probably from Africa. Its long, monotonous wail was the province of the gypsy. In Poema del cante jondo (1931; Poem of the Gypsy Seguidilla, 1967), García Lorca attempts to imitate this emotional chant and, through metaphor, to describe some of its effects upon the listener. When he writes that "The wail imprints in the wind, the shadow of the cypress," he shows the power of the deep song to permeate everywhere and the tragic pitch reached by its feelings (the cypress is associated with death).

From the poems inspired by the cante jondo, it was a short step to The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca, where García Lorca's gift for metaphor first astounded a large public. In primitive mythology, no dividing line exists between the natural and supernatural worlds. Elements of nature are personified and interact with humans, and the gods quarrel and make love among themselves and the inhabitants of the earth. That is the world that García Lorca attempts to re-create in his gypsy ballads. The moon hypnotizes a gypsy girl, and the wind snarls at the roof of a house in which another gypsy girl has taken refuge. Other elements of nature (trees, water) react in sympathy to the plight of the gypsies. Sex, violence, and a strange beauty of language combine to explain the attraction of these ballads.

The poet formed by a rural agrarian society found himself horrified and offended by New York. The moon loses its mythical magic and becomes a fat woman wetting the streets. Prevalent adjectives such as "hollow" (perhaps an echo of T. S. Eliot's "hollow men") and "empty" express the sense of alienation that García Lorca felt. Poet in New York's rage and despair speak not only for García Lorca's loneliness in this alien land but also for his outrage at the poverty and the treatment of the blacks. "El rey de Harlem" ("The King of Harlem") depicts the blacks as victims of white civilization and proposes to show as early as 1929 that "black is beautiful," and that whiteness, whether bleached or in the blush of apples, must be abolished so that the blacks can have their freedom of expression. "I denounce everyone/ Who ignores the other half," he wrote in a poem about New York's offices. Moral outrage controls the pell-mell rush of imagery and keeps the surrealistic tendency from getting out of hand. The poet, condemning the mindless slaughter of animals, mourning for the lost Eden of his childhood, and evoking a dance of death through Wall Street, has written a classic book on the alienation and despair produced by the urban landscape.

Reading Walt Whitman and meeting the American poet Hart Crane helped García Lorca come to terms with his homosexuality. His "Oda a Walt Whitman" ("Ode to Walt Whitman"), written in New York, idealizes a pure homosexual love in contrast with that of male prostitution. He began work on two obscure and difficult plays in which he explored homosexuality and its relation to all forms of love, Así que pasen cinco años (wr. 1931, pb. 1937, pr. 1945 in English, pr. 1954 in Spanish; When Five Years Pass, 1941) and El público (wr. 1930, pb. 1976; The Audience, 1958).

As a child, García Lorca was deeply Catholic, and some of his unpublished pieces show how closely he identified with the figure of Jesus Christ. Letters from New York to the family recount his disillusion with the coldness of Protestant churches and their lack of ritual. Even in his most pagan moments, he expresses himself from a Spanish Catholic experience, and his images often come from church icons, the history of the saints, and the Bible. His religion is also a source of his strong moral feelings in the face of economic suffering and racial prejudice.

García Lorca's dramatic trilogy, Blood Wedding, Yerma, and The House of Bernarda Alba, promises to be an enduring monument. Each play addresses the ultimately tragic oppression by society on the freedom of individuals. In Blood Wedding, a marriage of convenience is violently subverted when Leonardo, who is already married but has always longed for the bride, carries her off into the forest. He is killed by the outraged villagers, and the bride is excoriated by the bridegroom's mother. In Yerma, the protagonist is a childless woman (yerma means "barren") who does not love her husband but cannot leave him because society forbids it. In a fit of anger and frustration, she strangles her husband, thus killing her only legitimate chance of having a child. Bernarda Alba suffocates her daughters' desires and rules like a cruel despot in The House of Bernarda Alba. She determines that the eldest should marry first, even though the youngest is the most attractive. The suitor Pepe el Romano courts Angustias but has an affair with Adela. When Bernarda discovers what has been occurring, Adela commits suicide, but the undaunted matriarch shouts that her youngest has died a virgin, thus continuing to impose her will.

García Lorca's work is an outcry against oppression of all kinds (sexual, social, racial). Individuals need to be free to express themselves, and silence is a form of death.

“THE GUITAR”

First published: “La guitarra,” 1931 (collected in Poem of the Gypsy Seguidilla, 1967)

Type of work: Poem

The all-powerful guitar evokes a strange, magic world.

“The Guitar” typifies García Lorca’s purpose in the cante jondo: to approximate in print something of the auditory experience in hearing the music. Two characteristics are notable. The sound of the guitar is like a wail (llanto), the same word that refers to the flamenco singing. “The lament of the guitar begins” is the opening line of the poem, and it is repeated two lines later. The guitar’s lament is monotonous and repetitious (like the wind and the rain), and García Lorca achieves this effect through further repetition. Three times he writes the phrase, “It is impossible to silence it.” Meanwhile, the strength of the guitar’s sound is sufficient to break the wine cups of dawn. Flamenco players sing and dance all night, and their revelry persists until daybreak.

For what does the guitar wail? Why is its sound so heartbreaking and haunting? In a series of brilliant metaphors, García Lorca supplies some answers, summarized in the simple lines, “It weeps for/ things far away.” “Sand of the warm south/ asking for white camellias” associates the guitar with Andalusia, situated on the Mediterranean Sea with its beaches and flowers. “It weeps arrow without target/ evening without morning.” Arrows without targets and evenings without mornings are metaphors of disorientation. Another cause for its grief is “The first dead bird/ upon the branch,” a reference to the loss of innocence, a theme that appears often in García Lorca’s verse.

Finally, this instrument that evokes so many poignant feelings itself becomes a metaphor: “Oh, guitar!/ Heart grievously wounded/ by five swords.” It is a splendid example of a García Lorca metaphor. The body of a guitar roughly approximates the shape of a heart, which is wounded by the five fingers of the person playing it. The image also evokes the common household religious print of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, wounded by the grief of the world.

“RIDER’S SONG”

First published: “Canción de jinete,” 1927 (collected in Selected Poems of Federico García Lorca, 2005)

Type of work: Poem

A horseman has set out on a journey to the Andalusian city of Córdoba; even though he knows the way, he will never reach his destination.

In “Rider’s Song,” one of his most popular short poems, García Lorca has written a parable about the unattainability of goals. The refrain that frames the poem, “Córdoba/ Far away and alone,” indicates in somber tones the rider’s destination. Córdoba in the eleventh century was the capital of Arabic Spain and the richest city in Europe, and for a modern traveler it is still a city of great cultural wealth.

Mounted on a valiant black pony, olives in his saddlebag, the moon lighting his way, conditions seem optimum for the rider. The moon is usually a malevolent figure in García Lorca’s poetry, however, and it soon turns red, the color of violence and blood. “Although I know the roads/ I’ll never reach Córdoba,” exclaims the narrator, and the reader discovers why: “Death is looking at me/ From the towers of Córdoba.” The road seems suddenly long, and the poem ends the way that it began: “Córdoba/ Far away and alone.” The poem takes on special meaning for the reader who knows that García Lorca greatly feared death and was executed at the age of thirty-eight in the midst of a brilliant career.

“BALLAD OF THE MOON, MOON”

First published 1928 (collected in The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca, 1951, 1953)

Type of work: Poem

Dressed as a woman, the moon descends to Earth and, by means of her dance, casts a spell on a gypsy boy and carries him off with her.

Since it is the first poem in Romancero gitano, 1924-1927 (1928; The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca, 1951, 1953), “Ballad of the Moon, Moon” sets the tone and also signals the role of the moon and other natural elements in the book. The moon appears in the smithy (gypsies were often blacksmiths) dressed as a woman, wearing a bustle of white lilies (suggested by the moon’s whiteness), and she begins a lascivious dance in front of a little boy left in the shop by his parents. García Lorca renders the spell cast on the boy through rhyme and repetition: “The boy stares and stares at her./ The boy keeps staring hard.” Captivated, the boy warns the moon that she must flee before the gypsies return or they will chop her up for necklaces and silver rings, typical gypsy jewelry. The words that he uses to caution the moon are incantatory, “Run away, moon, run away, moon.”

The moon, however, refuses to be frightened and answers the boy with her own prediction: When the gypsies come, they will find you on the anvil with your tiny eyes shut. Enthralled, the boy draws near. A rider is heard galloping across the plain, and in the smithy the boy’s eyes are shut. The moon gives way to the sound of dry hooves pounding on the ground, which suggests death.

The gypsies return through the olive groves, their bronze faces also under the spell of the moon. A barn owl hoots, and through the sky goes the moon, taking a boy by the hand. The boy’s body lies inside the smithy, but his spirit has gone with the moon. The gypsies, upon discovering their loss, commence to wail and shout. Outside, the air, this time a sympathetic element of nature, watches over them.

There are many stories in Greek and Roman mythology of the moon descending to the earth to capture a young man and take him away. The most famous case is the handsome Greek shepherd Endymion, whom the moon goddess found irresistible. Thus did García Lorca create a modern mythology for his gypsies, weaving strands of ancient tales and local Andalusian culture.

LAMENT FOR THE DEATH OF A BULLFIGHTER

First published: Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías, 1935 (English translation, 1937, 1939)

Type of work: Poem

García Lorca mourns the death of his friend, fellow poet, and famous bullfighter in terms that remind the reader of the mythical and religious source of bullfighting.

Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter grows out of a series of facts that help explain some of the poem’s allusions. Ignacio Sánchez Mejías, the son of a Seville doctor, was a member of García Lorca’s generation, a patron of the arts, a writer admired for his plays, and a nationally known bullfighter who had learned his art from the great García y Belmonte. Sánchez Mejías retired from bullfighting in 1922 but allowed himself to return to the ring in 1934, close to the age of forty-three. He was gored on August 11, 1934. Taken to a clinic in Madrid, gangrene set in, and he suffered a painful end, writhing on his bed. He died on August 13. The next day, his body was placed on a train to take him for burial to Seville, and a Madrid newspaper in bold headlines announced the time of the train’s departure: AT FIVE O’CLOCK IN THE AFTERNOON.

García Lorca had strong thoughts on the origin and nature of the bullfight, and it is these convictions that help explain the rhetoric of the elegy on the death of his friend. The sport, if it may be called that, was connected to the Spanish character. As García Lorca noted, “Spain [was] the only country where death is the national spectacle.” Ancient Near Eastern religions deified the cow, and many primitive religions required the annual sacrifice of an animal to ensure the fertility of the crops. Bulls were bred in Spain in Roman times, and the modern art of bullfighting began in the eighteenth centure. García Lorca viewed the bullfighter as priest, the struggle with the animal as a ritual, and the entire spectacle as a primordial pagan rite. The bull's bellow in the ring, the blood that is shed before the roaring crowd, and the entwined movement of man and animal originate, García Lorca believed, in primitive spectacles from the Mediterranean region of Europe.

The poem consists of 220 lines divided into four parts. Part 1, "The Goring and the Death," creates the turmoil that surrounded Ignacio's accident and the agony of his death. With a dirgelike effect, every other line reads "At five o'clock in the afternoon." Attributes of the goring and the clinic are strewn between each of these funereal lines: the winding sheet, the basket of lime to be thrown on the spilled blood in the ring, cotton and oxide, the operating table ("a coffin with wheels"), groups of silent men on the corners awaiting the news, and the metaphor that announces the gangrene: "death laid eggs in the wound." The gored flesh burns like the sun, and it is five o'clock on all the clocks!

Part 2, "The Spilt Blood," starts with an anguished shout, "I do not want to see it" (Ignacio's blood on the sand). The poet cries out to his old friend the moon to rush to the scene and sends for jasmines so that their whiteness will cover the blood.

Lines 67 to 74 incorporate for the first time mythical elements. The cow of the old world licking up the generations of blood spilled on the sand alludes to the primitive cow goddess. The bulls of Guisando are standing stone statues not far from Madrid, erected as part of a bull cult. With this device, García Lorca turns the personal tragedy of Ignacio's death into an event with mythic proportions, a millennial sacrifice. Ignacio did not flinch when he saw the horns near, but the "terrible mothers/ lifted their heads," for they scented once more the sacrificial blood. These terrible mothers contain, as is so often the case in García Lorca's poetry, several layers of allusion: the fates of Greek mythology and the baleful female goddesses in different religions.

The elegy demands a recitation of the deceased's qualities, and García Lorca waxes eloquent. Ignacio is a prince, his strength a river of lions, his laughter as white as a lily, his countenance a blend of Rome and Andalusia. He knew how to fight, but he was also an artist "soft with the ears of corn." Now, however, his blood ("nightingale of his veins") soaks into the earth, to form part of a pool of agony that stretches to the stars. No chalice can contain it, no song can smother it. The poet shouts once more: "I do not want to see it!!"

Part 3, "Body Laid Out," presents a series of complex images evoked by the thought of Ignacio's body awaiting its transport to Seville to be buried. He is stone cold, defenseless (rain penetrates his mouth); mourners crowd around the body, creasing the shroud. The scene needs men with hard voices to accompany this captain bound by death. Finally, the poet releases the body: "Go, Ignacio: do not feel the hot bellow./ Sleep, fly, rest: the sea also dies!"

After the preceding torrent of grief, part 4, "Absent Soul," has a haunting, quiet sadness, a final acceptance. The loneliness of the dead and their eventual disappearance into oblivion form its basic themes. The bull, the fig tree, the child no longer know Ignacio, because he has died forever. Autumn will come and go, death will continue. Only art will preserve Ignacio, and thus García Lorca returns to the purpose of all elegies, to erect a verbal monument in words to the departed individual. Many readers think that García Lorca wrote his own epitaph in the final stanza: "Not for a long time will there be born, if indeed he is born,/ an Andalusian so famous, so rich in adventure."

BLOOD WEDDING

First produced: Bodas de sangre, 1933 (first published, 1935; English translation, 1939)

Type of work: Play

García Lorca's first hit, Blood Wedding, using prose and poetry, recounts the story of a rural wedding in southern Spain that ends in violence.

Blood Wedding bestowed fame and fortune overnight on its author. In 1928, García Lorca read a newspaper account of a wedding that ended in tragic circumstances near Almería in southern Spain. He clipped the article, reread it five years later, and in a week finished his play, which became a hit in Madrid, Barcelona, and Buenos Aires. In Blood Wedding, García Lorca forcefully presents the theme of his three tragedies: Love that is unfulfilled because of the need to preserve honor and appearances results in death. A good-natured, hardworking young man contracts matrimony with a woman. The bridegroom is the only surviving member of a family that has been involved in a feud with the Felixes, and his mother is still overcome with a mixture of rage and fear that her only surviving son will meet the same fate. In rural Spain, where there were no secrets, it was known that the bride had been seeing someone else before the engagement. She is still madly in love with Leonardo (of the Felix family), who is married and the father of a boy. While the wedding celebration continues with singing and dancing, Leonardo rides away with the new bride. He is pursued by the groom, and the two men kill each other, thus causing the mother's forebodings to come true.

This simple plot summary does little to account for the sharp visual and verbal impact of the drama. García Lorca assigned a different color to each one of the scenes and characters. The groom's house has yellow walls, a pink cross accents the bride's dwelling, and the scene of the wedding has shades of whites, grays, and cool blues. Flowers are assigned to each character: carnations to the groom, a crown of orange blossoms to the bride. Folk lullabies are used for their musical effect and to advance the plot, and folk dances enliven the foreground of the wedding, while in the background the passions of Leonardo and the bride impel them to a tragic conclusion.

Signs of the care with which this play was crafted are the various clues at the outset as to the fate that will befall the characters. The mother, still grieving over the murder of her husband and first son, curses all knives and sharp-edged weapons. Leonardo's first speech reveals that he has had to put new shoes on his horse, suggesting that he is riding his stallion to death by making nightly visits to the bride-to-be. Even the lullabies contain portents. Leonardo's mother-in-law sings to her grandchild about a giant horse (Leonardo) that refuses to drink water (conform to custom) and rides with a silver dagger (death) in his eyes, through the gray valleys where the mare (the bride) awaits.

Vintage García Lorca is the blend of fantasy and symbolism in the first scene of act 3. Leonardo and the bride take refuge in the forest from the groom, and in this section of the play García Lorca exercises his talent for magic and mystery that marked The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca. He sets the stage carefully: "A forest at night with great moist tree trunks and a murky atmosphere. Two violins are playing." The moon emerges in the guise of a young white-faced woodcutter and recites a poetic monologue about her mythical powers. She wants no shadows and will shine on the groom's white vest and point the way for the daggers. A barefoot beggar woman appears, her face hardly visible under the dark-green folds of her garment. Representing death, she directs the moon to throw lots of light, for they cannot escape.

The vengeful, unforgiving figure of the mother is plain. Her grief is monumental, and she scorns the bride's passion. The fact that the bride in the final scene proclaims that she is still a virgin seems beneath contempt as far as the groom's mother is concerned.

As Leonardo and the bride cling to each other in the forest and await the groom and his men, they are portrayed as if in the grips of a force much stronger than they. "I love you, but leave me," cries the bride, torn between her passion and her honor. Leonardo replies that the blame is not his, "The blame belongs to the earth,/ And to the smell that comes/ From your breasts and your braids." It is this powerful passion in conflict with tradition and honor that creates the tragic conclusions of the three plays in García Lorca's trilogy.

SUMMARY

Readers of Federico García Lorca's poetry and plays encounter an intense, shattering emotion, one that occasionally hovers on the edge of melodrama but that frequently stirs deep feelings. Lovers of metaphor are fascinated by the play of his imagination and keep discovering new interpretations as they read his verse. García Lorca is not a difficult poet, however, for he believed in keeping firm control, obeying what he called the logic of the poem.

After he was executed by the Fascists in 1936, he became a symbol of the poet as a victim of repression. His reputation outside Spain grew accordingly. Now, with the history of the Spanish Civil War long past, it is a testimony to his talent that he continues to be probably the best known of modern Spanish writers.

Howard Young

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Libro de poemas, 1921

Canciones, 1921-1924, 1927 (Songs, 1976)

Romancero gitano, 1924-1927, 1928 (The Gypsy Ballads of García Lorca, 1951, 1953)

Poema del cante jondo, 1931 (Poem of the Gypsy Seguidilla, 1967)

Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías, 1935 (Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter, 1937, 1939)

Primeras canciones, 1936

Poeta en Nueva York, 1940 (Poet in New York, 1940, 1955)

Diván del Tamarit, 1940 (The Divan at the Tamarit, 1944)

Collected Poems, 2002 (revised edition)

DRAMA:

El maleficio de la mariposa, pr. 1920, pb. 1957 (The Butterfly's Evil Spell, 1963)

Mariana Pineda, pr. 1927, pb. 1928 (English translation, 1950)

El paseo de Buster Keaton, pb. 1928 (Buster Keaton's Promenade, 1957)

La doncella, el marinero y el estudiante, pb. 1928 (The Virgin, the Sailor, and the Student, 1957)

Quimera, wr. 1928, pb. 1938 (Chimera, 1944)

Los títeres de Cachiporra: La tragicomedia de don Cristóbal y la señá Rosita, wr. 1928, pr. 1937, pb. 1949 (The Tragicomedy of Don Cristóbal and Doña Rosita, 1955)

La zapatera prodigiosa, pr. 1930, pb. 1938 (The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife, 1941)

El público, wr. 1930, pb. 1976 (fragment; The Audience, 1958)

Así que pasen cinco años, wr. 1931, pb. 1937, pr. 1945 (in English), pr. 1954 (in Spanish; When Five Years Pass, 1941)

Bodas de sangre, pr. 1933, pb. 1935 (Blood Wedding, 1939)

El amor de don Perlimplín con Belisa en su jardín, pr. 1933, pb. 1938 (The Love of Don Perlimplín for Belisa in His Garden, 1941)

Yerma, pr. 1934, pb. 1937 (English translation, 1941)

El retablillo de don Cristóbal, pr. 1935, pb. 1938 (In the Frame of Don Cristóbal, 1944)

Doña Rosita la soltera: O, El lenguaje de las flores, pr. 1935, pb. 1938 (Doña Rosita the Spinster: Or, The Language of the Flowers, 1941)

La casa de Bernarda Alba, wr. 1936, pr., pb. 1945 (The House of Bernarda Alba, 1947)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Show how music serves as metaphor in the poetry of Federico García Lorca.
- Examine García Lorca's thesis that New York in the late 1920's was an effective symbol of the Western world.
- Compare García Lorca's conception of the ballad with the conception that governed the folk ballads of England and Scotland.
- To what extent does Blood Wedding depend on a concept of honor that is difficult for an American audience to understand?
- Consider the subject of frustrated love in García Lorca's plays.

NONFICTION:

Impresiones y paisajes, 1918 (Impressions and Landscapes, 1987)
Selected Letters, 1983 (David Gershator, editor)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Obras completas, 1938-1946 (8 volumes)

About the Author

Bonaddio, Federico, ed. A Companion to Federico García Lorca. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell & Brewer, 2007.
Cobb, Carl. Federico García Lorca. Boston: Twayne, 1967.
Craigie, Betty Jean. Lorca's "Poet in New York": The Fall into Consciousness. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1977.
Edwards, Gwynne. Lorca: Living in the Theatre. London: Peter Owen, 2003.
Gibson, Ian. Federico García Lorca: A Life. New York: Pantheon, 1989.
Honig, Edwin. García Lorca. Norfolk, Conn.: New Directions, 1963.
Staunton, Leslie. Lorca: A Dream of Life. London: Bloomsbury, 1998.
Stone, Rob. The Flamenco Tradition in the Works of Federico García Lorca and Carlos Saura: The Wounded Throat. Lewiston, N.Y.: E. Mellen Press, 2004.

© The Nobel Foundation

GABRIEL GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ

Born: Aracataca, Colombia
March 6, 1928

One of the most admired writers of Latin American fiction, Nobel laureate García Márquez has brought worldwide recognition to the contributions of Latin American authors in contemporary world literature.

BIOGRAPHY

On March 6, 1928, Gabriel José de la Concordia García Márquez (gahr-SEE-ah MAHR-kays) was born in Aracataca, Colombia. The oldest of eleven children of Luisa Santiago Márquez Iguarán and Gabriel Eligio García, the boy was reared by his grandparents during his early years. He refers to his grandfather, a retired colonel, as the “guardian angel” of his “infancy.” The old man instilled in him a love for the past, especially for the period of the Colombian civil wars from 1899 to 1903. García Márquez also grew up hearing his grandmother and aunts tell stories of local myths and legends.

After graduation from the National Secondary School near Bogotá in 1946, García Márquez entered the National University of Colombia to study law. While there, he also read poetry avidly and began to write short stories. In 1948, an assassination in Bogotá triggered a civil war that first drew García Márquez’s attention to politics and that caused the closing of the National University. When he resumed his studies at the University of Cartagena, García Márquez studied journalism. In 1950, he went to work as a columnist for El Heraldo in Barranquilla. He also spent considerable time reading and discussing fiction with other journalists and writers in local cafés and bookstores. In that context, García Márquez first became acquainted with the works of European and North American authors that particularly influenced his own work, including the writings of William Faulkner, Ernest Hemingway, James Joyce, Franz Kafka, and Joseph Conrad.

In 1954, García Márquez returned to Bogotá as a film critic and reporter for El Espectador and, in his spare time, composed short stories. He published the first major work, La hojarasca (Leaf Storm, 1972) in 1955. In addition to fiction, García Márquez also wrote a true account of the shipwreck of a Colombian naval destroyer, which El Espectador published anonymously. This story included material about illegal government activity and stirred so much controversy that the editor of El Espectador sent García Márquez abroad to work as a foreign correspondent. When the Colombian government eventually shut down El Espectador altogether, García Márquez remained in Paris. The two political novels that he wrote during this time were well received in literary circles: La mala hora (1962; revised, 1966; In Evil Hour, 1979) and El coronel no tiene quien le escriba (1961; No One Writes to the Colonel, 1968). His fiction did not receive widespread critical acclaim until the publication of his surprise best seller Cien años de soledad (1967; One Hundred Years of Solitude, 1970).

In 1958, García Márquez left Europe to work for the newspaper Momento in Caracas, Venezuela. That same year, he married Mercedes Barcha and resumed work on his short stories. From 1959 to 1965, however, García Márquez—who, like most Latin American intellectuals, supported the Cuban Revolution—concentrated fully on journalism and political issues. His return to fiction resulted in One Hundred Years of Solitude, a novel that has risen to the foreground of twentieth century fiction. Because of the financial security that it brought, García Márquez was able to support his wife and two sons and still devote himself full time to writing fiction. He also began to travel widely, denouncing political dictatorship and speaking in support of human rights.

In 1985, García Márquez published El amor en los tiempos del cólera (Love in the Time of Cholera, 1988), another major work of fiction that received laudatory reviews. A subsequent novel, El general en su laberinto (1989; The General in His Labyrinth, 1990), challenged the image of Simón Bolívar—generally considered to be Latin America's greatest hero—and sparked great controversy in Latin America. He subsequently published several additional collections of short stories, including Doce cuentos peregrinos (1992; Strange Pilgrims: Twelve Stories, 1993); a novel, Memoria de mis putas tristes (2004; Memories of My Melancholy Whores, 2005); and several works of nonfiction, including Noticia de un secuestro (1996; News of a Kidnapping, 1997) and the first volume of his projected three-volume memoir, Vivir para contarla (2002; Living to Tell the Tale, 2003). His later books show an increasing attention to political and social concerns, a marked change from his earlier works and their tendency toward Magical Realism and the fantastical. Nevertheless, most of his works retain their air of the imaginative and continue to demonstrate his highly artistic style.

In 1971, García Márquez received an honorary doctorate from Columbia University, and in 1972 he won the prestigious Rómulo Gallegos Prize in Venezuela and the Neustadt International Prize for Literature; he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1982. Returning to Colombia in 1990 after living abroad for thirty years, García Márquez continued to commute with his wife among homes in Mexico, Cuba, and Colombia. In 1999, García Márquez was diagnosed with lymphatic cancer, an event that induced him to finally begin work on his memoirs. La República, a Peruvian daily newspaper, incorrectly reported his imminent death in 2000.

ANALYSIS

Latin American fiction flourished in the 1960's and became appreciated as a powerful force in contemporary literature. Along with fellow Latin American authors Julio Cortázar, Ernesto Sabato, Mario Vargas Llosa, and Carlos Fuentes, García Márquez is one of the most significant literary influences in this period, known as the Latin American Boom. His fiction presents a reality quite unlike that in the novels of previous generations. Blending history, folktales, and imagination, García Márquez creates an expanded vision of life. Literary critics have coined a term for this bold interweaving of imagination and reality: Magical Realism.

The bulk of García Márquez's fiction, which includes social and political issues and commentary, is set between the early 1800's and the early 1900's in the mythical village of Macondo, which resembles his childhood village of Aracataca. García Márquez researches details of daily life in the nineteenth century for use in his fiction. He also considers himself "quite disrespectful of real time and space," and, thus, free to build relationships between different worlds and eras. Because he has "no desire to change a detail" that he likes "just to make the chronology function properly," García Márquez writes stories that free readers from space/time boundaries and encourage them to take a fresh look at the world. García Márquez seems to suggest through his writings that nothing is impossible.

Through rich and luxurious language, García Márquez characteristically offers detailed images of persons, places, and things. He provides his readers mathematical precision. In One Hundred Years of Solitude, for example, a breakfast consists of exactly eight quarts of coffee, thirty eggs, and juice from forty oranges. Rain falls in Macondo for precisely four years, eleven months, and two days. Such concrete specificity within myth and legend helps to create the stimulating interplay between reality and fantasy for which García Márquez is best known.

Thematically, García Márquez attends to topics and ideas that challenge the established order in people's lives. A recurring image is a plague that comes and changes all that it touches. García Márquez once said that the only subject about which he writes is solitude, and it is certainly a recurring theme. He also said that all of his books are about love, and that also seems to be true. Frequently, he investigates the relationship among love, solitude, and power, especially with an eye toward uncovering an individual's relationship to his or her fate or destiny. Themes of nostalgia and dignity pervade some of his more mature works.

Death is another characteristic theme, although the gloomy perspective prior to 1959 contrasts sharply with García Márquez's more mature work. García Márquez also writes frequently about both the humor and the emotions of aging, from his first two books, Leaf Storm and No One Writes to the Colonel, to his more recent Love in the Time of Cholera and The General in His Labyrinth. He cites his grandparents as the models for most of the mature people in his fiction. Other influences from García Márquez's childhood also abound: old houses, ancient matriarchs, a sense of nostalgia, civil wars, colonels, and banana companies, among other things.

Although García Márquez's work shows thematic consistency, his tone and style have undergone considerable changes. His early work was generally most concerned with communicating content through a precise, controlled style. An exception was his elaborate, dense first work of fiction, Leaf Storm. In the late 1950's, however, García Márquez's approach became more allegorical, and he entered into a period of literary crisis, a period of severe self-criticism and dissatisfaction with previous work. Caught between his old sparse style and the growing mythical approach, with its flowing language, supernatural occurrences, and hyperbole, García Márquez wrote no fiction until 1965. Then, while he was driving from Mexico City to Acapulco, García Márquez had a vision of how he could, at last, tell the story of his childhood, and he immediately returned home to write in seclusion, sometimes for fourteen hours a day. Writing constantly for one and a half years, he produced the masterpiece One Hundred Years of Solitude, in which his Magical Realism blossomed fully.

Some critics have been disappointed that, since this novel, García Márquez has not extended Magical Realism. García Márquez explains that his work as a whole is founded on "a geographic and historical reality" that is not that of "magical realism and all those other things which people talk about." He takes a different path in every book, he says, because "style is determined by subject, by the mood of the times."

The fiction García Márquez created after the publication of One Hundred Years of Solitude continues to display his wide-ranging and considerable literary skills. Love in the Time of Cholera, written in the author's own maturity about an octogenarian protagonist, offers an almost childlike delight in the powerful discovery that old age can be a time of love, joy, and passion. The General in His Labyrinth, in contrast, presents an almost humorless investigation of García Márquez's ever-present themes of solitude, love, and destiny. Both reflect the author's own vibrant energy and enthusiasm for life. Although death is a major theme in his work, García Márquez has said that he does not pay much attention to it because it distracts him from the most important thing in life: what one does. By interacting with the worlds that García Márquez creates, his readers become better able to reflect upon their own worlds—the realities that they themselves create—and embrace more of the field of all possibilities in their own daily lives.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF SOLITUDE

First published: Cien años de soledad, 1967
(English translation, 1970)

Type of work: Novel

Six generations of the founding family of Macondo are chronicled in this comic masterpiece.

One Hundred Years of Solitude traces the Buendía family dynasty through six generations of chaotic decline. Family patriarch José Arcadio Buendía founds the almost-perfect town of Macondo with three hundred inhabitants, all under age thirty. A man of "unbridled imagination" who always goes "beyond the genius of nature and even beyond miracles and magic," José Arcadio devotes his life to the quest for knowledge, but he is finally overwhelmed by the intensity of his own pursuit and spends his last days chained to a chestnut tree, preaching in Latin against the existence of God.

José Arcadio's son, Colonel Aureliano, shepherds Macondo into a period of political rebellion and conflict reminiscent of the civil wars that were part of the lore and culture of García Márquez's youth. A giant American fruit company develops the town, but worker exploitation erupts in a violent strike, and thousands are killed in a secret massacre. Úrsula, matriarch of the family and José Arcadio's wife, struggles to save the family from an evil destiny for more than 130 years. Her death, however, signals the demise of the family and of Macondo. At the end, the two surviving Buendías together conceive a child, who is born with the prophesied curly tail of a pig. Both the child and his mother die, leaving the father alone.

Until its final pages, the novel seems to be written from the perspective of an omniscient author. At the conclusion, the reader learns that the story has been the unfolding of the prophecy made by the old gypsy Melquíades, who had long ago recorded the history of the Buendías family in Sanskrit. As his final act, the father—sole survivor of the family, as well as of the town of Macondo—deciphers the parchments of Melquíades. He begins to read of the very instant that he is living, “prophesying himself in the act of deciphering the last pages of the parchments, as if he were looking into a speaking mirror.” He realizes that at the precise instant that he finishes reading, the entire story will be wiped from the memory of humankind and that it will never be repeated, because “races condemned to one hundred years of solitude did not have a second opportunity on earth.”

Thus, the novel becomes a world that both gives birth to, and consumes, itself. The main theme is solitude, humankind’s destiny in a universe that it can never completely comprehend or control, and the novel has been interpreted as a family saga, as a history in microcosm of Colombia, and even as an epic myth of the human experience moving from the paradise of Eden to the apocalypse. With majestic irony and magic, García Márquez interweaves details of everyday life with the fantastic to create such memorable images as a plague of insomnia that afflicts the whole town; Remedios the Beauty, who rises to heaven still clutching the bedsheets that she was hanging out to dry; and a cloud of yellow butterflies, which follow Mauricio Babilonia everywhere he goes. Although grounded in Latin American history, this work employs facts and figures to suit poetic purposes. For example, García Márquez expands the number of people who actually died in the United Fruit Company strike of 1928 from seventeen to more than three thousand to reflect popular Latin American legend, and as a hyperbole reflecting a vast number of bodies—enough bodies to fill a train.

This novel circles and recircles. García Márquez describes José Arcadio Buendía as one with enough lucidity to sense that time can stumble and have accidents, and therefore splinter and leave an “eternalized fragment” in a room. In this novel, darting back and forth between visions and memories of generations, García Márquez bends both time and space to create his own eternalized fragment of reality. Critics worldwide have hailed this masterpiece as Magical Realism at its best.

LOVE IN THE TIME OF CHOLERA

First published: El amor en los tiempos del cólera, 1985 (English translation, 1988)

Type of work: Novel

An octogenarian renews his courtship of a woman who spurned him more than fifty years ago, and this time love triumphs.

Love in the Time of Cholera is a celebration of life over death, love over despair, and health over sickness. It is the story of Florentino Ariza, who was rejected by Fermina Daza in his youth. He maintains a silent vigil of unrequited love for fifty-one years, nine months, and four days, until he meets Fermina again at her husband’s wake and renews his suit. The novel spans a period from the late 1870’s to the early 1930’s, and it is set in a South American community modeled after Cartagena, Colombia, and besieged by civil wars and plagues.

Florentino, an eighteen-year-old apprentice telegraph operator, sees thirteen-year old Fermina and falls madly in love. Fermina’s father finds out and sends his daughter on an extended trip to remove her from temptation. She returns years later, rejects Florentino, and accepts the proposal of a cultured physician and cholera specialist, Dr. Juvenal Urbino. Although Florentino continues to love Fermina throughout the years, he also continues his own social relationships—engaging in 622 long-term liaisons, which he records in a series of notebooks—and becomes president of a riverboat company. Then Florentino learns that eighty-one-year-old Juvenal has died, falling off a ladder trying to capture a condescending, bilingual parrot. Although Love in the Time of Cholera does not have the extended fantasy of One Hundred Years of Solitude, touches of unexpected, delightful humor—like the parrot—abound. In the midst of careful detailing, it is almost as if García Márquez winks and turns his head to tell the reader a private joke.

When Florentino attends Juvenal's wake at the Urbino home, Fermina orders him to leave. Undaunted, he launches a fervent, youthful courtship and eventually triumphs, consummating his passion on a riverboat during a trip on the Magdalena River. The ship is unable to dock because of an outbreak of cholera on board, and the crew and passengers are running low on supplies. Florentino is focused on life, not death. At the end of the novel, the captain asks Florentino how long he thinks they can keep going up and down the river, and Florentino responds, "Forever."

This novel differs considerably from much of García Márquez's previous fiction. It is a more precise and simple story, in contrast to his often complicated multiple narratives. Except for a brief section in the beginning, the plot proceeds chronologically. Although reality and fantasy intermingle, the fantastic in this novel is not as fantastic as in other works, and the line between the two is less blurred. Critics have suggested that Love in the Time of Cholera reads like a nineteenth century novel in the majestic narrative tradition.

García Márquez continues to address his enduring themes of love and destiny; this novel is an optimistic celebration of life. Evil and negativity are present, and this time his characteristic plague is cholera. In this novel, however, such situations make people want to live more, not less. García Márquez has explained that Fermina and Florentino's romance—which is based on the relationship of his father and mother—was sparked by an image that he once saw: an elderly couple, very much in love, dancing on the deck of a ship. García Márquez told an interviewer that he could not have written Love in the Time of Cholera when he was younger because it includes points of view that he did not have in his youth. He continued, "I think that aging has made me realize that feelings and sentiments, what happens in the heart, are ultimately the most important."

THE GENERAL IN HIS LABYRINTH

First published: El general en su laberinto, 1989 (English translation, 1990)

Type of work: Novel

General Simón Bolívar reflects on his life and career as he proceeds on his final journey through the Colombian landscape.

In keeping with the narrative structure of some of his other works of fiction—One Hundred Years of Solitude in particular—the text of The General in His Labyrinth begins with the story's ending, when General Simón Bolívar is facing the end of his career and life. The reader is introduced to an aging, frail Bolívar, who is a mere shadow of the legendary figure he once was. Against the backdrop of his own native land, García Márquez weaves the fantastic and grotesque into a fictionalized tale of the hero's last days, bringing to life a very human portrait of this legendary figure and the culture he helped create.

The story takes place as Bolívar travels along the Magdalena River, his journey along which acts as a metaphor for the hero's psychological and emotional journey. As he follows the river's winding path, he reflects—sometimes lucidly, sometimes not—on the events of his life and the achievements and failures he has met. Following his resignation as president, the real-life Bolívar had set out along the Magdalena River to travel to the coast and eventually make his way to Europe. García Márquez's fictionalized version of the hero follows the same path and with the same results: He never makes it to the end of this journey, dying before he reaches the coast and relieving himself of the impossible decision to leave the land of which he is so much a part.

The story speaks to the cultural lore and legends passed down to García Márquez by his grandfather and others around whom he grew up. Though by the time of García Márquez's youth Bolívar was no longer the predominant contemporary heroic figure, the legendary status of El Libertador (The Liberator) lives on to this day and helps to shape Colombian and Latin American culture. It is therefore with a certain degree of risk that García Márquez takes on this subject, especially given the novel's sometimes unflattering portrayals of Bolívar and his decline at the end of his life, as well as the highly fictionalized and fantastic accounts of this poorly recorded and little-known final journey.

The historical setting in which the story takes place is a very real part of the Colombian cultural landscape, and García Márquez largely consigns his narrative to historical accuracy in that respect. Nevertheless, his imaginative flair is as alive in this novel as in his others, and it helps to color the historical elements of the story with the same fantastical flair apparent in his other works. The General in the novel is a largely beloved historical figure who, even in his aging, decrepit body, retains the grandeur of the larger-than-life hero of previous times. His mental journey allows the story to transcend the bounds of time and place and to venture even into the imagined or fantasized. The historical setting of the novel places far more rigid bounds on García Márquez's narrative than those found in his works of Magical Realism. However, the work as a whole is representative of the evolving nature of García Márquez's body of literature, which increasingly finds itself situated in the very real culture and history of the author's homeland.

LIVING TO TELL THE TALE

First published: Vivir para contarla, 2002
(English translation, 2003)

Type of work: Nonfiction

This is the first volume in a projected three-volume memoir, outlining García Márquez's life from his birth to the day he proposed to his wife.

The central story of Living to Tell the Tale is Gabriel García Márquez's journey with his mother to sell the home in which he had grown up. This journey sparks an outpouring of memories and initiates a theme of change—temporal, personal, and cultural—that pervades the book. Other significant themes include personal dignity and nostalgia. As with his other works, this text plays with chronology and weaves autobiographical episodes in and out of memory, popular culture, and historical context. As noted in the book's opening epigraph, "Life is not what one lived, but what one remembers and how one remembers it in order to recount it."

García Márquez's memoir takes its shape against the backdrop of cultural, political, and literary events in Colombia, spanning three decades and describing the landscape of the region between the 1920's and the 1950's. The memoir's narrative is stunning in its ability to bring to life the socio-cultural setting that gave birth to one of Colombia's most beloved literary figures. Nevertheless, the book received strong criticism for its excessively lengthy and at times seemingly unnecessary expository passages.

Readers familiar with the author's works of fiction will find in this memoir numerous clues to his inspirations for settings, characters, plots, and many of the fantastic elements apparent in his fictions. Many elements of the story serve to highlight the Colombian landscape in which García Márquez's personal narrative, as well as so many of his other stories, take place. Along the way, the reader meets many of the true-to-life individuals that are the basis for many of García Márquez's more colorful characters. He also recounts some of the lore handed down to him by the elders of his family—stories, folklore, and superstitions that provide the context for some of his stories' plot lines.

García Márquez frequently pauses to mention the incidents and moments in which he realized his path to becoming a writer. The first chapter outlines an argument with his mother regarding his career that takes place when he is in his early twenties. He makes clear to her his choice to become a writer, and throughout the rest of the book he justifies that decision through numerous anecdotes and tidbits of personal history. He describes the literary circles in which he made his first forays into authorship, and he mentions many established writers who were the inspiration for his own writing career—William Faulkner, James Joyce, and Joseph Conrad among them. His dedication to his personal journey toward becoming an author, journalist, and poet is an inspiration to budding writers of a later generation.

The memoir recounts many largely factual events and experiences that helped to shape García Márquez's life and career. As a memoir and not a strict autobiography, the story at times veers toward the fantastic and unbelievable, with hyperbolized characters, odd coincidences, and some anecdotes that the author admits to having fabricated in his own memory. Though the tone of this work is inconsistent, drifting at times between the dryly accurate and the fantastically unbelievable, the work offers overall a literary window to the life of a literary man.

SUMMARY

The fiction of Gabriel García Márquez is an investigation of what has been called "poetic truth." Most of his work presents pictures of nineteenth century Latin American life that are recognizable in many respects, but García Márquez also deals with deeper truths and investigates more universal patterns. To do so, he blends fantasy and realism in what critics have called Magical Realism, creating works that have earned him not only the Nobel Prize in Literature but also the kind of recognition that he says he has always desired: people reading and talking about his books "not with admiration or enthusiasm but with affection."

Jean C. Fulton; updated by Rachel E. Frier

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

La hojarasca, 1955 (novella; translated as Leaf Storm in Leaf Storm, and Other Stories, 1972)

El coronel no tiene quien le escriba, 1961 (novella; No One Writes to the Colonel, 1968)

La mala hora, 1962 (revised 1966; In Evil Hour, 1979)

Cien años de soledad, 1967 (One Hundred Years of Solitude, 1970)

El otoño del patriarca, 1975 (The Autumn of the Patriarch, 1975)

Crónica de una muerte anunciada, 1981 (Chronicle of a Death Foretold, 1982)

El amor en los tiempos del cólera, 1985 (Love in the Time of Cholera, 1988)

El general en su laberinto, 1989 (The General in His Labyrinth, 1990)

Collected Novellas, 1990

Del amor y otros demonios, 1994 (Of Love and Other Demons, 1995)

Memoria de mis putas tristes, 2004 (Memories of My Melancholy Whores, 2005)

SHORT FICTION:

Los funerales de la Mamá Grande, 1962 (Big Mama's Funeral, stories included in No One Writes to the Colonel, and Other Stories, 1968)

Isabel viendo llover en Macondo, 1967 (Monologue of Isabel Watching It Rain in Macondo, 1972)

No One Writes to the Colonel, and Other Stories, 1968

Relato de un naufragio, 1970 (The Story of a Shipwrecked Sailor: Who Drifted on a Liferaft for Ten Days Without Food or Water, Was Proclaimed a National Hero, Kissed by Beauty Queens, Made Rich Through Publicity, and Then Spurned by the Government and Forgotten for All Time, 1986)

Ojos de perro azul, 1972

El negro que hizo esperar a los ángeles, 1972

La increíble y triste historia de la Cándida Eréndira y de su abuela desalmada, 1972 (Innocent Eréndira, and Other Stories, 1978)

Leaf Storm, and Other Stories, 1972

Todos los cuentos de Gabriel García Márquez, 1975 (Collected Stories, 1984)

Doce cuentos peregrinos, 1992 (Strange Pilgrims: Twelve Stories, 1993)

NONFICTION:

La novela en América Latina: Diálogo, 1968 (with Mario Vargas Llosa)

Cuando era feliz e indocumentado, 1973

Chile, el golpe y los gringos, 1974

Crónicas y reportajes, 1976

Operación Carlota, 1977

De viaje por los países socialistas, 1978

Periodismo militante, 1978

Obra periodística, 1981-1999 (5 volumes; includes Textos costenos, 1981; Entre cachacos, 1982; De Europa y América, 1955-1960, 1983; Por la libre, 1974-1995, 1999; and Notas de prensa, 1961-1984, 1999)

El olor de la guayaba: Conversaciones con Plinio Apuleyo Mendoza, 1982 (The Fragrance of the Guava: Plinio Apuleyo Mendoza in Conversation with Gabriel García Márquez, 1983; also known as The Smell of Guava, 1984)

La aventura de Miguel Littín, clandestino en Chile, 1986 (Clandestine in Chile: The Adventures of Miguel Littín, 1987)

Por un país al alcance de los niños, 1996 (For the Sake of a Country Within Reach of the Children, 1998)

Noticia de un secuestro, 1996 (News of a Kidnapping, 1997)

Vivir para contarla, 2002 (Living to Tell the Tale, 2003)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What are some examples of Gabriel García Márquez's Magical Realism? How do these examples help shape the text in which they appear?
- To what extent do the recurrent themes of his works—love and solitude, nostalgia and dignity, death and destiny—reflect the cultural context in which García Márquez writes? To what extent are these themes more universal?
- The General in His Labyrinth and Living to Tell the Tale are both based very strongly on real, historical events, yet incorporate a great number of fictive or imaginative elements. In what ways does the inclusion of the fictional benefit or detract from the reader's experience and/or understanding of the historical events?
- In what ways do the works of García Márquez help to bridge a literary gap between the works of Latin American writers and North American and European writers?
- In interviews and elsewhere, García Márquez has alluded to the very personal experiences that are the basis for many of his characters, settings, and plots. What might this pattern suggest about the author's views on the nature of literature?
- How has One Hundred Years of Solitude shaped readers' and critics' expectations of Magical Realism, both within García Márquez's texts and in a broader literary canon?

About the Author

Bell-Villada, Gene H., ed. Conversations with Gabriel García Márquez. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2006.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Gabriel García Márquez. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2007.

De González, Nelly Sfeir V. Bibliographic Guide to Gabriel García Márquez, 1986-1992. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994.

_____. Bibliographic Guide to Gabriel García Márquez, 1992-2002. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2003.

Fau, Margaret Eustella, and Nelly Sfeir V. de González. Bibliographic Guide to Gabriel García Márquez, 1979-1985. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1986.

_____. Gabriel García Márquez: An Annotated Bibliography, 1947-1979. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980.

McMurray, George R., ed. Critical Essays on Gabriel García Márquez. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1987.

Pelayo, Rubén. Gabriel García Márquez: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.

Williams, Raymond L. Gabriel García Márquez. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Wood, Michael. García Márquez: "One Hundred Years of Solitude." Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1990.

KAHLIL GIBRAN

Born: Besharri, Lebanon

January 6, 1883

Died: New York, New York

April 10, 1931

While Gibran is best known for his poetry and short stories, he also is recognized for his drawings and influence on the poetic form of Arabic literature.

BIOGRAPHY

Kahlil Gibran (juh-BRON) was born in Besharri, Lebanon, on January 6, 1883, the son of Khalil and Kamila Gibran. He had a stepbrother, Peter, and two sisters, Marianna and Sultana. Family life was marked by economic insecurity and frequent parental arguments. As an escape from such conditions, Gibran spent much time in the nearby countryside. In particular, he liked the region called the Cedars of Lebanon, which was filled with mountains, gorges, rivers, and waterfalls. The beauty of the area fueled his romantic dreaming. His writings and drawings often drew upon these childhood images and experiences.

The family had few material possessions, so Gibran often made his own toys—objects like kite-flying vehicles and waterwheels. The attention and praise he received when he shared his creations led him to equate creative work with love. This idea remained with him throughout his life. As for education, Gibran did not have even what little schooling was available for boys of his day: learning Arabic and basic mathematical calculations. While biographers disagree as to the education he did receive, it generally is agreed that Kahlil had a tutor who helped and encouraged him. Gibran was eight years old when his father was arrested and charged with embezzlement. When his father was found guilty, all of the family's possessions were seized, leaving them only the clothes they were wearing. Kamila decided to escape this disgrace by taking her family to America; they sailed on June 25, 1895. Boston became their home.

In Boston, Gibran entered public school and became acquainted with the world of theater, libraries, and museums. He met people who took an interest in him and his artistic talents. One such person was Fred Holland Day, a publisher and photographer who became Gibran's patron. Day not only used him as a subject in his photographs but also gave him his first success as an artist when, in 1898, several of his drawings were used as book covers for published books. In addition, Day introduced the young boy to other persons in the art world who could be of help. One such person was Lilla Cabot Perry, a versatile painter. She took an interest in Gibran, often used him as one of her models, and probably gave him his first set of paints.

Day also introduced the young man to a wide range of authors and literature. Of particular interest was the Classical Dictionary (1788) by John Lempriere, an English scholar. This reference book, widely used in the nineteenth century, described the gods and goddesses of classical mythology and history. According to Gibran, this book led him to renounce his Maronite Christian religion and provided him with information that infused his writings.

After three years in Boston, Gibran returned to Lebanon to study Arabic. From there he went to Paris to study art and drawing. While in Paris, he published Al-Arwāḥ al-Mutamarridah (1908; Spirits Rebellious, 1948), a book that led to his being declared an exile by the Turkish government, to his excommunication from the Maronite Church, and to the banning of his books in Lebanon. He was pardoned in 1908. This book, like many of Gibran's early works, revealed his concern about conditions in his homeland.

Gibran returned to Boston in 1902, when his sister Sultana died. Within the next year, both his stepbrother Peter and his mother Kamila also died. Gibran remained in Boston until 1911, when he moved to New York City. Marianna, his remaining sister, supported Gibran while he painted and wrote. His first art show was in Boston in 1904. It was during this show that Gibran met Mary Haskell, a headmistress in Boston, who became his lifelong benefactress, editor, and lover. According to their love letters, published in 1972, they never physically consummated their love.

While Gibran continued to draw and paint after he moved to New York City, he also increased his literary efforts and eventually became better known for his writings than for his drawings. Gibran also spent time organizing other Arab émigré writers who lived in America. Together they published several periodicals that influenced Arabic literature.

In the 1920's, Gibran's already frail health became a major concern. By 1928, he was drinking heavily to ease the physical pain from which he suffered; within a year he was diagnosed with cirrhosis of the liver. Gibran died on April 10, 1931, at the age of 48. He was buried with state honors in Besharri, Lebanon.

ANALYSIS

During what has been called Gibran's first literary phase (1902-1915), he wrote exclusively in Arabic and published eight books. They included Al Ajnīḥah al-Mutakassirah (1912; The Broken Wings, 1957), Kitāb Dam'ah wa Ibtisāmah (1914; Tears and Laughter, 1946, also known as A Tear and a Smile, 1950), and Al-Mawākib (1919; The Procession, 1947). The Broken Wings, a prose poem about a young man's first love, is considered his best and most popular work in Arabic. His best poetic work is said to be The Procession, which explores the "complete unity of all living things as they moved toward the fulfillment of their beings." His plays and short stories became known from China to Spain.

Gibran's use of short and simple words in his early poetry introduced a new style to Arab poets, who generally prided themselves on using words that had to be looked up in a dictionary. In addition, his first writings express dismay over the poor and oppressive conditions in his homeland and often urge his countrymen to revolt against the Turks. All of his writings of this period in some way reflect his revolt against the social, the religious, and the literary forms of the day. Many of these writings also depicted Gibran's typical hero, who used eloquent speech to overcome the Lebanese feudal lords and the clergy, who were fundamentally anti-Christian.

His best works, however, are considered to be those written between 1918 and his death in 1931. This time became known as his second literary period, when he wrote mainly in English, and his themes changed from revolt to contentment and peace. During these years he wrote few poems, but those he did reflect the same topics as his prose: the power of universal love, nature, and the essential goodness of humanity. Perhaps the difficulty he experienced using the English language was one reason he wrote more prose than poetry during this time. His English prose consists of moral fables, aphorisms, fragments of conversation, and parables. The works of this period include The Madman: His Parables and Poems (1918), The Forerunner: His Parables and Poems (1920), The Prophet (1923), Sand and Foam (1926), Jesus, the Son of Man (1928), and The Earth Gods (1931). Two works published after his death were The Wanderer: His Parables and His Sayings (1932) and The Garden of the Prophet (1933).

While there are clear distinctions between the writings of the two periods, there are similarities as well. First, Gibran frequently uses himself and his homeland as the basis for his literary characters and settings. For example, The Broken Wings, set in Lebanon, is thought to be autobiographical. Likewise, in The Prophet, the young prophet Almustafa is considered to be Gibran, and the return to the "isle of his birth" is interpreted as Gibran's desire to return to Lebanon. Second, Gibran considered himself a poet-prophet-philosopher. While this combination was common in Arabic literary circles, it does not have a counterpart in the American tradition. It is widely believed in the West that philosophers are supposed to think more deeply and objectively than other people. They are supposed to analyze facts and events as well as cause-and-effect relationships. The expected result of such study is to produce general principles and concepts that may be applied to life. Except for the general principles, Gibran does not much conform to the Western concept of what a philosopher is. Third, Gibran's works are known for their mysticism, simplicity, imagery, metrical beauty, wisdom, and lofty vision. Basic to his writings are eternal questions, such as “What is humankind’s purpose?” and “Where did humankind come from and where is it going?” He consistently deals with human relationships, questions about life and death, and the need to know oneself. His writings reflect his beliefs that life is a mixture of joy and suffering, that individuals are responsible for their own destiny, and that humans are social beings who must coexist. Other themes include the difficulties faced by women, the power of and need for truth over law, the importance of work, the concept of love as a unifying force in nature, and the possibility of reincarnation, in the sense that one returns to finish the work left undone by one’s death. Fourth, Gibran’s writings spark the imagination. Whether it is the multiple messages that can be found within the same work, the similes or metaphors drawn from nature, or the various moods created by simple words, the reader is drawn into the work and becomes a part of it.

There are two key characteristics to Gibran’s style. First, there is parallelism, repetition, and refrain. The second characteristic is a rhythm such as that found in biblical and other sacred writings. While these qualities greatly influenced Arabic literature, they are not common in American literature. This may be one reason why Gibran’s writings have never received much attention from American literary scholars.

THE PROPHET

First published: 1923

Type of work: Narrative

A young prophet, about to leave the place where he has lived for twelve years, shares his wisdom through responses to questions directed to him.

The Prophet, Gibran’s most famous work, has sold more copies and been translated into more languages than any of his other writings. Its popularity has been attributed to its simple style, metrical beauty, and words of wisdom. It focuses on human relationships—with others, with nature, and with God.

Almustafa, a young prophet, has lived in Orphalese for twelve years and is waiting for the ship that will take him home. The townspeople beg him to stay, but Almustafa remains firm in his decision. Then they ask him to speak to them one more time, to share his words of wisdom on love, marriage, children, giving, eating and drinking, work, joy and sorrow, houses, clothes, buying and selling, crime and punishment, laws, freedom, reason and passion, pain, self-knowledge, teaching, friendship, talking, time, good and evil, prayer, pleasure, beauty, religion, and death. His final words are a promise that he will return to Orphalese.

While the structure is narrative, the language is very rhythmic and biblical in style, using such phrases as “You have been told . . . but I say unto you” and “Verily I say unto you.” The repetition of such words as “but,” “and,” and “for” helps maintain the thought and logic of the theme as Gibran moves from response to response, as one idea suggests another. In addition, Gibran skillfully uses rhetorical questions. This can be observed in Almustafa’s response to the question about giving. He says, “What is fear of need but need itself?” and “Is not dread of thirst when your well is full, the thirst that is unquenchable?”

Mysticism, characteristic of all Gibran’s writings, is extensively present in The Prophet. For example, Almustafa’s words are given to him directly by God. Furthermore, personal characteristics are attributed to inanimate concepts; love is personified, and the ocean is able to “laugh with you.” The work reflects an entrance into a progression through, and an emergence from, a mystical state. Also in keeping with the characteristics of mysticism, God is treated as a principle or a force rather than as a person; God’s divinity is in nature. Since all living creatures come from and return to God, God is present in all things, present in all places and at all times. At the same time, Almustafa acknowledges the human traits of God when he asserts, “God listens not to your words save when He Himself utters them through your lips.”

In interpreting this work, Mikail Naimy, a writer and friend of Gibran, suggests that Almustafa is Gibran. The twelve years spent in Orphalese correspond to the twelve years Gibran lived in New York. “The isle of his birth” was Lebanon, and Almitra, the seeress, represents Mary Haskell. Naimy also proposes that the promise to return to Orphalese was an example of Gibran’s belief in reincarnation. Other critics have taken a broader view and suggested that Orphalese symbolizes the earth, Almustafa’s twelve-year stay in Orphalese parallels the separation of the individual spirit from the “All-Spirit” while on earth, and the “isle of birth” is the center of Life Universal, the place where all beings are born.

THE BROKEN WINGS

First published: Al Ajniḥah al-Mutakassirah, 1912 (English translation, 1957)

Type of work: Prose poem

A young man’s first love is thwarted when the village bishop selects the young woman the young man loves as the bride for his nephew.

The Broken Wings is considered Gibran’s best writing in Arabic. The prose poem, set in Lebanon, is written in the first person and skillfully uses everyday words. Gibran effectively engages the reader in the work’s depiction of emotion, alienation, and the longing for connections.

The central male character is a young Lebanese student who meets Ferris Effandi, a friend of his father. The young man meets and falls in love with Effandi’s daughter, Selma, who is described as “beautiful in both spirit and body.” They are prevented from marrying when the village bishop chooses Selma to be the wife for his nephew. After Selma marries, she and her friend do not meet again until they see each other at Effandi’s house just before his death. When Selma reveals the conditions of her unhappy marriage, Effandi asks the young man to be Selma’s brother and friend.

Defying the social customs of the day, the two meet secretly and regularly in a secluded temple to talk and share their thoughts. These bittersweet hours spent together cannot heal Selma’s failing health, which is caused by unhappiness. She begins to see death as her rescuer. When her newborn son dies, she holds him in her arms and says, “You have come to take me away my child . . . lead me and let us leave this dark cave.”

There is some debate as to whether or not The Broken Wings is autobiographical. Some think Gibran is recounting the story of his first love, Hala Dahir, the oldest daughter of Selim Dahir, Gibran’s tutor. Reportedly, their love was discouraged by Hala’s brother, who thought she could do better. Gibran told Mary Haskell, however, that the work is not based on any of his experiences.

As in his other Arabic works, revolt against social and religious structures is a central element. The young man in love bemoans the plight of women who are “looked upon as a commodity, purchased and delivered from one house to another . . . [they] become like an old piece of furniture left in a dark corner.” The three principal characters are brought into conflict with the local church leader, who arranges a marriage without regard for the feelings of the chosen woman or her family. This conflict, along with unrequited love, leads the two lovers to defy both religious and social practices by meeting in the temple. Not only was it a sacrilege to use the temple in this manner, but it also was taboo for married women to be in the company of other men. In keeping with Gibran’s style, the hero is both young and wise. He looks for some workable way of feeling, thinking, and living that will lead him to prevail over the social and religious forces that keep people from realizing their true selves.

“THE POET FROM BAALBEK”

First published: 1912 (collected in Thoughts and Meditations, 1960)

Type of work: Short story

Using the theme of reincarnation, this short story honors the Lebanese poet Kahlil Effandi Mutran.

Gibran was invited to Beirut to participate in a ceremony honoring the Lebanese poet Kahlil Effandi Mutran. Unable to attend the celebration, he sent this short story to be read on his behalf. In the letter Gibran included with the story, he said that the “devilish muses” inspired this prose and that its length was short when compared with “the dignity of the great prince and outstanding poet.”

Gibran believed in reincarnation for the purpose of completing tasks left undone by the person’s death. “The Poet from Baalbek” provides a clear example of this belief. Part 1 is set in the city of Baalbek, 112 B.C.E. The emir is saddened by the death of a beloved poet. A sage from India comforts the emir with these words, “Remember . . . that the sacred Law which restores the sublimity of Spring after the passing of Winter will reinstate you a prince and him a genius poet.”

The setting for part 2 is Cairo, Egypt, and the year is 1912. A pensive prince asks his companion to recite some poetry. When the prince hears poetry that speaks to his soul, he asks who wrote the verses. The reply is, “the poet from Baalbek.” Upon hearing this, the prince remembers words spoken long ago by Mohammed: “You were dead and He brought you back to life, and He will return you to the dead and then restore you to life. Whereupon you shall go back to him.” The prince decides that this poet must be honored because “he descends from his lofty domain to tarry among us, singing; if we do not honor him he will unfold his wings and fly back to his dwelling place.” The story ends with the prince, alone, pondering life and its mysteries.

One example of Gibran’s ability to create vivid pictures with simple words can be found in part 1, where the phrases “glittering lamps,” “gilded censers,” and “immobile slaves and guards” help set the stage and mood. Elements of mysticism and the belief in universal truths are found in the wise sayings of the poet and sage, as well as in the prince’s reflection on the mysteries of life. While a sense of sadness and longing pervades the story, there is also the joy created by the poet’s words and the deep sadness felt at his death. Gibran even involves mythology, mentioning the temple of Ishtar as a place where the poet was seen one evening. Both Gibran and Mutran supported the group honoring Mutran, The Arab League of Progress, which was created to promote Arab unity and culture.

SUMMARY

For Kahlil Gibran, the desire for a perfect world was muted by the realities of life. Good and bad, joy and sorrow, ignorance and knowledge existed side by side. This dichotomy was reflected in his writings. On one hand, he used his Arabic writings to denounce the conditions in his homeland and to urge his countrymen to rebel. On the other hand, he promoted peace and contentment in his English works. Simple and ordinary words combined in metaphors, similes, wise sayings, parables, poems, and stories expose his belief in the power of love, God, nature, reason, understanding, honesty, and the authority of the great mind.

Beth Adams Bowser

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

ʿArāʾis al-Murūj, 1906 (Nymphs of the Valley, 1948)

Al-Arwāh al-Mutamarridah, 1908 (Spirits Rebellious, 1948)

Al Ajnīḥah al-Mutakassirah, 1912 (The Broken Wings, 1957)

Kitāb Damʾah wa Ibtisāmah, 1914 (Tears and Laughter, 1946; also known as A Tear and a Smile, 1950)

The Madman: His Parables and Poems, 1918

Kahlil Gibran

Al-Mawākib, 1919 (The Procession, 1947)
Twenty Drawings, 1919, 1974
The Forerunner: His Parables and Poems, 1920
The Prophet, 1923
Sand and Foam, 1926
The Earth Gods, 1931
The Wanderer: His Parables and His Sayings, 1932
The Garden of the Prophet, 1933
Prose Poems, 1934, 1962, 1971
Secrets of the Heart, 1947
Mirrors of the Soul, 1965 (Joseph Sheban, translator and editor)
Kahlil Gibran: A Prophet in the Making, 1991 (based on manuscript pages of The Madman, The Forerunner, The Prophet, and The Earth Gods)

NONFICTION:

Al-'Awāṣif, 1920
Jesus, the Son of Man, 1928
Kahlil Gibran: A Self-Portrait, 1959
Thoughts and Meditations, 1960
Wisdom of Kahlil Gibran, 1966
Between Night and Morn: A Special Selection, 1972
Beloved Prophet: The Love Letters of Kahlil Gibran and Mary Haskell and Her Private Journal, 1972
Shu'lah al-Zarqa', 1983 (Blue Flame: The Love Letters of Kahlil Gibran to May Ziadah, 1983)
The Book of Giving: A Tribute to Mother Teresa, 1990
The Vision: Reflections on the Way of the Soul, 1994
The Beloved: Reflections on the Path of the Heart, 1994

About the Author

Acocella, Joan. "Prophet Motive: The Kahlil Gibran Phenomenon." The New Yorker 83, no. 42 (January 7, 2008): 72.
Bushrui, Suheil, and Joe Jenkins. Man and Poet: A New Biography. Boston: Oneworld, 1998.
Gibran, Jean. Kahlil Gibran: His Life and World. Boston: New York Graphic Society, 1974.
Gougassian, Joseph P. Kahlil Gibran: Wings of Thought. New York: Philosophical Library, 1973.
Naimy, Mikhail. Kahlil Gibran: A Biography. New York: Philosophical Library, 1985.
Nash, Geoffrey. The Arab Writer in English: Arab Themes in a Metropolitan Language, 1908-1958. Portland, Oreg.: Sussex Academic Press, 1998.
Waterfield, Robin. Prophet: The Life and Times of Kahlil Gibran. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
Young, Barbara. This Man from Lebanon: A Study of Kahlil Gibran. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1945.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Was Kahlil Gibran more a man of Lebanon or of the United States?
- Gibran's influence as a writer has been immense. Of his recognized literary virtues, which best explain the popularity of The Prophet?
- If Almustafa in The Prophet is Gibran, how does the author avoid a display of egoism?
- Discuss Gibran's capacity for perceiving and adapting insights that are more characteristically feminine.
- Characterize Gibran's god.

Karen Moskowitz

WILLIAM GIBSON

Born: Conway, South Carolina
March 17, 1948

Gibson's award-winning novels and short stories helped revitalize the science-fiction genre in the 1980's by examining the mostly negative effects of computer, biological, media, and telecommunication technologies on human beings.

BIOGRAPHY

William Gibson was born on March 17, 1948, in Conway, South Carolina. His father, William Ford Gibson, Jr., was a manager at the construction company that installed the plumbing fixtures in the Oak Ridge nuclear facility, where the first atomic bomb was built. His father's work required the family to move throughout the southeastern United States. Gibson's father died when he was eight. After his father's death, Gibson and his mother, Elizabeth Otey Williams Gibson, moved to Wytheville, Virginia, a small town in the southwestern part of the state where she grew up. Gibson's mother was an avid reader and helped restore the town library, which had burned down in 1910.

As a boy, Gibson discovered science fiction in a Classics Illustrated comic book adaptation of H. G. Wells's The Time Machine: An Invention (1895), which led him to Wells's original. He also watched Tom Corbett, Space Cadet on television and read a book on space travel so many times that the cover fell off. As a young teenager, Gibson was reading the works of J. G. Ballard, Alfred Bester, Ray Bradbury, Samuel R. Delany, and other science-fiction writers. (Gibson later wrote the foreword to the 1996 edition of Delany's novel Dahlgren.) At age fifteen, Gibson was sent to a boarding school in Tucson, Arizona, where he discovered William S. Burroughs, especially his 1964 novel Nova Express.

Gibson went on to read Jack Kerouac, Allen Ginsberg, Hunter Thompson, and Thomas Pynchon.

After his mother's death when he was eighteen, Gibson dropped out of school and fled from the United States to Canada to avoid military service. He lived in Toronto for about three years and wandered around Europe for another. He married Deborah Thompson, a language instructor from Canada, in 1972. They had two children, Graeme Ford and Claire Thompson, and settled in Vancouver, British Columbia, Deborah's hometown. He later used Vancouver as the setting for his short story "The Winter Market" (1986). Gibson earned a bachelor's degree in English from the University of British Columbia in 1977.

After graduating, Gibson began to write seriously while staying home and taking care of the children. Written originally as a class assignment, "Fragments of a Hologram Rose" appeared in Unearth magazine in 1977. The short story "Johnny Mnemonic" (1981) and the novelette "Burning Chrome" (1982) were both nominated for Nebula Awards. Terry Carr, an editor at Ace Books, encouraged Gibson to write a novel, which eventually became Neuromancer (1984). This novel won the Hugo, Nebula, Ditmar, Sei-un, and Philip K. Dick awards and established Gibson as one of the hottest new writers in the science-fiction genre.

After writing two more novels set in the same future as Neuromancer and picking up more Hugo and Nebula nominations, Gibson collaborated with Bruce Sterling on The Difference Engine (1991), an alternate history set in Victorian England. It was also nominated for the Nebula Award. He then wrote another science-fiction series, the Bridge Trilogy. The first book in the trilogy, Virtual Light (1993), was nominated for the Hugo Award. Some of his subsequent novels, such as Pattern Recognition (2003) and Spook Country (2007), are not science fiction, but they are often placed in the science-fiction section of bookstores so that fans of Neuromancer can find them.

Besides novels and short stories, Gibson wrote the screenplay adaptation for "Johnny Mnemonic." The film was released in 1995 but was neither a commercial nor a critical success. Gibson blamed the postproduction editing process for the film's failure and believed that the version edited for release in Japan was better. Gibson also wrote two scripts for The XFiles television series and was the first of many writers involved in the third Alien film, released in 1992. It was Gibson's idea to include prisoners with bar codes tattooed on their foreheads, but the rest of his script was not included in the final film, although it can be read on the Internet. Over the years, he has written several additional screenplays, but none of them has been produced.

ANALYSIS

Ironically, given the subject matter of his work, Gibson wrote Neuromancer and his early short stories on a manual typewriter. He did not buy an Apple II computer until he broke an irreplaceable part of his typewriter. In any case, he knew little about computers when he started writing. He first learned about the concept of the computer virus when he overheard a conversation in a hotel bar, and he never heard the term "hacker" until after finishing Neuromancer. Actually, his ignorance worked in his favor. If he had been more knowledgeable, he would have known that computer networks would never have the bandwidth for what his fiction described.

Neuromancer and his next two novels, Count Zero (1986) and Mona Lisa Overdrive (1988), are collectively known as the Cyberspace Trilogy and take place in a dystopian future, as do some of the stories in his collection Burning Chrome (1986). "Cyberspace," the term Gibson coined in the novellette "Burning Chrome," is the marriage of virtual reality technology with the Internet and is a place where someone can visit or even live. Gibson got the idea for cyberspace by watching children play video games, but he does not claim the concept was original.

The three books are also called the Sprawl Trilogy. "The Sprawl" is the nickname for the Boston Atlanta Metropolitan Axis, a continuous urban area from Atlanta to Boston that is the setting of the novels. Neuromancer takes place around the year 2035, Count Zero around 2043, and Mona Lisa Overdrive around 2050. In Gibson's mid-twenty-first century, multinational corporations are more powerful than any government, democracy is considered an obsolete concept, and the middle class has disappeared.

Gibson stopped writing about the cyberspace future after the collapse of the Soviet Union. One of his key premises was that there would be a war between the Soviet Union and the United States prior to 2035. In addition, some of his descriptions of futuristic technology were dated less than a decade after Neuromancer was published. None of the characters has a cell phone or its mid-twenty-first century equivalent, for example.

Gibson postulated a different future for his Bridge Trilogy, which consists of the novels Virtual Light (1993), Idoru (1996), and All Tomorrow's Parties (1999). Set in 2005 and afterward, the trilogy gets its name from the prominence of the San Francisco Bay Bridge in the first and third books. In this series, the bridge was closed after an earthquake, was taken over by the homeless, and is now a city in itself. This concept originally appeared in Gibson's short story "Skinner's Room," which he wrote for a 1990 art exhibit, "Visionary San Francisco." The three books sometimes are called the San Francisco Trilogy because much of the action in the first and third books takes place there; the second book is set in Tokyo.

Even in his work that is not science fiction, Gibson is preoccupied with technology and its effects on human beings. The Difference Engine, cowritten with Bruce Sterling, is set in an alternative 1855 London, and the key premise is that Charles Babbage (1791-1871) succeeded in building a computer with the materials of the time, using a steam engine as the power supply. In reality, Babbage failed to construct a computer, although his theory was correct. Babbage called his failed invention an "analytical engine," and the novel is concerned with how history would have been changed if the information revolution had arrived a century earlier. In some ways, this novel is even more dystopian than the books in the Cyberspace Trilogy.

Pattern Recognition is set in the summer of 2002 and was influenced by the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. It is not science fiction but rather a contemporary thriller that includes encounters with the Russian mafia. The main character is Cayce Pollard, who works as a fashion industry consultant but has an allergy-like phobia to trademarks and corporate logos, such as the Michelin Man. (Gibson's daughter has a similar problem.) Cayce and other characters are obsessed with the footage of a mysterious Web video, in which bits and pieces are released one at a time and not necessarily in order, and she travels to places like Tokyo and Moscow to locate the video's creator.

NEUROMANCER

First published: 1984

Type of work: Novel

Assisted by a team of specialists, a futuristic computer hacker penetrates the defenses of one of the most advanced systems in the world.

The protagonist of Neuromancer is Case, whom no one calls by his first name. In the opening chapter, he is barely making it as a street hustler in Chiba City, a suburb of Tokyo where many Europeans and Americans live. Case was formerly a cyberspace cowboy who stole data from banks, corporations, and governments, but he was caught double-crossing one of his clients. This client punished him by altering his nervous system so he can no longer use the neural implants required to interface with the world's computer matrix.

Case is recruited by a mysterious man named Armitage to become a cyberspace cowboy once again. In addition to a generous fee, Armitage arranges for Case's nervous system to be repaired. However, the surgeons also install sacs of poison with time-release mechanisms into Case's body so he will not consider disappearing. Armitage promises to remove the poison when Case accomplishes his mission. Case later finds out that Armitage's real name is Willis Corto and that he is a soldier who lost his eyesight, legs, part of his jaw, and his sanity in World War III. Someone has restored him physically, but Case quickly realizes that Armitage's apparent sanity is only a facade. Armitage was inspired by the character of Commissioner Hauk in the 1981 film Escape from New York.

Armitage's principal associate is Molly Millions, a former prostitute who is now a "razor girl." Gibson originally created Molly for "Johnny Mnemonic" and featured her again in Mona Lisa Overdrive. Retractable razors have been implanted into her hands in place of her fingernails, and her reflexes have been enhanced.

The next person enlisted into the gang is actually a dead man, McCoy Pauley, also known as Dixie Flatline. He was a top cyberspace cowboy who became brain dead when he encountered the electronic defenses of an artificial intelligence (AI). The gang steals a cassette of his recorded memories, skills, and personality to help them crack the defenses of the same AI that killed him.

The last recruit is Peter Riviera, a holographic performing artist and Demerol addict. He is also a psychopath and the least trustworthy member of the team. His mission will be to seduce 3Jane Marie-France Tessier-Ashpool, a member of the Tessier-Ashpool family currently residing at the family home on the space habitat Freeside. The Tessier-Ashpools are one of the wealthiest families in the world, and they own Freeside.

The power behind Armitage is an AI named Wintermute, based in a mainframe in Berne, Switzerland, that is owned by the Tessier-Ashpools. It is akin to the one that killed Pauley, also owned by the Tessier-Ashpools but based in a mainframe in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Since Wintermute is not human, its motivations are mysterious, but in one sense it is the most human of all the characters in the novel. It knows in some way that it is incomplete and that there is more to existence than processing data.

The team is assisted by the inhabitants of Zion, a space colony founded by five Rastafarians convinced that they were living in the Final Days, as described in the Book of Revelations, and who regard the entire earth as a modern-day Babylon. Rasta is an actual religion with about one million adherents. It originated in Jamaica in the 1930's and is the source of reggae music. The Rastafarians' space tug is named after Marcus Garvey (1887-1940), a proponent of black nationalism and African American separatism.

Neuromancer shows the influence of film noir, the pre-1960 crime films photographed in black and white, because the novel's plot takes the form of a caper. In a traditional caper film, such as The Asphalt Jungle (1950), the protagonists are a group of criminals who band together to rob a jewelry store, bank, or other location where valuables are stored. In Neuromancer, the goal is information, not jewelry or cash, but in Gibson's vision of the year 2035, information can be as valuable as gold. Something goes wrong, of course, and whether the gang succeeds or even survives is in doubt until the last chapter.

VIRTUAL LIGHT

First published: 1993

Type of Work: Novel

A simple act of petty thievery leads to murder and the discovery of a conspiracy that will affect the lives of millions of people.

Virtual Light is set in a less dystopian and more satirical future than Neuromancer. The title refers to a form of instrumentation that produces optical sensations directly in the eye without the use of photons and which was originally developed to help blind people see. The story primarily takes place in California in 2005, as Gibson imagined it might be like when he wrote the book in the early 1990's. Besides holding normal jobs and paying taxes, the characters have lives and families, unlike most of the characters in Neuromancer. Some of those characters are actually motivated by moral values, and the novel has a relatively happy ending.

Virtual Light takes place in a time of social, political, and economic turmoil. California has split into two states, NoCal and SoCal, but governments, especially police departments, are still relevant. The main characters are immersed in and dealing with this turmoil, while powerful organizations have their own agenda without regard to the human consequences of their actions. There are interesting supporting characters, such as Skinner, one of the first squatters on the San Francisco Bay Bridge, and Sublett, a Texan who was raised in a religion that believes God can be found on television.

Originally from Beaverton, Oregon, Chevette-Marie Washington is a bicycle courier who lives with Skinner on the bridge. The bridge became a haven for the homeless after it was closed to traffic following an earthquake.

When Chevette crashes a party in a hotel in San Francisco, an obnoxious man she immediately dislikes comes on to her. In revenge, she picks his pocket and walks away with what she thinks are sunglasses.

Berry Rydell is a former cop who is working as a security guard at the beginning of the novel. He drives around in an armored Land Rover designed by Ralph Lauren. Born in 1983, he was originally from Knoxville, Tennessee, not far from the Virginia town where Gibson grew up. Other characters comment that Rydell looks like a younger version of the actor Tommy Lee Jones. When he was a cop, Rydell was almost featured on the reality show Cops in Trouble, so he almost had his fifteen minutes of fame. He has a nose for trouble, in the sense of getting into it. After eighteen days on the job as a member of the Knoxville police force, he shoots and kills a man. The man was high on a drug called "dancer," was holding his girlfriend and their two children hostage, and was randomly firing shots from a gun. After the shooting, Rydell was permanently suspended from active duty and the dead man's girlfriend filed a lawsuit against Rydell and the police department.

Rydell then moved to Los Angeles and joined a security company named IntenSecure, headquartered in Singapore. When the computer in his van is hacked by a group called the Republic of Desire in order to indicate an emergency in a client's home, Rydell catches the wife of the homeowner and her gardener in a compromising situation. To get Rydell out of Los Angeles, his supervisor finds an assignment for him in San Francisco, where he is to help find and return the glasses that Chevette has stolen. Rydell eventually discovers that he is being set up by his employer and the owners of the glasses.

The plot is driven by a “MacGuffin,” a term coined by film director Alfred Hitchcock. It refers to a plot device, usually a physical object, that drives the action but is ultimately irrelevant to the real story. The title of The Maltese Falcon (1929-1930, serial; 1930, book) by Dashiell Hammett refers to perhaps the most famous example of this plot device. In Virtual Light, the MacGuffin is the supposed sunglasses, which resemble the kind that were worn by the singer Roy Orbison. (Skinner has a poster of Orbison in his room.) They are not sunglasses but rather virtual reality glasses that contain information for which the owners are willing to kill Chevette, Rydell, and anyone else who gets in their way.

SUMMARY

William Gibson’s books and stories blend trends, fashions, futuristic technology, and sophisticated literary techniques. He can extrapolate current trends as well as the top traditional science-fiction writers, but he can also hold his own stylistically with the best mainstream authors.

Thomas R. Feller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Neuromancer, 1984
Count Zero, 1986
Mona Lisa Overdrive, 1988
The Difference Engine, 1991 (with Bruce Sterling)
Virtual Light, 1993
Idoru, 1996
All Tomorrow’s Parties, 1999
Pattern Recognition, 2003
Spook Country, 2007

SHORT FICTION:

“Fragments of a Hologram Rose,” 1977
“Johnny Mnemonic,” 1981
“The Gernsback Continuum,” 1981
“Burning Chrome,” 1982
Burning Chrome, 1986

SCREENPLAY:

Johnny Mnemonic, 1995 (adaptation of his short story)

TELEPLAYS:

Kill Switch, 1998 (X-Files episode; with Tom Maddox)
First Person Shooter, 2000 (X-Files episode; with Maddox)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Agrippa: A Book of the Dead, 1992 (multimedia; with Dennis Ashbaugh)
No Maps for These Territories, 2000 (documentary)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- William Gibson prefers to write about the people who live on the margins of society. Why would he write about such people rather than the rich and famous?
- Is Gibson optimistic or pessimistic about the present and the future?
- Romance is generally lacking from Gibson’s books. Does Gibson believe that romantic love is impossible in our high-tech world?
- In conventional science fiction, a highly competent person overcomes formidable, but not insurmountable, obstacles to solve problems affecting large numbers of people. In what ways do Gibson’s books depart from this template?
- What is Gibson’s attitude toward computers and other high-tech devices?

About the Author

Cavallaro, Dani. Cyberpunk and Cyberculture: Science Fiction and the Work of William Gibson. New York: Continuum International, 2000.

Fair, Benjamin. "Stepping Razor in Orbit: Postmodern Identity and Political Alternatives in William Gibson's Neuromancer." Critique 46, no. 2 (Winter, 2005): 92-103.

Olsen, Lance. A Reader's Guide to William Gibson. Mercer Island, Wash.: Starmont Press, 1992. Entire text available at <http://www.lanceolsen.com/gibson.html>.

Stevens, Tyler. "Sinister Fruitiness: Neuromancer, Internet Sexuality, and the Turing Test." Studies in the Novel 28, no. 3 (Fall, 1996): 414-434.

William Gibson. <http://www.williamgibsonbooks.com>.

© The Nobel Foundation

ANDRÉ GIDE

Born: Paris, France
November 22, 1869

Died: Paris, France
February 19, 1951

Following World War I, Gide emerged as a leading spokesperson for rebellious youth seeking to lead spontaneous and “sincere” lives in opposition to conventional morality.

BIOGRAPHY

André Paul Guillaume Gide (zheed) was born on November 22, 1869, in Paris, France, the only child of Juliette Rondeaux and Paul Gide. Both parents were Huguenots in Roman Catholic France and believed in a strict Protestant upbringing for their son. Gide’s father died when André was only eleven years old. This loss, combined with a somewhat nervous temperament, turned Gide into a difficult and unhappy young man plagued by psychosomatic illness. At an early age he developed an almost obsessive infatuation for his cousin, Madeleine Rondeaux, whom he worshiped as an idealized epitome of pious and pure young womanhood. They saw each other at family gatherings and corresponded regularly for several years; both families, however, apparently opposed the two of them getting married, and they had to wait until the death of Gide’s mother in 1895.

Gide’s relationship with Madeleine was a platonic and spiritual one throughout their married lives. Though he was unfaithful to her, he continued to place Madeleine on a pedestal and to find in her the inspiration for much of his best work. Madeleine served as the model for Marceline in L’Immoraliste (1902; The Immoralist, 1930) and for Alissa in La Porte étroite (1909; Strait Is the Gate, 1924), both female exemplars of Christian morality and piety.

The major crisis in their marriage occurred in 1918, when Gide returned from one of his jaunts to Switzerland with his lover, Marc Allegret, to learn that Madeleine had burned all of his letters to her. Gide was profoundly distressed by the destruction of what he believed to be the expression of the most noble side of his nature; he was also forced to recognize, perhaps for the first time, the very real pain his duplicitous life was causing her. Following Madeleine’s death in 1938, Gide privately published a small volume, Et nunc manet in te (1947, 1951; Madeline, 1952), which attempted to justify his unorthodox marital relationship and to express remorse at having forced his wife to lead a life of loneliness and isolation.

With hindsight, it is easy to identify a moral continuum in the influence of Gide’s mother and wife on his own sense of self. Together, they represent the forces of Protestantism, spirituality, and the highest standards of morality; they also represent the forces of repression and denial, against which Gide would find himself struggling his entire life. As a timid and shy young man, Gide was uncomfortable with his peers. He was embarrassed by his own sheltered existence and lack of exposure to the male initiation rites of his generation. The turning point of his life occurred on a trip to Africa in the summer of 1893, following the publication of his first few books and his acceptance into the literary circles of Paris. He and Paul Laurens, the son of a well-known painter, set out with the express goal of finding opportunities for their first sexual adventures. Both quickly became involved with a young Arab dancing girl, and Gide began what was to become the first of a series of relationships with young Arab boys. Gide saw his new life as a kind of rebirth marked by health, joy, and sensuality. These experiences became the basis for the natural, unfettered existence he would preach in such works as Les Nourritures terrestres (1897; Fruits of the Earth, 1949).

Gide continued to write prolifically throughout his life. He often worked on several books at the same time, almost as if the warring aspects of his personality needed to find expression in separate ways. In the 1930's, he also began to play a more active political role, speaking out throughout Europe against the dangers of Fascism. As a precursor to the postwar existentialists, Gide is famous for the credo most clearly articulated by Bernard in Les Faux-monnayeurs (1925; The Counterfeiters, 1927), a belief that individuals must find their own law for living within themselves and then use it as their guide. In a sense, Bernard represents a restatement of Gide's youthful credo that one can learn to live only by living, in this case more maturely understood to include the sense of responsibility and social awareness lacking in Fruits of the Earth.

In 1947, Gide was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature. The presentation address acknowledged the controversy surrounding the apparent immorality of Gide's work: "The work of André Gide contains pages which provoke with almost confessional audacity. . . . One must always remember that this manner of acting is a form of the impassioned love of truth. . . . Through all the phases of his evolution, Gide has appeared as a true defender of literary integrity, founded on the personality's right and duty to present all its problems resolutely and honestly." Gide died on February 19, 1951, in Paris, after a long and rich literary life that included the publication of more than eighty volumes of stories, novels, memoirs, and literary essays.

ANALYSIS

Gide's earliest works were influenced by Symbolism and Decadence. Le Voyage d'Urien (1893; Urien's Voyage, 1964), for example, takes the reader on a highly ironic journey to a series of perpetually changing landscapes. Gide's sensual language and playful exploration of consciousness and perception in this work has been compared to the poetry of Edgar Allan Poe and Arthur Rimbaud. Gide later rejected what he termed the German mysticism of such early works in favor of a crisper, more precise style that he felt better suited the French language.

Gide's first work, Les Cahiers d'André Walter (1891; The Notebooks of André Walter, 1968), though published anonymously, brought him into the literary circle of the famous French Symbolist poet Stéphane Mallarmé. Gide became acquainted with the major writers of his time, including Paul Valéry, with whom he maintained a literary correspondence throughout his life. In Paludes (1895; Marshlands, 1953), however, Gide satirized the artificiality of Mallarmé's artistic credo and called for an art based on spontaneity rather than an abstract concept of artistic purity. Fruits of the Earth was Gide's most successful attempt to put his new artistic beliefs into practice. It is a work that reads like a series of unrelated personal experiences; sensual language replaces metaphor and symbol. It was also the first work by Gide demonstrating the influence of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Friedrich Nietzsche, the great German apostles of titanic individualism. Though only five hundred copies of Fruits of the Earth were sold in the first ten years following its publication, the post-World War I generation embraced its call for an honest and spontaneous life and its apparent condemnation of conventional morality.

With the publication of The Immoralist in 1902, Gide's works became increasingly psychological, almost appearing to be case studies of the nature of individualism confronting a series of polarities—sickness and health, asceticism and sensualism, relationship and independence, puritanism and paganism, Europe and Africa. The Immoralist tells the story of Michel, a young academic who revolts against repression and conformity as he strives to achieve what he believes to be a healthy, sensual, unfettered existence. It is often compared to two other tales, Strait Is the Gate and La Symphonie pastorale (1919; The Pastoral Symphony, 1931), written in similarly concentrated, journalistic styles with the same thematic polarities at their center. Strait Is the Gate tells the story of a young woman as excessive in her piety as Michel in his immorality. She literally tries to destroy herself in renunciation of the love she craves and out of fear that she might resemble the adulterous mother whom she despises. The Pastoral Symphony tells the story of a self-deluded Cal-vinist minister who falls in love with an innocent, blind child whom he has rescued from poverty. As a mature, married man who should be a model of morality for his community, he cannot at first admit the sexual nature of his feelings for her.

Together, these three tales portray a complex erotic drama performed against a backdrop of Puritan repression and self-denial. The stories of all three are variations on experiences from Gide's own life—in particular, the repressiveness of his Protestant upbringing, his unconsummated marriage to his cousin Madeleine, his extensive travels in Africa, and his struggle to accept his homosexuality. All three are tightly structured; the second half of The Immoralist, for example, repeats the journey of the first half in reverse. In his Journal (1939-1950, 1954; The Journals of André Gide, 1889-1949, 1947-1951), Gide complained that all three were misread; middle-class French men and women failed to note the irony in Gide's use of unreliable narrators. They condemned The Immoralist for its pagan hedonism and praised Strait Is the Gate for its Christian values, in both cases missing Gide's critique of excessive behavior.

The last period of Gide's long and rich literary life was dominated by the writing of his Journal and of The Counterfeiters, his most complex and ambitious work, the only one he called a novel. Si le grain ne meurt (1926; If It Die . . ., 1935), Gide's chronicle of his youth and sexual initiation in North Africa, is, in effect, the preface to the Journal. With its publication, Gide's contemporaries began to understand the close relationship between his life and his fiction. He himself spoke of his characters as representing possibilities within himself that might have become monstrous if left unchecked by the little bit of common sense he possessed.

In writing The Counterfeiters, Gide acknowledged his growing awareness of the individual's relationship to a larger society and gave vent to his own fears about the impact of Fascist thinking on all aspects of French life. The Counterfeiters takes almost all the themes and characters found in earlier works and weaves them into a comprehensive study of French literary circles and middle-class life. It is, in a sense, a serious sequel to Les Caves du Vatican (1914; The Vatican Swindle, 1925; better known as Lafcadio's Adventures, 1927), a farcical tale filled with complex plots and amusing coincidences. Lafcadio, its flippant young hero, who kills a complete stranger for no good reason other than the exercise of pure freedom, becomes, like Bernard in The Counterfeiters, the most positive of Gide's protagonists. Bernard is ultimately the only one of Gide's characters who seems capable of both true individualism and social responsibility, and whose authenticity allows him to be faithful both to himself and to others.

Gide spent six years writing The Counterfeiters; it was the last major fiction of his career. For the remaining twenty-five years of his life, he continued to work on his journals, a variety of short stories, literary essays, and even political exposés of French colonial practices in Africa. At his death, he was honored as one of the great moral voices of the twentieth century; a year later the Holy Office of the Vatican ordered that his entire work be placed on the index of prohibited books. Corrupter of youth or model of sincerity and authenticity? The paradox is appropriate; no writer has ever been more aware of the contradictions within himself and his world.

THE IMMORALIST

First published: L'Immoraliste, 1902 (English translation, 1930)

Type of work: Novel

A young anthropologist journeys from sickness to health to debauchery in rebellion against his repressive Protestant upbringing.

The Immoralist was the first of Gide's famous series of quasi-autobiographical, psychological tales. It is narrated as if it is a confession made to three friends of the protagonist, Michel. He has summoned them together to hear his story, not to pass judgment, but simply to listen. Strangely, he wishes that their friendship may "resist" the accounting of his life that he is about to make. In the end, however, the friends believe that they have been unwittingly turned into "accomplices," that Michel's confession is a veiled attempt to legitimize his "immorality" rather than to express remorse at the pain and suffering he has caused.

The framing context of the story is significant in that it helps the reader appreciate Gide's irony.

The novel has been misread as a call for a Nietzschean individualism that revels in its own freedom. The only clue to an action's propriety, according to such a philosophy, would be the pleasure the individual takes in it, irrespective of its impact on others. Ménalque, the Nietzschean apostle of pure freedom in the novel, mocks the "man of principles" as "the most detestable kind of person in the world" and warns Michel that as a married man with responsibilities he must choose between his freedom and his happiness. In attempting to heed Ménalque's advice and to satisfy his own sensual desires, Michel proves at least indirectly responsible for the declining health and ultimate death of his wife, Marcéline. As he concludes his story, Michel begins to wonder if his nights of debauchery were as freely chosen as he wants to believe or if he had, in fact, become the victim of the "brutality of passion." His friends are "struck dumb" in the end by the confession they have just heard. Gide must have expected that his readers would feel the same; "Drag me away from here," Michel begs, "I can't leave of my own accord."

This novel, like most of Gide's work, is highly structured. It divides neatly into five sections. The first and last sections take place in Africa, the setting for Michel's recovery from tuberculosis and Marcéline's ultimate death from it. The second and fourth sections are set in Normandy, where Michel first involves himself in the management of his inherited property and then later almost consciously sets out to destroy it. The middle section is set in Paris, where Michel presents lectures on his new philosophy, exalting the savagery of the Goths and condemning Latin culture as anti-theetical to life. It is there that Michel feels most attracted to Ménalque, who alone seems to understand why Michel is now "burning what he once worshipped."

Perhaps the most striking example of the tale's conscious symmetry is the contrast between two highly symbolic scenes. Early in the novel Michel experiences the healing power of sensuality as he delights in "the circumspect call of turtledoves" and the sight of a naked child tending a herd of goats. Toward the end, Michel goes to sleep among a group of young boys lying in the open air and wakes up covered with vermin. This second "baptism" marks the final stage of Michel's journey, which has taken him from sickness to health, from impotence to debauchery, and from a passive observer of the immorality of others to an active participant in the seamiest of existences.

THE COUNTERFEITERS

First published: Les Faux-monnayeurs, 1925
(English translation, 1927)

Type of work: Novel

The Counterfeiters juxtaposes several complexly interwoven plots with the journals of a would-be novelist.

The Counterfeiters is Gide's most complex and ambitious work, the only one he called a novel. There are at least a dozen characters and almost as many subplots surrounding a group of families, some of whose children are involved in a ring of counterfeiters. On its most coherent level The Counterfeiters is a study of adolescents attempting to discover who they really are and how they may achieve authentic, "sincere" lives in the face of all the false, counterfeit attitudes and social forms that dominate their middle-class lives.

The two major characters, Olivier and Bernard, share a love of literature and an enthusiasm for life. Bernard, however, is by far the stronger of the two; he alone is capable of true authenticity, of discovering his own internal law and living by it. In terms of one of the novel's major metaphors, Bernard is the fish who sees with his own light; Olivier is the fish who becomes the prey of others because he swims either too high or too low. Olivier at his best is capable of true lyricism; at his most vulnerable he falls under the influence of Robert de Passavant, a literary counterfeiter who is guilty of claiming the ideas of others as his own.

Olivier is ultimately rescued from Passavant's pernicious influence by his uncle Édouard, whom he has always adored but whom he has been too shy to approach. Édouard functions in a sense as the center of the novel. His notebooks are juxtaposed with Bernard's and Olivier's narratives; they provide most of the key subplots and a running commentary on the nature of the novel viewed in terms of the same problem of authenticity at work in the lives of the main characters. Édouard is not the implied author of the novel but rather a character in his own right understood to represent the opposite of Passavant. He would like his art to be absolutely "true," "unedited," and "original."

His particular dilemma is how to move beyond observation and journal writing without falsifying his material, a dilemma Gide sees as endemic to the novel, the "freest" of literary genres.

The novel turns on the passing of Édouard's mentorship from Bernard to Olivier, Édouard's nephew and lover. This transfer of influence occurs the night of the Argonaut dinner, one of the major set pieces of the novel in which key characters, both real and fictional, and key plots from both the narrative proper and the journals all intersect. For Passavant, it is a night of celebration turned to ridicule. For both Bernard and Olivier, the night brings a coming-of-age. Bernard's sexual initiation marks his growing independence; Olivier's encounter is followed by a failed suicide attempt proving his continued vulnerability.

By this point in the novel Bernard emerges as one of Gide's true heroes, the only character in The Counterfeiters strong enough to live a potentially productive life, both free of hypocrisy and morally good. Bernard's story is a variation on the classic pattern of the hero's journey: He progresses from the discovery that he is a "natural" child, hence free from the genetic curse of following in his father's footsteps, to the influence of a sympathetic surrogate father (Édouard) under whose wing he experiences both pure and spiritual love, to the passing of his baccalauréat examination (a required rite of passage for French schoolboys), to a return home in recognition of the true love that the father he rejected has always felt for him.

In one of the most explicit message chapters of the novel, "Bernard and the Angel," Bernard longs "for dedication, for sacrifice," for some noble cause outside himself to which he could offer his newly won freedom. Unfortunately, most of the ready-made causes he sees around him strike false notes. As he struggles with his Angel, Bernard wonders if it is possible to live without a goal and still not coast aimlessly through life. Christopher Columbus, he thinks, did not know where he was going when he discovered America: "His goal was to go ahead. . . . Himself was his goal." Bernard fears that without a goal he may live badly. Gide clearly believes that it is a risk worth taking.

SUMMARY

André Gide's ultimate literary achievement is that of a moralist in the great French tradition. Though he proved an innovator in his experimental works, The Counterfeiters and The Vatican Swindle, he was most influential as a proponent of individualism and what he called, "sincerity." Gide's moral philosophy was a product of both his times and his own personal experience. Gide managed to reconcile the post-World War I yearning for excitement and adventure with his own profound belief in moral goodness. The distance between Michel's obsessive pursuit of his own sensual pleasures in the name of freedom and Bernard's return home in acknowledgment of his responsibility to others marks the distance between the romantic individualism of the 1890's and the existentialism of the 1950's. It is the same distance Gide traveled in his own life and work.

Jane Missner Barstow

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- L'Immoraliste*, 1902 (The Immoralist, 1930)
La Porte étroite, 1909 (Strait Is the Gate, 1924)
Les Caves du Vatican, 1914 (The Vatican Swindle, 1925; better known as Lafcadio's Adventures, 1927)
La Symphonie pastorale, 1919 (The Pastoral Symphony, 1931)
Les Faux-monnayeurs, 1925 (The Counterfeiters, 1927)
Thésée, 1946 (Theseus, 1950)

SHORT FICTION:

- Paludes*, 1895 (Marshlands, 1953)
Le Prométhée mal enchaîné, 1899 (Prometheus Misbound, 1953)

DRAMA:

- Philoctète*, pb. 1899 (Philoctetes, 1952)
Le Roi Candaule, pr., pb. 1901 (King Candaules, 1952)
Bethsabé, pb. 1903 (Bathsheba, 1952)
Saül, pb. 1903 (English translation, 1952)
My Theater, pb. 1952

NONFICTION:

- Amyntas*, 1906 (English translation, 1958)
Corydon, 1911, 1924 (English translation, 1950)
Si le grain ne meurt, 1926 (If It Die . . ., 1935)
Le Journal des faux-monnayeurs, 1926 (Journal of the Counterfeiters, 1951)
Voyage au Congo, 1927 (Travels in the Congo, 1929)
Retour de l'U.R.S.S., 1936 (Return from the U.S.S.R., 1937)
Retouches à mon "Retour de l'U.R.S.S.", 1937 (Afterthoughts on the U.S.S.R., 1938)
Journal, 1939-1950, 1954 (The Journals of André Gide, 1889-1949, 1947-1951)
Et nunc manet in te, 1947, 1951 (Madeleine, 1952)
Ainsi soit-il: Ou, Les Jeux sont faits, 1952 (So Be It: Or, The Chips Are Down, 1959)

MISCELLANEOUS:

- Les Cahiers d'André Walter*, 1891 (The Notebooks of André Walter, 1968)
Le Traité du Narcisse, 1891 ("Narcissus," in The Return of the Prodigal Son, 1953)
Le Voyage d'Urien, 1893 (Urien's Voyage, 1964)
Les Nourritures terrestres, 1897 (Fruits of the Earth, 1949)
Le Retour de l'enfant prodigue, 1907 (The Return of the Prodigal Son, 1953)
Les Nouvelles Nourritures, 1935 (New Fruits of the Earth, 1949)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does the structure of André Gide's The Immoralist refute the charge that it justifies immorality in Michel?
- To what extent was Gide's age—he was almost fifty when World War I ended—a factor in his ability to see the postwar world more positively than many younger writers?
- Consider Gide's journal of The Counterfeiters as distinct from his other journals.
- Are Bernard and Olivier themselves counterfeiters?
- Gide has been considered a man who retained the faults of youthfulness. Does your reading of Gide confirm or deny this assertion?
- How did Gide influence the existential movement?

About the Author

Brée, Germaine. Gide. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1963.

Cordle, Thomas. André Gide. Boston: Twayne, 1969.

Fowlie, Wallace. André Gide: His Life and Art. New York: Macmillan, 1965.

Freedman, Ralph. The Lyrical Novel: Studies in Hermann Hesse, André Gide, and Virginia Woolf. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1963.

Heller, Erich, ed. Three Studies in Modern French Literature: Marcel Proust, André Gide, François Mauriac. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1960.

Lucey, Michael. Never Say I: Sexuality and the First Person in Colette, Gide, and Proust. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2006.

O'Brien, Justin. Portrait of André Gide: A Critical Biography. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1953.

Segal, Naomi. André Gide: Pederasty and Pedagogy. New York: Clarendon Press, 1998.

Sheridan, Alan. André Gide: A Life in the Present. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999.

RUMER GODDEN

Born: Eastbourne, Sussex, England
December 10, 1907

Died: Thornhill, Dumfriesshire, Scotland
November 8, 1998

In lyrical fiction and nonfiction, Godden offers sensitive portrayals of twentieth century families in Great Britain and abroad, capturing the interior world of individuals, alliances, and betrayals within close relationship and friction between different generations and cultures.

BIOGRAPHY

Margaret Rumer Godden (GOD-uhn) was born in Eastbourne, Sussex, England, on December 10, 1907, at the height of British colonial power. She was the second of four children born to Arthur Leigh Godden, an independent-minded river navigation company manager, and Katherine Norah Hingley, a Midlander from a prosperous manufacturing family. Rumer moved from England to India with her family when she was nine months old. Thereafter until late life, she lived alternately in both countries, which offered abundant settings for storytelling, access to two distinct cultures, and insight into the plight of social outsiders.

With the exception of an unhappy year in London shortly before World War I, Godden spent a halcyon childhood beside tributaries of the Ganges River, along routes of the Calcutta-based steamship company that employed her father. Her early education was home-centered, fueled by lively family lore and the diverse Indian languages and traditions of household servants. Her parents and Aunt Mary Hingley taught leisurely paced lessons in math, spelling, literature, history, and the Bible, and Godden wrote her first tales and poems in paper books that she and her three sisters had cut and stitched themselves. On summer journeys, Godden absorbed even more of the vast landscape and complexity of India that would color the majority of her numerous books, including novels, short stories, biographies, and tales for children.

In 1920, Godden returned to England for formal education. Unaccustomed to boarding school restrictions and made to feel like misfits, Rumer and her older sister, Jon, were removed or expelled from five schools in two years. Finally, they settled at Moira House, an innovative Eastbourne school where Mona Swann, the vice principal, cultivated Rumer's writing talent with private lessons in literary technique. In 1925, Godden decided against college in France, returning to India for several restless years that included Hindi lessons and a broken engagement.

Drawing on a love of dance and despite a childhood back injury, Godden then trained in London to become a ballet teacher. By 1928, she had opened the Peggie Godden School of Dance in Calcutta, which welcomed Eurasians among its students. Since it was taboo for society ladies to work, Godden was ostracized by India's English elite. However, the eight-year run of her school led to two ballet novels and many stories about marginalized Eurasians.

In 1934, Godden married Laurence Sinclair Foster, a stockbroker and avid sportsman by whom she had become pregnant. Their son died shortly after birth. The couple later had two daughters, Jane and Paula. Godden began writing novels while pregnant with Jane.

Godden's first novels juxtaposed Eastern and Western outlooks and moved back and forth in time. Chinese Puzzle (1936) featured a Pekingese dog reincarnated in England from an ancient Mandarin man, and The Lady and the Unicorn (1937) followed Eurasians in a Calcutta home with an evocative past. Her first commercial success was Black Narcissus (1939), a tragically comic story about Anglican nuns trying to establish a convent in a tainted Himalayan palace. Marketed extensively in the United States, the book won international acclaim. It was also the first of Godden's works to be made into a film or adapted for television.

The financial reward of Black Narcissus was short-lived, however. Laurence Foster had gambled away most of the book's profits and embezzled company funds before abandoning his family and debts to join the English army. Nearly penniless, Godden and her children spent World War II in an isolated cottage in India's Kashmir Mountains. She wrote prolifically—Gypsy, Gypsy (1940), Breakfast with the Nikolides (1942), Rungli-Rungliot (Thus Far and No Further) (1943), and A Fugue in Time (1945) were published during that time—while teaching her children and a nephew and raising herbs. After surviving a poisoning attempt, an episode recreated in Kingfishers Catch Fire (1953), the author and her daughters returned to England in 1945 with the manuscript of a coming-of-age story set in India. That novel, The River (1946), was a successful book with two protagonists modeled after Rumer and Jon Godden and was made into a film by renowned director Jean Renoir. Godden wrote the screenplay and consulted during filming in 1949 and 1950.

In the late 1940's, Godden also began writing children's stories and verse lauded for their entry into the imaginations, thought processes, and moral quandaries of young people. Her first and favorite such work was The Doll's House (1947), a seemingly simple tale about toys. Subsequently, she penned In Noah's Ark (1949), The Mousewife (1951), Whitbread Prize-winning The Diddakoi (1972), The Valiant Chatti-Maker (1983), and more. Like the novels she continued writing for adults, Godden's works for children frequently had Indian roots; few had simplistic endings. Typically, they depicted young people and animals—such as a resilient gypsy girl or a homeless mouse—tapping inner strength to deal with an imperfect world.

Godden married British civil servant James Haynes-Dixon in 1949. In the 1950's, she converted to Catholicism, which may account for the kinder portrayals of nuns in Godden's later work. Certainly, the Benedictines of In This House of Brede (1969) and the nuns of Five for Sorrow, Ten for Joy (1979) outshine the bullying sister superior of Black Narcissus, who was modeled after a school administrator young Godden had abhorred.

After her second husband's death in 1973, Godden relocated to Scotland. She continued writing in a variety of genres, reading her books aloud to test for quality. Rumer Godden died in 1998 at the age of ninety.

ANALYSIS

In tone and quality, Rumer Godden's work has been compared to that of English short-story writer Katherine Mansfield. However, Godden's best-known work is uniquely grounded in the India of her youth, with the exoticism, hierarchies, and culture clashes of that distinctive time and place. In fact, Godden built her novels on actual incidents and people in British India, drawing on journals, notebooks, and letters she wrote while in India.

The protagonists of Godden's fiction are women and children, especially awkward girls on the cusp of adulthood. The young are adrift, either separated from parents, far from home, or otherwise short on stability as they experience vulnerability, adolescent pangs, an awareness of sex, and the loss of innocence. The Bullock siblings of The Greengage Summer (1958), for example, fend for themselves among criminals in a foreign hotel when their mother falls ill. Without parental guidance, the Eurasian twins of The Lady and the Unicorn fall for dishonorable Englishmen. Similarly, the uprooted daughter of a hypocritical British envoy in The Peacock Spring: A Western Progress (1975) seeks solace with an attentive Indian poet. Despite prejudice, poverty, or broken plans, Godden's young protagonists find new senses of power within themselves. Their adult counterparts, however, do not always fare as well. Adults like Sophie Ward, the forthright widow living among hostile villagers in Kingfishers Catch Fire, are more easily daunted by circumstances.

The dominant theme of Godden's work is the swiftness of time, which carries the lives of her characters in a riverlike continuity, hastened by a great many house clocks and church bells. Houses themselves absorb human essences and serve as harbingers of time, outlasting generations of people they shelter. Thus, family history repeats itself in the home of A Fugue in Time, and centuries of human voices and spirits inhabit the house dubbed China Court in China Court: The Hours of a Country House (1961). As Harriet of The River bemoans after her brother's death, the sweep of time continues despite what befalls people.

The narrative form that Godden uses is nonlinear and intensely psychological. Not only does the narrative jump across past, present, and future time, but, along with dialogue and concrete descriptions of places and things, it also weaves memories and the nuanced, hidden, and unspoken intentions of characters. The narrative conveys what characters meant to say, what they could have said, and how they will recall events years later.

Although her books were favorably reviewed in The New York Times Book Review and other reputable publications, the inclusion of Godden's fiction in book-of-the-month-clubs and ladies' magazines dampened her early reputation among the literati. By the 1940's, however, most critics took Godden seriously, and she had earned a solid reputation for finely crafted plots, subtle treatments of character, and a complex and effective narrative style.

A TIME TO DANCE, NO TIME TO WEEP

First published: 1987

Type of work: Autobiography

Godden describes the joyful and the difficult experiences that shaped her life and writing career from 1907 to 1946.

As the Ecclesiastes-based title of A Time to Dance, No Time to Weep suggests, Godden's early life was marked by dramatic contrasts between joy and sorrow. Her quirky, unorthodox family offered the creative freedom that her first marriage never would; writing became satisfying and cathartic work, but it was often interrupted by the children that Godden had to raise alone; the author would earn a comfortable living and a popular following, but not before money worries and social ostracism had taken their tolls; and although Godden embraced Indian culture as did few Europeans of her time, she was haunted by how a trusted Indian servant had nearly killed her.

The prologue of the A Time to Dance, No Time to Weep is portentous. It depicts a wary twelve-year-old Godden and her older sister, Jon, on a wet English quay, having just arrived from India and left their childhoods behind for formal schooling. India had meant sunlight, family, and inclusion for young Godden; England, as she had briefly known it while living with her aunts and grandmother at age five, proffered dull routine, Anglican piety, and dizzying rules and regulations. As the memoir moves beyond initial chapters on lineage and home life to Godden's turbulent education, dating years, marriage, and motherhood, the wariness of the twelve-year-old seems to have been warranted. After Godden's childhood, things often went awry.

Supporting her sister through upheavals was Jon Godden, the literary touchstone of sister whose closeness with the author is discussed in the chapter "The Little Fishes." Like odd fishes out of water, Rumer and Jon Godden endured school together, closed ranks when others wronged them, and always encouraged one another's literary efforts. Jon was an accomplished artist and author in her own right; Rumer routinely sought her sister's assessment before submitting books for publication. The sisters cowrote Two Under the Indian Sun (1966), a joint autobiography of their youth, and Shiva's Pigeons: An Experience of India (1972).

Biographers have argued that Godden writes sympathetically about outsiders—such as plucky orphans, transient gypsies, entrapped mothers, and people shunned—because her own sense of exclusion was profound. Indeed, by Godden's own account in A Time to Dance, No Time to Weep, she was the least attractive of the four Godden sisters, an unsporting student out of step with peers, and a woman put off by the very cliques and chattiness prized by her first husband and British club society in India. When some of her books were banned from club libraries because they addressed unsavory liaisons and racial tensions, the distance increased between Godden and her offended English contemporaries.

Written when the author was eighty years old, A Time to Dance, No Time to Weep closes on a Liverpool quay, with Godden and her daughters returning to England for a fresh start after World War II. The story continues in A House with Four Rooms (1989), a second memoir published two years later.

A CANDLE FOR ST. JUDE

First published: 1948

Type of work: Novel

Headed by a passionate and exacting former ballerina, a ballet ensemble in post-World War II London prepares for the opening-night performance of a new season that also marks the fiftieth anniversary of its founder's stage debut.

A Candle for St. Jude is a critically distinguished short novel praised at publication for its witty and compassionate characterization of two elder heroines, as well as for an intimate, behind-the-scenes rendering of the ballet. Like a group of lightly nostalgic British novels published in the aftermath of World War II, it focuses on a narrow but sparkling slice of humanity.

A Candle for St. Jude is a small story about art and continuity, tracing two days in the life of a small but accomplished ballet company. Told in the third person by an omniscient narrator, the novel revolves around Madame Anna Holbein, an aging Russian ballerina turned theater manager whose artistic inspirations, uncompromising standards, and heady points of view drive the action and dominate the narrative.

In this novel, as in much of Godden's work, houses are harbingers of hope and links to the past. A Candle for St. Jude begins with the selection of a house that defines the novel's central character. The dark, wisteria-framed London house that Madame Holbein chose to transform into a ballet school and theater was worn, difficult to clean, and nearly impossible to afford. To Madame, however, it was perfect, ripe with artistic possibilities to be realized as she saw fit. Madame is dedicated to artistic perfection: She provides vision, while the dancers, costumers, musicians, and others in her theatrical circle must deal with messy practicalities, however capricious and unreasonable Madame's demands. Indeed, Madame's opposite is her practical and self-sacrificing sister-in-law, the widow with whom Madame shares the London home. Ilse Holbein's faith rests in God and the Catholic Church rather than art, but she contributes to Ballet Holbein by cooking meals, keeping books, and praying fervently for the success of the financially tenuous enterprise.

Crisis erupts the day before the new season, when Madame suddenly realizes that Lyre with Seven Strings, one of three ballets on the opening-night program, is wrong for the occasion. Conceived by seventeen-year-old Hilda French, the ardent, superior pupil who unnerves Madame but takes after her, the ballet portrays seven essential facets of a harmonious life. Madame wants to shorten and rename the ballet, or cut it entirely from the program. Headstrong Hilda resists, and theater members take sides, each with unique aspirations and loyalties at stake. Lion, a leading dancer who is drawn to Hilda as she is to him, woos her to capitulate.

Even so, Madame remains distraught: On the cusp of celebrating her own dancing debut and longtime reputation for success, she has no viable substitute for the troublesome third ballet. As her anxiety and exhaustion increase, streams of consciousness and shifts in time—frequent storytelling devices for Godden—take over the narrative. Madame's immediate managerial worries are overtaken by a flurry of girlhood memories, lines that someone once said to her, bouquets from past admirers, and moments from Tarantella, Giselle, and other ballets in which she once starred. Madame collapses and takes to her bed.

Finally, Madame discovers the last-minute program solution in Leda and the Swan, a primal and strangely powerful ballet for two based on the classic seduction of a young virgin by a virile winged beast. The new ballet is Hilda's, written in a notebook the girl left in an empty practice room where sleepless Madame wanders. When Lion and Hilda demonstrate the new ballet—its power intensified by their attraction to one another—Madame recognizes Hilda's considerable vision, which has surpassed the artistry of Lion's usual dance partner and Madame's favorite student, Caroline.

Caroline herself recognizes the potency of Hilda's new ballet. Like Lion, Caroline has advanced to the Metropolitan Ballet but returns to perform with Ballet Holbein as guest artist, in deference to Madame. Afraid of being outshone by Hilda, Caroline walks out, threatening to draw Lion into mutiny, too. When Caroline returns in time to perform, Madame gives her a treasured keepsake from the czar of Russia. Meanwhile, Madame has ordered and cajoled others to draft musical scores, refashion new costumes from old, and hurry to produce Hilda's new ballet on time.

The story closes with an assured Madame Holbein dressing for the evening and planning how to single out Hilda for recognition when the curtain falls, marking the start of an unbounded career for the girl. Madame wonders, after days of theatrical missteps, quarrels, tears, and opportunities, what accounts for the eleventh-hour miracle of a wondrous ballet program? Ilse is convinced that the credit goes to St. Jude, patron saint of lost causes. She had lit a candle to him on Ballet Holbein's behalf.

THE BATTLE OF THE VILLA FIORITA

First published: 1963

Type of work: Novel

Two unescorted English siblings venture to Italy, determined to wrest their recently divorced mother from her lover, bring her home to England, and restore stability to their dispersed family.

The Battle of the Villa Fiorita, a novel about children pitted against parents, demonstrates Godden's technical mastery of character development and family dynamics. One of the author's few novels set outside India, The Battle of the Villa Fiorita has garnered praise for its vivid evocation of the Italian landscape, as well as for an authentic representation of how families operate—even from critics who find its premise implausible.

For this work, Godden employs a single narrator but shifting points of view, primarily those of the two Clavering children and their mother, to tell a story unfolding in two places. The Italian countryside of exotic fragrances, sprawling gardens, and alluring beauty serves as the immediate battleground setting, while the backstory is set in conventional England, where the Claverings' once-predictable life ended with divorce.

The story opens with two travel-weary children outside the locked gates of an Italian villa, the temporary lakeside abode of their adulterous English mother and the film director intent on marrying her. Like soldiers pushed to the brink, fourteen-year-old Hugh Clavering and his younger sister Caddie have arrived to derail the relationship between their mother, Fanny Clavering, and Robert Quillet, a widowed director who fell in love with the plain matron while filming in Whitcross, her middle-class neighborhood.

With Godden's customary acuity for presenting life as children experience it, the story begins and ends with the point of view of eleven-year-old Caddie. Caddie compares the untidy physicality of the villa to the orderly decor and furniture at Stebbings, the spacious suburban home she had to leave for a cramped London flat when her father assumed custody of the three Clavering children. At Stebbings, Caddie's world had centered on Topaz, her beloved pony, and the secure routine of school, holidays, and childhood rituals. Then, life became ruled by words like "access," "custody," and "visitation"—words explained to Caddie by her older sister Philippa, unfazed by the divorce and headed for school in France. Caddie wants her mother and her old life back.

At the villa, Hugh's attention is attracted by disturbing signs of his mother's newly awakened sexuality, such as a finely embroidered petticoat and an unmatronly scarf. In a series of flashbacks prompted by visual cues, and eventually by questions from his astounded mother, Hugh tells how he and Caddie left school and traveled to the villa. Fanny is impressed by her children's efforts to reach her, but she and Rob promptly notify their father, Darrell Clavering, a queen's messenger, of the children's whereabouts. As the three adults plan how to return the children to their father, none of them grasps the subversive nature of Hugh and Caddie's mission. Nevertheless, Darrell's business schedule and Hugh's case of food poisoning delay the return.

In spite of themselves, Hugh and Caddie warm to Italy and to fair-minded Rob. Caddie relishes the La Scala opera and sumptuous meal to which Rob treats her, and Rob steadies Hugh with masculine advice after the lad has an unsettling sexual encounter. However, when Rob's ten-year-old daughter, Pia, arrives at the villa from Rome at her father's request, battle lines form. The three children join forces against Fanny and Rob, using contentiousness and a hunger strike to drive a wedge between them.

Fanny and Rob disagree over how to handle the hunger strike. The couple also is taxed by increasingly dangerous and public crises involving the children. Hugh runs away and then returns. Caddie, grasping at Catholic theology touted by convent-educated Pia, begs the village priest to make her mother a Catholic; Catholic mothers do not marry other people's fathers when their husbands are alive. Caddie's public tears turn Malcesine villagers against Rob and Fanny. Then, Caddie pummels Pia upon learning that the prim girl and Hugh have betrayed her, secretly eating during the strike and disregarding the purpose of the Italian journey, which had been financed by the sale of Caddie's beloved pony. Finally, Hugh nearly drowns himself and Pia in a reckless boating accident.

Remembering the moral warnings of her deceased Aunt Isabel, Fanny convinces herself that Hugh's brush with death is her own terrible punishment for doing wrong; that is, for attempting to build a separate, loving new life with Rob. Her well-worn bedside book, the Imitation of Christ, suggests that Fanny may have swept aside her long-standing religious convictions for love. In the end, Rob and Fanny give up the battle, parting ways by mutual, but brokenhearted, agreement. The novel closes with Fanny and her children exiting the villa gates, headed for the Milan airport and an uncertain future.

SUMMARY

In her original, edited, and translated work, Rumer Godden specialized in revealing the inner workings of families and communities. Her portrayals of actual families, as well as nuns living in a community, animals on an ark, or miniature dolls in a toy world, offer a real-life balance of joys and jealousies, love and rivalries, innocence and darkness. Although the author was inclined to process life by retreating with her pen rather than socializing in the mainstream, she created a substantial body of work that successfully re-created the exoticism of colonial and then independent India, as well as twentieth century England.

Wendy Alison Lamb

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Chinese Puzzle*, 1936
- The Lady and the Unicorn*, 1937
- Black Narcissus*, 1939
- Gypsy, Gypsy*, 1940
- Breakfast with the Nikolides*, 1942
- A Fugue in Time*, 1945 (also known as Take Three Tenses: A Fugue in Time)
- The River*, 1946
- A Candle for St. Jude*, 1948
- A Breath of Air*, 1950
- Kingfishers Catch Fire*, 1953
- An Episode of Sparrows*, 1955
- The Greengage Summer*, 1958
- China Court: The Hours of a Country House*, 1961
- The Battle of the Villa Fiorita*, 1963
- In This House of Brede*, 1969
- The Peacock Spring: A Western Progress*, 1975
- Five for Sorrow, Ten for Joy*, 1979
- The Dark Horse*, 1981

Rumer Godden

Thursday's Children, 1984

Coromandel Sea Change, 1990

Pippa Passes, 1994

Cromartie v. the God Shiva: Acting Through the Government of India, 1997

SHORT FICTION:

Mooltiki: Stories and Poems from India, 1957

Swans and Turtles: Stories, 1968 (also known as Gone: A Thread of Stories)

Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love: Stories, 1989 (with Jon Godden; also known as Indian Dust, 1989)

SCREENPLAY:

The River, 1951 (adaptation of her novel)

NONFICTION:

Rungli-Rungliot (Thus Far and No Further), 1943 (also known as Rungli-Rungliot Means in Paharia, Thus Far and No Further and Thus Far and No Further)

Bengal Journey: A Story of the Part Played by Women in the Province 1939-1945, 1945

Two Under the Indian Sun, 1966 (autobiography; with Jon Godden)

Shiva's Pigeons: An Experience of India, 1972 (with Jon Godden)

The Butterfly Lions: The Story of the Pekingese in History, Legend, and Art, 1977

A Time to Dance, No Time to Weep, 1987 (autobiography)

A House with Four Rooms, 1989

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

The Doll's House, 1947

In Noah's Ark, 1949

The Mousewife, 1951

Impunity Jane: The Story of a Pocket Doll, 1954

The Fairy Doll, 1956

The Story of Holly and Ivy, 1958

Candy Floss, 1960

Miss Happiness and Miss Flower, 1961

Little Plum, 1963

Home Is the Sailor, 1964

The Kitchen Madonna, 1967

Operation Sippacik, 1969

The Diddakoi, 1972

Mr. McFadden's Hallowe'en, 1975

The Rocking Horse Secret, 1977

A Kindle of Kittens, 1978

The Dragon of Og, 1981

The Valiant Chatti-Maker, 1983

Fu-Dog, 1989

Great Grandfather's House, 1992

Listen to the Nightingale, 1992

Premlata and the Festival of Lights, 1996

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In what ways are The Battle of the Villa Fiorita and A Candle for St. Jude coming-of-age novels?
- What sets outsiders in Rumer Godden's fiction apart from other characters?
- How are descriptions of nature used in Godden's works?
- How does Godden view marriage?
- How do religious rituals and images function in Godden's novels?

EDITED TEXTS:

Round the Day, Round the Year, the World Around: Poetry Programmes for Classroom or Library, 1966 (with Margaret Bell)

A Letter to the World: Poems for Young People, 1968 (by Emily Dickinson)

Mrs. Manders' Cookbook, 1968 (by Olga Manders)

About the Author

Chisholm, Anne. Rumer Godden: A Storyteller's Life. New York: Greenwillow Books, 1999.

Head, Dominic, ed. The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English. 3d ed. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2006.

Lassner, Phyllis. Colonial Strangers: Women Writing at the End of the British Empire. Piscataway, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2004.

Rosenthal, Lynne M. Rumer Godden Revisited. New York: Twayne, 1996.

Sage, Lorna. The Cambridge Guide to Women's Writing in English. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Library of Congress

JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE

Born: Frankfurt am Main (now in Germany)
August 28, 1749

Died: Weimar, Saxe-Weimer-Eisenbach (now in Germany)
March 22, 1832

Widely recognized as one of Germany's greatest lyric poets, Goethe is most famous for his very personal, autobiographical verse and his profound understanding of human individuality in relationship to nature, history, and society.

BIOGRAPHY

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (GUR-tuh) was born in Frankfurt am Main (now in Germany) on August 28, 1749, the eldest son of Johann Kaspar and Katharina Elisabeth Goethe. He was educated at home by his lawyer father before attending the University of Leipzig to study law in 1765. Goethe acknowledges his parents' influence in his autobiography, indicating that from his father he inherited his stature and the serious conduct of his life, and from his "dear mother" he acquired the gaiety of spirit and his love of storytelling.

As a student in Leipzig, a leading cultural center of eighteenth century Europe, Goethe developed an interest in literature and art and became acquainted with the dramatic works of contemporary Romantic poet Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock and literary critic Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. Their influence and Goethe's affection for Anna Katharina Schönlkopf, daughter of a Leipzig tavern owner, are reflected in his early poetry and dramatic works, especially in the one-act comedy in verse Die Laune des Verliebten (wr. 1767, pr. 1779, pb. 1806; The Wayward Lover, 1879). Illness caused Goethe to return to Frankfurt in 1768. During his convalescence, he studied religious mysticism, astrology, and alchemy. His familiarity in these areas becomes evident in his best-known work,

Faust: Eine Tragödie (pb. 1808, pr. 1829; The Tragedy of Faust, 1823).

Goethe received his law degree in 1771 from the University of Strasbourg and returned to Frankfurt to practice law with his father for four years. In Strasbourg, Goethe made the acquaintance of the German philosopher and literary critic Johann Gottfried Herder, a leader in the German Romantic movement known as Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress). Herder introduced Goethe to the works of William Shakespeare, and consequently, Goethe patterned his first dramatic tragedy on Shakespeare's dramatic style. He received his first literary acclaim with Götz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand (pb. 1773, pr. 1774; Goetz of Berlichingen, with the Iron Hand, 1799), the fictionalized story of a German knight whose exploits stimulated a national German revolt against the authority of the emperor and the church early in the sixteenth century.

In 1774, Goethe's reputation as an author of international fame was established with the sensational success of Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (1774; The Sorrows of Young Werther, 1779), a sentimental and psychological novel in letter form, inspired by his infatuation with Charlotte ("Lotte") Buff, the fiancé of his friend G. C. Kestner.

Goethe's influence as a writer spread throughout Germany and was enhanced by his association with Duke Karl August, who invited him to live and work at the ducal court in Saxe-Weimar. Goethe moved to Weimar in 1775 and, except for a two-year sojourn to Italy, lived in Weimar until his death in 1832. At the court of Karl August, Goethe assumed a wide variety of governmental duties. He became a member of and, later, head of the duke's cabinet. As a minister of the state, he managed state finances, military recruiting, and social activities. He also pursued his personal interest in science, spending years studying horticulture, geology, botany, and biology.

The governmental duties that Goethe had accepted consumed much of his time in the first ten years at Weimar and significantly limited his literary activities. Except for some notable poems, such as the lyric "Wanderer's Nachtlied" ("Wanderer's Night Song"), and the ballad "Erkönig" ("The Erlking"), he wrote little during the period between 1775 and 1785. At this time, his primary intellectual stimulation came from correspondence with Charlotte von Stein, the wife of a Weimar official. Stein, a woman of refined literary taste and culture, was seven years his senior and the mother of seven children. She dominated Goethe's intellectual and romantic interests for twelve years, until his journey to Italy in 1786. He remained there until 1788.

In Italy, Goethe found new vitality. He had become weary of life at the Weimar court and of his relationship with Charlotte von Stein. His study of ancient Greek and Roman literature, art, and architecture and its influence on the Renaissance provided him with new inspiration. The products of his Italian stay include the classical dramas Iphigenie auf Tauris (first version pr. 1779, pb. 1854, second version pb. 1787, pr. 1800; Iphigenia in Tauris, 1793) and Torquato Tasso (pb. 1790, pr. 1807; English translation, 1827). These works introduced the classical period in German literature with their focus on ideas and form.

Goethe's return to Weimar proved difficult and disappointing. His new literary principles met with considerable opposition, and his decision to live with young Christiane Vulpius offended court circles and aroused the enmity of Charlotte von Stein. Christiane gave birth to his son in 1789; to legitimize the child, Goethe married Christiane in 1806. For some time, Goethe reabsorbed himself in his scientific interests, publishing Beyträge zur Optik (1791, 1792) and Zur Farbenlehre (1810; Theory of Colors, 1840). Goethe also spent much of his time in nearby Jena, where he met Friedrich Schiller, a German poet, dramatist, philosopher, and historian.

Beginning in 1794, a close friendship developed between Goethe and Schiller that proved inspiring to both men. Their intellectual partnership caused them to be viewed, then and now, as the two leading figures in German literature. The friendship, with its stimulating daily discussions and collaborations on various projects, proved rehabilitating to Goethe's literary interests. When Schiller died in 1805, Goethe buried his grief in an intense study of Oriental literature, drawing parallels between his personal experiences and elements of Oriental culture. His study culminated in a collection of love poems, rich in Oriental imagery, published under the title Westöstlicher Divan (1819, West-Eastern Divan, 1877).

Goethe remained productive until his death in Weimar on March 22, 1832. His writings in the period between 1805 and 1832 include the novel Die Wahlverwandtschaften (1809; Elective Affinities, 1849); a fictionalized account of his Italian journey, Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (1795-1796; Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, 1825); his multivolume autobiography Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit (1811-1814; The Autobiography of Goethe, 1824; better known as Poetry and Truth from My Own Life); and the second part of his most famous dramatic poem, Faust, published posthumously in 1833 (pr. 1854; The Tragedy of Faust, Part Two, 1838).

ANALYSIS

Goethe is recognized as one of the greatest and most versatile European writers and thinkers of modern times. He profoundly influenced the growth of German Romanticism. His first novel, The Sorrows of Young Werther, was one of the literary sensations of the eighteenth century. A psychological unfolding in letter form, it brings new focus to the epistolary novel. With Elective Affinities, Goethe created a new type of fiction. Instead of concentrating on one individual character, Goethe builds this novel around social concerns, the complications of human relationships, and divorce.

Many of Goethe's works are autobiographical. The tone of the first volume of his autobiography sets a new standard for autobiographical writings.

Because Goethe defines his own writings as fragments of a grand confession, it is important to study his life in order to understand his work. That is especially true of his poetry, which is characteristically extremely personal and private. With his autobiographical writings, Goethe himself makes the most important contributions to the understanding of his own literature.

The lyrical poetry of his early days brought Goethe into the foreground of the German literary arena. Collecting folk songs with his friend Johann Gottfried Herder inspired him to write numerous poems in the folk-song style. Some of these became popular favorites among the German people, such as “Heidenröslein” (“Little Rose of the Heath”) and “The Erlking.” In both poems, Goethe explores the themes of love, alienation, and death. In “Little Rose of the Heath,” the love is that of a young man, and in “The Erlking,” it is the love of a father for a young child. Both poems are reflective of the passions of Goethe’s Storm and Stress period, during which the focus was on depth of emotions and on the individual.

While Goethe’s initial fame comes from his lyric poetry, it is his dramatic poem Faust that is considered the crowning achievement of his long life and one of the masterpieces of world literature. In style, theme, and point of view, it delineates Goethe’s impressive range of development from the early, rebellious Storm and Stress days to the calm classicism and realistic vision of his later years. The themes of the individual’s right to negotiate his own destiny, to strive for knowledge and power, and to cross the threshold into the supernatural all contribute to making Faust a landmark as the first major work in the spirit of modern individualism.

FAUST

First produced: Faust: Eine Tragödie, part 1, 1829 (first published, 1808; English translation, 1823); Faust: Eine Tragödie, zweiter Teil, part 2, 1854 (first published, 1833; English translation, 1838)

Type of work: Play

A medieval scholar turns to supernatural forces in his quest for knowledge and sells his soul to the Devil.

Goethe began his most famous work, Faust, while he was in his twenties. He published the first part of Faust in 1808 and completed the second part two months before his death. The Faust story is based on the legend of the Renaissance scholar Dr. Faustus, who quested after universal knowledge by means of alchemy and magic. The real Johannes Faustus lived from 1480 to 1540. His legendary adventures became the subject for innumerable puppet shows and popular folk dramas throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in Germany. Thus, Goethe was familiar with the Faust myth since childhood, and from the time that he was twenty, until he died at eighty-two, the theme never left his imagination.

The theme of Goethe’s Faust befits both the Romantic fascination with the supernatural and the themes of justice and good and evil, which have occupied literature since biblical times. Goethe takes the theme of good and evil beyond the traditional Christian concept embodied in God and the Devil. Influenced by the study of Oriental literature, Goethe sees the world as a totality composed of opposing forces: light and dark, good and evil, male and female, yin and yang, physical and spiritual, natural and supernatural. God and the Devil (whom Goethe calls Mephistopheles, which means “without light”) are representative of these opposing forces on a larger, as well as a smaller, scale: within the macrocosm (the universe) and the microcosm (humanity). There exists on all levels a constant struggle between the opposing forces, with each side striving to overcome the other. It is this striving that is key to the understanding of Goethe’s work. The redeeming factor of Faust is that he continues to strive. To Goethe, the ideal man, the Faustian man, never gives up striving.

The story of the Faust drama (sometimes referred to as the Gretchen tragedy) begins in Heaven. In “The Prologue in Heaven”—a modern enactment of the Job story—the Devil, Mephistopheles, complains that God’s creation, man, is so pitiful and corrupt that it is no more fun to torture him. God asks Mephistopheles if he knows the good man Faust. The Devil laughs and offers God a bet: “What do you wager? You will lose him yet.” God accepts Mephistopheles’ bet for Faust’s soul and points out that as long as man strives, he will make mistakes, but that he is basically good.

Despite Mephistopheles’ gleefully wicked intent to make Faust “eat dust” like his cousin the Snake, God tells Mephistopheles that He never hated him or those like him, but instead, he considers him necessary to provoke humankind to action. These lines embody the key to understanding the theme of the Faust story and the Faustian striving:

I have never hated the likes of you.
Of all the spirits of denial
The joker is the last that I eschew.
Man finds relaxation too attractive—
Too fond too soon of unconditional rest;
Which is why I am pleased to give him a companion
Who lures and thrusts and must, as devil, be active.

Goethe depicts the Devil not as the customary embodiment of fear-filled threat and wickedness but rather as a jovial but serious mischief maker. When the curtain closes after the prologue and Mephistopheles is left alone on stage, he humorously observes that God is not all that bad, saying, “I like to see the Old One now and then.”

The first part of the tragedy begins with Faust alone in his study. Dr. Faust is a professor, doctor, lawyer, and theologian. He has studied all that there is to study but bemoans the fact that he still knows nothing. He teaches, but he feels that he is merely leading his students by the nose, since they could read for themselves and know all that he knows. He would like to be able to teach something that would improve humankind.

There is one subject, though, of which Faust knows virtually nothing: the world of the spirits. He opens a book on mystic art by Nostradamus and sees the sign of the Macrocosm and then of the Earth Spirit. Inspired to venture into this mystic world, he calls forth the Earth Spirit. In a flash of red flame, the Spirit appears before him, then vanishes, as Faust is unable to detain it. Feeling dejected, Faust decides that there is only one way to experience the world of the spirits, and that is to go through the door to death. He considers crossing that threshold and reaches for a vial of poison. As he lifts the poison to his lips, Faust hears the church bells outside ringing on Easter morning (symbolic, of course, of rebirth). He puts the poison down, decides to delay his quest for now, and takes a walk in the village with Wagner, his student.

A black poodle joins Faust and Wagner on their walk and follows Faust back to his study. The poodle fidgets nervously as Faust reaches for the Bible and begins to read: “In the Beginning was the Word.” Faust ponders the biblical text, then writes what he considers to be a correction: “In the beginning was the Deed.” The squirming poodle distracts Faust. Then Faust realizes that this dog is not an ordinary one. Suddenly, mist fills the small room, and from behind the stove, Mephistopheles steps forward, dressed like a traveling scholar.

When Faust asks the name of his guest, Mephistopheles identifies himself as the dark side of Totality, the evil side of good, the power that negates, but in negating creates “A part of that Power/ Which always wills evil, always procures good . . . I am a part of the Part which in the beginning was all/ A part of the darkness which gave birth to light.” The image of Mephistopheles as a part of the Greater Whole, as that force that destroys (negates), but in destroying the old creates the new, is essential to the theme of the play. Believing that he can still Faust’s unrest and continuous striving, Mephistopheles challenges Faust to a wager. He agrees to be Faust’s servant and to do or show him anything that he wants. If Faust ever says that he is totally satisfied, that the moment is so perfect that he wants it to last forever, then he will die and Mephistopheles will possess his soul.

The Devil and Faust sign their bet in blood. Before they begin their quest, Mephistopheles takes Faust to the Witch's Kitchen for a youth potion. The witch, startled to find two traveling scholars in her kitchen, does not recognize the Devil. He chastises her and tells her that the Devil must go along with the times. The time for cloven feet, pitchforks, and traditional views of Satan is over: "Satan has long been a myth without sense or sinew. . . . They are quit of the Evil One but the evil ones remain./ You may call me Noble Baron, that should do; I am a cavalier among other cavaliers."

On leaving the Witch, Faust and Mephistopheles begin their adventures. In their sojourns, Faust falls in love with a young girl, Margaret—usually referred to as Gretchen. Gretchen is the embodiment of innocence. She falls in love with Faust but is uneasy around Mephistopheles. Since Gretchen lives with her mother, consummating their love is a problem until Mephistopheles secures a sleeping potion. Unfortunately, the sleeping potion is too strong, and Gretchen's mother dies. Gretchen's brother, Valentine, appears and challenges Faust to a duel. Faust, with Mephistopheles at his side, kills Valentine. Faust is then ushered away by Mephistopheles to a witches' celebration, the Walpurgis Night. In the meantime, Gretchen has discovered that she is pregnant. She gives birth, then kills her illegitimate child and goes to prison.

In the midst of the bizarre activities of the Walpurgis Night, Faust is distracted by a mirror image of Gretchen in jail. He confronts Mephistopheles with what he (the Devil) has done. Mephistopheles, however, reminds Faust that he is merely his servant, and that Faust, alone, is responsible for his actions. In other words, the Devil did not make him do it; he simply facilitated the act.

Faust goes to Gretchen and, with Mephistopheles' help, wants to get her out of prison. Gretchen at first rejoices at seeing Faust, but when she realizes that Mephistopheles is behind him, she turns away from Faust and bids him farewell. All she wants is to die and be punished for her sins. After Faust and Mephistopheles leave, a heavenly voice calls out that Gretchen's soul is saved, she having been an innocent victim of circumstance. Thus ends Faust, part 1.

At the beginning of Faust, part 2, Faust awakens, again on Easter morning (a new rebirth), to continue his adventures with Mephistopheles. Faust has learned that personal gratifications do not satisfy him and now sets out on an expedition to do something for humankind. He encounters a king who is out of money, and Mephistopheles suggests issuing paper money.

Faust, part 2, is considerably longer than Faust, part 1, and is usually considered too cumbersome for stage productions with its intricate network of details. A familiarization with the major themes, however, is important in understanding the Faust story in its entirety. One of the themes that occupied much of Goethe's later works is classical mythology. In the second part of the tragedy, Faust falls in love with Helen of Troy and asks Mephistopheles to conjure up the famous heroine. He marries Helen and has a son with her, whom he calls Euphorion. When Euphorion (who is thought to be a symbol for the English poet Lord Byron) is seven years of age, he tries to fly from the top of a ledge and crashes to the ground. With the death of Euphorion, Helen of Troy returns to the underworld, and Faust is left to continue his quest for satisfaction.

Goethe filled Faust, part 2, with extensive symbolism, revealing his increasing interest in the more restrained and structured classics, contrasting his earlier fascination with the Romantic extremism. The union of Faust and Helen represents the union of Romantic emotionalism and classic restraint. Their offspring is euphoria (Euphorion), but euphoria is short-lived.

Tragedy and failure do not prevent Faust from his striving. In the hope of doing something of value for humankind, he seeks to reclaim land from the sea to convert it into a public housing project. By the end of Faust, part 2, Faust is one hundred years old and blind. He hears digging outside and thinks that Mephistopheles is finally working on the housing project. Overjoyed at the thought that finally something will be done for humankind, Faust makes his way outside to let Mephistopheles know that this moment is the one for which he has been waiting. He dies reflecting that he has never found a moment so beautiful, so pleasant, that he wanted it to linger. The digging sound that Faust heard was Mephistopheles preparing Faust's grave. In the final scene of part 2, the soul of Faust is carried to Heaven, saved because the moment that he had found most beautiful was a moment that he thought would benefit humankind.

In contrast to the traditional Christian concept of good and evil, Goethe depicts the two forces not as mutually exclusive but as part of the greater Totality, as intricate parts of the Whole, of which all are a part. In portraying the opposing forces as existing in the macrocosm (the universe) and the microcosm (humankind), Goethe indicates that both forces exist on every level, that all humankind has an inherent goodness that is sometimes challenged by inherent badness.

Goethe's perspective is directly influenced by Oriental thought. Western interest in Oriental literature began to spread in Europe at the end of the eighteenth century with the Romantic fascination for the exotic and reached a high point during the nineteenth century.

THE SORROWS OF YOUNG WERTHER

First published: Die Leiden des jungen Werthers, 1774 (English translation, 1779)

Type of work: Novel

An artistic and intellectual young man, tormented by hopeless love for a young married woman, ends his anguish with a gunshot to his head.

The first great popular success of Goethe's career was The Sorrows of Young Werther. It is a sentimental and psychological novel in letter form, influenced by Samuel Richardson, an eighteenth century English novelist famous for his epistolary novels. The letter-writing style is a natural genre for Goethe, whose writings are filled with biographical and autobiographical elements.

The character, Lotte, to whom the protagonist, Werther, is irrevocably drawn was inspired by Goethe's unhappy infatuation with Charlotte ("Lotte") Buff, the fiancé of his friend G. C. Kestner. Goethe met Lotte during his summer stay in Wetzlar in 1772. The end of the novel, with Werther pulling the trigger of the gun pointed at his head, was most probably prompted by the tragic fate of Karl Wilhelm Jerusalem, secretary of the Brunswick ambassador, who committed suicide in October, 1772, after a public reprimand and the subsequent ostracism from aristocratic circles for his infatuation with the wife of a colleague.

In the letters to his friend, Goethe's character, Werther, describes the joy and agony of his love for Lotte. She also feels the attraction but is betrothed to Albert, whom she subsequently marries. Werther befriends Lotte's husband but is convinced that Albert's love for Lotte is not as deep as his own. After a passionate embrace with his beloved, the chaos and excruciating turmoil in his heart become unbearable for Werther. He asks Lotte to let him borrow Albert's pistols for safety on a journey that he never takes. Instead, in an ironic twist, the weapons of protection provide Werther with the means to end his suffering.

Goethe's sentimental novel stands for more than the fate of Werther. It becomes the creed of a whole generation protesting the oversimplified and optimistic rationalism of the Enlightenment, with its emphasis on reason and its disregard for emotions. The Sorrows of Young Werther met with enthusiastic response from its readers and was soon translated into most of the European languages.

Its popularity produced a kind of Werther fever, with imitations of Werther behavior, which unfortunately led to a series of suicides. For a brief time, the publication of the novel was stopped and its sale banned. The reverberations of the effect of The Sorrows of Young Werther reached into the twentieth century, with psychologists referring to a rash of suicides among young people as the "Werther syndrome." The popularity of this novel testifies to Goethe's success in directing into a single channel the many currents of sentimentalism that were so prevalent during the German Romantic period.

“THE ERLKING”

First published: “Erlkönig,” 1782 (collected in Selected Poetry: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, 2005)

Type of work: Poem

A father on horseback, clutching tightly his feverish and hallucinating child, rushes in vain to get his son home before he dies.

The theme, setting, and mood of Goethe’s “The Erlking” capture the spirit of the Romantic period of the late eighteenth century. Characteristics of Romanticism include a love for nature, a fascination with the supernatural, and the recurring themes of love and death, all of which are contained in Goethe’s poem.

“The Erlking” begins with a narrator describing a father’s frantic ride home on horseback, through the woods, holding tightly his feverish child. The child begins to hallucinate and tells his father that he sees the Erlking:

“O father, see yonder!” he says;
“My boy, on what do you so fearfully gaze?”
“O, ’tis the Er’king with his crown and shroud.”
“No, my son, it is but a dark wreath of cloud.”

The father’s rational explanation of what his son sees remains unheeded. The feverish child describes the luring of the Erlking, who invites him to come with him, promising toys and playmates. The fearful child hesitates, but the Erlking persists and finally takes him by force. At the end of the poem, the father arrives home with his son dead in his arms.

The Erlking symbolizes death, which is to the Romantic a source not only of fear but also of attraction to the unknown and the supernatural. Goethe’s poem embodies the universal theme of the loss of innocence. In this perspective, the Erlking becomes the monstrous maturity, which lures youth but destroys its innocence. The fatalistic tone of the poem suggests that innocence inevitably succumbs to, and is destroyed by, the socialization of adulthood.

Goethe’s poem reflects the Romantics’ view of society as the culprit in the destruction of innocence. They believed in the natural goodness of humankind and emphasized the expression of feelings, which they considered more important than intellect. In eighteenth century Germany, emotionalism burst forth in violent form in the Storm and Stress literary movement, of which Goethe was an integral part.

“WANDERER’S NIGHT SONG”

First published: “Wanderers Nachtlied,” 1776 (collected in Selected Poetry: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, 2005)

Type of work: Poem

Addressed to the creator, the poem is an appeal for freedom from the torment of the soul and the bustle of life.

“Wanderer’s Night Song” is representative of the poems written by the young Goethe at the height of his Storm and Stress years. It is indicative of his love of nature and his view of nature as the creator of all things. “Wanderer’s Night Song” exemplifies Goethe’s pantheistic ideas and sentiments, which he developed out of his study of the seventeenth century Dutch philosopher Baruch Spinoza and the eighteenth century French philosopher Jean-Jacques Rousseau. The poem is an appeal to nature to allow the sweet freedom (symbolic of death) to enter the chest, suggesting the stopping of the heartbeat. This poem, like “The Erlking” and The Sorrows of Young Werther, yearns for freedom from emotional agonies, a freedom attainable only by crossing the final threshold of physical existence.

SUMMARY

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, as a poet, dramatist, and novelist, made a major contribution to world literature. His themes of individuality and social concerns reflect a profound understanding of human interrelationships. With his lyric poetry, his novels and dramas, and his vast correspondence with his contemporaries, Goethe influenced writers and thinkers of his own time and helped shape the literary movements of the nineteenth century. Goethe is widely considered to be one of the most versatile and prolific figures in all world literature.

Elisabeth Stein

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Neue Lieder, 1770 (New Poems, 1853)
Sesenheimer Liederbuch, 1775-1789, 1854 (Sesenheim Songs, 1853)
Römische Elegien, 1793 (Roman Elegies, 1876)
Reinecke Fuchs, 1794 (Reynard the Fox, 1855)
Xenien, 1796 (with Friedrich Schiller; Epigrams, 1853)
Epigramme: Venedig 1790, 1796 (Venetian Epigrams, 1853)
Hermann und Dorothea, 1797 (Herman and Dorothea, 1801)
Balladen, 1798 (with Schiller; Ballads, 1853)
Neueste Gedichte, 1800 (Newest Poems, 1853)
Gedichte, 1812-1815 (2 volumes; The Poems of Goethe, 1853)
Westöstlicher Divan, 1819 (West-Eastern Divan, 1877)
Sonette, 1819 (Sonnets, 1853)

DRAMA:

Die Laune des Verliebten, wr. 1767, pr. 1779, pb. 1806 (The Wayward Lover, 1879)
Die Mitschuldigen, first version wr. 1768, pr. 1780, pb. 1787, second version wr. 1769 (The Fellow-Culprits, 1879)
Goetz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand, pb. 1773, pr. 1774 (Goetz of Berlichingen, with the Iron Hand, 1799)
Clavigo, pr., pb. 1774 (English translation, 1798, 1897)
Götter; Helden und Wieland, pb. 1774
Erwin und Elmire, pr., pb. 1775 (libretto; music by Duchess Anna Amalia of Saxe-Weimar)
Stella, first version pr., pb. 1776, second version pr. 1806, pb. 1816 (English translation, 1798)
Die Geschwister, pr. 1776, pb. 1778
Claudine von Villa Bella, first version pb. 1776, pr. 1779, second version pb. 1788, pr. 1789 (libretto)
Iphigenie auf Tauris, first version pr. 1779, pb. 1854, second version pb. 1787, pr. 1800 (Iphigenia in Tauris, 1793)
Jery und Bätely, pr. 1780, pb. 1790 (libretto)
Die Fischerin, pr., pb. 1782 (libretto; music by Corona Schröter; The Fisherwoman, 1899)
Scherz, List und Rache, pr. 1784, pb. 1790 (libretto)
Der Triumph der Empfindsamkeit, pb. 1787
Egmont, pb. 1788, pr. 1789 (English translation, 1837)
Faust: Ein Fragment, pb. 1790 (Faust: A Fragment, 1980)
Torquato Tasso, pb. 1790, pr. 1807 (English translation, 1827)
Der Gross-Cophtha, pr., pb. 1792
Der Bürgergeneral, pr., pb. 1793
Was wir bringen, pr., pb. 1802
Die natürliche Tochter, pr. 1803 (The Natural Daughter, 1885)
Faust: Eine Tragödie, pb. 1808, pr. 1829 (The Tragedy of Faust, 1823)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Johann Wolfgang von Goethe is often considered the earliest of the great authors of the Romantic movement. Which Romantic traits are most important in The Sorrows of Young Werther?
- What is the Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress) movement? What does Goethe contribute to it?
- Is the morality of Faust heretical by the religious standards of Goethe's society?
- Consider the union of Faust and Helen of Troy as a unification of classical and Romantic values. How can emotionalism and classic restraint be combined?
- Offer arguments that Faust conveys a more hopeful or a more skeptical outlook.
- Goethe studied a number of sciences. Do they influence his literary works in any significant way?

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe

Pandora, pb. 1808

Die Wette, wr. 1812, pb. 1837

Des Epimenides Erwachen, pb. 1814, pr. 1815

Faust: Eine Tragödie, zweiter Teil, pb. 1833, pr. 1854 (The Tragedy of Faust, Part Two, 1838)

LONG FICTION:

Die Leiden des jungen Werthers, 1774 (The Sorrows of Young Werther, 1779)

Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre, 1795-1796 (4 volumes; Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, 1825)

Die Wahlverwandtschaften, 1809 (Elective Affinities, 1849)

Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre: Oder, Die Entsagenden, 1821, 1829 (2 volumes; Wilhelm Meister's Travels, 1827)

SHORT FICTION:

Unterhaltungen deutscher Ausgewanderten, 1795 (Conversations of German Emigrants, 1854)

Novelle, 1826 (Novel, 1837)

NONFICTION:

Von deutscher Baukunst, 1773 (On German Architecture, 1921)

Versuch die Metamorphose der Pflanzen zu erklären, 1790 (Essays on the Metamorphosis of Plants, 1863)

Beyträge zur Optik, 1791, 1792 (2 volumes)

Winckelmann und sein Jahrhundert, 1805

Zur Farbenlehre, 1810 (Theory of Colors, 1840)

Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit, 1811-1814 (The Autobiography of Goethe, 1824; better known as Poetry and Truth from My Own Life)

Italianische Reise, 1816, 1817 (2 volumes; Travels in Italy, 1883)

Zur Naturwissenschaft überhaupt, besonders zur Morphologie, 1817, 1824 (2 volumes)

Campagne in Frankreich, 1792, 1822 (Campaign in France in the Year 1792, 1849)

Die Belagerung von Mainz, 1793, 1822 (The Siege of Mainz in the Year 1793, 1849)

Essays on Art, 1845

Goethe's Literary Essays, 1921

Goethe on Art, 1980

MISCELLANEOUS:

Works, 1848-1890 (14 volumes)

Goethes Werke, 1887-1919 (133 volumes)

About the Author

Bennett, Benjamin. Goethe's Theory of Poetry. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1986.

Bloom, Harold, ed. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.

Brown, Jane. Goethe's "Faust": The German Tragedy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1986.

Dye, Ellis. Love and Death in Goethe: One and Double. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2004.

Fiedler, Hermann G. Textual Studies of Goethe's "Faust." Oxford, England: Basil Blackwell, 1946.

Lange, Victor, ed. Goethe: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1968.

Robertson, John G. The Life and Work of Goethe, 1749-1832. 1932. Reprint. Freeport, N.Y.: Books for Libraries, 1971.

Rowland, Herbert, ed. Goethe, Chaos, and Complexity. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2001.

Swales, Martin, and Erika Swales. Reading Goethe: A Critical Introduction to the Literary Work. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2002.

Library of Congress

NIKOLAI GOGOL

Born: Sorochintsy, Ukraine, Russia (now in Ukraine)
March 31, 1809

Died: Moscow, Russia
March 4, 1852

Russia's greatest writer of serious comedy, Gogol penned novels, short stories, and dramas that add human pathos to hilarity and stretch portrayals of reality from the ordinary to the eccentric and the grotesque. His work profoundly influenced future literary pieces of psychological focus or of the absurd.

BIOGRAPHY

Nikolai Vasilyevich Gogol (GAW-guhl) was born in the village of Sorochintsy, near the town of Dikanka in Ukraine, then a part of the Russian empire, on March 31, 1809. Gogol was the first surviving child of Vasily Afanasievich Gogol-Yanovsky, a landowner of dubious claim to Polish nobility who owned 150 to 200 serfs and was given to arranging plays and pageants for the amusement of the local gentry, and Maria Ivanovna Kosiarovsky, the niece of the wealthy local patriarch, Dmitri Prokofeyevich Troschinsky. At the time that her marriage was arranged, Maria was barely fourteen years old. She was herself a child in a household that she was expected to fill with other children. Maria was an extremely doting mother whose children, especially her oldest son, Nikolai, could do no wrong. She was given to fantasy and, when extolling her children, did not let truth or reality interpose. Later, after Gogol's death, she gave interviews in which she claimed that her son had invented the steam engine and designed the network of railroads then spreading across the country.

Gogol began his education in the district school at Poltava. He was enrolled there in the same class with Ivan, his younger brother and closest companion. Ivan's sudden death during the summer vacation of 1819 had a lasting impact on Gogol. He was a lifelong hypochondriac who lived in particular fear of death's caprice. He later told acquaintances that his continual seeking of medical treatment was attributable to distress caused by his stomach being in an upside-down position. Troschinsky agreed to pay for his transfer to the boarding school in Nezhin, which he attended from 1821 to 1828. While there, he participated with a number of future literary contributors in school dramas. His schoolmates called him the "mysterious dwarf" because of his aloofness and his physical appearance and posture. It was in the school at Nezhin that Gogol began to write literary works of his own and to plan his move to the capital of St. Petersburg, where he was sure that a bright career awaited him.

At the end of 1828, Gogol is supposed to have sought out Alexander Pushkin, the reigning literary star in St. Petersburg, for sponsorship and advice. He was rebuffed, the story goes, by Pushkin's butler, who refused to awaken the great poet after a night of gambling. Gogol then began a series of minor civil posts, received through the importuned influence of Troschinsky. His attempt to self-publish his schoolboy poem, Hanz Kuechelgarten, under the pseudonym V. Alov, was an embarrassing disaster for him, and he fled for six weeks to Germany, offering such fanciful excuses by letter to his mother that she erroneously concluded that he had contracted a venereal disease. He returned to St. Petersburg and persisted in his writing, changing his emphasis to prose works of Ukrainian life and superstitions. With the circulation of these works under the name Nikolai Gogol, he soon won the sponsorship of Pushkin and of Vasily Zhukovsky, the poet and translator.

In the 1830's, Gogol was given the care of two of his sisters, who had come to St. Petersburg to find suitable husbands. This responsibility necessitated his working as a tutor and teacher. At first, upon Zhukovsky's recommendation, he taught history at a young women's finishing school, the Patriotic Institute, but he complained to acquaintances that it vexed him to bestow his insights on such "puny intellects" as his students there possessed. Women, apart from his mother and sisters, were always beneath his concern. He never had, or sought, romantic involvement with any woman. Indeed, current scholars debate the evidence for his struggle with a latent homosexuality. His effusive and often saccharine letters to male acquaintances seem to support the contention that the objects of his romantic feelings were male.

As Gogol's first collection of stories, Vechera na khutore bliz Dikanki (1831, 1832; Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka, 1926), gained popularity, he was struggling through a professorship in world history at St. Petersburg University, a position for which he had no appropriate credentials or erudition. The publication of his Arabeski (1835; Arabesques, 1982), a miscellany of lectures, essays, and stories; of his Mirgorod (1835; English translation, 1928), a collection of four stories; and of his fantastic short story "Nos" ("The Nose") gave him financial independence at last, and he was able to cease his labors in academia. Pushkin had given him the idea for a play about a man who is mistaken by provincial officials for a visiting government inspector general, but the staging and reception of Revizor (pr., pb. 1836; The Inspector General, 1890) so upset Gogol that he left St. Petersburg for Europe, returning only twice for visits in the next twelve years.

It was also Pushkin who gave Gogol the core idea of his great novel Myortvye dushi (1842, 1855; Dead Souls, 1887). The basic idea of this work was that a swindler might make money by buying the legal titles to deceased serfs, or "souls," whose names were still listed on the decennial census rolls. Gogol's subsequent characterization of the real "dead souls," who were the dead serfs' greedy or oblivious owners, was acclaimed by the seminal socialist literary critic Vissarion Belinsky as Russia's most accomplished literary indictment of the institution of serfdom. Belinsky hailed Gogol as an abolitionist and a social critic of the first magnitude and urged him to continue his literary endeavors in this vein. However, Belinsky was misinterpreting Gogol's motivation in writing Dead Souls. Gogol was not primarily a socially conscious writer, though he came to think that he should be, trying to meet the expectations of Belinsky and others of his time.

In 1842, Gogol's short story "Shinel" ("The Overcoat") was published. The pitiful protagonist of this work, Akaky Akakievich, whose demise was occasioned by his attempt to procure a new overcoat, became the epitome of the "little man" theme in the "laughter through tears" point of view. Gogol's portrayal sprang from his own deep feelings of human inadequacy and from his religious conception of divine retribution for wrongs done. Once again, however, the social critics misinterpreted him and proclaimed his work as an example of literature with a sociopolitical message. They clamored for him to complete the second part of Dead Souls, expecting to obtain therein his guidance in the social and political concerns of the day.

After 1842, Gogol struggled more and more with the loss of his inspiration. The social and political expectations that his previous works had elicited from others were not in accord with his own growing religious mysticism. The act of literary creation became ever more difficult for him. He traveled from place to place, at last sending in his Vybrannye mesta iz perepiski s druz'yami (1847; Selected Passages from Correspondence with Friends, 1969) for publication in Moscow. The critics were mystified by this intensely personal call for the spiritual regeneration of Russia along religious lines. Belinsky was incensed and wrote a famous open letter to Gogol in which he expressed his sense of disappointment and betrayal. As a result, Gogol felt even more estranged from his beloved country and its problems. His efforts to complete the second part of Dead Souls, the work that he felt might ransom him with his readership, became even more belabored.

In the spring of 1848, Gogol traveled to Jerusalem, hoping to find spiritual peace. He returned to Moscow still without hope, but he was impressed with the spiritual guidance that he was offered by Father Matthew Konstantinovsky, former archbishop of Rzhev, who had taken to giving his guidance in Moscow to the nobles gathered for that purpose by Count Alexander Tolstoy, a former diplomat and very conservative religious scholar. Konstantinovsky advised Gogol to renounce literary pursuits altogether in the interest of saving his soul. This advice only tormented Gogol's soul further, since literary pursuits were tantamount to living and breathing for him. He therefore decided to travel again, to Odessa, to see his mother in Sorochintsy, and to various monasteries, but finally he returned to Moscow in early 1852.

On the last day of January, 1852, Gogol was staying at the Moscow home of Count Tolstoy. Gogol was deeply under the influence of Konstantinovsky, who was berating him for his continued attempts to find salvation in "pagan" literature. Gogol woke a servant boy in the middle of the night to aid him in burning his manuscripts for the second part of Dead Souls in the household furnace. The boy pleaded with Gogol to stop, but Gogol continued until the work of his past decade of life was destroyed. Only a few days afterward, he summoned the doctors to bleed him with leeches to correct stomach pangs that were the result of his fasting. The loss of blood in his weakened condition caused his death in Moscow on March 4, 1852. All the leading intellectuals of Moscow society attended his funeral. His gravestone in the cemetery of St. Daniel's Monastery is inscribed with the words that he chose from the book of Jeremiah: "For they will laugh at my bitter words."

ANALYSIS

Early in his literary career, Gogol strove to entertain his more cosmopolitan Russian readers with tales of Ukrainian folk customs and superstitions. Supernatural tales were very popular at that time, and the main literary method was to structure a story in such a way that the events related could be attributed either to natural or to supernatural causes. The tension between the two possibilities of interpretation was a key aspect of the narration. Occurrences of spontaneous human combustion, as Gogol relates in "Vecher nakanune Ivana Kupala" ("St. John's Eve"), from Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka, and in "Viy," from Mirgorod, and again later in Dead Souls, can be seen either as evidence of unknown natural processes or as divine intercession in human events.

As Gogol's career matured, he began to deviate from the prevailing modes of prose narration, both in theme and in method. Indeed, his innovations in these areas defined his greatness as a writer. Taras Bulba (1835, 1842; English translation, 1886) was a harbinger of thematic innovation, with its treatment of a father's killing of his own son for reasons of obsessive pride. This story also shows the transcendence of the narration itself over its relation to reality, a later Gogol hallmark. That is, the time frame of Taras Bulba is hard to define, and the specific ethnic conflicts among Cossacks and Turks and Poles are only vaguely explored, if at all. The time line of the narrative misses subtleties of season or of reasonable travel time between the cities depicted, yet the reader is swept into the relationships of the characters and into their actions by the power of Gogol's narration. By the time of his Arabesques collection, Gogol had essentially abandoned the tales of Ukrainian life and was writing stories that were intended not only to entertain and amuse but also to edify and mystify. The struggle between good and evil and its consequences for ordinary people gained primacy in Gogol's characterizations.

Long a part of Slavic narrative technique is the "telling of what is not." Gogol elevated this technique to literary use and availed himself of it on a multitude of levels. He deliberately sought to bring to the reader's attention details that other writers would not consider worth mentioning—descriptions of meals eaten, street signs passed, dogs encountered. In Dead Souls, Gogol justifies his fixation on detail by writing that "microscopes, revealing the movements of unseen creatures, are just as wonderful as telescopes, which give us a new view of the sun." The reader is deluged with what is not of significance to the main plot, as well as with what is. Digression follows digression until the point is almost, but not quite, lost. Characters are created and explored and then suddenly dropped.

In Gogol's earlier work, his satire is largely devoid of sympathy for its human objects. The epigraph to his play The Inspector General quotes a Russian popular saying, "If your face is skew don't blame the mirror." In his later "Confession by an Author," Gogol writes that he "resolved in The Inspector General to pile all the rubbish of Russia together . . . and laugh at the whole lot." Provincial officials are parodied as petty, corrupt, venal, and downright foolish in their attempts to find favor in the eyes of Khlestakov, a St. Petersburg clerk whom they mistakenly believe is a government inspector general. Khlestakov soon assumes the pose with relish but is revealed as a fraud when the local postmaster reads his letter to a friend in which, to their horror, the parodied provincial officials are ridiculed.

As Gogol matured as a writer, he developed more sympathy for his objects of ridicule, obviously identifying with them personally as a human being caught in the clash of forces, both social and spiritual, beyond human control. In “The Overcoat,” the reader can feel Gogol’s sympathy for the tormented Akaky Akakievich, the office copy clerk who is the butt of his coworkers’ pranks. Gogol gives Akaky a supernatural revenge for the cruelty and the slights. In Dead Souls, Gogol summarized his relationship with his characters in this way: “Supernatural powers have ordained that I should walk hand in hand with my odd heroes, observing the life that flows majestically past me, conveying it through laughter, which the world can hear, while seeing it myself through tears it never suspects.” This “laughter through tears” is the most lasting literary legacy of Nikolai Gogol.

“THE DIARY OF A MADMAN”

First published: “Zapiski sumasshedshego,” 1835 (collected in Arabesques, 1982)

Type of work: Short story (in diary form)

The reader witnesses the progression of a man’s insanity in twenty entries from his diary.

In “The Diary of a Madman,” the eccentric clerk Poprishchin is infatuated with the daughter of his office director. He records in his diary that he has intercepted a letter from her dog to another dog. The contents eventually lead him to conclude that “women are in love with the Devil,” a fact that only he has discovered. Soon, he ceases going to work, where his main task is to sharpen the director’s quills, because he has become the king of Spain, although “Spain and China are one and the same country.” The flimsy moon, he relates, is inhabited by people’s noses, and that is why they cannot see them on their own faces.

Poprishchin (whose name evokes the Russian word for “pimple”) records October 3 as his first diary entry. Entries for October 4, November 6, and November 8 follow. As his insanity becomes more and more pervasive and debilitating, the entries are given dates such as “the 43rd Day of April in the year 2000” and “The 34th of yrae yraurbeF 349.” The reader begins to see shadows of reality in Poprishchin’s ramblings, as when he mentions the “Spanish court custom” requiring that his head be shaved and that water be dripped on it. In his last entry, Poprishchin longs for escape. He wants to return to his peasant home and to his mother, saying,

O mother, mother, save your unhappy son! Let a tear fall on his aching head! See how they torture him! Press the poor orphan to your bosom! He has no rest in this world; they hunt him from place to place.

Mother, mother, have pity on your sick child! And do you know that the Bey of Algiers has a wart under his nose?

“THE NOSE”

First published: “Nos,” 1836 (collected in The Complete Tales of Nikolai Gogol, 1985)

Type of work: Short story

A St. Petersburg city official awakens without a nose and takes several courses of remedial action to no effect before the nose’s mysterious return.

Much has been made of the “nose” theme in Gogol’s work “The Nose.” American writer Vladimir Nabokov, in his interpretation, rejects the Freudian view that, in Gogol’s topsy-turvy world, the nose represents a misplaced phallus, and that his literary fixation on noses, sneezes, snuff, stinks, scents, and the like evidences his own uncertain sense of sexual identity. Instead, Nabokov attributes Gogol’s “olfactivism” to a general nasal consciousness in the Russian culture that was made more acute in Gogol’s work because of the peaked prominence of his own nose. Whatever the origin, Gogol’s tale is “verily a hymn to that organ.”

St. Petersburg barber Ivan Yakovlevich awakes to find a nose baked into his breakfast bread. He recognizes the nose as that of his recent customer, Major Platon Kovalyov, a collegiate assessor in the municipal government. Harangued by his wife, he seeks to dispose of the nose by wrapping it in a cloth and throwing it into the water below the Isaac Bridge. He is observed in this act, however, by a policeman. Kovalyov awakens, looks in the mirror, and notices that his nose is missing. He is most upset about this, so he covers his face with a handkerchief and walks out onto Nevsky Prospect to seek aid. His sense of embarrassment prevents him from approaching anyone, however, and his discomfiture is greatly increased when, in front of a confectionary shop, he encounters his nose exiting a carriage. Since his nose is wearing the uniform of an official of higher rank than his, Kovalyov importunes the nose very politely to return to his face. The nose, however, is indignant and denies that there can be any close ties between them, before haughtily walking away.

Kovalyov goes to seek the aid of the chief of police, but the chief of police is not at home. Kovalyov realizes that he must act on his own to effect the return of his nose. He contemplates advertising in the newspaper for its return but rejects the idea. At this point, the policeman who had observed Yakovlevich throwing the nose off the Isaac Bridge comes to Kovalyov's house to inform him that the nose "had been arrested just as it was getting into a carriage for Riga." The nose is now returned to Kovalyov in its cloth wrapping. Kovalyov is very grateful, but he does not know how to stick the nose back onto his face. A physician whom he consults on the matter is of no help at all.

Thinking things over, Kovalyov concludes that the loss of his nose is the result of a spell put on him by his superior's wife, Madame Podtochina, whose ire he aroused when he refused to marry her daughter. He writes Madame Podtochina a letter, demanding that she restore his nose to its rightful place or face "legal procedures." Kovalyov's quandary continues until April 7, when he awakens to find his nose returned to its proper place in the middle of his face.

The notion of a nose disappearing from a man's face, assuming human size, rank, and uniform, is Gogol's way of expressing life's absurdity. The reader's sense of expected reality is violated. Is this the relation of dreams? Is it the rambling of a madman? Are there unexplained facts behind it all? What does it mean? Many authors since have included similar violations of expected reality in their literary art. Franz Kafka's Die Verwandlung (1915; The Metamorphosis, 1936), in which a man wakes up to find himself transformed into an insect, comes to mind. Gogol characterizes the entire story within the narrative as one of those "strange things" that "happen all the time." "Whatever you might say," he writes in the famous concluding sentences, "such things do happen, rarely perhaps, but they do."

"THE OVERCOAT"

First published: "Shinel," 1842 (collected in The Complete Tales of Nikolai Gogol, 1985)

Type of work: Short story

A downtrodden copy clerk saves for months to buy an overcoat, but before he can enjoy it, it is stolen, and as a result, he dies.

In many a workplace, there is one person who serves as the object of the others' cruel amusement. In "The Overcoat," that person is Akaky Akakievich Bashmachkin, a poor office worker whose very name reminds a Russian of excrement-befouled boots (from "kaka," the child's word for excrement, and "bashmak" for boot or shoe). His coworkers poke endless fun at him. They tear paper into confetti and sprinkle it over his head. Akaky protests only when the torment becomes extreme. Otherwise, he is content to work as a copy clerk, keeping his pencils sharp and copying document after document all day.

The fiercely cold St. Petersburg winter forces Akaky to consider the purchase of a new overcoat, since his old coat has worn to complete transparency and is useless. The tailor, Petrovich, suggests the possibility of owning a splendid new coat with a "catskin collar that could pass for marten." After months of the most sacrificing parsimony (so many months, in fact, that it would have been summer and the coat not needed, but Gogol's narrative logic is not fazed by this fact), Akaky saves the needed eighty rubles to buy the coat. He immediately wears it to work and basks for the first time in the admiration of his coworkers. One of them even invites Akaky to a birthday party. On the way home after the party, a group of "people with moustaches," one of whom had a "fist the size of a civil servant's head," accosts him and strips him of his new coat.

Akaky knows that seeking redress for such a crime from the police is futile. Instead, he makes an appointment to see a "very important person." This "very important person," however, sees Akaky only as someone else to intimidate. He booms out three questions at Akaky (there is much triplicity in Gogol's work): "Are you aware who you are talking to?" "Do you realize who is standing before you?" and "Do you hear me?" Akaky flees this person's office in terror, goes home coatless through the winter wind, and takes to bed with a swollen throat and a fever. In three days, he is dead. It takes another three days for his office to miss him and replace him with another copy clerk, whose letters were written "in a hand quite unlike Akaky Akakievich's upright ciphers, sloping heavily to one side."

The sad story is not ended, however, as a mysterious ghost begins to haunt St. Petersburg near the area of the department. The ghost accosts people and strips them of their coats. Indeed, the "very important person," whose conscience had begun to trouble him over his treatment of Akaky, is accosted by the ghost and has his coat stolen as well. The reader feels that, in death, Akaky is wreaking his revenge on those who slighted him in life. The coat-stealing ghost is not seen again after the robbery of the "very important person's" coat. Another ghost, though, is seen by a cowardly constable, who is taken aback by the "much taller" apparition's "enormous moustache" and a "fist such as you would see on no living man." With this baffling inclusion, Gogol ends his classic story of the "little man" and his mistreatment by society.

"The Overcoat" has been a very influential story in world literature. Many literary works that treat the problems of an individual in a callous society with some psychological depth and empathy owe a debt to Gogol. The Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoevski's famous remark that "We all came out from Gogol's Overcoat" still held true through much of the twentieth century. The "little tramp" films of the English actor Charlie Chaplin also embody Gogolesque aspects of the "little man" and the "laughter through tears" character type.

DEAD SOULS

First published: Myortvye dushi, part 1, 1842; part 2, 1855 (English translation, 1887)

Type of work: Novel

A con artist plans to purchase "dead souls," or serfs, from a number of provincial landowners who turn out to be the real "dead souls."

In Gogol's time, a Russian landowner could buy and sell serfs, or "souls," like any other property. The serfs were counted, for the purpose of tax assessment, every ten years. Thus, a landowner still had to pay taxes on the value of serfs who had died, until the next ten-year census could legally record the deaths. In Dead Souls, a prose novel subtitled A Poem, Gogol's hero, Pavel Ivanovich Chichikov, plans to buy the titles to these "dead souls" and use them as collateral to obtain a large loan. He comes to a small provincial town and begins to proposition the local landowners: the slothful Manilovs (the "kind-manners"), the slovenly Plewshkin ("Mr. Spittoon"), the coarse Sobakievich ("Mr. Dog"), the cautious Madame Korobachka ("Mrs. Box"), and the bully and cheat Nozdryov ("Mr. Nostrils"). These landowners are revealed to be so petty and avaricious that not even Chichikov's amazing offer can be worked to his advantage on them. Some stall, some refuse for no obvious reasons, some promise and then renege, and others want “in on the deal.” In the end, Chichikov, having concluded that the landowners are a hopeless lot, leaves for other regions.

Throughout Dead Souls, Gogol presents Russian life as a mosaic of strangely intersecting inanities. He makes his authorial presence felt as a first-person commentator. His commentator’s stance is curiously unresolved. Though he likens Russia to the “fastest troika imaginable . . . racing headlong . . . inspired by God,” he seems most insistent, with his wordy, tongue-in-cheek prose, in portraying the life within its borders as inalterably superficial.

SUMMARY

Nikolai Gogol was a man with more than his share of neuroses. He was confident of his narrative gift yet lived in fear that his inspiration would wane. He was misinterpreted in his lifetime, and he died in mental and spiritual frustration. However, he has given world literature some of its most laughable and yet pathetic prose. In most of his mature works, he laid bare the banality and the pettiness (signifying the manifestation of false values) underlying all human pretense. For Gogol, humor was the most effective way to call for human sincerity. Digressions were the way that he chose to address the central aspects of human life. Trivia was his path to finding what was most important.

Lee B. Croft

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Taras Bulba, 1842 (revision of his 1835 short story; English translation, 1886)
Myortvye dushi, part 1, 1842; part 2, 1855 (Dead Souls, 1887)

SHORT FICTION:

Vechera na khutore bliz Dikanki, vol. 1, 1831; vol. 2, 1832 (Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka, 1926)
Mirgorod, 1835 (English translation, 1928)
Arabeski, 1835 (Arabesques, 1982)
The Complete Tales of Nikolai Gogol, 1985 (2 volumes; Leonard J. Kent, editor)

POETRY:

Hanz Kuechelgarten, 1829

DRAMA:

Vladimir tretey stepeni, wr. 1832, pb. 1842
Zhenit'ba, wr. 1835, pr., pb. 1842 (Marriage: A Quite Incredible Incident, 1926)
Revizor, pr., pb. 1836 (The Inspector General, 1890)
Utro delovogo cheloveka, pb. 1836, pr. 1871 (revision of Vladimir tretey stepeni; An Official's Morning, 1926)
Igroki, pb. 1842, pr. 1843 (The Gamblers, 1926)
Tyazhba, pb. 1842, pr. 1844 (revision of Vladimir tretey stepeni; The Lawsuit, 1926)
Otryvok, pb. 1842, pr. 1860 (revision of Vladimir tretey stepeni; A Fragment, 1926)
Lakeyskaya, pb. 1842, pr. 1863 (revision of Vladimir tretey stepeni; The Servants' Hall, 1926)
The Government Inspector, and Other Plays, pb. 1926

NONFICTION:

Vybrannye mesta iz perepiski s druz'yami, 1847 (Selected Passages from Correspondence with Friends, 1969)
Letters of Nikolai Gogol, 1967

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Collected Works, 1922-1927 (6 volumes)

Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 1940-1952 (14 volumes)

The Collected Tales and Plays of Nikolai Gogol, 1964

About the Author

Bloom, Harold, ed. Nikolai Gogol. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.

Bojanowska, Edyta M. Nikolai Gogol: Between Ukrainian and Russian Nationalism. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2007.

Gippius, V. V. Gogol. Translated and edited by Robert A. Maguire. Reprint. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1989.

Karlinisky, Simon. The Sexual Labyrinth of Nikolai Gogol. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1976.

Kutik, Ilya. Writing as Exorcism: The Personal Codes of Pushkin, Lermontov, and Gogol. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2005.

Lindstrom, Thais S. Nikolay Gogol. New York: Twayne, 1974.

Nabokov, Vladimir. Nikolai Gogol. New York: New Directions, 1961.

Rancour-Laferriere, Daniel. Out from Under Gogol's Overcoat: A Psychoanalytic Study. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis Publishers, 1982.

Rowe, William Woodin. Through Gogol's Looking Glass: Reverse Vision, False Focus, and Precarious Logic. New York: New York University Press, 1976.

Troyat, Henri. Divided Soul: The Life of Gogol. Translated by Nancy Amphoux. New York: Minerva Press, 1975.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Some have called Nikolai Gogol “the Russian Dickens.” What resemblances do you see between Gogol and Charles Dickens?
- How does Gogol enlist sympathy for Akaky in “The Overcoat”? Is it undercut by the “supernatural revenge” at the end?
- Show how Gogol’s rather offhand remarks and comments in his fiction contribute to its humorous effect.
- What absurdist features do you find in Gogol’s writing, and can you make any comparison between them and similar effects in more recent fiction?
- Some readers who come to Gogol after reading other Russian writers, such as Fyodor Dostoevski and Leo Tolstoy, are disappointed that Gogol does not seem serious. Consider the matter of Gogol’s seriousness or lack of it.
- Argue that Gogol is or is not a champion of the underdog.

© The Nobel Foundation

WILLIAM GOLDING

Born: St. Columb Minor, Cornwall, England
September 19, 1911

Died: Perranarworthal, Cornwall, England
June 19, 1993

*Golding's novels explore the dark side of the human psyche. His Lord of the Flies became a classic fictive study in the dark side of human nature.*

BIOGRAPHY

William Gerald Golding was born on September 19, 1911, in St. Columb Minor in Cornwall, England. His father was an extremely well-educated schoolmaster, and his mother was a strong-minded suffragette. Golding grew up in the family home at Marlborough. When he left to enter Brasenose College, Oxford, he had planned to study science, but he later decided to study English literature instead. After graduating, he worked for a while in a London theater group, writing, acting, and producing. In 1939, however, he married and then followed in his father's footsteps, becoming a schoolmaster at Bishop Wordsworth's School in Salisbury. He left Bishop Wordsworth's to serve in the Royal Navy during World War II. He saw action at sea as a lieutenant on a rocket launcher and was very affected by seeing the violence of which people were capable. He returned to the school in 1945 and taught there until 1961.

As a child, Golding had been fascinated with words, and as an adult he tried his hand at writing, but with little early success. A small volume, Poems (1934), was published when he was twenty-three, but Golding decided he was not a poet. During the early years of his teaching career, he wrote several novels that he himself described as being too derivative, too much like works that had already been written. Publishers were not interested in these works, either. Trying a new tactic, Golding wrote Lord of the Flies (1954). For this novel, he adopted an unusual perspective that he then altered at the end, and he used his experience with small boys to explore the dark side of humanity, which the war had brought to his attention. This time, Golding was more pleased with his efforts, but twenty-one publishers rejected the novel before Faber & Faber published it in 1954. Thus, Golding was forty-three when his literary career began to flourish.

A fairly regular stream of novels followed: The Inheritors (1955), Pincher Martin (1956; first published in the United States as The Two Deaths of Christopher Martin), Free Fall (1959), and The Spire (1964). In addition, he published a collection of essays and book reviews, The Hot Gates, and Other Occasional Pieces (1965).

By 1964, Golding was enjoying the respect of scholars, a widening audience, and financial security. He left Bishop Wordsworth's in 1961 and, after a year as writer-in-residence at Hollins College in Virginia, devoted himself solely to writing.

With the publication of The Pyramid (1967), Golding's reputation suffered a slight decline. Critics gave the novel's linked episodes and light social satire mixed reviews. The publication of three novellas in The Scorpion God: Three Short Novels (1971) did nothing to recoup Golding's reputation, nor did the eight-year hiatus before Darkness Visible was published in 1979. That novel, however, attracted favorable critical attention and won the James Tait Black Memorial Prize in 1979. Golding's reputation was on the rise again. Rites of Passage, the first novel of A Sea Trilogy, followed in 1980, winning the Man Booker Prize and garnering much praise for Golding's parody of eighteenth century prose and for his adaptation of the tradition of sea journals. Golding also won the Man Booker Prize for his collection of essays, A Moving Target, published in 1982. In 1983, Golding was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature, and he was knighted in 1986.

Before Golding completed A Sea Trilogy, three other books appeared: A Moving Target; The Paper Men (1984), a novel dismissed by most critics as the autobiographical musings of a cranky author, who both craved and rejected critical attention; and An Egyptian Journal (1985), an account of a trip to Egypt in the winter of 1984. The publication of Close Quarters in 1987 and Fire Down Below in 1989, however, completed A Sea Trilogy and confirmed the critical praise received for Rites of Passage. The trilogy firmly reestablished Golding as a major novelist of the twentieth century. It has since been reissued as a single volume under the title To the Ends of the Earth: A Sea Trilogy (1991). Another novel, The Double Tongue, was published posthumously in 1995. Set in classical Greece, it centers on the priestess of the Delphic Oracle at a time of growing disbelief. The writer as prophet in a skeptical world and the communicating of wisdom are the predominant themes of the book.

ANALYSIS

Critics have called Golding an allegorist, a fabulist, and a mythmaker. Of the three terms, Golding preferred mythmaker, and when he was awarded the Nobel Prize the citation acknowledged the mythic quality of his work, his ability to illuminate the condition of humankind by means of a concrete story.

